In Ex 3 Moses arrives at the 'Mountain of God' while grazing Jethro's sheep and without noticing where he was going. There he catches sight of the burning thornbush. He approaches with a certain curiosity, is called from the bush by name, is warned not to come nearer, and then is told that in the bush there is dwelling the Elohim of his fathers, the Elohim of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And now Moses covers his face for fear of seeing God. He then is charged to lead the people out of Egypt, to bring it to this 'Mountain of God', whereupon he asks his question concerning the name of this God of his fathers, and receives God's double answer: 'I am who I am' (or 'I will be who I will be for you'), and: I am 'Yhwh, the Elohim of your fathers', 'this is my name for all eternity'. While in the remainder of J the name Yhwh is taken for granted as already familiar, here in E God's revealing of his name occurs for the first time. Moses thus stands in a dramatic dialectic between knowing and not knowing. He knows of a God of the tradition, but he neither knows that he is here present nor who he is (what his name is). And when he asks for the name on account of his mission, he receives a dialectical answer: the one name is a designation without apparent content,[7] and the other name contains the promise of God's self-attestation by a free intervention on behalf of the people, but it evades a specific designation. The name is indeed 'disclosed', and only when it is known is a cult of its God possible for the people.[8] It is now impossible for Israel to say that it does not know its God. Nevertheless, Israel knows him by the fact that its God acts for it and yet concedes it no control over his divine freedom: precisely when one thinks one knows him, this God shows himself sovereignly to be Another. Possibly there once existed a story about the revelation of God's name in connection with the giving of the Law on Sinai: that would be the story in which Moses desires to see the 'glory' (Ex 33.18) or the 'face' (Ex 33.20) of God, but he is refused and receives a vision of God 'only from behind', after God, on going by, had pressed him with his hand into the crack in the rock. 'Yhwh passed before him, and cried out:[9] "Yhwh! Yhwh! a God merciful and compassionate, slow to anger, and abounding in grace and fidelity . . . to the third and the fourth generation." And Moses made haste to bow his head toward the earth, and worshipped' (Ex 34.6ff.). Here the dialectic of knowing and not knowing passes over into that of seeing and not seeing.

---

[7] L Koehler, ThAT (1936), pp. 22f.; Eichrodt, ThAT, I^4, pp. 86f.

c. Seeing and not seeing

The contradiction between seeing and not seeing is glaring. Moses is expressly said to enjoy a vision of God 'face to face, as a man speaks to his friend' (Ex 33.11). Of Moses God says: 'With him I speak mouth to mouth, clearly, and not in dark speech; and he beholds the form (temuna) of Yhwh' (Num 12.8). Moses 'knew God face to face' (Deut 34.10). When the covenant was concluded the one version in Ex 24, which transfers the event to the mountain, tells how Moses according to God's command has himself accompanied by Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and the seventy elders: 'They saw Elohim of Israel; and there was under his feet as it were a pavement of sapphire stone, like the very heaven for clearness.

---

[8] G. von Rad, ThAT, I, p. 184.

[9] It is God who calls out his own name, not Moses; cf. Ex 33.19.

And he did not lay his hand on the chosen men of the people of Israel; they beheld Elohim, and ate and drank' the meal of the covenant before him (Ex 24.9ff.). In a form which is already very reflected, Deuteronomy says also of the whole people that they were 'spoken to by the Lord face to face' (Deut 5.4), 'up on the mountain . . . out of the midst of the fire, the cloud, and the thick darkness' (Deut 5.5, 22). And the people testifies: 'Behold, Yhwh our God has shown us his glory and greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire; we have this day seen God speak with man and man still live' (Deut 5.24). But in the fire and in the cloud 'you saw no form; there was only a voice' which you heard (Deut 4.12, 15). This denial, which here applies to the people, applies also retrospectively to the chosen ones who on the mountain were to 'worship afar off' (Ex 24.1) and who perhaps were not at all present on the mountain at the concluding of the covenant (Ex 24.3–8). Finally, it applies to Moses himself, who is spared the vision of God out of mercy, since 'no man can see me and live' (Ex 33.20). The narrative equates the vision of God with that of his face and of his glory; it refuses to say that one can see 'only' God's glory and splendour but not God himself, and the dialectical nature of the situation is expressed in the story by the movingly naive image that God can be seen 'only from behind'. Caught up in this vision/non-vision, Moses is further said to have been so irradiated by God's glory that, on his descent from the mountain, he had to cover his face before the people with a cloth that he would remove only when he entered the tent to converse with God. This later story may derive from a very old particular tradition (Ex 34.29–35) not belonging to P, and Paul takes it up in a significant passage (2 Cor 3.7; 4.6).

d. Form and non-form

The passages we have quoted reveal the opposition between form and non-form. Can we then speak of a 'form' of God in his revelation? To be sure, fire, cloud, pillar and so forth have something of a form-quality about them, but compared to the forms of the images of the gods they have no form at all. But this is not what is meant when, as a great exception and a special honour, Moses is allowed to see the form of God (Num 12.8). The same word (temuna) is used in Deut 4.12 and 15 to refuse the people any vision whatsoever of a 'form' in the fire at Sinai, out of which God's voice had spoken. Only twice more does this same word occur in connection with God. The first time it is used to express the longing of a psalm-singer, who says that in the morning, 'when I awake, I will be sated with beholding thy form' (Ps 17.15)—as if precisely this privileged word contains the boldest and most exuberant hope of a believer.[10] The second and last time the word temuna occurs is the description of a vision by Eliphaz, the friend of Job: 'Dread came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones shake. A spirit glided past my face; the hair of my flesh stood up. It stood still, but I could not discern its appearance. A form was before my eyes; there was silence, then I heard a voice whisper: "Can mortal man be righteous before God . . .?"' (Job 4.14–17). Here again, in an ecstasy of fright, there is certain knowledge about the presence of a form that is more felt than seen. Nor is there in Num 12.8 any thought of the mal'ak-Yhwh, those temporary embodiments of God in a purely transparent messenger-subject, a personified embassy from God[11] such as we encounter in the old narratives but no longer in Deuteronomy, in P, or in any of the Prophets. For the passage to which Num 12.8 refers is none other than Ex 33.18: 'I pray thee, show me thy glory.'[12] It is in this vision that Moses wanted to be a participant, and not in any mediating embassy. What is actually granted to Moses? He is granted a vision of the Glory after it has passed by, since no one can see it in the

---

[10] For an interpretation, see H.-J. Kraus, Psalmen I (1961²), p. 134.

[11] This is manner of expressing the dialectic that exists 'between the God who is incomprehensible for man and the God who nevertheless really and substantially reveals himself in the phenomenal world.' We here have before us 'a concept of relationship which seeks to characterise an effect as originating in Yahweh and as revealing him, in order then simply to equate the effect with God himself' (Eichrodt, II³, p. 7).

[12] This is the correct reference, as von Gall states (p. 18). No reference to Ex 24.9f. is possible.

'face' (Ex 33.23). And in this context the word tub ('beauty') emerges most unexpectedly: 'I will make all my beauty pass before you' (Ex 33.19). The beauty of God, which is really seen even though his essence (his face) is not seen: beauty as a word for a knowledge which, even in its concealment, is nonetheless disclosed and laid bare, a word for an intimacy such as Jesus must have meant when he reproaches the Jews: 'His voice you have never heard, his form (εἶδος) you have never seen; and you do not have his word abiding in you' (Jn 5.37f.).[13]

e. Dazzling darkness

The visible images that appear to the whole people move in an alternation between blinding light and deepest darkness. And in this it seems that different traditions have been brought together without being fully integrated, and this deliberately. According to the Elohistic tradition (which itself contains other traditions) the very core of the appearance is a deep, oppressive, and threatening darkness—the cloud out of which peals of thunder and flames of lightning erupt (Ex 20.16). To this phenomenal image belong the terrified retreat and flight of the people, which is afraid to die (v. 19) and must be reassured by Moses (v. 20). To it also belong the people's remaining off at a distance and Moses' entrance into the 'thick darkness where God was' (v. 21).

---

[13] May we be allowed to reproduce here some verses of Ephraem the Syrian:

> Behold, as he instructed the people
> Moses spoke of the Majesty in human images.
> He exalted it when he said:
> 'You did not see an image in the midst of the fire';
> for the Unseen One on Sinai did not clothe Himself with an image > lest the people should portray Him in colours.
> He made for Himself a form and a face > in the case of Moses, so as to shape his heart [for Himself].
>
> And He did well by not showing > [either] face or form on Mount Sinai, > so as not to give the heathen an occasion > to represent Him falsely before men.
> But He did well [also] by putting on the form of a face > so as to show us His beauty, that we might perceive His glory . . .
> And although Moses did see,
> he knew that he had not seen.
> It did not escape judicious Moses that his Lord had put on borrowed images . . .
>
> The Genuine One had put on an image;
> the fullness was in it,
> but its splendour was covered by our form.
> For the form was not empty of majesty, > and yet the image was not the Deity itself.

Hymns concerning the Faith, 26, after the German translation of Edmund Beck, Corp. Script. Chr. Oriental., v. 155 (Louvain, 1955), pp. 73f.

An opposite representation is that of J, for whom the core of the appearance is a 'consuming fire' (as it was indeed with the thornbush in Ex 3) that, rather than a cloud, has smoke all about it, and this on two levels: on the natural level, because a great fire, like that of a 'kiln' (Ex 19.18), gives off much smoke, and also on the supernatural level, because the God who reveals himself as a blinding and consuming fire wraps himself in smoke so as to spare man. Now if the first sort of appearance has on the people the effect of the absolutely tremendum, then the second sort is the fascinosum: Moses himself had come closer in order to look more precisely at the phenomenon of the unconsumed bush; and for the people at Sinai strict prohibitions had been necessary: 'Take heed that you do not go up into the mountain or touch the border of it' (Ex 19.12). Moses alone climbed the mountain and penetrated through the layer of smoke to appear before the face of God.

When both images are fused they initially give the impression that what is involved is a volcanic phenomenon.[14] However, the (Yahwistic) divine fire does not erupt from inside the mountain but, like the (Elohistic) cloud, it descends from above. The fact that the 'whole mountain quakes' belongs to the tremendum of God's apparition; this motif persists throughout the entire Old Testament all the way to Golgotha and the Apocalyse. But the motif of light and darkness is subsequently transformed in many ways. First we have the theme of the divine cloud which, already before the crossing of the Red Sea, takes its place at the head of the people: 'Yhwh went before them by day in a pillar of cloud to lead them along the way, and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light' (Ex 13.21). And at the shores of the Sea (Ex 14.9) the 'angel of Yhwh' (14.19) changes his position and now walks among the host of the people, becoming for the Egyptians a purely Elohistic cloud of threats out of which comes God's dark glance, that strikes the enemy armies and wreaks havoc among them (14.24; cf. Josh 24.7).

---

[14] At that time, however, there were no volcanoes on the whole Sinai Peninsula. The closest were perhaps found beyond the Gulf of El-Akaba in the northwest of modern Saudi Arabia. For the reasoning and documentation on this, see Gressman, Mose und sein Zeit (1913), pp. 409ff. Another plausible explanation may be found in A. Alt, Det Gott der Väter, in: Kl. Schriften I (1953), p. 5, note 4.

P harmonises both traditions and henceforth calls the phenomenal appearance the kabod-Yhwh: God, in the form of fire and wrapped in 'the' cloud, is present to the people; the appearing form dominates and, as it were, conducts the whole founding of the cult, most clearly in Ex 40.34–38. When it is completed, the tent of the covenant is taken by God as his possession: 'The cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. And Moses was not able to enter the tent of meeting, because the cloud abode upon it, and the glory of Yhwh [the fire in the cloud] filled the tabernacle' (Ex 40.34f.). In the daytime the people sees only the cloud, and at night it also sees a gleam of fire shimmering through the cloud (then the fire is not only in the tent, but also over it: Num 9.15–23; 10.11f.). And it is this phenomenon, called the 'glory of God', which from Sinai on will rise and move on as sign that the tent was to be lifted, and it will go ahead of the people as either a pillar of cloud or of fire. Finally, P gives a prominent role to the 'glory of God' in the investiture of the priests and in the founding of the sacrificial cult: once the sin-offering, praise-offerings, and peace-offerings have been prepared for the first time, 'the glory of the Lord appeared to all the people, and fire came forth from before the Lord and consumed the burnt offering' (Lev 9.23f.). Even in its liturgised form in P the glory retains its character as a tremendum: it is a hidden, consuming fire which, as in E, can at any moment break out as lightning. This is why the appearance of the glory comes into action also in the sacral administration of justice, either as a fire coming forth from the appearance and consuming (Num 16.19, 35; Lev 10.2),[15] the guilty (the band of Corah, Nadab, and Abihu), or simply as a flame that appears in bright daylight before the assembled people and thus manifests the divine wrath (Num 14.10; 17.7–11; 20.6). Nevertheless, in comparison with the primary dialectic between exceeding brightness and thick darkness, all of these instances that bring the kabod (by now univocally fixed in its essence) into play so as to explain the cultic and juridical spheres appear to us as quite derivative and, indeed, as 'faded' (2 Cor 3.10). The primary scheme whereby the glory is manifested as such again emerges at Tabor (the 'bright cloud'), and lives on as the supereminent light of God in the biblical mysticism of Gregory of Nyssa (the 'ascent of Moses'), of Denys ('dazzling darkness'), and John of the Cross (the 'dark night').

f. Abode and event

In yet another way the sensory manifestation of glory shows itself to be dialectical: namely, in the insoluble contradictions between the various spatial assertions concerning the presence of God. In his manifestations God presents himself as one who dwells, one who descends, one who comes and goes and, finally, as a fellow-traveller. In old cultic sagas which come to be a part of Genesis, and also in the saga about 'God's Mountain' (in Ex 3 and 18.5, probably an ancient shrine for pilgrimage and cult), God shows himself as one who dwells in special places and who reveals himself at times in dreams and visions ('Surely the Lord is in this place; and I did not know it,' Gen 28.16). The sanctuaries and cultic places in the country derive their existence from original appearances that had occurred there, until all of these are finally concentrated by Josiah and Deuteronomy (12) in Zion, which in turn has a founding theophany of its own (2 Sam 24; 1 Chr 21–22.1). But even the God of the Patriarchs was one who descended from heaven (Gen 11.5f.), and such he is again when he turns to the chosen people with which the covenant is to be concluded. The movement of descent opens up a living relational space between the 'place' that is God's and the 'place' that is man's[16]—that space of ascents and descents (Gen 28.12; Jn 1.51) which is the real stage for all biblical revelation. The divine mountain on which God 'dwells' (E) now becomes the divine mountain upon which Yhwh 'descends' in the form of fire (Ex 19.18) and up to which he calls Moses, in turn, to ascend (19.20) and experience a kind of meeting between Heaven and earth. But already in the next verse God tells Moses to go down again to the people (v. 21) and then once more come up together with Aaron (v. 24). Moses' mediatorship will, in spatial terms, result in the fact that henceforth what was valid up on the mountain would also be valid down below among men. This is true especially of the Ten Commandments, along with all the sacral rites that accompany them; but in the end it is also true of the cult which, having been prefigured on the mountain, must be exactly imitated on the plain (Ex 35–40), so that God himself will again be able to come down in his glory and henceforth pitch his tent and dwell among men.

---

[15] In contrast to J, in which the earth opens up and swallows the guilty (Num 16.25–34).

Here we once again find several movements that have become perceptible to the senses. Even before the building of the tabernacle there existed (in ancient fragments of nomadic tradition deriving from E) a 'tent of meeting' (Ex 33.9ff.) outside the camp to which Moses went out to encounter God. 'And when Moses entered the tent, the pillar of cloud would descend and stand at the door of the tent, and Yhwh would speak with Moses', while the people would each stand before him own tent and throw himself to the ground in adoration (Ex 33.9f.).[17] The movement of encounter is conceived of as an event and not as a state, just as had been the case with the occasional appearing of the glory in a cultic or juridical context. In contrast to this, at the consecration of the tabernacle the glory descends definitively to 'abide' (shakan, whence shekina) within the camp (Ex 40.34–38).

---

[16] 'The heavens are the Lord's heavens, but the earth he has given to the sons of Adam' (Ps 115.16).

[17] Cf. Num 11.24.f; 12.4f.; Deut 31.14.

But where did the concluding of the covenant actually take place? Here again two contradictory traditions intertwine beyond all unravelling. Was it up on the mountain where God dwells, the place to which Moses ascends with the representatives of the people and where they eat the covenant-meal in full view of God (Ex 24.1f., 9ff.)? Or was it down at the foot of the mountain where the people promises to keep all God's words and where Moses built the altar and poured the blood of the covenant half on the altar and half on the people after he had read the book of the covenant (Ex 24.3–8)? Both things can and must be asserted: man ascends to the place of God ('transport'), and God descends to the place of man. The event of the sealing of the covenant occurs in both movements, which are not 'purely spiritual' but, rather, take in the sphere of the senses.

And, last of all, after the people has experienced the decisive encounter with God, will it now be sent out into the world as a sanctified people? What will it take away from the experience? A memory, a permanent instruction, a representative of God, or God himself? Again the strands of different narratives intertwine. There must have been an old story in which the shepherd Moses is led to God's mountain, where he receives God's command to lead the people to this same mountain. Here, at his request, he would learn the name of God (Ex 34.6), see also something of his glory, and receive an instruction (33.13). Then follows a dismissal (33.1), for the mountain remains the place of God (33.3; cf. 15); but Moses wants to move no further unless God comes with him (33.15). And so God wants to give him 'an angel' (33.2) for the journey, or 'his appearance, his countenance' (33.14); but Moses needs more. If God does not himself come with them, the people will not be distinguishable from other peoples, since these have their gods with them (33.16). In the end, a tremendous experience of salvation takes place when God's final answer is given in the later version, which has 'God's glory' descend for ever down from the mountain to rest upon the tent, and from this new abode it will lead God's wandering people to the promised land: the eternal God who have can have no 'history' now becomes involved, right along with men, in accomplishing their temporal and spatial movements within the sphere of their lives, and this not only as an observer who steers things from above, but as one who journeys and experiences along with his creatures at their level.

g. Dialectic of fire

When the great paradoxes of God's sensory manifestation recede in Israel's later history, one last paradox, which likewise has one of its origins in Sinai, will always remain alive and constantly attain to new depths of meaning: this paradox is fire. Compared with the other paradoxes we have discussed, this one may appear disappointingly plain, so that we may be tempted to make a dangerous and direct equation: 'Yhwh, your God, is a devouring fire' (Deut 4.24; cf. Heb 12.29); and yet the phrase that immediately follows—'a jealous God'—shows that it never occurred to Israel to equate God with a material fire. But the interior dialectic of fire captivated Israel from the outset, making fire an excellent manifestation of the ineffable. In any event, fire is related to 'Yhwh's glory', which is perceptible to the senses: as lightning out of darkness (E), as 'flame surrounded by smoke' (J), as fiery light in the cloud (P). For Deuteronomy Israel is essentially the people which, at the true hour of its birth, had looked into the flame of God:[18] 'The Lord spoke with you face to face at the mountain, out of the midst of the fire' (5.4). But Israel could not withstand this frightful proximity to the fire, this salamander's existence, and therefore it sent Moses on ahead in order itself to draw back into cooler spheres (5.25ff., continuing Ex 20.18–21). No wonder that God's word, imposing itself from the midst of the divine incandescence, had to appear as fire. 'I am making my words in your mouth a fire, and this people wood, and the fire shall devour them' (Jer 5.14).[19] But the word burns only because God himself burns in his jealousy; and with this a glance into the heart of God becomes possible as never before: if this jealousy communicates so much about his spiritual being, this is because it is the jealousy of a unique election, and this directs us to the uniqueness of the living, free, and sovereign subject involved and already lays open the point where such election can become both a consuming love and the consuming fire of punishment. This is already the case at its first mention at the beginning of the Yahwistic decalogue: 'I am Yhwh, your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt. . . . I am a jealous God, punishing the iniquity of the fathers in the children . . . but showing steadfast love to thousands, to those who love me and keep my commandments' (Ex 20.2, 5f.).[20] In Deuteronomy this consuming character of jealousy is intensified in both directions. Very near is the wrath with which God could blaze out against the unfaithful people and wipe it out from the face of the earth (6.15). Israel's infidelity 'provokes him', 'stirs him up', and he will repay Israel by 'stirring them to jealousy with those who are a non-people' (Assyria); 'for a fire is kindled by my anger, and it burns to the depths of Sheol . . . and will scatter them like dust' (Deut 32.16, 21ff., 26). He will do this, however, because he had found that people 'in a desert land . . ., encircled it, cared for it, and kept it as the apple of his eye' (32.10). Beyond Deuteronomy, this dialectic intensifies in the Prophets, where at times it appears that God's punishing fire will burn utterly everything belonging to the earth (as in the seven oracles at the beginning of the Book of Amos), and where Yhwh's face itself emerges as one single blaze of punishment: 'Behold, . . . his anger glows, his doom is heavy, his lips are frothing with indignation, his tongue is a devouring fire . . ; his breath, like a stream of brimstone, will set afire' the shrine of worship where Israel slaughtered children to Melek (Is 30.27, 33). But precisely this consuming conflagration is God's 'eternal love' [18] Deut 4.11f., 15; 5.4f., 22–26; 9.10, 15; 10.4.

---

---

[19] Cf. Jer 20.9; 23.29.

[20] Likewise Deut 5.6–10.

(Jer 31.3), which will at some time open up to man 'access and nearness' to his heart; for, in fact, 'who would (now) risk his life by approaching me?' (Jer 30.21). This mystery, moreover, will only be fully disclosed when believing man permits himself, in obedience, to be thoroughly consumed by God's fire. Thus, Isaiah is set afire by the glowing coal, Jeremiah feels the word of God burning unbearably in his bones (Jer 20.6), the three youths praise God in the blazing oven (Dan 3) and, finally, Jesus, bringing all this to completion, wants to be baptised in God's fire (Mt 3.11; Lk 12.50).[21] The dialectic of fire, which is launched at the beginning of the Bible with the fiery sword of the Cherub, finds its resolution only in the cross and the eschaton.[22]

Now Elijah had been the early prophet who had himself been full of a 'consuming jealousy for Yhwh Sabaoth' (1 Kings 19.10), who possessed the power to call down God's consuming fire from heaven (1 Kings 18.38; 2 Kings 1.10f.), and who, finally, rode up to heaven in the 'fiery chariot' drawn by 'fiery horses' in the 'whirlwind' (2 Kings 2.11). And it is significant that it is precisely this Elijah who, in his encounter with God, should leave behind all sensory manifestations of God. When following the solitary footsteps of Moses in the wilderness, he experiences on Horeb that God 'passes by' him too; and 'God was not in the great storm', and 'not in the earthquake', and 'not in the fire'. God was in the ultimate experience of being grasped by—rather than grasping—the 'gentle breeze', and this can hardly be perceived any longer by the senses and is more non-vision than vision. This experience, however, is not understood as a 'spiritualisation', but as an intensification of the presence of the 'Awesome',[23] the tremendous presence by virtue of which the contradictory signs are what they are meant to be: indicators which are equivocal in themselves but which derive their total clarity from him who is revealing himself in them.

---

[21] On this, see A. Hamman, Le baptême par le feu (Mélanges de Sc. Rel., v. 8, 1951).

[22] On this theme, see Dict. Spir., art. 'Feu' (J. Gaillard), with bibliography.

[23] '. . . Thus, after the passing of the storm, after the earthquake and the fire, the situation did not now become less tense or even more pleasant just because a soft breeze could be heard. On the contrary, it only then became wholly awesome, or, at any rate, that is how it affected Elijah' (G. von Rad, ThAT, II, p. 33).

2. THE DIVINE 'I'

a. Integration

The Sinaitic kabod-Yhwh,[1] which recurs in the Solomonic kabod, was not an additional phenomenon for P, but rather the actual legitimation of the cultic and sacro-juridical order that had just been erected in the concluding of the covenant. It was God's seal on the document: he himself was visibly present in his majesty. But this sign, so clearly understood by P, is neither the first nor the last word concerning God's glory in the biblical sphere. For one thing, it has already been shown that the forms of sensory manifestation (in E and J—forms that go all the way back to Genesis) were already present before they became fixed in the almost 'technical' concept of the 'glory of God'. And then, too, this fixed formulation will not prevent a great number of similar concepts being utilised to express this same attribute of God, present in sensory phenomena—an attribute which once received not only the description kabod but, in the Greek translation, is precisely rendered as δόξα. This serves as a double warning not to cling one-sidedly to the expression kabod when developing God's glory theologically.[2] The word δόξα also renders hod (8 times: 'glory' as sublimeness, majesty, splendour, magnificence), hadar (8 times: 'glory' as sacred ornamentation), tip'eret and tip'ara (14 times: embellishment, pomp, but also honour, renown); a few times also ga'on (exaltedness, majesty, grandeur), yekar (preciousness, glorious appearance, splendour), 'os (power, solidity, and, when applied to God, glorification).[3] All in all, δόξα renders a total of 25 different Hebrew words, of which kabod is the chief, occurring 181 times. Thus, it is kabod that determines the fundamental meaning and future profile of, and also, as we can infer, colours by association the other Hebrew words having to do with majesty and splendour. This means, in turn, that the sensory appearance which is the centre of gravity in kabod is not a marginal phenomenon that could, in other definitions of 'glory', be heedlessly suspended to make way for an invisible, 'abstract', 'ethical' glory. Kabod shapes the entire gamut of its meanings not least of all because the word has its origin ('heaviness', 'ponderousness', 'imposingness') in

---

[1] This integration, whose result will be shown in the New Testament, forbids us to make a serious dichotomy between two religious schools in the Old Testament: a school of glory (kabod) and a school of holiness (kedusha), as Israel Efros suggests should be done ('Holiness and Glory in the Bible', in: Jewish Quarterly Review, 1950, pp. 363–377). The kabod-school would represent God's immanence and his nearness to man; the kedusha-school stands for God's transcendence and man's striving to exalt God as high as possible. The former would include Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Kabbala; the latter Amos, Isaiah, and the Hasidim. To be sure, one or the other predominates at different times, but each current requires the other and they are constantly crossing.

[2] When A. von Gall, as philologist and exegete, undertakes an investigation concerning the kabod-Yhwh (which if necessary can be translated as the 'glory of Yhwh') and seeks to define the limits of the concepts, he is quite right to refuse himself arbitrary theological remarks which elaborate the concept in an unbiblical manner (p. 16, note). But this does not mean that the English concept 'glory' has to be equated with the almost 'technical' restriction of the concept that P has effected. This is not desirable, for one thing, because then the transition to the δόξα of the Septuagint becomes unintelligible.

---

[3] Complete statistics in: Haire Forster, 'The Meaning of δόξα in the Greek Bible', in: Angl. Theol. Rev. 12 (1929), pp. 311–316; Helmuth Kittel, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes (1934), with tables on pp. 60f.; and Hatch and Redpath, A Concordance to the Septuagint (Oxford, 1897), under the entry δόξα.

A less important issue for us is the much-discussed question as to how it was possible that the Septuagint could have rendered the Hebrew kabod as δόξα. On this see especially: J. Schneider, Doxa: eine bedeutungsgeschichtliche Studie (1932); E. C. E. Owen, 'Δόξα and Cognate Words', in: J. Th. St. 33 (1932), pp. 132–150, 265–279; both the works referred to above by Forster and Kittel; G. Kittel, ThWNT II (1935), pp. 236–240, 245–250; Christine Mohrmann, 'Note sur δόξα', in: Sprachgeschichte und Wortbedeutung: Festschrift für A. Debrunner (1954), pp. 321–328; Elpidius Pax, 'Ex Parmenide ad Septuaginta: De notione vocabuli δόξα', in: Verbum Domini 38 (1960), pp. 92–102.

In Greek usage outside the Bible, δόξα means the opinion that I have about myself or that someone else has about me; in the end it also means a good reputation or renown. It appears in no way to have connoted a luminous radiance perceptible to the senses, which is essential to the Hebrew kabod. Following a suggestion of A. Deissmann and of Reitzenstein, a sphere where the 'sensory' and the 'spiritual' are indivisibly fused, indeed a sphere where, when God is concerned, what manifests itself is without any doubt the very point of reference of the manifestation.[4]

In this respect what we have so far said has shown that the kabod-Yhwh in P is not an original phenomenon, but rather a derived and reflected one, a synthesis of elements which are at odds with one another and which indicate what is manifested not in a 'symbolic' but in a 'dialectical' form, since the subject of this manifestation cannot be given unequivocal expression within the human sphere. We must now concentrate our attention on the subject of this manifestation, namely, the divine 'I', which in the Bible reveals itself on its own initiative as both a speaking and an acting agent. Now, every person who reveals himself by speaking and acting

---

Schneider thought he could demonstrate a certain element of light in δόξα by basing himself on Egyptian magical papyri and late inscriptions. But the sources used by him, in so far as they are conclusive, already belong to the Christian era and, in any event, they are dependent on the Greek Bible. Thus, the assumption of the whole content of the Hebrew word into the Greek word was an 'interference of unusual proportions into the formation of linguistic usage' (G. Kittel, p. 248). Cautious attempts, therefore, were again made to find an element of light in the usage of δόξα outside the Bible. The attempt of E. Pax summons little credibility because it is too far-fetched: he thinks that in Parmenides, and even more so in Plato (in the philosophical use of δόξα as 'true opinion', as in the Meno, 97B), a kindling of the intellectual light (as it awakens to episteme) may be detected. And his questionable translation of such passages connects not with δόξα as 'opinion' but with δόξα as τιμή (renown, honour). Simpler and more insightful is the thought of C. Mohrmann: 'un sens de splendeur, d'éclat dans le cadre des royautés hellénistiques' (p. 326). Whether or not this reference point existed, it appears as even more essential that to the Greek translator the original element of renown in kabod seemed so predominant—as we have ourselves already shown in our discussion—that the centre of gravity seemed to live in this sense of renown and not in the element of splendour. The Targumists will divide the two elements of kabod into two new words: shekina (from shakan, 'to dwell') will refer to the abiding presence of God's majesty, while yekara will be reserved for the sensory splendour of light. An analogous problem emerges, in turn, when we seek to translate δόξα into Latin: majestas (more European) and claritas (more African) were first used, and both were later on displaced by gloria which, already in profane usage, was the normal rendering of δόξα. See bibliography on this in C. Mohrmann, loc. cit.

[4] On this see especially Abrahams (loc. cit.), pp. 16f.

necessarily discloses as well something about his nature—supposing that the person is truthful. God too, therefore, by speaking and acting, discloses something of his unique being, which is infinitely exalted above everything worldly. Because of this, what we have been describing as 'God's glory' in the phenomenal realm is now inseparably coupled both to the modes of expression of the divine 'I' and to the qualities proper to God which must necessarily be disclosed in his revelation.

From the historical viewpoint, Israel's understanding of God must be deepened by the fact that, in God's active word, God's inner being is disclosing itself ever more richly. In this, the paradox that in his self-disclosure God becomes ever more manifest as the Incomprehensible One must retain its full vigour. It is also a process of integration: the more the aspects of God are differentiated, the more they reciprocally interpenetrate, and this because all of them bear that quality of the infinite subject which is discovered time and again in the other aspects. The historical unfolding and deepening of revelation (which we will not here be able to treat in detail) is, therefore, the most splendid possible introduction to theology, for it occurs under the guidance of the Theos legon—the speaking God—himself. The course of revelation shows that God 'is not only the Lord (der Herr), but the Lord of glory (Herrlichkeit), and, conversely that all glory is the glory of God the Lord (die Herrlichkeit Gottes des Herrn) . . . It does not go without saying that God . . . is the Lord of glory; there is a danger of a cleavage here. God as the Lord can be viewed and understood, so to speak, in a punctiliar or in a linear manner . . . We may well prefer the dark secret of our own existence to the whole range of this purely economic glory of God, i.e. to the unknown quantity, the inscrutable being who is concealed by it.' But in the end it would be deadly for faith 'if God were not the God of glory'. On the other hand, 'the glory of God can be seen and understood in a way which dissipated and dissolves it because it has no Lord.' This would be the case if we understood it to be something like a 'collection of mighty potencies . . ., conceptual forces, of principalities and powers', behind which God's being would withdraw as unknowable.[5] Late Judaism, with its hypostasisations of God's utterances and attributes, did not wholly evade this danger, and the Church's theology in both East (Gregory Palamas) and West (Gilbert de la Porrée) often approached it. But when this happens the very essence of revelation is destroyed.

Both historically and in an objective, systematic sense, the different aspects (of which we will treat only the most outstanding in what follows) become integrated as they converge through time; from a certain clarity which these aspects possess in the pre-biblical, mythical sphere, we see them proceed towards a point of convergence which will have to lie beyond the Old Testament in the new clarity of Jesus Christ. This gives to the Old Testament understanding of God that peculiar suspension we already spoke of in the first volume.[6]

b. Power

The overwhelming sensory signs by which God proclaims his presence point initially, in an elemental way, to power. At a later time these signs appear amalgamated in the phenomena of a storm: the threatening oppressiveness of oncoming darkness, the stormwind that suddenly scours the land, the growling voice of the thunder, the lightning that blindingly flares out of the darkness, the waters suddenly released from above, hail that wreaks havoc upon helpless man . . . And little imagination is required to understand even today how the Israelite, as a being close to nature, could see in the overriding might of natural forces an immediate and evident manifestation and a most sublime expression of the overriding might of his God. Yhwh, however, was never primarily a nature-god, but rather a God who led, chose, and instructed.[7] The power of nature does not characterise his being; at best it points to it. His power is the potency of one who can, one who has at his disposal a tremendous space of freedom within which to act.

---

[5] Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics II/1, pp. 324–326.

[6] Volume I, pp. 619f. (Eng. trans.).

[7] M. Buber, Königtum Gottes (1932); now in Werke II (1964), pp. 589–649.

To be sure, at first Israel experiences this might of its God above all in war. Yhwh has the powers of nature as his helpers to conquer his and Israel's enemies and cast panic and fear among them:[8] some foes he drowns in the sea, others he buries in the gaping earth.[9] He himself is a 'warrior hero' (Ex 15.3) and his glory merges in the processional hymn Ps 24 with his renown in war:

Who is the King of glory?
  Yhwh, strong and mighty,
  Yhwh, mighty in battle! . . .
Who is the King of glory?
  The Lord of hosts,
  he is the King of glory! (Ps 24.8, 10).

Victory in battle is the first decisive proof of the fact that the God who has chosen Israel and given it his command can accomplish what he has desired and begun. This proof-by-power demonstrates that that mysterious 'I', who wanted to reveal his name only by pointing to his active presence (Ex 3.14), had been the right divine 'I,' and that it is good to trust in him. Ever since this discovery Israel understands God's glory immediately to be a superior lordliness which imposes itself; both attributes become interlocked.

Thy right hand, O Lord, is glorious in power . . .
In the greatness of thy majesty thou overthrowest thy adversaries (Ex 15.6f.).

In a storm-psalm we read: 'The voice of Yhwh is powerful, / the voice of Yhwh is full of majesty' (Ps 29.4). And in a hymnic psalm: 'Ascribe to Yhwh glory and strength!' (Ps 96.7).[10] It is important that in the New Testament the close union of 'glory' and 'power' will be preserved intact. The Son of Man will come to judge 'with great power and glory' (Mt 24.30). Paul wishes the Colossians to grow in the spirit of Christ κατὰ τὸ κράτος τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ (1.11); and when he censures the pagans for not having recognised 'his eternal power and divinity' from the works of his creation, he adds immediately: 'They exchanged the glory of the immortal God for images resembling mortal man' (Rom 1.20, 23). The divine subject is no empty, indeterminable point; he has the whole space of freedom, which allows him to be present wherever he will: in the world, in his enemies, but especially in the covenant with his chosen friends.

---

[8] 1 Sam 7.10; Judg 5.4, 10; and passim. Perhaps the 'Sabaoth' over which Yhwh rules were originally mythical powers of the nature-religion (V. Maag, 'Jahwäs Heerscharen', in: Festschrift für L. Köhler, 1950, pp. 27–52), or also his own powers (O. Eissfeldt, 'Jahwä Zebaoth', in: Miscell. Acad. Berolinensia, 1950, pp. 128f.).

[9] Ex 16.4f.; Num 16.33.

[10] More passages in ThW, II, p. 293 (Grundmann).

c. Word

All sensory revelation of glory is directly oriented to the word of God. Such revelation does not for a moment produce a word that reposes in itself; rather, it is a signal of a speech that is just beginning, a signal that points to the quality of the speaker.[11] Even if the various forms of the decalogue are never wholly successfully incorporated into the stories of theophanies, the very fact of their incorporation, along with all the relevant instructions, shows clearly the place assigned to sensory manifestations. And in the calling of the Prophets the appearances and the word are even more intimately associated.

The word lacks all dialectical elements; both in its utterance and in its origin from the divine 'I', the word is unambiguous. The fact that it can and must also be two-sided—a word of grace and a word of judgment—in no way calls its clarity into question.[12] The signal of the kabod calls attention to the fact that the word which resounds is that of the absolute subject whose particular 'cadence' all by itself can sufficiently prove that it is the Lord's. For the word immediately confiscates, as it were, the whole existence of its hearers, their entire relationship both to God and to the world. Sirach has summarised all of this in two verses:

---

[11] This is true starting from the revelation on Sinai. For certain theophanies of the period of the Patriarchs, see below pp. 193f.

[12] Cf. pp. 162ff., 169ff., 217f.

> Their eyes saw the glory (δόξα) of his majesty > (μεγαλεῖον), > and their ears heard the glory of his voice (δόξα > φωνῆς).
> And he said to them, 'Beware of all unrighteousness > (service to idols).'
> And he gave commandment to each of them > concerning his neighbour (17.13f.).

God's word always undergirds its hearer's whole existence; it orders individual aspects of his life only by directing the entire course of his life. It is pure objectivity, which finds a foothold neither in the hearer's desires nor in his fears, and this objectivity quite simply expects only one single answer from the hearer: assent and obedience. It demands assent not because the hearer is 'of the same opinion' or because he suddenly 'intuits' what is at stake. Rather, assent is required because, in a most effortless way, the word possesses the quality of glorious lordliness and proclaims a will which takes hold of man beyond all appeal. In all the history of religions there is no analogy for such a unity of objectivity (it is the word that approaches man) and totality (the word demands obedience with one's whole existence). The objectivity permits no intervening space to exist between the speaker and the listening subject; what it creates there is perfect immediacy; and, because the word proceeds from him who is the owner of the listening subject and who as such knows him through and through, the word is a challenge to the subject which presents him with the most evidently sensible and possible of realities.

> This commandment which I command you this day is not too hard for you, neither is it far off. It is not in heaven, that you should say, 'Who will go up for us to heaven, and bring it to us, that we may hear it and do it?' Neither is it beyond the sea, that you should say, 'Who will go over the sea for us, and bring it to us, that we may hear it and do it?' But the word is very near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart, so that you can do it (Deut 30.11–14 = Rom 10.6–8).

It is precisely this immediacy, which penetrates mouth and heart, that demonstrates the power of the word. It does not, however, intend to be a power that does violence but rather one which summons insistently: in the word, the infinite 'I' summons the finite 'I' to be fully itself.

At Sinai the people is a vague and timorous collective (Deut 5.25f.); the possibility of being a self is communicated to it through the person of Moses. The fact that later on the king will not be a representative of the mythical collective before the deity, but rather a person called to obedience (consider Saul!), is due to the connection between Nebiism and the emerging monarchy. The first figure in all the history of civilisation to possess an 'I' perfectly is the prophet Isaiah, who hears God's question: 'Whom shall we send?' and at once gives his 'Here I am!' (von Rad). And the more deeply the human self awakens in the answer it gives, the more boundlessly do the heights and depths of the absolute 'I' open out before him in the glorious lordliness of the divine word. Israel, moreover, stylises its ancestor Abraham under this emblem, then to understand itself as his descendant. The present, however, is understood as an order established upon God's word of command (legal and priestly tradition); but it is an order that may not resist the word when it irrupts with ever-new commands (prophetic tradition). And if at first a great number of commandments appeared simply to coexist alongside one another, gradually one all-encompassing and form-giving commandment emerges ever more clearly: this is the command that the created 'I' shall be immediately and exclusively at the disposal of the disposing 'I'. Under the influence of Hosea, Deuteronomy formulates this as 'love with all one's heart, all one's soul, and all one's might' (Deut 6.5). This it was that resounded out of the shapeless fire (Deut 4.32–40). The Deuteronomic historiographs make this the criterion for the whole history of the people. P even has the sensory 'glory of God' become a kind of word of command which the people (ideally speaking) are to follow in an attitude of pure readiness:

> Whenever the cloud was taken up from over the tent, after > that the people of Israel set out; and in the place where the cloud settled down, there the people of Israel encamped. At the command of the Lord the people of Israel set out, and at the command of the Lord they encamped.

The same motif is played through to the end of the chapter (Num 9.15–23; cf. Ex 40.36ff.).

If, in the realms of sensory signs, the covenant could be concluded only by a 'transport' of the people up to the mountain, in the same way the word of God can be received and followed by man only by a 'transport' out of his spirit into the Spirit (ruach) of God, or—and this amounts to the same thing—by an ingrafting of God's Spirit into the spirit of man. 'This is my covenant with them, says Yhwh: my Spirit which is upon you, and my words which I have put in your mouth, shall not depart out of your mouth . . .' (Is 59.21). 'Thou gavest thy good Spirit to instruct them . . ., and didst warn them by thy Spirit through thy prophets,' prays Nehemiah (9.20, 30; cf. 2 Sam 23.2), and the penitential psalm implores: 'O God, take not thy holy Spirit from me' (Ps 51.11). Only in community of spirit with God is obedience to his word possible, and this community of spirit teaches the 'fear of the Lord': that is, the difference between the Thou that bestows and exacts in a lordly way and the Thou that acknowledges and obeys through its service. In the Spirit man experiences the glory of the word, in so far as in this Spirit he is given to know what Lord's word it is.

Regardless of whether man admits God's Spirit into himself interiorly or whether he resists it with a rebellious and hardened heart, God's word exhibits itself as deed by virtue of the power with which it imposes itself on man. Precisely by dividing for man simultaneously into a promise and a threat, a grace and a judgment, God's word demonstrates its transcendental unity and power. And the more the history of this power becomes revealed, the more does it become clear that God's word is not limited or frustrated by man's opposition; rather, it disposes of every enemy and brings the realisation of its every content to full term. Through the bifurcation of God's efficacious word into a grace and a judgment in its worldly form, the unity and uniqueness of the acting 'I' are laid bare in the most direct way possible. 'I, I am the Lord . . . I have revealed and saved and proclaimed . . . There is none who can deliver from my hand; I work and who can hinder it?' (Is 43.11ff.; cf. Num 23.19).

d. Holiness and name

The fact that God utters himself makes him both nameable and approachable, but by the same token it reveals his incomparability and unapproachableness. He does indeed disclose his name, but only as a holy name. Both these aspects of God, therefore, are immersed in his sublime majesty.

What the holiness of the living God might be comes to light for Israel only very slowly, following the same rhythm with which his word manifests him as the free and sovereign Lord. Along with the creature's primal, intuitive knowledge concerning the abyss in being between a relative and an absolute, between the world of men and that of the gods,[13] there also comes a primal concept of holiness: everything within the world that belongs to the realm of the divine or the god is radically 'set aside' or 'separated' from the world (temenos from temnein, sanctus from sancire, tabu = 'taken out'), and it is therefore dangerous for mortals to approach it. Whoever enters this sphere for cultic purposes is in need of purification, and whoever is permanently associated with the cult must be especially consecrated. The cult consists of prayer that placates and especially of sacrifice: the thing or person sacrificed is sundered from the realm of the profane and considered holy, in the sense of having become a possession of the god. All of this is still 'natural' religion which continues however to have a vital existence in Israel's understanding of holiness and in its cultic life. Holy is what belongs to the sphere of God: first of all, the heavens, God's dwelling on earth, the tent, the ark of the covenant, Zion itself; also everything having to do with the priesthood and the usages and objects of the cult. The element of danger is strongly emphasised throughout; the line of demarcation between clean and unclean cuts right through the middle of everyday life. The Israelite lives constantly on the dividing-line and must continually become aware of the fact that the realm of the divine is making demands on him. Is all of this a stubborn residue of the mythical understanding of existence? One thing is clear, namely, that in Israel ritualism does not wane while prophetism waxes strong; the former actually surpasses the latter, and in the final phase ritualism even gains new ground and passes on to the New Testament this primal form of massively incarnate human religiosity. The Letter to the Hebrews will in due time interpret the meaning of this transmission.

---

[13] Volume IV, pp. 45–55, 93, 109f., 270f. (Eng. trans.).

In spite of the integrity of the concept, the interior understanding of holiness was drastically revolutionised by the revelation through the word, especially in the case of the prophets. This can be seen already in the fact that, by his word, God takes possession of the whole chosen people, thereby separating it from the world and introducing it into his own divine sphere. Moreover, if God can do this it is because he has power over the whole 'profane' world:

> From now on . . . you shall be my own possession among all peoples; for all the earth is mine, and you shall be to me a kingdom of priests [or shall belong to the royal realm of my lordship as those closest to the king's hand] and a holy [consecrated] nation (Ex 19.5f.).

With this Israel has been fundamentally lifted out of the oppostion between sacred and profane, and since God has chosen Israel out of his possession, which is the whole earth, the whole earth too has been taken out of that dichotomy, at least with regard to the end of times (Zech 14.20). Once the dichotomy between sacred and profane is thus relativised within the world, then the centre of gravity of the concept of holiness is transferred to God himself: over against all worldly reality, God is the 'thrice holy' (Is 6.3) and, in the end, the 'only holy' one (1 Sam 2.2; Rev 15.4), because he alone is God, and he can swear by nothing other than his own holiness (Am 4.2), his own distinctive divinity. But God does not keep this his divinity for himself behind his revelation in word and deed; rather, he offers it as the divine space (temenos) in which Israel is henceforth to dwell after being 'transported' out of itself. This whole space now has the qualities formerly had by one single 'holy' object (as, for instance, the ark of the covenant): it is at the same time the bearer of salvation and a source of peril. This is an extension of the two aspects of grace and of judgment that already characterised the word of God; or, even better, judgment becomes inevitable when man receives the grace of being admitted to the dwelling-space of God and when he is given to know and to learn God's 'customs and ordinances' (Lev 18.4). 'Be holy, for I, Yhwh, your God, am holy' (Lev 19.2). By grace they have already been taken up and 'transported', so that now, by having heard God, they belong to God ('you are consecrated and have become holy, for I am holy,' Lev 11.44); under threat of judgment they must obey God and 'belong wholly to him' (Deut 18.13).[14]

Like his word, God's holiness is active; it imposes itself and has an effect. Starting with Ezekiel, this is expressed by saying that God 'sanctifies himself' before the world and its peoples,[15] and then also in Israel (Lev 10.3; 22.32; Num 20.12). And since in so doing he shows himself to be the Lord God, he also 'glorifies' himself. There thus emerges a circumincession between holiness and glory that also becomes visible in the fact that God consecrates the tent of meeting by his kabod: 'This place shall be sanctified by my glory' (Ex 29.43).[16] Or, as the latter part of the song of victory at the Sea of Reeds has it: God is 'glorious in holiness' (Ex 15.11).

---

[14] In this passage there is an intricate but suggestive play of words with hörig and gehörig, gehorsam and angehören, all driving from the stem hör— and variously meaning 'to hear' or 'listen to', 'to obey', and 'to belong to', concepts which von Balthasar interrelates theologically. Translator's Note.

[15] Ezek 20.41; 28.22, 25; 36.23; 38.16; 39.27.

[16] Ex 14.4, 17. In Ezekiel the various verbs of sanctification and glorification are sometimes congregated in the same verse: μεγαλυνθήσομαι καὶ ἁγιασθήσομαι καὶ ἐνδοξασθήσομαι καὶ γνωσθήσομαι (38.23). Ezek 39.21 and 27 speaks in parallel fashion of God's revelation of his glory and his revelation of his holiness.

Drawing closely on Oetinger and Bengel, Herntrich has written (Isaias, Correspondingly, Israel's obedience must also be active; it will thus 'sanctify' the holy God (Num 27.14),[17] or, what amounts to the same, it will let him be Lord, thereby 'glorifying' him.[18] That this is no merely external giving of praise is clear from the outset; at the deepest level, it is by making room for grace that man obediently contributes to God's self-sanctification and self-glorification in the world.

By revealing his holiness God both manifests and communicates the distinctive fact that he is God, and by doing so he reveals his name.[19] The name is communicated to Moses in such a way that at once a mysterious reticence on his part follows—and this reserve is a continuation of earlier inquiries about God's name which had been met with a negative answer (Gen 32.29; cf. Judg 13.18). Even into the New Testament the naming and the Name will retain something of an esoteric side to it (Phil 2.9; Rev 2.17). That God dares to 'hand over' his name to men is a sign of the highest grace, love, and self-surrender; there is no question that with the traditio nominis God himself is handed over, and that he enters a commitment with those who know and invoke his name. Nonetheless, God does not come into their possession for the reason that, even as he becomes known by name, he also is revealed as the mighty and ruling Lord. Because he calls out 1950, on 6.3): God's 'holiness is his hidden, concealed glory . . . And his glory is his holiness made manifest.' The interpenetration of these two aspects of God is nowhere expressed so clearly as in the vision of Isaiah.

---

[17] Deut 32.51; Is 8.13; 29.23.

[18] On this, see below pp. 204ff.

[19] We can here disregard all time-conditioned elements, since the fundamental understanding of what we mean is not dependent on them. Things which elsewhere hold a primordial place in connection with names have in the Bible become insignificant: for instance, that the name is by nature so closely bound to the being which bears it that, through knowledge of the name, one acquires power over this being and can cast spells with the name. The great difference here is due to the fact that the communication of God's name is so totally a free action on God's part that he is in no way robbed of his nature as Lord. Furthermore, one can speak only very marginally, and then only quite late, of hypostasisations of the name of God which, once again, are unimportant for a total understanding of the question.

his own name, it is he who calls and names man, thereby taking man as his possession (Is 43.1). When God's name was spoken over someone, it meant that he became God's possession. To know the name of God, who still remains eternally mysterious, does not therefore mean to know one part of God and not to know another and surely greater part. To know God's name, rather, means that one has been vouchsafed the self-revelation of a God who, even as he reveals himself, shows himself to be the ever-greater Lord and who has assumed into his service the person who henceforth knows him. Thus, Israel understood the grace of being allowed to know its God's name as a pledge of his presence, something like a sacrament, as with Christ's eucharistic presence in the New Testament. At the beginning of the Book of the Covenant God himself ordained which would be the places where his name was to be invoked (Ex 20.24), the places, therefore, where he wanted to be present in a special manner. When, in the passage about the establishment of a single place for the cult, Deuteronomy also emphasises the fact that God dwells in heaven[20] and that he allows 'only' his name to be present in the earthly temple,[21] the point may have been to implant anew the concept of the ever-greater and free God against suspected magical abuses of the time. But Deuteronomy never called into question God's proximity to man or man's intimacy with God (Deut 30.14). With the destruction of the temple one part of this tension is lost; God and his name are now one: God is manifest and acts in heaven and, from there, also on earth. From this point on the name (shem), as God's manifest aspect, will, on the one hand, be an alternate term for God himself[22] and, on the other hand, it will be interchangeable with God's 'word'.[23] With this, moreover, 'name' enters into circumincession with 'glory': objectively, in so far as the name is that aspect of God through which he shows himself in the world as mighty

---

[20] Deut 4.36; 26.15.

[21] Deut 12.5, 11, 21; 14.23; 16.2, 6, 11; 26.2.

[22] For example, Ps 68.5; 86.12; 92.2; Is 25.1, and so on.

[23] O. Grether, 'Name und Wort Gottes im Alten Testament', in: ZAW, Beih. 64 (1934), p. 38.

Lord;[24] subjectively, because by the very act of knowing God's name, invoking, and taking refuge in it (Ps 124.8), man is glorifying God precisely in his name (Ps 86.9, 12).[25] The wise praise the Name (Ps 106.47; 145.21) as being objectively 'glorious' (tehilla, parallel to shem). 'Blessed be his glorious name for ever; may his glory fill the whole earth!' (Ps 72.19; cf. 102.16f.).

The mutal interpenetration of 'holiness', 'name', and 'glory' will be maintained in the New Testament, where Jesus' life's task is summarised as the glorification of the name of the Father (Jn 12.28; 17.4, 26), and where he places the prayer for the hallowing of this same name on the lips of his disciples (Mt 6.9; cf. Is 29.23), while Mary, hearkening back to Ps 111.9, praises the name of the Lord as holy (Lk 1.49).

e. Face

While God's word, his holiness, and his name have manifested ever more clearly who it is that has become involved with Israel, we may now last of all consider his countenance, the Face that turns toward the believer—the Face which he piously seeks, before which he stands, in which he takes refuge. We have seen that, in the case of sensory perception, the experience of vision/non-vision consisted of feeling one's way through the contradiction between excessive light and darkness. Here, however, total clarity is finally attained: God's face is light (Ps 89.16) and in no way darkness, and this emphatic clarity will persist uninterruptedly all the way to John (1 Jn 1.5) despite the gnosticism of every age. Word, holiness, and name qualify this unambiguous light as a love, a goodness, and a grace that is manifested in God's very act of turning toward the creature. This content of the act is so undeniable that it becomes impossible to speak of not seeing God's face. There exists in Israel an evidence of God's manifestness as the Lord that far outshines all inner-worldly evidence, and that divine evidence is in no way affected by the modern distinction between sensory vision and spiritual insight; rather, that evidence quite outdistances this distinction. All of bodily-spiritual man 'knows',[26] in the manner of perception, that the Lord who created him body and soul is there standing before him, and he himself lies there in outspread nakedness before the Lord's eyes. Thus, Philo interpreted 'Israel' (Jacob's new name after his wrestling-bout with God) not as 'strong against God' (which was originally probably 'let God be strong') but as 'God-seeing man'.[27] For this is precisely what God had intended for Israel: it was to 'see and know, consider and understand . . . that the Holy One of Israel has done this' (Is 41.20). So, also, speaks Deuteronomy when it interprets the theophany on Sinai as but the starting-point which actually implied the turning of the infinite 'I' toward man: 'Behold, Yhwh, our God, has shown us his glory and greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire; we have this day seen God speak with man and man still live' (Deut 5.24). No evidence is more compelling than that provided by one's having been looked on, particularly when it is before the Creator's eyes that the creature is standing.[28] Israel already knew in a primitive way, not to be qualified as ‘mythical’,[29] what later on the Christian tradition of spiritual wisdom would seek after and know as ‘walking in God’s presence’—and for this the prerequisite is not an esoteric technique and training, but rather ‘purity of heart’ and the pliancy of faith. There is a dimension of listening to God that could be qualified as ‘seeing God’,[30] and this seeing is based on being seen by God. ‘He looks to the ends of the earth, and sees everything under the heavens’ (Job 28.24). ‘There is no hiding from his gaze, his seeing stretches from age to age’ (Sir 39.19f.).

---

[24] Thus, too, the interchangeability of 'name' and 'power': Ps 54.1; 20.2; 44.6; Pr 18.10, and passim..

[25] In the Canticle of Azariah (S of 3 Y = Dan 3.24ff.) the plea for the glorification of the Name is incessantly repeated.

---

[26] Here the various languages have become for us repositories of ancient wisdom. Greek εἴδω ('to see') is actually ←ειδω, Latin video. The root weid at once connotes 'seeing' and 'knowing' (Gothic witan, Old High German wizzan); Sanskrit vedas = 'knowledge', Gothic weis = OHG wîs = Modern High German weise = English wise. Greek ὁράω is actually ←οραω, Latin vereor ('to fear' or 'dread'); Gothic and OHG war: 'cautious', 'wary'; wara; 'heed', 'attention'; gi-war = MHG gewahr werden ('to become aware of'), gewahren ('to perceive'), wahrnehmen ('to perceive'), and also warten ('to await', 'to be on the look-out'). The root wer or war means 'to watch for' or 'to look after': Greek οὖρος = 'keeper', 'warder'; φρουρά (προ-ὁρά) = 'watch', 'guard'. Similar word-families could be traced for other 'sensory perceptions', which always connote the perceiving disposition of the whole person.

[27] De Mut. Nom. XII (81). Philo is here followed by Irenaeus (C. Haer. IV, 20, 1) and Hippolytus (C. Noet. 5).

[28] Philo, De Somn. 2, 226. Nicholas of Cusa, De visione Dei 5. R. Guardini, Der Engel in Dantes göttlicher Komödie (1951), pp. 128f. E. Biser, Gott ist tot (1962), pp. 48f. R. Mosis, Der Mensch und die Dinge nach Johannes vom Kreuz (1961), pp. 114f., and passim.

Once the hearer of the word knows who it is that sees him in such a way, this condition whereby his whole existence lies open in the sight of God produces at first a deep fright, and then a deep happiness, and it concludes with the plea that one may continue to be seen ever more piercingly by God in this manner (Ps 139).[31] This sort of statement, and others like it (Job 34.21; Ps 11.4; 33.13–15; Jer 32.19), at first has the whole span of the created world as its object; but gradually God’s glance gathers up, as it were, to focus on those who know him and, therefore, fear him (‘Behold, the eye of Yhwh is on those who fear him, on those who hope in his steadfast love’, Ps 33.18), and on those who need him in their distress (‘From heaven Yhwh looked at the earth, to hear the groans of the prisoners', (Ps 102.19f.). If God's 'exaltation' above the heavens manifests his 'glory', then his 'glance into the depths' manifests his grace (Ps 113.4–7); indeed, his exaltation can be a judgment on those who raise themselves up proudly: on these the Lord turns his back; but all his sublimeness was never an obstacle to his regard for the little ones (Ps 138.6).

---

[29] This, of course, does not mean that the experience of God’s presence in Israel, too, could not be extremely nuanced, according to the degree of purity of heart (Ps 11.7) and the intensity of faith’s surrender. But to assert the reality of the fact that one has been addressed by the word of God at once places one directly before the ‘face’ of the speaker. Cf. Scheeben, Mysterien des Christentums (1865), pp. 726f., 736, 746; Dogmatik III (1862), pp. 694f.; also, everything the present work has said on this subject (Vol. I, pp. 219ff. (English translation).

[30] Jer 23.18; Ezek 13.3; etc.; cf. God’s speaking with Moses ‘from mouth to mouth’, ἐν εἴδει, Num 12.8. And consider the way in which Sir 17.6 describes the formation of the human senses by God (‘he made for them tongue and eyes . . . and ears’), and v. 13 describes how they are to be used: ‘Their eyes saw his glorious majesty, and their ears heard the glory of his voice’: and both these faculties are naturally rooted in the same ‘power of comprehension’ (σύνεσις, v. 11, from συνίημι, ‘to bring together’, ‘to understand’).

[31] Cf. R. Guardini’s beautiful interpretation of this psalm in Wahrheit und Ordnung 3 (1955).

If the dialectic of sensory manifestation, however, has been transcended because God's face always gives forth light, nevertheless at this higher level another dialectic returns which derives from our manner of knowing. God's glance and his face are grace, but God's face can be either uncovered or concealed, turned towards one or averted. This elemental experience, too, can embrace the full extent of the created world, and in this way it expresses a radically anti-theistic religious experience of existence. When God hides his face everything created dies away, and when he again turns his face toward creation everything awakens to new life.[32] This experience, moreover, is ever more firmly rooted in Israel's distinctive experience, namely, that God's face can relate to it in contrary ways: in times of grace, God's face is turned towards Israel and gives forth light, in times of anger it is either turned away or turned towards Israel in a terrible manner, and beyond both these possibilities there is still the frightful experience of Job, for whom in the night of suffering God's naked glance becomes unbearably fierce.[33]

When God makes the light of his face shine on man (Ps 31.17; 44.4; 67.2; 80.4, 8, 20; 119.135; Dan 9.17) and man is allowed to live and walk in the light of the eternal Countenance (Ps 89.16), then man's experience of life itself moves into the light: 'In thy light do we see light' (Ps 36.9)—hence the prayer that the sunrise of God's face may dawn on man (Ps 4.7), and the liturgical blessing imploring that 'Yhwh may make his face to shine upon you . . ., may reveal his countenance to you' (Num 6.25f.; cf. 2 Chron 30.9). And, as he prays, the believer seeks to 'placate' God's face (1 Sam 13.12; Ps 119.58) when it is angry and turned away.

[32] Ps 104.29f.; 146.4; Gen 3.19; Job 10.12; 12.10; 34.14f.; Eccles 12.7.

[33] See the chapter on Job below, pp. 281–290.

There are numerous passages that either threaten people with such turning away or that describe it as having already happened; but in all of them it is the sin of man which is the cause of this concealment.[34] However, although sin does dig out the deep abyss between God and man (Is 59.2), God's turning away is not the simple 'result' of sin, but rather a personal decision of God (Is 57.17) that finally does indeed deliver the sinner over 'to the power of his sin' (Is 64.6b). In this active sense God 'turns his face against' the sinner [35] and declares war upon him.[36]

Once this all-embracing concept of God's face and glance, which can be turned toward or away from man, is taken seriously, then we will refrain from dismissing as a merely traditional and metaphorical 'manner of speaking' the very numerous statements about 'seeking the face of God' and longing for the 'vision' of him.[37] To be sure, the expression 'to see' or 'to seek the face of Yhwh' means first of all 'to come into the temple', analogous to the way in which they used to say throughout the Orient, upon being admitted to audience before a king or other high-ranking person, that one has 'seen the face' of the person involved. In the context of a pagan holy place the expression can additionally mean that one has come before the image of the god or that one has glimpsed the images of the gods in a solemn procession. In Israel there may have been an analogy for this in the procession with the ark of the covenant, which was considered the throne of the present God.[38] The plastic quality conveyed by those words that speak of God's becoming visible in the temple during liturgical celebrations has given occasion for the conjecture that, at given high points in the cult, certain ecstatics or appointed prophets used to give witness to a theophany granted to them;[39] but for this we have no proof whatsoever. The mythical analogies are too far-removed and the ceremonial analogies too shallow to explain the intensity of Israel's longing to see God. And even if at an early period the 'face of God' sometimes was taken to connote a kind of substitute theophany (in the already mentioned version of the Exodus saga, Ex 33.14, in which God, instead of himself going forth with the people, wants to appoint his angel or his 'face' to accompany them), still this distinction very soon disappears: God's face is himself as he turns in grace toward man and becomes fully present to him. This is what we read, for instance, in Is 63.9, where it is expressly said: 'It was no envoy, no angel, but he himself that delivered them; he himself ransomed them by his love and pity.' Over and beyond all mythical analogies, Israel's liturgical utterances are thus to be regarded as unique expressions of this 'historically incarnate' religion; it is a religion in which the evidence of the God who bears witness to himself in word and historical deed (Ps 105.4f.) is closely bound to the intimate experience of the believer's heart, pliant to the word and always reciprocating it. It is also a religion in which the official pilgrimage to the temple as authentic focus of God's presence is the same thing as taking 'refuge' there when in personal distress. 'In Yhwh I take refuge . . . The upright shall behold his face' (Ps 11.1, 7). And in Ps 17.15 we read the mysterious words: 'I shall behold thy face (panim) in righteousness (sedek, that is, in the realm of God's salvation); when I awake, I shall be satisfied with beholding thy form (temuna)'; here the parallelism points to a very high degree of actualisation. In Ps 24 we see an anticipation of the promise of the Sermon on the Mount that the 'pure hearts' (v. 4) which 'seek the face of the God of Jacob' (v. 6) will experience his appearing.[40] The person praying in Ps 27 importunes God in his desire for greater personal immediacy; here heart speaks to face: 'Of thee my heart says: "Seek his face." Thy face, Yhwh, do I seek. Hide not thy face from me' (v. 8). At the conclusion of the prayer ('Wait for the Lord!', v. 14) faith's certainty of the coming vision is almost indistinguishable from the hope that longs for it. The real fulfilment of the Old Testament lies in such heart-to-heart, face-to-face immediacy, and hence we can understand the battle the God of the covenant fights against all images of God, which pretend to mediate him to man but in fact only put distance between God and man. Augustine expressed it as follows when commenting Ps 94.9: 'We have a promise of the vision of God, of the true and highest God. For it is a good thing to see him who sees us. Whoever serves false gods sees them easily, but he is seeing gods who have eyes yet see not. But to us is promised the vision of the God who both lives and sees' (Sermo 69, 3).[41]

---

[34] Deut 31.17f.; 32.20; Mic 3.4; Is 8.17; 54.8; 57.17; 59.2; 64.6; Jer 33.5; Ezek 39.23; Job 13.24; Ps 13.2; 22.25; 27.9; 30.8; 44.25; 51.11; 69.18; 88.15; 102.3; 143.7.

[35] Ezek 15.7; Am 9.4, 8; Ps 80.17.

[36] Job 16.12f.; Lam 2.4f.

[37] We find a balanced but not wholly satisfactory presentation of this in A. Gelin, '"Voir Dieu" dans l'Ancien Testament', in: Bible et Vie Chrétienne 23 (1958), pp. 1–12.

[38] W. Baudissin, 'Gott Schauen' in der alttestamentlichen Religion (1915). F. Nötscher, 'Das Angesicht Gottes Schauen' nach biblischer und babylonischer Auffassung (1924). One also enters the sanctuary to 'consult the face of Yhwh' in the manner of a mechanical oracle (2 Sam 21.1).

---

[39] M. J. Kraus, Psalmen, p. 145; von Rad, Ges. Stud., p. 239.

[40] Ibid., I, p. 197.

The case of the pious believer who experiences these things does not, as a result, undermine the truth of the statement that Israel's God is invisible, even if the believer insists on seeking and finding God's face. The Wisdom literature will interpret this vision as an 'insight', a 'seeing into' which leads to knowledge (εἰδέναι: Wis 13.1; 15.3);[42] but the Hebrew origins of this vision should not be forgotten even though in this literature the mode of thought is becoming more Greek. In the transition from myth to philosophy, the Greek god becomes wholly invisible, but the God of the Old Testament does not, even in the Wisdom literature.[43] 'To seek God' here means at bottom to make the attempt to see with God's eyes, in God's manner of seeing (cf. Sir 39.16–35). To 'seek without respite' (Ps 105.4) is for the pious believer an essential part of his visionary experience. In Hosea the 'search for God' (3.5; 5.15) and daʿat-Elohim (the existential, experiential knowledge of God: 4.1; 6.6; etc.) are inseparably united. But what in the search is bestowed by anticipation contains ever-greater promises and projects the fulfilment of the vision forward into the eschaton (Is 40.5). In comparison with the coming light, the ultimate finding of the Face can without any sense of regret be called taking shelter in God's shadow, in the shadow of his wings or of his hand (Ps 17.8; 57.2; 63.8; Hos 14.8; Is 49.2; 51.16). And in Jeremiah and Ezekiel the paradox is proclaimed that God will be precisely with those who are sent into exile, and not with those who in the temple still have the pledge of his cultic presence (Jer 29.12; Ez 11.14f.).

---

[41] Outside Israel, too, there are authentic parallels for this experience of being seen by God; cf. F. Nötscher, op. cit., pp. 119–147. But the distance between these parallels and Israel's own experience also becomes evident. Among the pagans, the god before whose glance one comes and in whose sight one lives is a dispenser of 'gifts': life, health, and so on; but never does he, above all, give himself, as is the case with the God of Israel.

[42] Cf. E. Fascher, 'Deus Invisibilis', in: Festschrift für R. Otto (1931), p. 58.

[43] R. Bultmann, 'θεὸν οὐδεὶς ἑώρακεν πώποτε: Untersuchungen zum Johannesevangelium', in: ZNW 1930, pp. 169–192.

Because of his deep knowledge of the tradition, Paul will anchor every aspect of man's vision of God in God's all-embracing and ever-surpassing vision of man and in man's awareness of being thus seen (Gal 4.9; 1 Cor 8.3; 13.12; 2 Cor 5.11; Phil 3.12).

3. COSMIC LITURGY

So far our discussion has not integrated into God's glory some of the most essential attributes of the Godhead—we mean all those which express God's relationship as gracious to man.[1] And such attributes are indispensable in order truly to see the subject of biblical theophanies and, therefore, in order to be in a position to appraise the full implications of these theophanies themselves. Nevertheless, we can already at this point venture to examine something of those revelations of glory that take on the form of natural phenomena. The basic characteristic of all these utterances, whose realism does not wane in the course of time, is their orientation toward praise—praise that strives to witness to the ever renewed presence of the unquestionable glory of the God of history and of the universe, who never ceases to approach Israel as a living reality. The language of such witness does not always use the dialectical procedure of the redactor of the Pentateuch, but often a seemingly more straightforward form which describes the appearance of glory preeminently in terms of the threatening magnificence of the storm: storm-wind, ominous clouds that float, by darkness, lightning that erupts from the gloom, the roar of thunder, downpours of rain, and destructive hail. And yet these phenomena are nowhere described for their own sake, but only as emphatic symbols of the self-revealing Lord. Other symbols are also incorporated into the narratives that do not derive from the storm but that give the divine appearance an even more terrifying and (because of the mixing of images) also more abstract character; the addition of these symbols not deriving from the storm moreover, permits us to see that Yhwh was never seen as a storm-god.[2] The complex of literary utterances on this subject, tirelessly elaborated throughout the centuries and incapable of being restricted or tied down from any one angle, unites an intense realism with the feeling of distance that always characterises the Old Testament.[3] [1] See below under 'Grace and Covenant,' pp. 144f.

---

[2] A. von Gall, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes (1900), p. 23. Duhm, Psalmen (1922²), p. 356. S. Grill, Die Gewittertheophanie im Alten Testament (Heiligenkreuzer Studien I, Wien, 1931). On what follows, see especially Jörg Jeremias, Theophanie: die Geschichte einer alttestamentlichen Gattung (1965, henceforth referred to as JJ), where all texts relating to form, origin,

The oldest hymnic document which portrays a theophany, the 'Song of Deborah', would appear to provide us with the key for the understanding of most later compositions. Through Deborah God's word calls for Barak to entice the superior might of Jabin and of Sisera, the general of his army, into the bed of the river Kishon, along with his chariots and his troops; there God would deliver the enemy into Barak's hands (Judg 4.7). The song itself, full of archaic wildness, partly reads as follows (Judg 5.4f., 21f.):

Yhwh, when thou didst go forth from Seir, when thou didst march from the region of Edom,
the earth trembled, and the heavens dropped, yea, the clouds dropped water.
The mountains quaked before Yhwh, (that is Sinai)
  Before Yhwh, the God of Israel . . .
The torrent Kishon swept them away,
  the onrushing torrent, the torrent Kishon.
  March on, my soul, with might!
Then loud beat the horses' hoofs with the galloping, galloping of his steeds.

God comes from Seir which, as the gloss in v. 5 tells us, is Sinai. He comes from that Mountain of God of the old theophany where Israel came to know God as manifest,[4] and he comes on the road that Israel had taken (Edom). He comes and context are critically examined and organised. For our purposes a brief survey will suffice.

---

[3] J. Hempel (Gott und Mensch im Alten Testament, 1926) has concluded that this is the distinctive characteristic of God's revelation to Israel, by contrast to the surrounding religions: 'You are but a man, and no god' (Ezek 28.2, 9); 'The Egyptians are men, and not God' (Is 31.3); 'I am God and not man' (Hos 11.9). For what follows this statement of Norman W. Porteous is essential: 'Mythological language has the peculiarity of being able to outlive the actual myth that originally created it'; Das Danielbuch ATD 23 (1962), p. 53.

[4] It is certainly striking that the description of a theophany in the Song as the saving God of history in the storm and in its dripping darkness, which swells the dry riverbed to bursting, entangles and sweeps away the chariots of the enemy, and routs the riders. The 'natural theophany' is, therefore, to the highest degree an historical 'theophany of salvation'. By means of a violent storm God has brought victory; the tribes of Israel have only 'fought alongside' God. In this the song would prove to be a decisive model. The archaic blessing of Moses also began with 'Yhwh's coming from Sinai, from Seir he has dawned upon us; he shone forth (ἐπέφανεν, LXX) from Mount Paran' (Deut 33.2), he 'rides through the heavens to your help, and in his majesty through the clouds. The God of old is your refuge' (vv. 26f.). Such a conception helps us understand why later compositions by the Prophets assume an archaic form when comprehensive aid is expected from God, an assistance which demands just as powerful a revelation. In the words of Hertzberg: 'The Bible knows something about total revelation.' Thus we read in one of Isaiah's most original creations, which we have already referred to:

Behold, Yhwh[5] comes from afar, burning with his anger, and in thick rising smoke;
his lips are full of indignation, and his tongue is like a devouring fire;
his breath is like an overflowing stream that reaches up to the neck;
to sift the nations with the sieve of destruction . . .
Yhwh will cause his majestic thunder-voice to be heard

---

of Deborah does not formally make reference to the theophany at the Exodus (JJ, pp. 105, 116). Still, J. Jeremias is right in pointing to the Sinai tradition as the only plausible point of departure for the theophanies, first, of the Song of Deborah, and then of the other victory hymns that contain a 'coming of Yhwh from Sinai' (Ps 68.9, 18, emended text; Deut 33.2; Hab 3.3 and portrayals of theophanies dependent on it). Already C. Westermann (Das Loben Gottes in den Psalmen, 1954, pp. 65f.) is in agreement with this view, by contrast to Weiser, who seeks for a Sitz im Leben in the cult.

[5] The present text has 'the name of Yhwh,' which doubtless is an anxious later weakening of a portrayal that was felt to be all too anthropomorphic.

and the descending blow of his arm to be seen,
in furious anger and a flame of devouring fire, with a cloudburst and tempest and hailstones.
The Assyrians will be terror-stricken at the voice of Yhwh,
when he smites with his rod (Is 30.27f., 30f.).

Habakkuk will make even more wholesale use of such archaic symbolic language, but to this we will come in a moment.

In the Song of Deborah there already lay the seed of a significant development: Sisera's chariots and steeds are swept away by the wildly erupting torrent, just as Pharaoh's chariots and steeds had been submerged in the tides of the Sea of Reeds as they crashed together. In the older song at the Sea of Reeds (Ex 15.1b–11), moreover, theophanic images had already been used: 'In the greatness of thy majesty (ga'on) thou overthrowest thy adversaries . . .; at the blast of thy nostrils the waters piled up' (Ex 15.7f.). Later reflection on that first historical event which lays the foundation for all of Israel's salvation comes to the conclusion that it was for Israel that God laid bare the bottom of the sea; and since 'sea' (tehom) also means 'abyss,' 'chaos,' 'nether-world,' here God's primal power over the forces of the abyss also becomes visible. Thus, to the portrayal of the natural forces which are agitated and set loose in the storm there is joined—secondarily and by way of illustration—another portrayal: that derived from the Akkadian myth of Marduk's taming of the chaotic waters (Tiamat and the monsters conceived by her).[6] Israel, which knows precisely what it can say and wants to say about its God, uses mythical imagistic materials unabashedly and combines these with the common Oriental images of the epiphany in the storm, for which there likewise existed numerous cultic hymns to storm-gods in Sumeria, Babylon, Ugarit, and Canaan.[7] The magnificent and very ancient Ps 29 surely contains pre-existent images and forms from hymns to weather-gods, but there is no question that here it is Yhwh's glory that predominates; to him all the heavens call out 'Glory!':

---

[6] 'Weltschöpfungslied Enuma eliš,' in: AOT, pp. 109–29. The same connection between the miracle at the Sea of Reeds and the battle with Chaos is made also in Ps 77.17–20 and Ps 114.3–7; cf. Is 51.9f. Cf. JJ, p. 96 for the fact that there can be no question of a subsequent historicisation of the mythical battle with Chaos in the event at the Sea of Reeds; this had been suggested by Mowinckel and Wright. In Ps 114.3, 5 the miracle of the crossing of the Jordan is also included in the complex of motifs. If the Ugaritic myth takes the sea and the torrent as being enemies to Baal, then in our context this corresponds to the Sea of Reeds and the Jordan as being the forces repelled by Yhwh (JJ, p. 93).

Give to Yhwh, O heavenly beings, give to Yhwh glory and strength.
Give to Yhwh the glory of his name;
  fall down before Yhwh at his holy theophany.[8]
  the God of glory thunders,
  Yhwh, upon many waters.
The voice of Yhwh is powerful, the voice of Yhwh is full of majesty.
The voice of Yhwh breaks the cedars,
  Yhwh breaks the cedars of Lebanon.
He makes Lebanon to skip like a calf, and Sirion like a young wild ox.
The voice of Yhwh flashes forth flames of fire.
The voice of Yhwh shakes the wilderness,
  Yhwh shakes the wilderness of Kadesh.
The voice of Yhwh makes the hinds to calve and brings kids early to birth.
The God of glory thunders,
  and in his temple all cry, 'Glory!'
Yhwh sits enthroned over the flood;
  Yhwh sits enthroned as king for ever (Ps 29.1–10).[9]

God's roaring voice of thunder and his victory over the primal waters are here glorified without apparent reference to salvation-history; this psalm is a pure song of praise to him who alone is mighty, and all 'divine' beings, the whole palace of the heavens, are to join in its praise. Such a song, consisting of glorification that immediately passes over to the glory itself, can be adopted by Israel because it knows the 'name' of its God not from the garbled roll of thunder, but because God himself has revealed his name to Israel through instruction, historical assistance, and promises. How Israel interpreted such a hymn for itself may be seen from Ps 97, which derives from it; here all divine beings are likewise summoned to venerate God (v. 7), for the reason that God 'is exalted far above' them (v. 9). Here the description of the kabod in nature ('darkness and clouds' surround God) are immediately counterbalanced with 'justice and right' as being the supports of his throne. The 'consuming fire that goes before him' destroys his enemies all around him (v. 3) and 'delivers from the hand of the godless' (v. 10). And if the 'earth trembles, the mountains melt like wax before the Ruler of all the earth,' we also know that the 'heavens proclaim his righteousness and all the peoples behold his glory' (vv. 4ff.). The ultimate word on theophany is now 'light' and God's ultimate attribute, which gives us cause for jubilation, is 'holiness' (vv. 11f.).

---

[7] Cf. the 'Hymn to Adad-Ramman,' in: AOT, pp. 248f. For Ugarit, see H. L. Ginsberg, 'Kitwe Ugarit': The Ugaritic Texts (1936), pp. 129f. Numerous texts in JJ, pp. 75–87.

[8] For this translation, see H. J. Kraus, 'Psalmen I,' in: BK (1961), p. 233.

[9] The final verse (v. 11) is probably a later addition: 'May Yhwh give strength to his people! May Yhwh bless his people with peace!'

When late post-Exilic psalms undertake to recall the great deeds God wrought for Israel in the past, they consciously harken back to an archaic tone. This is shown in Ps 77, which presents the crossing of the Red Sea in the style of the Tiamat myth and the hymns to Hadad in order to underscore the significance of the Exodus as being the salvific re-creation of Israel:

> I will call to mind the deeds of Yah;
>   yea, I will remember thy wonders of old.
> I will meditate on all thy work, >   and muse on they mighty deeds . . .
> Thou art the God who workest wonders, >   who hast manifested thy might among the peoples
>   . . .
> The waters saw thee, O Yhwh;
>   when the waters saw thee, they were afraid, >   yea, the deep trembled.
> The clouds poured out water;
>   the skies gave forth thunder;

the arrows flashed on every side.[10]
The crash of thy thunder was in the chariot-wheels; thy lightnings lightened up the world;
the earth trembled and shook.
Thy way was through the sea,
thy path through the great waters;
yet thy footprints were unseen.
Thou didst lead thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron (Ps 77.11f, 14, 16–20).

The use of myth to portray the saving event and the use of the natural wonder to interpret an historical occurrence[11] show above all that, for Israel, the significance of the salvific miracle reaches far beyond what the bare natural phenomenon of the opening of the pathway through the Sea of Reeds appears to demonstrate.

This becomes fully evident in the theophany inserted into the first part of that 'royal Te Deum,' Psalm 18. The king give thanks for having been saved from extreme danger. 'The torrents of perdition assailed me, the cords of Sheol entangled me,' and in his affliction he cried to the Lord and the Lord heard him. Then there followed the description of the God who comes to deliver:

The earth reeled and rocked;
the foundations of the mountains trembled and quaked, because he was angry, Smoke went up from his nostrils, and devouring fire from his mouth . . .
He bowed the heavens and came down;
thick darkness was under his feet.
He rode on a cherub, and flew;
he came swiftly upon the wings of the wind.
He makes darkness his covering around him, his canopy thick cloud, dark with water.
Out of the brightness before him there broke through his clouds

---

[10] That is to say, the 'strokes of lightning.'

[11] A. Weiser, 'Glaube und Geschichte im Alten Testament,' in: Beitr. z. Wiss. v. A. und N. T., IV, 4 (1931). M. Noth, 'Die Historisierung des Mythus im Alten Testament,' in: Christentum und Wissenschaft 4 (1928).

hailstones and coals of fire.
Yhwh also thundered in the heavens, and the Most High uttered his voice . . .
He sent out his arrows, and scattered them;
he flashed forth lightnings, and routed them.
Then the bed of the sea was seen,
and the foundations of the world were laid bare,
at thy rebuke, O Yhwh,
at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.
He reached from on high, he took me,
he drew me out of many waters.
He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from those who hated me;
for they were too mighty for me (Ps 18.7–17).

Images crowd in on one another in order to convey the full weight of what has occurred: God's glory is storm and tempest, but it also is the creative force exhibited for Israel's salvation through the miracle at the Sea of Reeds; such salvation, in turn, at the same time means deliverance from Sheol's realm of death; and the king, threatened in war and triumphant in victory, places himself squarely in the middle of this event, which is at once a cosmic happening and an event of salvation-history.[12] As in Ps 97, in Ps 18 too, after the theophany, everything is put in the context of God's attributes as saviour, of his condescension (v. 27), and of his love as redeemer (v. 50).

Now the same God who appears in his revelation of salvation as being the absolutely glorious is recognised as the Lord of the world from his manifestation in natural phenomena of great marvel. Job is no Jew and therefore cannot read the glory of nature directly in terms of an historical glory of salvation. Nevertheless, through the sublimeness, unfathomableness, and magnificence of nature he is able to glimpse at the glory of the transcendental Creator. In the great hymn of Job 36.22–37.24 the images drawn from the storm are there, but incorporated into other images which no less than the former impose a state of awe before the Inscrutable who 'is clothed with terrible majesty' (37.22; cf.

---

[12] Cf. Ps 144.5ff.

Jer 10.12f. = 51.15f.; cf. Ps 135.7; 144.5). In the same spirit, but with brighter tones, Sirach sketches a great canvas of God's glory in the cosmos (ch. 43), where the magnificence of the storm is only one of the many witnessing wonders: 'The universe stands firm in his glory' (42.17). Also in Ps 104, a cosmic hymn, the stormy theophany constitutes but the beginning for the unfolding of the world's total goodness and beauty; from the outset God is clothed in the majestic mantle of the light (vv. 1f.), and everything draws life from the benevolent glance of his face and from the inspiration of his breath (v. 29).

If Ps 29 is the sensory glorification of the abstract (non-integrated) kabod, then Ps 104 is the sensory glorification of the concrete (integrated) kabod. And essentially all of it is a liturgy: a liturgy of man, who has an historical knowledge of God, united with unconscious nature, which in mute, encoded language delivers to itself 'hieroglyphic' tidings (Ps 19.2–5), while man, knowing God's commands in the form of the word (Ps 19.9f.), can render unto God with utter openness and clarity the praise of glory that is due him. It is certainly correct to say that the original Sitz im Leben of the theophanic Yhwh-psalms was the song of victory sung after a holy war; but charismatic wars had come to an end with the first period of the kings, and so this hymnic form is transferred to the liturgy. Here the form is, on the one hand, enriched with an extensive mythical imagery and, on the other hand, it is also given literary allures. The hymnic form becomes the traditional stylistic means for describing Yhwh's might and his eventful dynamism. Then the Prophets appropriate these images and the past or present event (Ps 50) is transferred into the future: the idea of the 'day of Yhwh'[13] blends with the traditional theophanic images: God, who earlier had stormed in as a warrior to fight for Israel, can henceforth approach also to give a judgment against Israel or to save it against the people who are to be judged. Ezekiel's first vision sees the 'glory of God' approaching in the storm-wind of the older theophanies, and the vision of the burning of Jerusalem (Ez 10.6f.) with a glowing coal from the fire of the kabod takes up one of the images of Ps 18: 'Out of the brightness before [God] there broke through the clouds hailstones and coals of fire' (v. 12).

---

[13] JJ, pp. 97f. G. von Rad, 'The Origin of the Concept of the Day of Yahweh,' in: JSS 4 (1959), pp. 97–108. Numerous other pertinent texts of the Prophets and the apocalypticists may be found in JJ.

Yet again, in Habakkuk, we find a hymn (3.1–19) which also served liturgical purposes and which in a prophetic vision gathers up the whole gamut of archaic images, this time to give expression to an eschatological hope of redemption:

Eloah came from Teman and the Holy One from Mount Paran.
His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise.
A brightness as of light was under him, rays flashed from his hand.
Before him went pestilence, and plague followed close behind.
He stood and shook the earth;
  he looked and made nations tremble; then the eternal mountains were riven, the everlasting hills sank low.
I saw the tents of Kushan in affliction;
  the tent-curtains of Midian did flutter (Hab 3.3–7).

Once again the kabôd comes from Sinai (this is why in v. 7 the people of the south tremble); but into the exodus-tradition there is here incorporated the tradition of the vision of Isaiah, which sees the glory of the Unseeable One only 'under him,' as 'train' trailing behind him. History and prophecy are intertwined. The two demons that ward off enemies, Pestilence and Plague, have a mythical effect; they express the terrifying nature of God's appearance just as much as the more traditional breaking apart and bowing of the mountains.

Was thy wrath against the rivers, O Yhwh, was thy indignation against the sea, when thou didst ride upon thy horses, upon thy chariot of victory?
Thou didst strip the sheath from the bow, and put the arrows to the string.

Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers;
the mountains saw thee, and writhed.
The raging waters swept on;
the deep gave forth its voice.
The sun forgets to turn in his course, and the moon stands still at her zenith.
At the light of thy arrows they sped, at the flash of thy glittering spear (Hab 3.8–11).

Again here images are interfused from both contexts—that of the storm and that of the victory at creation over the chaotic seas. But Yhwh is not Marduk, and the initial question, which presupposes this myth, for the time being remains unanswered. Yhwh's rage will afterwards be revealed as having had quite different motivations. For now the nature images predominate; even the almost apocalyptic image of the darkening and fleeing sun and moon is here still seen wholly in the context of the threatening storm: the glimmering of arrow and spear points to the lightning. Only the final strophe discloses where this wealth of images has been leading:

Thou didst bestride the earth in fury, thou didst trample the nations in anger.
Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people, for the salvation of thy anointed.
Thou didst crush the house of the wicked, uncovering its foundations to the bare rock.
Thou didst pierce his head with thy shafts, and his leaders are scattered by the whirlwind.
Their joy was to crush the just man,
to devour the poor in an ambush.
Thou didst trample their horses into the sea, into the swell of mighty waters (Hab 3.12–15).

Thus what until now had been a battle in nature is revealed as God's historical struggle against the godless, in which he delivers his 'people' and its anointed king, the 'just man' who had already been drawn into an ambush where he was to have perished. Time and time again the image of the Sea of Reeds and of the primal ocean of the beginning emerges to give vivid portrayal to the eschatological battle of judgment.

In future this was to occur even more frequently: in Ps 50, which portrays God's judgment on Israel, the God who comes to judge is endowed with the attributes of the glory of the storm (vv. 3f.). Similarly Nahum (1.3–6) describes God's coming in a cosmic tempest to execute angry judgment on Niniveh. In Third Isaiah (63.19–64.3) the Prophet yearns for precisely such an appearance of God, since from it he awaits salvation: 'O that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down, that the mountains might quake before thy face . . .'

This rapid survey has taught us one more thing—that one cannot establish sharp lines of demarcation[14] among the three forms of the kabod: the 'historical' kabod (with its centre in Sinai), the 'prophetic' kabod (with its clearest expression in Isaiah and Ezekiel), and the 'cosmic' kabod (in the nature-psalms, in Job, and in Sirach). The three forms are integrated beyond separation. In the theology of Israel the historical experience of God occupies first position, serving as foundation for everything else; this experience primarily[15] presents itself as including a sensory element, and then, for further clarification, it draws on both natural and mythical images. The prophetic experience, as Habakkuk has shown, can blend inseparably with the historico-natural experience; and the vision of God's glory in the cosmos is at bottom the vision of those who know God's historical word and action and who, with enlightened eyes, see the Creator in the creation (Rom 1.19f.).

After the battle God puts away his bow, with which he has shot the arrows of lightning. As a sign of peace between heaven and earth, he lays it upon the clouds. The Septuagint translates the keshet of Genesis (9.13f.). not as ἶρις but as τόξον: the rainbow that appears after the angry storm and the great waters is the bow as an instrument of war. No ancient man could, and not even modern man can, consider this sign, so erected, without being very deeply shaken. Even if the storm does not 'say' anything to him, the word 'peace' is uttered clearly by the bow of seven colours. It is this word that is perceived in the end, just as the God of Elijah was not in the violent storm, and not in the earthquake, and not in the fire, but in the whispering of the soft breeze (1 Kings 19.11f.). Thus we can understand why the last thing that Ezekiel sees and describes in his vision of God's glory is precisely this: 'Like the appearance of the bow that is in the clouds on the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about [the Form]. Such was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord' (Ezek 1.28). And Sirach says:

---

[14] Such as especially B. Stein (Kebod Jahweh, 1939) has attempted to draw.

[15] Cf. what we said above concerning the corporeo-spiritual totality of the experience of God.

> Look upon the rainbow, and praise him who made it, > exceedingly beautiful in its brightness.
> It encircles the heaven with its glorious arc;
> the hands of the Most High have stretched it out
> (43.11f.).

In another passage he compares the high priest Simon with 'the rainbow, gleaming in glorious clouds' (50.7). Late Judaism warned against looking at the rainbow, because man cannot bear to look directly at the sight of God's glory and because it is audacious to presume to contemplate the revelation of God's glory without having withstood the revelation of God's holiness.[16] In John's Apocalypse the seven-coloured bow becomes an aureole about the Unnameable on the throne in heaven (4.3), a halo of light which can bathe even an angel in radiance (10.1). Here, too, it is the sign of the glory of God as he returns to a judgment of grace.

---

[16] ThWNT, III, p. 341 (Rengstorf).

B. THE IMAGE

1. THE IMAGE AS THE CREATURE'S STATE OF SUSPENSION

a. The figure of God's hands

The beautiful does not live on splendour alone; it also needs figure (Gestalt) and image (Bild), even if what figure (Ge-stalt) does is attest to him who set it up (der Stellende), even if image (Ge-bild) is beautiful only as the imaging forth of that splendour which is beyond all images (überbildlich).[1] In the beauty both of nature and of art there is an element of victory: of the form-giving natura naturans and the human spirit which relates to it[2] over the rebelliousness of matter. Like no other theology, the theological aesthetics of the Bible allows for a serious and definitive development of the element of the image, for in the Bible alone the image is not a fleeting configuration of the imageless which must succumb to death or to the surpassing evolution of life or of the spirit; only in the Bible is the image something which God himself has set up with bold freedom over against himself—something which is to know God, respond to him in freedom, and welcome him with love. The full light of revelation will show that such a feat of daring on God's part is possible only because in God himself there exists an eternal reciprocity of living love: in the final analysis the biblical doctrine of the image can be understood only in light of the divine Trinity. And if in the end all worldly aesthetics needs a theological foundation, we can say in anticipation that only biblical theology provides a final, non-tragic justification for worldly beauty, since it is only here that the image, which finite worldly reality is of necessity, can be taken up and secured in the eternal Image, which is the archetypal image (Urbild) even as it is the image that transcends all images (Überbild).

---

[1] See volume I, pp. 19f. (Eng. transl.)

[2] See volume III/1, pp. 719–723.

'Image' is the second of the three key ideas of biblical aesthetics, and it distinctively has to do with the creature which God has formed. The creature, in its identity as image, can be understood only through its origin from God and its consequent return to God; and yet, we must add at once that the creature is also granted a certain space to be at home within itself before God; indeed, a sphere of autonomy is allowed it over against God that it may be a 'world' of its own with respect to God. Only when this autonomy of the image has been sufficiently pondered can we then go on to the third leading concept: namely, grace, the offer of the covenant, the initiative of divine love toward the image of himself that he had formed; and in this not only does it become definitively evident what God's glory is, but also why God ventured such an image in the first place and wherein lies its perfecting. This results for the theologian in the establishment of a mutual priority between 'image' and 'covenant'[3] which, for the time being, must necessarily leave the essence of the image, considered in itself, in a state of suspension. It is the suspension proper to the creature as such, for the reason that, from its nature alone (and its nature is being-in-nothingness), the creature has absolutely no possibility of taking a position over against God.[4]

According to the tradition of P, at the conclusion of his work of creation God decided to fashion 'man' (the word is a collective noun and does not imply an individual), and, according to J, God 'formed' (ἔπλασεν) the first man from the pre-existent clay. This last work, therefore, is also a final 'victory' over 'matter', a crowning of the entire edifice that had preceded it. It is of theological significance that the Bible portrays God as a sculptor/potter whenever he sets about creating: for the creature the crux of the matter will always lie in reposing quietly and patiently between God's shaping hands.[5] The concluding statement which says that God breathed the breath of life into his creation completes the analogy with the creative artist by surpassing it. The concrete, parabolic character of this statement ought not to escape us, even if it is also said that God creates with his word and later on the final consequences are drawn from these initial premises: namely, that God creates from nothing and not from a pre-existent chaos.

---

[3] Karl Barth has captured this priority in the now classical formula that says that creation (and, with it, God's image in man) is the outward ground of the covenant and the covenant, in turn, is the inner ground of creation.

[4] Pascal has much to say on this; see volume III, pp. 188 ff. (Eng. transl.)

[5] 'God is the fashioner (yotser) of the universe (Jer 10.16; 51.19; 33.2; Gen

Now suddenly we are told that the last creature fashioned by God is to be distinguished from all the previous ones by the fact that, as a 'fashioned image' (selem), it is meant to stand in a relationship of 'similarity to' (demuth) God himself (Gen 1.26). The first expression (selem) derives from the skills associated with handicrafts; it denotes something which has been cut and carved and is therefore also applied to the images of idols.[6] Erect statues,[7] precisely because of their quality of having been formed, already have about them something of the divine;[8] and then the second expression (demuth) tones down this quality and makes it somewhat more undefined

---

2.19; Ps 74.17; 104.26; 95.5; Is 45.7, 18; Amos 4.13), the shaper of historical events (2 Kings 19.25; Is 22.11; 37.26; 46.11; Jer 18.11) and, especially, of man (Gen 2.7f.; Ps 33.15; 94.9; Is 27.11; 29.16; 43.1, 7, 21; 44.2, 21, 24; 45.9, 11; 49.5, 8; 64.7; Jer 1.5; 18.6; Zech 12.1). In all these passages the Hebrew original employs the same verb, namely yatsar ('to model' or 'to give shape to'). . . . In the following passages the Greek Bible uses πλάσσειν in exactly the same sense: Gen 2.15; 2 Macc 7.23; Job 10.8f.; 34.15; 40.19; Ps 90.2; 119.73; 139.5; Pr 8.25; 24.12; Wis 15.11; Hab 1.12; Rom 9.20; 1 Tim 2.13' (D. Barthélemy, Gott mit seinem Ebenbild, 1966, p. 88, note 4).

[6] Num 33.52; 2 Kings 11.18; 2 Chr 23.17; Ezek 7.20; Amos 5.26.

[7] We here base ourselves on the pioneering work of P. Humbert, Etudes sur le récit du paradis et de la chute dans la Genèse (1940), especially ch. 5, 'L'imago Dei', pp. 53–75. See also L. Koehler, 'Die Grundstelle der Imago-Dei-Lehre, Genesis 1.26', in: ThZ 4 (1948), pp. 16–22. Koehler is of the opinion that it is especially the erect posture of man, by contrast to the animals, that expresses his likeness to God and his domination over the world as a representative of God.

[8] The element of form, when referred to man, obviously includes his corporeality; but to oppose this element to man's psychic and interior component would be a modern move, not at all consistent with the mentality of the ancient Near East. As the Eastern mind sees it, the corporeal gives expression to the specifically interior reality of what appears. On the other hand, we can also say that, 'if form is an essential part of the imago, and only analogical.[9] The second expression does not introduce an essentially new viewpoint, as shown by v. 27 (where demuth does not appear). And we can surmise nothing from the change of prepositions (b^{e} and k^{e}, in Greek κατά both times), since in 5.3 they appear precisely reversed.

The text, which is austere in its words and intentionally remains mysterious, leaves open the question as to where exactly it is that this similarity between God and his image lies. The text merely points to the fact of the similarity, and that in itself raises man up far beyond all other beings in the world. This elevation of man above all other inferior beings is what immediately emerges from what follows: 'Let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the birds of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creeps upon the earth' (v. 26). In the first account God presents to man the plants and animals that had already been created; in the second, man's superiority is manifested by the fact that he is created first and that only this means that even God has form and that this is quite in keeping with the evidence of the Old Testament' (J. J. Stamm, 'Die Imago-Lehre von Karl Barth', in: Antwort: Karl Barth-Festschrift, 1956, pp. 84–98, esp. p. 95). We already saw in the first section of this part (see esp. 'Form and non-form') that all the anthropomorphic constructs of the Old Testament convey in general an awareness that they are at one and the same time both indispensable and questionable. We know that our older dogmatic theology considered the elements of form in the divine epiphanies as paths and preliminary steps to the Incarnation of the Logos. God is not formless; rather, he has a form beyond all other forms (übergestalthaft), something which Hegel saw in a very positive light.

---

Now, in two passages (Ps 39.7 and 73.20) selem also means 'shadow' or 'fleeting image' (although it is questionable whether in both cases the words can be derived from the same stem). But we would hardly do well on this account to claim that God's 'primal form', in accordance with which Adam's form was supposedly fashioned, is identical with God's 'appearing form' in the theophanies (T. C. Vriezen, 'La création de l'homme d'après l'image de Dieu', in: Oudtestamentische Studien II, 1943, pp. 87–105, esp. p. 96).

[9] The text offers no basis for the division introduced by the Church Fathers between imago (εἰκών) and similitudo (ὁμοίωσις), the former referring to man's natural image of God and the latter to man's vocation to a supernatural likeness to God (or his endowment with grace before the fall). But the tension itself which the Fathers detected in the concept of the image is fundamental and will shortly be discussed.

then does God 'make every tree to grow out of the ground' by means of the surge of water that he makes to spring up out of the earth (2.9,6). In both narratives the crux of the matter is man's function of ruling over the world.[10] We must remember that in antiquity an image commonly denoted the making present of the thing portrayed: this is why a great king would set up statues of himself in his provinces, and also why the practice suggests itself of casting spells with images of the gods and even of acquiring power over the god by possessing the image that contains him.[11] With this in mind we will clearly see the meaning of the text as saying that man is put in the world as a representative of God and of God's power as ruler. But this implies a special relationship of man to God—a proximity and an immediacy of kinship (God's breath entered man!) that sets him apart from all other beings.[12] And this is an 'ontological statement' concerning man, as Protestant scholars themselves affirm in spite of their own dogmatics: 'The Old Testament nowhere entertains the idea that man has lost his likeness to God because of having sinned.'[13] 'God's image in man has been neither lost nor mutilated. In any event, the Old Testament knows nothing of this. Gen 9.6 speaks as much about God's image in man as does Gen 1. This proves that man's being God's image in no way connotes that all is well between them, but rather that God has put man in a special relationship to himself. . . . This relationship is man's ontological calling to divine sonship, which is never lost, not even through original sin, because it is founded upon God's will and therefore in creation itself.'[14] [10] W. Caspari, 'Imago Divina', in: Reinh. Seeberg-Festschrift (1929), pp. 197f. 'The appointment of man to lordship over the earth is remarkably secular. According to the Babylonian epic of creation, the destiny enjoined on man at his creation is the service of the gods.' Von Rad, ThOT Vol. I, p. 147, note.

---

[11] J. Hehn, 'Zum Terminus "Bild Gottes"', in: Festschrift für E. Sachau (1915), pp. 36–52.

[12] F. Horst, Face to Face: The Biblical Doctrine of the Image of God (1950).

[13] G. von Rad, ThWNT II, p. 390.

[14] T. C. Vriezen, Theologie des Alten Testaments in Grundzügen (1956), p. 177. Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics III/2: 'the dispute whether man lost his likeness to God by sin finds a self-evident solution. It is not lost' (p. 324).

Nevertheless, even as he establishes this relationship, God also preserves a distance that is expressed in the mysterious plural form of his monologue: 'Let us make men according to our image.' He here turns to his heavenly court—to the Elohim ('beings who surround God') or the b^{e}ne-Elohim ('sons of God', 'angels')—for God is not alone in his heaven (Is 6, Job 1), but is 'surrounded by all his heavenly host' (1 Kings 22.19).[15] Seen in this way, man receives a share of heavenly dignity; a godlike element has been bestowed on him. The Book of Wisdom would express the same thing in Greek terms: 'God created man in incorruption (ἀφθαρσία), and made him in the image of his own eternity (ἀϊδιότης)' (Wis 2.23).[16] The thought of 'immortality', however, is here barely

---

J. J. Stamm (op. cit., p. 91) declares: 'The Old Testament knows nothing of the affirmation by Reformed theology that man's likeness to God has been lost, and this insight' has become established among scholars 'by nearly unanimous consent'. In addition to the writers we cite, Stamm also refers to Dillmann, Gunkel, Eichrodt, Humbert, Koehler, and Zimmerli. The significance of this insight for ecumenical dogmatics is very great. Cf. von Rad, ThOT vol. I, p. 143.

[15] G. von Rad, Genesis (1953), p. 60; ThOT I, p. 145. Karl Barth has objected against such a conception as follows: 'How could non-divine beings even assist in an advisory capacity in an act of creation, let alone have an active part in the creation of man, as we are expressly told?' Barth therefore suggests, if not exactly the trinitarian interpretation of the ancient Church, then at least an indication of the interior vitality of God, who is 'not alone' but rather 'includes in Himself the differentiation and relationship of I and Thou' (Church Dogmatics III/1, p. 192). We would say, however, that this is surely one of those passages where we can clearly feel the presence of an inspiration that is making the inspired writer say more than he himself can grasp, given the stage of his religious consciousness. And, further, considering the unity of the Bible as a whole, we will certainly have to claim that the trinitarian interpretation does, in fact, yield the plenary sense (sens plénier) of the passage. Were we to inquire concerning the partial meaning of the passage, however, that sense of it that the writer must consciously have intended, then we ought not necessarily to exclude a limine the possibility of 'angels' who serve God as his collaborators. For in the ancient conception of the world 'angels' held the position of what the scholastics would come to call causae secundae, and in the second account of the creation we see God using the already existing (and somehow already fashioned) earth to give shape to Adam's selem.

[16] This is the correct reading, and not ἰδιότης, which is the unique 'nature' proper to God.

hinted at, since it does not lie within the scope of Genesis. What is essential here are the two aspects of man's distinct contraposition to God (as the work is distinct from the artist) and of man's task to represent God as ruler.

b. Crowned with glory

Psalm 8 begins with God's praise, with the 'greatness of his Name throughout the earth', the 'majesty (hod) that stretches out over the heavens', and the statement, unique in the Old Testament, that from the mouth of children and sucklings God has built for himself a bulwark against his enemies. And then, as if spurred on by this reference to God's opponents, the psalm continues:

> When I look at thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, > the moon and the stars which thou hast established;
> what is man that thou art mindful of him, > and the son of man that thou dost care for him?
> Yet thou hast made him little less than a divine being (Elohim) > and dost crown him with glory (kabod) and honour (hadar).
> Thou hast given him dominion over the works of thy hands;
> thou hast put all things under his feet, > all sheep and oxen and also the beasts of the field, > the birds of the air, and the fish of the sea, > whatever passes along the paths of the sea.
> Yhwh, our Lord, > how majestic is thy name in all the earth! (Ps 8.4–10).

This psalm's reflection on the doctrine of Gen 1 still remains within the sphere of the latter to the extent that the psalm understands God's 'image' in man fundamentally as man's dominion over the animals created by God. But the psalm goes beyond the statement in Genesis because of its great wonderment at the fact that the exalted God has condescended to come so low and to put something of his own divine glory into man's tiny being. The thought starts off from the laudatory affirmation of the divine majesty in all creation, then passes on to the astonishment that heavenly kabod is to be found in man, finally to return to the praise of God's glory. With a tone of distant awe, the basis for man's dignity is then given as being man's relationship to the celestial sons of God, and not man's unmediated relationship to God himself. It is already astonishing enough that 'ephemeral', 'mortal', 'earth-bound' man (enosh, ben-adam) is compared to the Immortals. The figure formed from clay receives a crown which it does not apparently deserve; this crown, however, is bestowed on it not only externally, but it declares the creature to be interiorly a being related to God and destined to rule. The crux of the matter here is the incomprehensible oscillation between lowliness and exaltation, between God's glory, proper to God alone, and the reflected splendour of the glory that emanates from God and enfolds man, without the human form ever being able to contain this splendour within itself.

Both texts envisage man as a whole, without any preferential isolation of his soul, which would run counter to Hebrew thought. This enables Ezekiel to use the word 'beauty' (yofi) instead of 'glory' in a passage where he is using a creation narrative which was parallel to the narrative we read in Genesis: 'You were the exemplary seal, full of wisdom and perfect in beauty. You were in Eden, the garden of God' (until the fall through sin): 'so I cast you as a profane thing from the mountain of God, and the guardian cherub drove you out from the midst of the stones of fire. Your heart was proud because of your beauty; you corrupted your wisdom for the sake of your splendour' (Ezek 28.12f., 16f.). From this story, obscure in many ways, of the fall through sin let us for the moment retain only the emphasis on man's beauty. Psalm 8 in no way takes into consideration a loss of the glory originally assigned to man; indeed, it speaks as if wholly overlooking all the historical aberrations of human nature. We must agree with Peter Brunner when, on the basis of these scriptural statements, pointing simultaneously at 'created form' and at 'God', he affirms:

> 'Man participates in God's theophanous form. . . . The concept of hadar expresses the fact that man bears a noble beauty within himself that becomes manifest precisely in his form. For hadar is parallel to to'ar ('beautiful form'; Is 53.2). Ezek 28.12, too, sees original man in paradise as possessing a perfect beauty. Beauty and form belong together. But beauty and God also belong together. The colours, forms, and sounds which belong to God's theophanous form and which are intimately bound up with God in the Apocalypse, indicate that God is not without relationship to the beautiful and, hence, also not without relationship to form: which, in turn, means that what is God's 'form' in the heavenly world must remain for us an utterly incomprehensible mystery. Like primal Truth and primal Goodness, primal Beauty is a reality established by God's divinity itself.'

And P. Brunner concludes by pointing to God's tri-unity as the ultimate clue to this mystery.[17]

Almost concurrently with the 'image' motif there emerges in both creation narratives, especially in the second, the motif of 'eros'. At first 'eros' is the yearning of the male as he searches out creation to find a being who possesses the same divine breath and the same reflection of divine glory as he has received from God. Then it takes on the form of the miracle whereby God creates the fulfilment of the male's yearning from the male himself and presents the astounded man with the woman. Finally, we see 'eros' as the 'one flesh' that results from this encounter of male and female. 'The Jahwist's story of creation practically issues in this aetiological explanation of the power of eros as one of the images implanted in man by the Creator himself (v. 24f.), and so gives the sexual relationship between man and woman the dignity of being the greatest miracle and mystery of Creation.'[18] But this is, precisely, no merely biological mystery; rather, it occurs at the level of man's distinctive beauty as constituted by his being the image of God. Eros and beauty will henceforth belong together, all the darkness of sin notwithstanding.

---

[17] P. Brunner, 'Der Erstgeschaffene als Gottes Ebenbild', lecture given in 1951 and published in: Pro Ecclesia: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur dogmatischen Theologie (1962), pp. 85–95. Our quotation is from p. 91.

[18] Von Rad, ThOT I, p. 150.

It was important to establish all this because Christian theology of the Greek strain at once began, understandably, to locate man's character as God's image wholly in his aspect as spirit, and this ultimately led to Augustine's psychological trinity in the soul (memoria, intellectus, voluntas). Then too, Protestant dogmatics to this day tends to identify man's character as God's image one-sidedly with an endowment received by man in his primaeval state before the Fall, which he lost by sinning; or it at least tends to identify the God-likeness with the fact that man continues 'to be addressed' by God's Word.[19] By contrast Sirach in his meditation on the position of man in the cosmos, still understands the affirmations of Gen 1 and Ps 8 in the original spirit:

> The Lord created man out of the earth, > and turned him back to it again.
> He gave to them few days, a limited time, > but granted them authority over the things upon the earth.
> He endowed them with might like his own,
> and made them in his own image. . . .
> He made for them tongue and eyes;
> he gave them ears and a heart for thinking.
> He filled them[20] with knowledge and understanding > and made them to know good and evil.
> He set his eye in their hearts > to show them the majesty of his works.
> And they will therefore praise his holy name, > and proclaim the grandeur of his works. (Sir 17.1–3, 6–10)

Only then does Sirach come to the Law and its understanding, to the 'eternal covenant' and insight into God's decrees. On this we read:

> Their eyes saw the glorious works of his majesty, > and their ears heard the glory of his voice. (v. 13)

[19] Cf., for instance, Emil Brunner, Dogmatik II (1951), pp. 64f. ('responding actuality'); H. Thielicke, Theologische Ethik I: Die Lehre von der Imago Dei in der evangelisch-katholischen Kontroverslehre, pp. 317f.

[20] Thus in the Jerusalem Bible.

Sirach, too, speaks at first 'unhistorically', from a perspective which, much to our amazement, encompasses both the primaeval state of man and his state after sinning. Here man's mortality (17.1f.) apparently is already part of God's original plan, without his character as God's image (v. 3) being thereby put in jeopardy; and the 'knowledge of good and evil' (v. 7) is given to man by God without God's 'glance' into men's hearts (v. 8) being thereby extinguished. In place of kabod, here 'might' (ἰσχύς) such as God himself has is praised as God's particular gift to man; both things are nearly equivalent. The 'image', moreover, includes both the bodily senses and the spiritual faculties of man, and the Moulder's intention this time goes beyond the mere governance of the cosmos to culminate in the praise of God's glory in both creation and covenant—the act of praise which Ps 8 actually embodies. Nothing is taken away from man's state as 'crowned with glory', but everything is reduced to the praise of God, which Sirach strikes up resoundingly, beginning at 42.15. With this the peculiarly 'secular' character of the classical statements in the Bible concerning man's nature as 'image' is attentuated, and adjusted in the direction of a general religious understanding of existence such as, for instance, that of Egypt or Babylon.

c. The suspension of the image

All of these statements concerning man as the image of God clearly exhibit a provisional character, as if the fulfilment of this theme had been postponed and withheld. The first sign of this is the negative emphasis on the prohibition of images, so strong in the Old Testament. Man may not do precisely what God has done, namely, model a selem. When God does it he imparts something of his own glory to the 'statue'; if man were to model an image of God, he would impart to this image not the divine but his own human glory, and so the image would distort the required immediacy between God and man.[21] Only within this immediacy does the beauty of man—and especially of Israel—retain the rank God assigned to it, as the reflection of the divine grace and glory. 'He is your praise' (Deut 10.21), and if you follow his instructions 'he will set you high above all nations . . . in praise and in fame and in honour' (Deut 26.19); he alone is Israel's glory, which cannot be exchanged for anything else (Hos 4.7; Jer 2.11; Ps 106.20; cf. Rom 1.23). This already shows us how suspended the reality of the image is: as we have seen, it is an attribute of man as such, in all the states of his historicity, and yet it remains essentially a reference to God as the origin and finality of this attribute. The doctrine of man's nature as image acquires stability only when this standard of origin and finality is applied to the suspendedness of the image, that is, when the meaning of the image's origin is brought to bear through the New Testament's understanding of the image. Thus, Ps 8 will undergo its complete christological transposition in Heb 2.6–10. But even though the theme remains sealed, as it were, in the Old Testament, it is nonetheless important to establish its full dimensions in advance, so that it will not suffer any abridgment when we come to the New Testament. Let us examine four of these dimensions.

---

[21] F. Michaeli, Dieu à l'image de l'homme (1950). D. Barthélemy, Gott mit seinem Ebenbild (German ed. 1966), pp. 107–132.

1. Gen 1.27 juxtaposes two fundamental statements: 'God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him' and 'Male and female he created them.' We see that here man's 'procreative ability is removed from God's image and shifted to a special word of blessing.'[22] And yet, without the specification 'man and woman' the subject of the first statement remains without definite contour. The second account shows this with greater clarity. Even though this account knows of a pre-existent relationship between God and the first man (2.16f.), yet with God's judgment that 'it is not good that man should be alone' it points to the fact that, with the male, the creation (in which everything is 'very good': 1.31) has not yet been completed. Thus it is that, as

---

[22] G. von Rad, Genesis, p. 61, with W. Zimmerli, 1 Moses 1–11 (1943). Karl Barth has at great length (Church Dogmatics III/1, pp. 289–329 and the man sleeps deeply, the woman is fashioned by God from the man's rib (her origin is from him) as his companion (she is made for him), and at her sight the man exclaims: 'This at last is bone of my bones. . . .'; and the text adds: 'Therefore a man leaves his father and his mother and cleaves to his wife, and they become one flesh' (2.23f.). If, therefore, the sexual relationship was initially set alongside man's nature as image of God, nevertheless the I-Thou relationship, especially of man and woman (but not as sexually derived), is now seen to be squarely located within man's nature as God's image, for it is only in this way that the subject is completely displayed which is the bearer of the image. At this point, moreover, we see that the existence-for-one-another of the man and the woman, which is hierarchical and yet co-equal, is what constitutes the human subject; and with this the motif of partnership between God and man—the fact that man can be addressed by God and that God does indeed speak in him—comes to light with full force as the interior depth of man's relation to God as his image.[23] Man, says Karl Barth, 'in virtue of his nature must be formally prepared for grace. This takes place as he is not left alone', but receives his partner.[24] But III/2, pp. 285–324) expounded his contrary opinion, which sees the second sentence of Gen 1.27 ('male and female he created them') as providing 'an explication which is a precise definition of the text' that immediately precedes it, namely, 'in the image of God he created him.' Since, for Barth, to-be-human fundamentally implies to-be-with-others, we can understand why he interpreted the plural that occurs in the divine utterance ('let us make man') in a trinitarian direction. 'To-be-with-others', however, is a much more comprehensive concept than the sexual relationship between man and woman (as P. Brunner also suggests and Barth's total discussion makes clear); and, further, the second creation narrative speaks of sexual relationship so obliquely (woman comes from man, in Paradise there are no children . . .) that sexuality cannot be directly derived from man's original state as image of God. But Barth's contribution to our understanding of the imago must be integrated as an essential, though partial, element of our growing insight into man's nature as divine image.

---

[23] Thus, in Sir 17.11f. the whole development of man's nature as God's image is oriented toward the knowledge of God in the 'eternal covenant'.

[24] Church Dogmatics III/1, p. 290.

the whole statement remains suspended, clearly delineated and yet again shifting the boundaries; the puzzle can be solved only 'pro-spectively', by reference to the New Testament, where the man-woman relationship, precisely in its subtle gradation, will be immersed in the whole zone of 'glory' (1 Cor 11.7–12): in the New Testament the carnal relationship between man and woman will no longer be only an image of the relationship between God and mankind (or God and the people: Ezek 16, etc.), but rather, as the incarnate relationship between Christ as Bridegroom and the Church as Bride, the man-woman relationship will become the supra-sexual goal of the entire relationship between the sexes. Marriage, therefore, is not an 'image' of God in the protological sense, but only in the eschatological sense that, beyond a certain point, marriage transcends itself to become the virginal and eucharistic reciprocity between Christ as the Man and the Church as the Woman.

2. A second suspension—that between nature and grace—emerged when, on the one hand, God's kabod over man was seen to perdure beyond the fall through sin, whereas, on the other, the text of Ezekiel cited could totally rob man of that kabod: he who had been created in glory rose up in revolt because of his own great beauty and thus desecrated God's sanctuary: 'So I brought forth fire from the midst of you; it consumed you, and I turned you to ashes upon the earth in the sight of all who saw you' (Ezek 28.18). Likewise, God reared that foundling, Jerusalem, decked her out with garments and ornaments, and the damsel's 'beauty . . . was perfect through the splendour which I bestowed upon you': but she shamelessly gives away to her paramours all the finery God had given her, until God angrily strips her down to her original poverty and leaves her 'bare and naked': (Ezek 16.14, 39). Thus, it is man who brings about that 'exchange of the glory of God' for the 'shame' (Hos 4.7), the 'impotence' (Jer 2.11), the 'image of corruptible man' (Rom 1.23) which makes God withdraw his gifts. Nevertheless, not even in his most humiliating judgments on the sinner does God take back his call, his claim, or his promise. But the return to the primaeval state is impeded by the sword of the Cherub (Gen 3.24; Ezek 28.16); we simply cannot reconstruct what existence in the grace of Paradise was like, not even after the death sentence had been passed (Gen 2.17; Wis 2.24; Rom 5.12).[25] The opaqueness of the primaeval state, which can be approached by us only dialectically,[26] and the impossibility of unearthing wholly univocal structures of 'nature' from man's different historical states, compel us rather in the intention of the Maker of the image[27] to look for whatever God's image in man might in the last analysis be. This intention, however, points forward to the definitive image which will appear with Christ and gather up into itself the meaning of all suspended fragments of the image that is man.

3. A third suspension—that between being and act—is related to the second. We have seen how in Gen 1 and in Ps 8 the content of the image is primarily expressed in man's mission to rule over the world, something which implicitly (and then explicitly in Sir 17) dictates a dialogical relationship between the knowledge of God and the response of God's call. The first element, to which the I-Thou structure of reciprocal existence (das Mitsein) belongs, can be regarded as the perduring being of the image, while in the second element something like a breaking off of communication can occur

---

[25] On this, F. K. Schumann ('Imago Dei', in: Imago Dei: Festschrift für G. Krüger, 1932, pp. 167–180) is quite right: from our sinful state we can only feel our way backwards, 'as far as the analogies of our own existence can lead us' (p. 173).

[26] Gregory of Nyssa seems to have been especially aware of this irreducible dialectic. Cf. my book Présence et Pensée: Essai sur la philosophie religieuse de Grégoire de Nysse (1942), esp. pp. 29–60.

[27] Schumann (loc. cit.) makes the following general observation: 'Everything which is called an image' (as opposed to a mere 'likeness', which can be a neutral concept) brings with it an intention 'which alone makes the thing comprehensible in its character as image' (p. 176). Notice how in Wis 7.25f. the attributes 'reflection', 'emanation' from God, 'mirror' of God, and 'image' of God are all related in rapid succession to the one subject (namely, Wisdom). This shows us that here 'image' appears as being in the strongest ontological and intentional dependence on the divine 'archetype' (Urbild).

with respect to God from the side of the sinner: the sinner no longer answers, or, if he does, it is only as one turned away from God or as one who flees to hide himself.[28] It would almost seem as if man's aspect as being remains intact, while his aspect as agent has collapsed. However, we also have to say that the aspect of being is itself also brought under the dark shadows of punishment: he who is lord over the world must now perform the painful duties of a servant (Gen 3.17f.). And then, too, hidden in the punishment is the promised salvation that is to come: for the saving Lord will appear as the 'servant of Yhwh', and the experience of punishment creates an anticipated hunger and thirst for the word of God (Am 8.11f.) even when this word can still not be found. But when the 'New Man' becomes accessible through God's grace—that Man 'who is renewed in knowledge (of God) after the image of his Creator' (Col 3.10; cf. Eph 4.24)—then what had been seemingly dead and fragmented will be reactivated, not to return again to the suspension of the original image, but now to enter the bright form of the Son of the Father, who is the 'reflection of the glory of God and the very stamp of his nature' (Heb 1.3). The tension between being and act is resolved in him.

4. Everything, therefore, is summed up in the final suspension, that between Adam and Christ: Adam's glory as God's image is truly resplendent and becomes legible as form only prospectively, that is, only with reference to the Christ who is to come; but Christ, as 'Son of David' and therefore of Adam, really entered into the old form of the image in order to open it up from within and bring it to perfection. But this perfecting from within is at the same time the most decisive transcending of everything that can be termed 'image' with reference to creatures and to the world; for the perfecting which Christ accomplishes authenticates the polarity between God as the image-maker and the creature as itself the image through the intra-divine relationship of the [28] Adam as we know, hides himself after sinning, but he can clearly hear God's call and he answers from his hiding-place (Gen 3.10).

---

Father as begetter and the Son as begotten. The Son appears before the whole world as the 'icon of the invisible God, the first-born of all creation; for in him all things were created' (Col 1.15f.), so that henceforth the task at hand is the 'proclamation of the glory of Christ, who is the icon of God' (2 Cor 4.4). This event does not abolish the whole theology of the creature as image of God possessing the mature lordliness of a spiritual creature and sent by God into the world as its proper realm of action; but this lordliness is relativised into a form of 'dominion' (Phil 2.11) determined solely by the paradox of the Son who, while existing in the form of God, takes on the form of a servant. The tension contained in the image of Adam, to whose inherent difficulties the first man immediately succumbed, now becomes evident in all its lethal character: How can one who has been appointed not only to dispose things fully, but even to rule, at the same time be wholly pliant to God and a servant?

This open suspension of the image will appear disappointing to one looking for clear, self-contained concepts. And yet, how can we expect to be handed an image of God that could be ratified by creatures—an image of the living, eternal God who is the Wholly Other? Would not such an image be a means of subjecting the ever-elusive, ever sovereignly free God? And is it not rather the dignity of man that he himself, as God's image, cannot be pinned down absolutely, and that only the One who is both God and man can possess, know and represent the contents of this eternally uncontainable image?

2. THE IMAGE: TO BE A WORLD BEFORE GOD

a. A sketch book

We must now take a concrete look at the interior vitality of the image as the Bible understands it—of the image as it stands over against God. Thus, we will not yet deal with the drama that will be played between God and man as a result of the Word of grace that is sent forth from the divine Self; this drama will be explored later. We will now concern ourselves with that breadth and fullness of the subject who receives the divine Word in all the freedom of space that has been assigned to him, in all his ability to be a world before God. It is quite evident where it is that the Bible unfolds this theme: in the historical period when Israel emerges from the stage of 'archaic pan-sacrality' in primitive times, the period when the world was full of numina (elohim) and their marvels and horrors, and Israel has not yet entered the stage in which its existence and history are under the shaping form of either the prophetic or the priestly-liturgical principle. The first stage can still be studied in the Book of Judges; the final stage may be observed in the great Prophets and in the priestly theology of Deuteronomy and of Exilic and post-Exilic literature. Between the two phases we find what Gerhard von Rad has termed the 'humanism' and the 'enlightenment' of the period of the kings, from David to Solomon and beyond:[1] the emergence of man from his subjection to a cosmos understood sacrally to his distinctive 'humanness', to a 'wholly demythologised profaneness'; an awakening interest for things as they are in themselves (Solomon's writings on 'natural science'), for what are regarded by mankind as political and human forms of association, education, and wisdom, for a 'new way of looking at and recounting history', whereby the 'distance from history' is the prerequisite and the result is the energy to 'recreate great historical constellations' with the sovereignty exhibited by the masterpieces of the Yahwist and of the narrator of the story of David: these combine 'a peculiarly cool distance' with the 'intensest realism'.[2] Just as Greek literature emerges all at once, with Homer, at its greatest peak of perfection, so it is, too, with the historical prose of the Old Testament, throughout which are strewn precious gems of perfect literature (the song of Deborah, the story of Jotham, David's dirge for Saul and Jonathan, his 'last words', the earliest psalms . . .). The 'story of royal succession' (1 Sam 9–20) does not contain a single miracle: the 'miraculous', incomprehensibly great and stupefying reality which is here sighted for the first time is man himself, in so far as he is the image of God and stands and acts on the world's stage either in proximity to or in guilty distance from his Archetype. God allows him the freedom to develop on his own, and yet keeps him in relation to himself: for man is an image, and in everything he does he remains in relation to his Creator, Summoner, and Saviour. It is precisely the tension between freedom received and continued relation that makes us see the clear parallel between the biblical and the Greek notion of the human, from Homer to the tragedies: in both cases we see man interpreting himself against the background of God. But Greek tragedy derives man's relation to God from the mythical past, while the biblical tragedian who wrote the story of David can quite abandon all dependence on sacral myths[3] and make David grow from within—without any reference to sagas of the gods or cultic sacrality—to attain a new, quasi-mythical greatness, or better, to become a human transparency of God. And when afterwards, under Solomon, the mythical elements of Egypt, Babylon, and Syria begin to penetrate and in the time of the kings again become a great threat to Israel's faith, we must carefully note that there lies at the source of this new incursion a purely human factor: the political reality, which, for the sake of attaining a position of power, must also accept in the transaction the religious contaminations which were part and parcel of diplomacy at that time. Quite significantly, everything further which in the Bible relates to the development of the image in its worldly character is joined to the name of Solomon: the secularistic, international ideal of 'education', the savoir faire of the Proverbs, the likewise international courtly love-poetry of the Song of Songs, and the pessimistic-eudemonistic 'philosophy' of Ecclesiastes. Through it all, however, the relation of the image 'man' to its Archetype can receive great variety of representation. The portrayal can be narrow and visible (as in the high points of the tragedy of David), or loose and almost invisible (as in the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes): but the Bible always takes care that the picture does not fall out of its frame. From this immense panorama we will focus for an instant on the figure of Saul, because, even though it represents the painful transition from the period of the Judges to that of the Kings, it nonetheless belongs above all to the line of direct charismatics. Saul, as one called forth (he did indeed have to leave the story of his calling to Samuel), is the prototype of the man taken up into the strictest kind of obedience: in contrast to David, he is precisely not launched on a wide-open field of political action. His enormous tragedy belongs to another field of forces.[4] It is true, as the tale of his first anointing (1 Sam 16) makes clear that David too comes as the last of the line of early charismatics; but nowhere is there exacted from him the strict obedience prophetically enjoined on Saul: in spite of his continued practice of consulting oracles, David is allowed the very free obedience of one who is to shape the world, who is responsible to himself. Precisely this release, however, into the sphere of freedom proper to the 'image and likeness' of God is an event so ominous and full of dangers that Scripture can portray it only in a dialectical and tragic fashion: the story of the rejection of the sacral kingdom of God of the early period and its replacement with the kingdom of men in the classical period is accompanied by a great number of reasons for and against the development, and of estimates of losses and gains, and the final redactor of the text has been careful not to smooth over such circumspection.

---

[1] With this we could compare K. Jaspers' thoughts on the 'period of the axles' (Vom Ursprung und Ziel der Geschichte, 1949).

---

[2] G. von Rad, ThOT, I, pp. 48f. His understanding of biblical humanism and his penetrating portrayal of it will remain among von Rad's greatest accomplishments.

[3] The stories of the ark do not belong to this category. It is significant that, as he flees from his son, David sends back the people who want to follow him with the ark (1 Sam 15.24–29).

---

[4] See below, pp. 210f.

What the brief story of Paradise relates concerning the splendour and the misery of human freedom then receives full polyphonic development in this decisive phase of Israel's history. With this Holy Scripture has done saying what in essence there is to say about worldly man existing in the worldly world; the New Testament will then have other more pressing concerns.

Compared to the classical tragedy of David, which in sheer quality competes with Sophocles and Shakespeare, the old stories of the Book of Judges strike us as a series of rough sketches. And only an epoch of unsubdued humanism such as that of the kings could possess the supreme ability to weave these stories in as a part of God's history with his people. It is the austere and pious Deuteronomist who produces such interweaving, and he organises all his material according to the supreme commandment, understood in its Old Testament sense: infidelity and decline, punishment, clamouring to God, deliverance. This pattern is so persistent that in the end it repels not only the reader, but God himself: 'You forsook me and worshipped other gods; therefore I will deliver you no more. Go and cry for help to the gods you have chosen' (Judg 10.13). Into this rather late context, however, the historiographer, without beautifying them, inserts all his remarkable figures and events as forms that have been only half-sculpted out of the stone: the left-handed Ehud, who, under the pretext of bringing a 'word from God' to fat King Eglon, drives a specially made stiletto into the king's belly and escapes through a window (Judg 3.15–30); the martial Jael, the woman who hides Sisera, after his defeat, under a rug and then hammers a tent-peg through his temples as he sleeps exhausted (Judg 4.21); the raider leader, Gideon, whom God disarms and whose nocturnal victory over his enemies almost becomes a prank played by God himself (Judg 7.16– 22); the first sketched attempt at abolishing charismatic leadership and replacing it with dynastic monarchy, the dangers of which already shimmer from the golden ephod (Judg 8.27) and which then goes astray so pitifully in the Abimelech episode, where the whole gamut of robbers' mores is unfurled—delusions of grandeur, trickery, cruelty and, of course, treachery—and the ending exhibits the same grandezza as with Saul (Judg 9.54); the whore's son Jephthah, who had to suffer for it and became the proud leader of a gang of pillagers: he engages in an amusing war parley with the king of Moab, who has been complaining about the God of the Jews stealing others' lands: 'Do you too not possess what Kemosh, your god, has taken away from its owners? So, too, we possess everything that Yhwh, our God, has taken away from its owners' (Judg 11.24). It is the battle that will determine which God is stronger, and therefore the rightful possessor. But all of this is topped by the collection of pranks, shows of strength and stories of wenching revolving around that 'outdoors man' Samson, this less noble brother of Hercules who is full of coarse humour and suggestiveness (apparent meaning, for example, of the riddle he tells at the wedding-feast: Judg 14.14), of anecdotes worthy of the Decameron itself (Judg 16.1ff.), and is cheated by women, who finally bring him to a bad end: the hero must now play the jester for the Philistines until he again recovers his magical power and succeeds in burying both them and himself under the ruins of the palace. Nil humanum mihi alienum; Goliardic-type songs and drinking songs also belong to a people's literature. And the further away from the religious and, indeed, from the edifying such a mixed form appears to be (Samson somehow reminds us of Enkidu, the friend of Gilgamesh, who is changed from a legendary animal into a human being only by his sexual relationship with a prostitute), the clearer the divine frame becomes which the Deuteronomist is placing around the picture: Samson's force is that of the nasir chosen by God; the story of his election is parallel to that of Samuel, John the Baptist, and Jesus; his actions, like those of all great judges, are those of a man driven by the spirit of God. Over the abyss of apparent inadequacy, the archetype continues to be active in the image. Just as Prakriti, nature herself, unceasingly makes attempts at forming a worthy creation to offer God, into which he might breathe his spirit, and yet for a while she produces only monsters and gnomes which God rejects in order to spur her on to make something better,[5] so, too, it seems that here, with Samson, it is God's Spirit himself who is taking pains to shape the finished form into which he might pour himself: the 'man after God's own heart' (1 Sam 13.14).

b. The great theatre of the world

Can a king be wholly royal and wholly do the will of God? He can do it with God's grace, which carries him like a wind-filled sail, but in the end he must pay for his power—must pay a superhuman price as only kings can pay.[6] If here there can be talk of a 'glory' (sebi) of the kings (2 Sam 1.19), by contrast to the 'glory of Israel', which is God himself (1 Sam 15.29), this can have its place only within the perspective of the final tragedy: the word sebi is found precisely in David's lament for the fallen heroes, Saul and Jonathan. Colourful and surrounded by tales as David's rise to power is, his figure becomes ripe for history proper only from the tragic turning-point on. The shadows of the episode with Uriah and Bathsheba descend upon everything which is to follow: the difficult and vertiginous road that for long made its ascent through alien and deserted lands now, in its descent, leads back over the brook of Kedron and the Jordan and into the wilderness; and the final, almost liturgically staged return thither is but a postlude: the concubines whom his son had approached are locked away and no longer visited by him (2 Sam 20.3).

Like no other stories, the tales of the David cycle are developed with delight: delight in narration, in external tension and internal psychological precision, and in the art of touching and elevating the reader. There is in them laughing and weeping, and the great game of life with the constant incursions of death is played out. David is a shepherd like Moses, a lion-killer like Samson (1 Sam 17.32). In contrast to Saul, he is at first plain in appearance (16.7), and yet he embodies the ideal of the young knight of the new courtly society: 'He can play music; he is a brave man and a good fighter, wise in speech and handsome, and the Lord is with him' (16.18). When he confronts Goliath, he is again called a 'handsome lad' (17.42). The eye for beauty has been awakened; in the David stories the following persons are described as 'beautiful', 'very beautiful', or 'handsome': the wily Abigail (1 Sam 25.3); Bathsheba (2 Sam 11.2); David's daughter Tamar (13.1); his son Absalom, who was 'without flaw from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot' (14.25); Absalom's daughter Tamar (14.27); and Abishag, the girl who warms David in his old age (1 Kings 1.3f.). Jonathan, whose love was 'more wonderful than the love of women' to David, was also 'dear and delightful' (2 Sam 1.26): their relationship is comparable to that of Achilles and Patroclus. Prince Jonathan is the most daring hero of all (1 Sam 14); unwittingly he violates his father's vow, and when the oracle declares him to be the guilty party, he exclaims: 'I am ready to die.' When his father Saul wants to kill him, the people save their hero. Then comes the bond of friendship between the prince and the shepherd, whom Jonathan 'begins to love as himself' and to whom he gives his tunic, his sword, his bow, and his belt (18.1–4). Together they conclude a 'covenant for life', and David aspires to be killed by his friend's hand in the event he cannot escape Saul's wrath (20.8). By a hair's breadth David just misses having to go out in battle against Jonathan (28.1f.), but his friend falls alone in the distance and David erects for his 'brother' that splendid memorial which unites him in death with his doomed father:

---

[5] Paul Claudel, 'La Légende de Prakriti', in: Figures et Paraboles (1936), pp. 103–159.

[6] In this respect David could be seen as the quintessence of the work of Reinhold Schneider: we find him at the very heart of the Bible and with no connections to the Greek, Germanic, or Indian tragic view of life.

> Delightful and dearly loved were Saul and Jonathan; > in life, in death, they were not parted (2 Sam 1.23).

After friendship, David's great gift is magnanimity, the thoroughly human, Aristotelian sort: the grandezza which, in its sovereignty, knows how to forgive and, by so doing, also captivates without any ulterior motives. This is David's constant attitude toward Saul as he flees from the latter's disfavour: David continually exhibits his magnanimity to Saul (1 Sam 24 and 26), and it is that of God's elect towards one God has rejected—the graciousness of a man rising toward one in decline. Then we witness the forbearance of David, the guerrilla leader, toward those lazy companions of his who had wanted no part in wresting back from the Amalekites the goods and women these had stolen (30.21f.); also his generosity to the son of Jonathan (2 Sam 9 and 19.25–31), to his former benefactor Barzillai (19.32f.), and even, finally, to the disgraceful Shimei (19.16–24). All possible motives of human actions and attitudes are interwoven in the plot: perpetual intrigues to the very end; jealousies over the glory of victory and over women; dangerous escapes with comic effects (1 Sam 19.10b–17), with deceptions (21.2f.) that unwittingly unleash terrible consequences (22.6–19) and yet in the end turn to the advantage of this eternally happy go-lucky man (22.20); multiple acts of treachery (23.19f.; 26.1f.), and, in between, the burlesque interlude with Nabal (i.e. 'fool') and the sly Abigail, whom David in the end marries along with her considerable dowry (1 Sam 25); then the enforced desertion to the enemy (27), and the stroke of chance that at the last moment delivers him from the duty of having to fight against his own people. A whole panorama unfurls before us of espionage and counter-espionage (2 Sam 15.32f.; 17.17f.), dramatic traps into which the hero falls (2 Sam 12), all conceivable intrigues involving love and politics (David's relationship to the daughters of Saul, Abner's quarrel for Saul's concubine, 2 Sam 3f.), the war among brothers (2 Sam 2.12–32), insidious assassinations and vendettas (2 Sam 3.22–27), the very opportune murder of rivals on the part of the rising king, the shadows of which nevertheless fall on him and from which he can purify himself only at great effort (2 Sam 4, cf. 16.7). And through it all David, God's elect, is led by his star to ascend the throne first of one, then of both kingdoms: he conquers 'his' city, which now becomes the national shrine, and he establishes a great kingdom which his son will only have to consolidate (2 Sam 8).

The narrative, however, disposes of the main political events with surprising rapidity in order to make time for the great human tragedy, whose shadows begin to fall with the adultery with Bathsheba and the murder of Uriah. Shortly before, God had, through Nathan's mouth, given the king the ultimate assurance: his royal house would stand firm forever (2 Sam 7.5–16, esp. v. 13), and in a disconcerted prayer the king had given thanks for this unimaginable grace (7.18–29). And now, again through Nathan, God proclaims the curse which will reach out into the future, contrasting the earlier blessing: 'Thus speaks Yhwh: I will bring trouble upon you from within your own family' (12.11). So begins the tragedy, which brings what follows so close to the ancestral curse of Greek families. (Such a curse had already been pronounced and carried out on the house of Eli: 1 Sam 3f., 22.6–19, 1 Kings 2.27; and in Saul we could clearly see what ἄτη is.) But David must first bear the incest between Amnon and Tamar, Amnon's deadly hatred for his ravished sister, then Absalom's fratricide against Amnon, the banishment of the murderer and, after his return, Absalom's rebellion against his father, who now, in his flight before his son, has to lower himself to the utmost humiliation. The whole theme had been hinted at from the beginning, although not yet with its dark undertones: David was said to be a 'poor man of low birth' (1 Sam 18.18, 23), and even his full Israelite genealogy is questionable: the Book of Ruth was written so as to dispel such doubts. David is looked down upon by Goliath (17.42); at first Samuel overlooks him (16.6f.); at the low point of his flight he has to play the lunatic and so invite contempt (21.10ff.); as king he has to endure constant suspicions. He is pathetically humiliated by Nathan ('You are the man', 2 Sam 12.7), and from then on the chain of humiliations is unbroken. The old man, as he flees, has to listen while Shimei heaps every possible insult on him and showers him with stones, while his son Absalom broadcasts the secret sin of his father and lies with his father's concubines on a rooftop (2 Sam 16.20–23). He becomes a King Lear, and even more an Oedipus at Colonus who, precisely as one humiliated, ripens to become a blessing for the land. Pressed to return curse for curse, he rejects the suggestion: 'If the son of my loins is out to kill me, who can wonder at this Benjamite? Let him be, let him curse; for the Lord must have told him to do it' (16.11). Earlier Jephthah had sacrificed his daughter just as Agamemnon had his in Aulis, and the girl had offered herself willingly, like Iphigeneia, for her father's victory had been purchased at the price of her life (Judg 11.36). But now another, even more painful killing takes place: David has to fight against Absalom, and from his officers he demands only one thing—that they spare his life. Joab, who is the Hagen of this epic, kills him nonetheless. From atop the city gate the old king is on the lookout, watching the two messengers as one overtakes the other (a scene that Aeschylus himself could have composed). And when he learns what has happened, he collapses: 'Absalom, my son! If only I had died instead of you!' (2 Sam 18.33). Who has killed whom: the father the son or the son the father? 'And the army stole into the city like men ashamed to show their faces after a defeat in battle.' Then Joab, three-time murderer (of Abner, of Absalom, and of Amasa), berates David as follows: 'You have put to shame this day all your servants, who have saved you . . ., because you love those that hate you and hate those that love you; you have made us feel, officers and soldiers alike, that we are nothing to you; for it is plain that if Absalom were still alive and all of us dead, you would be content. Now go at once and give your servants some encouragement; if you refuse, I swear by the Lord that not a man will stay with you tonight' (19.3–7). And the king, face bathed in tears, must then present himself to his men, a type of Ecce Homo.

The tragedies meet at many points. When David is forced to deliver seven sons of Saul over to the Gibeonites for impaling, another Antigone comes on the scene: Rizpah, the mother of two of them, keeps watch day and night by the corpses all summer long. In the daytime she chases away the vultures, and at night the hyenas.

This is indeed the theatre of the world; the action, however, is enveloped by a God who not only remains a spectator of the play, in order afterwards to reward and to punish, but a God who, in the actions of his 'images', remains the archetype that also participates in the action, both in hidden and manifest ways. He lets man explore the extremest possibilities of his freedom, and yet he conducts events as a play of his manifold elections and directions. He both ties and loosens the knots, and through it all he wants to further this kingdom and this dynamic promise. But he also wants to exhibit the tragic mask of the old king with the bleeding heart, who, if only he had been allowed to, would have so gladly died in the place of his lost son. And because out of his pain another, still concealed pain resounds, David can become the father of all those who sing and glorify the glory of God:

> The very word of David, son of Jesse,
> the very word of the man whom God raised up,
> the anointed prince of the God of Jacob,
> and the singer of Israel's psalms:
> the spirit of the Lord speaks now through me, > and his word is on my lips. . . . (2 Sam 23.1f.).

c. The splendour of power

The first preliminaries related of Solomon the magnificent are the purges necessary whenever a new government comes to power: first, the liquidation of the other pretender, the older brother Adonijah, and (following David's directives) also of Joab the general; then the deposition of the priest Abiathar; finally, the removal of Shimei. The story of Solomon, however, really begins, even before the building of the temple, with his marriage to the daughter of Pharaoh (1 Kings 3.1), and this leads to his first encounter with God in a dream vision he has while offering sacrifice at the shrine in Gibeon: this could have been an initiation rite of the young king according to the Egyptian royal ritual, just as the 'king's dream', especially within the sanctuary itself (incubation oracle), was an established concept both in and outside of Israel.[7] David's wholly unmythical kingdom must now be secured and established in peace especially through international alliances of a political and cultural nature and by commerce (5.2ff.). The main objective is power, and even love is subordinated to its service. At first it is power of quite an 'unmythical' sort,[8] a power which will act as mentor to a cultural 'enlightenment' which is itself not only 'unmythical' but even de-mythologising and which in the end, for reasons of strategy and prestige, cannot totally dispense with the mythical draperies that befit a great king of the period. Such superficial adornment has at times given scholars the impression that Israel at this time completely adopted the Egypto-Akkadian ideology of the king with its mythical liturgy. This is an undemonstrable thesis built on air. In reality the mimicry involved was limited to externals in the cultic sphere,[9] and had more serious effects only in the importation of foreign art (the temple buildings), in poetry (the psalms, the lyricism of the Song of Songs), and in Wisdom literature (the Proverbs). Admittedly, writing as he does with the total collapse of royal splendour in Jerusalem in mind, the Deuteronomist is keenly aware of the religious consequences of Solomon's diplomacy: the foreign princesses bring their own cults with them and for these a space must be set apart in the king's temple; moreover, love, which at first had been subservient to politics, now gradually becomes a theme of its own '(Solomon loved a great many foreign women . . . and was devoted to them out of love,' 11.1f.). The court, established for diplomacy, also becomes the stage for courtly love. And yet, behind all this, the army, as Gerhard von Rad clearly shows, played the decisive role. A lasting change takes place from a militia used defensively, and summoned up by the charismatic leader in times of need, to a standing professional army that keeps in subjection the foreign peoples conquered by David. To this is conjoined the extended 'army' of state officials, tax-collectors, regional administrators, and so on. This entire secular system of power now needs a religious justification, and 'good society' begins to relate worldly prestige to God: 'Thine, O Yhwh, is the greatness, the power, the glory, the splendour, and the majesty; . . . thine the sovereignty, and in thy power is the one who is exalted over all as head. Wealth and prestige come from thee; thou rulest over all; might and power are in thy hand. . . . We give thee thanks and praise thy glorious name' (1 Chron 29.10–13). How many power-words in one prayer!

---

[7] S. Herrmann, 'Die Königsnovelle in Ägypten und Israel', in: Wiss. Zft. d. Univ. Leipzig, Festschrift Alt, 1934/5, pp. 33f.

[8] Saul and David were elected democratically either by the people or by the elders of the people, and this is again the case with Solomon's successor (1 Kings 12.2–20).

[9] On this see M. Noth, 'Gott, König, Volk im Alten Testament: eine methodologische Auseinandersetzung mit einer gegenwärtigen Forschungsrichtung' (1950), now in: Ges. Stud. z. AT (1957), pp. 188–229. Noth shows the one-sidedness of both the English school (Hooke) and the Scandinavian school (Mowinckel, Widengren, Engnell, Riesenfeld, Bentzen, etc.). R. C. North ('The Religious Aspects of Hebrew Kingship', ZAW 50, 1932, pp. 8f.) and C. J. Gadd (Ideas of Divine Rule in the Ancient East, 1948) were already moving in Noth's direction.

And yet the whole thing had begun with a very personal encounter with God (1 Kings 3.4f.) in which God lays out his graces before the young king for him to choose. He chooses wisdom; God grants it to him; and because he did not desire power, God gives him in addition what he had not asked for—'wealth and honour as no king of your time can match' (3.13). Solomon thus becomes the 'wonder of the world', actually for possessing in utter fullness both God's treasures and the world's simultaneously: 'King Solomon outdid all the kings of the earth in wealth and wisdom' (10.23). At the same time he builds the temple, according to the plan and layout of Phoenician temples and with workmen and architects from Tyre. For himself, adjoining the temple, he erects a royal palace, and within it the 'House of the Forest of Lebanon' with forty-five cedar columns (7.3; probably a place of amusement and a treasury) whose proportions alone already surpass those of the temple. But in addition he built a 'Hall of Columns' and a 'Hall of Judgment' containing the throne, for great diplomatic occasions. In short, what we have is a kind of Versailles in which a lavishly appointed and richly endowed House of God was also provided. And just as the Greek pantheon provides sensuous embellishments for the palace of the Christian king, so, too, mythical trees of life, lions, bulls, and temple sentinels (cherubs) find a place as showpieces in the development of Solomonic splendour.[10] Nor can the glory of Yhwh be missing from the total splendour of such religious and profane representation. Indeed, when the temple is completed and consecrated by the king, two actions are accomplished in this sense: the ark of the covenant, which David had already brought to his city, is now brought into the temple as well, as the central object of the cult (8.1); and then the king prays that the ancient kabod of Sinai might come down as the final legitimation of the new sanctuary.

'Then the priests came out of the Holy Place, since "the cloud" was filling the house of the Lord, and they could not continue to minister because of "the cloud', for the glory of Yhwh filled the house of Yhwh. And Solomon said:

O Lord who hast set the sun in heaven, but hast chosen to dwell in thick darkness,
here have I built thee a lofty house, a habitation for thee to occupy for ever.' (8.10–13).

Even this is not enough for the redactor of the Chronicle; even the final requisite from the Sinaitic period is called into play: 'When Solomon had finished this prayer, fire came down from heaven and consumed the whole-offering and the sacrifices, while the glory of Yhwh filled the house' (2 Chron 7.1).

Thus, God also comes into the action, but in so doing he chooses the garment of darkness and hiddenness. The aspect of his glory as light is represented by the sun and the magnificent temple;[11] this will prove a dissociation with heavy consequences. God has occupied the temple, but, as it were, with reservations. In the third theophany (1 Kings 9.1–9) God makes everything (even the promise to David in v. 5) dependent on the conditional clause: 'if you live in my sight as your father David lived.' If not, 'I will renounce the temple which I have consecrated in honour of my name, and Israel shall become the byword and the derision of all peoples.' Neither the promise to David nor the temple nor the ark[12] can be used by man as mortgages against God.

---

[10] J. Fichtner, 'Die Bewältigung heidnischer Vorstellungen und Praktiken in der Welt des Alten Testaments' (1959); now in: Gottes Weisheit: Ges. Stud. z. AT (1964), pp. 115–129.

[11] J. Fichtner, Das erste Buch von den Königen (1964), p. 136.

A king represents the divine order of the world; in his person God's presence in the world is concentrated. And so in Sumeria and Egypt the king was naturally seen as belonging to the divine sphere. In Akkadia he is at the very least the 'adopted son' and 'servant' of his god.[13] Also for Phoenicia (Ugarit) there are indications that the king was taken to be an embodiment of god.[14] With many varied nuances the idea and cultic practice of a 'divine marriage' are everywhere evidenced. From the king, therefore, there emanates something of the divine kabod, something of that terrifying and distancing radiance of power which casts down enemies and keeps ordinary mortals at a distance of awe. On the other hand, by virtue of his immediate relation to the divine world, the king as such is resplendent and a mediator of joy. It is a feature of the international style of the oriental courts always to be praising these two qualities of the king, and to ascribe them to him in both oral and written address.[15] [12] The ark, long the sacral centre of the covenant with the twelve tribes (1 Sam 1–6), resumes in itself the memories of the Sinaitic period (Num 10.35). Thus it is understandable that it was seen as a kind of substitute for God's former visibleness, as a token of his invisible presence, and that at the time of its loss during the war with the Philistines the painful cry could be heard: 'The glory has departed from Israel' (1 Sam 4.21). It is not because his sons are dead, but because the ark has been lost, that Eli falls dead from his chair. It is not because her son had fallen, but because the ark had been taken, that Phinehas' wife goes into labour prematurely, giving her child the name Eikabod: 'Where is the glory?' Doubtless because of the ark, Israel long retains a primitive attitude toward the numinous. Still in David's time the ark is dangerous, 'laden' with divine powers; whoever touches it must die (2 Sam 6.7f.). Because it was full of mana the holy mountain Sinai was also taboo during the theophany. Helmuth Kittel attempts to interpret kabod in the whole Old Testament from this perspective (Die Herrlichkeit Gottes, 1934, pp. 69f). Until the time of its transfer into the temple, the ark remains the 'place' of God's presence (Ps 99.5; 132.7; 1 Chron 28.2), but more and more it is regarded as the 'footstool' of a Lord who in reality has his throne in heaven. On the variously merging and changing perspectives, see von Rad, ThOT I, pp. 236ff.

---

[13] Henri Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods (Chicago, 1948). René Labat, Le caractère religieux de la royauté assyro-babylonienne (1939).

[14] Ivan Engnell, Studies in Divine Kingship in the Ancient Near East (Uppsala, 1943). F. K. Euler, 'Königtum und Götterwelt in den altaramäischen Inschriften Nordsyriens', in: ZAW N.F. 15 (1938), pp. 272–313.

It is in this context that we must read the Bible's royal marriage hymn (Ps 45), whether composed for Solomon himself or for Ahab's wedding with Jezebel, the woman from Tyre, or for some other ruler. The song first describes the splendour of the young king and then the beauty of the foreign bride who is being brought him:

> You surpass all mankind in beauty, > your lips are moulded in grace,
> so you are blessed by God for ever.
> With your sword ready at your side, warrior king, > your limbs resplendent in their royal armour, > ride on to execute true sentence and just judgment.
> Your right hand shall teach you terrible deeds:
> your sharp arrows flying, nations beneath your feet,
> the courage of the king's foes melting away!
> Your throne, O God, remains now and for > ever. (vv. 2–6a)

The 'splendour and majesty' which are to terrify the peoples through his 'terrible deeds' have an even bolder model in the inscriptions of the Assyrian kings: 'For fear of my dominion and the dazzling horror of my powerful weapons they became frightened and with their own weapons they slew Giammu, their lord' (Salmanassar III).[16] Tiglath-Pileser III speaks of the 'glory of my lordship', which made an enemy 'collapse into madness'.[17] Sargon says: 'Fear of the splendour of my lordship enveloped him,' referring to the king of [15] K. Grzegorzewski, Elemente vorderasiatischen Hofstils auf kananäischem Boden (Diss. Königsberg, 1937). Cf. Is 33.17.

---

[16] K. Galling, Textbuch zur Geschichte Israels (1950), p. 45. Cf. Gressmann, AOT, pp. 339f.

[17] Galling, pp. 51f.

Melucha.[18] 'Luli, the king of the city of Sidon, had been struck down by fear of the splendour of my lordship, and so he fled far away, into the midst of the sea, and died.'[19] 'Hiskia (Hezekiah), from the land of Juda, was overcome by fear of the splendour of my lordship,' reads the inscription of Sennacherib.[20] This 'frightful splendour' is the destructive aspect of that majestic radiance which had bathed the king as it emanated from the Egyptian and the Sumero-Babylonian deity, a splendour celebrated everywhere in the royal hymns.[21] It is no coincidence, then, that the king in the psalm is addressed as 'God' and as 'divine', which is to say as one who, in his beauty and power, radiates the divine (Elohim).

The Book of Esther, in the scene of Esther's audience in the throne room of King Artaxerxes, introduces into the biblical sphere the whole kabod of the theophanous Oriental ruler.

'Passing through all the doors she found herself before the king. He sat upon his royal throne, decked with all the garments of his solemn appearance (ἐπιφάνεια), quite covered over with gold and precious stones, terrible to look at. And as he raised his face in dire anger, glowing purple as it was with glory, the queen collapsed, and in her swoon she changed colour and leaned her head on the servant accompanying her. And God turned the king's disposition to mildness.' He stepped down from the throne, took Esther in his arms, reassured her she would not die, and sought to console her. 'He raised the golden sceptre, placed it on her neck, kissed her, and said: "Speak to me." She said: "Lord, I saw thee like an angel of God, and my heart was troubled for fear of thy glory (δόξα),[22] for thou art magnificent, O Lord, and thy face is full of beauteous grace" (χάριτες). As she said this she (again) sank into a swoon' (ch. 5, with the LXX additions which go back to a Hebrew original that antedates the Masoretic text).

---

[18] Ibid., p. 56.

[19] Ibid.

[20] Ibid., pp. 57f.

[21] Falkenstein and von Soden, Sumerische und akkadische Hymnen und Gebete (1953). W. H. P. Römer, Sumerische 'Königshymnen' der Isin-Zeit (Leiden, 1965). A divine radiance of their own is manifested by the offspring of Tiamat in the creation myth (AOT, p. 112; Z, p. 136) and by the monster Humbaba, whom Gilgamesh and his friend kill (The Epic of Gilgamesh). The 'radiance' in each of these cases is the numinosum tremendum. A great number of passages exhibiting this 'frightful splendour' of the Sumerian and Akkadian gods has been collected by J. Jeremias (Theophanie, 1965, pp. 75–85).

In the great king Esther doubtless sees a theophany; divine glory radiates upon her, first the 'frightful splendour' of the offended majesty and then, as the king comes down to her and kisses her, a 'gracious splendour'. She collapsed like all who in the Bible believe they are to die because they have seen God (Judg 13.22; Is 6.5) or who cannot bear the sight because of the magnitude of the radiance (Ezek 1.28; Dan 8.17f.; 9.15; Mt 17.6; Rev 1.17). She thinks she is seeing an 'angel of God', and this is probably a biblical accommodation of the original Persian concept of the theophanic quality of their great kings.[23] Several times David, too, was compared to an angel of God,[24] which was perhaps already a part of the courtly style. The Book of Esther is also a commentary on the following verses of Proverbs: 'A king's anger is a messenger (angel) of death, and a wise man will appease him. In the light of the king's countenance is life, his favour is like a rain-cloud in the spring' (16.14f.). This turning from a terrifying divine splendour to a splendour of grace and favour is precisely the high point and the real meaning of the story. The background is perhaps the hope of a possible 'conversion' on the part of Antiochus Epiphanes; for, if great kings of Persia can be won over by the Jews, why not he as well?[25]

Esther comes before the king 'after she had decked herself in all her glory (δόξα) and had become beauty itself (ἐπιφανής). . . . At the peak of her beauty she blushed and her gladsome face was open as with love.' Ps 45 portrays in similar terms the bride 'for whose beauty the king longs'. Again in a comparable manner, the Queen of Sheba comes before Solomon and all her expectations are surpassed (1 Kings 10.7). Solomon himself is seated on 'a great throne of ivory, overlaid with fine gold. Six steps led up to the throne; at the back of the throne there were the heads of bulls. There were arms on each side of the seat, with a lion standing beside each of them, and twelve lions stood on the six steps, one at either end of each step. Nothing like it had ever been made for any monarch' (10.18ff.). This is indeed a stage fit for theophanies.

---

[22] Another reading: 'for the glory of thy anger.' In the Slavonic Book of Enoch we still read: 'How frightful and perilous it is to come before an earthly king! It is fearful and dangerous because a king's will means life or death or great heat' (39.8).

[23] On all this, see William H. Brownlee, 'Le livre grec d'Esther et la royauté divine', in: Revue Biblique 73 (1966), pp. 161–185, esp. 171.

[24] 1 Sam 14.17, 20, 27; 29.9; cf. Zech 12.8.

[25] This is Brownlee's attractive attempt at interpretation.

From the outset the Deuteronomist follows with apprehension the Solomonic mixture of the spiritual and the secular, but he does so in such a way that at first he delights unabashedly in the wonderful unfolding of political power: he expressly traces such power back to God's favour, no less than the wisdom the king has prayed for. For the redactor the situation becomes questionable only when eros trespasses the limits imposed by reasons of state and becomes autonomous, for it is the blindness of eros that makes the ruler indifferent toward the imported pagan cults and deities. Discomfort grips us, for our part, somewhat earlier, when both spiritual wisdom and earthly glory are without distinction attributed to the grace of God. Doubtless the 'poor in Israel' subsequently also experienced the same sense of malaise. Attempts at legitimating the glory of the Christian empire—from Constantine to Justinian, from Charlemagne and the Ottonians all the way to the Sun King—have always been based on this Davidic-Solomonic conception, without any apparent awareness of the fact that the questionableness of such a representation of God through earthly power arises even earlier for the New Testament than for the Old. And yet the Bible nowhere categorically condemns as hybris the attempt of the 'image' to emulate its 'archetype' even in such a way and to find the gift of the Creator in all creaturely goods. Here, too, man is released to develop his possibilities with freedom; he is led 'on a long leash', but in such a way that God's might and glory envelop all unfoldings of human power in order to direct them and to dissolve them again at the right moment.

d. Wisdom of life

Education and enlightenment are a part of the splendour of a royal court. Solomon is also the arch wise-man in Israel; his 'wisdom surpassed the wisdom of all the people of the East, and all the wisdom of Egypt'; he 'uttered three thousand proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five' (1 Kings 4.30, 32). From the outset we have here wisdom on the level of and in competition with the 'East' (Edom, the inhabitants of the Arabian steppe east of Moab and Ammon) and with Egypt. The Book of Proverbs claims to derive from Solomon and its most ancient parts (chs. 10–22 and 25–29) could conceivably go back to him; in any event, it does derive from the period of the kings. It is commonly agreed that it contains passages embodying such 'Eastern' wisdom of life (the 'proverbs of Agur' and of 'Lemuel': 30.1–31.9) and, in addition, demonstrable textual borrowings from the Egyptian Instruction of Amen-em-ope (22.17–23.11). Indeed, the pattern of the whole work, both in thought-content and in form, is inconceivable without a knowledge of the expansive tradition of Egyptian wisdom. This tradition constitutes the cultural element of the class of scribes and officials. Under Solomon such a class is established also in Israel with the consequence that, if it is to contend with contemporary cultural and political relations, Israel's cultural deficiencies must quickly be remedied.[26] Apart from the introduction (1–9), which comes from a much later period, the Book of Proverbs is a monument to the new process of lay education that is to make a man into an internationally formed and useful cortegiano or honnête homme. The distinctively Israelite nuances are suggested most discreetly, in a way not painful to 'foreigners'. The talk is of God and providence, never of the historical revelation or the covenant. The unashamed objective is to equip the government official with the know-how and the polish necessary for a successful career and, of course, personal advancement, while all the while providing him with a religiously based ethic.[27] From the Christian perspective, what is offered here is an anthropocentric philosophy with a religious backdrop, or an enlightened, liberal theology. This amounts to the systematic development of the built-in possibilities of the 'image' by emphasising its counterposition to its divine archetype. Such a one-sided model, focussing on man as such in an international sense, is now assigned a place within the total encounter between the living God and Israel. Neither are this 'religion' and this ethic banished as being the titanic enterprise of unbelief (K. Barth), nor can they in the least come into competition with God's authentic revelation, however much the Solomonians and anthropocentrists of all ages would wish it so.

---

[26] See the thorough analysis of the international (especially Egyptian) wisdom books and a comparison of them with biblical wisdom in: Hilaire Duesberg, Les Scribes inspirés (1939), with a bibliography. On our particular theme, see Drubbel, 'Le conflit entre la sagesse profane et la sagesse religieuse', in: Biblica 17 (1936), pp. 45–70, 393–406.

In order to acquire a right sense of proportion, we must now take a quick look at the Egyptian wisdom books which were regarded as the leading examples of the genre.[28] Our main interest here is in the key ethico-religious statements, and not so much in the customary instructions for advancement in one's career or the exclusive praise of the prestigious profession of scribe, which is always contrasted to the philistine and dirty occupations of those who work with their hands and to the miserable life of the government official[29] (reproduced by Sirach, 38.21–39.11). The order of the world rests on maat, the unity of truth and justice, which God has instilled into the world and according to which men must live.[30] Men are 'copies of God'.[31] They have God's instruction in their 'conscience'[32] as 'shame' (that is, 'dread', αἰδώς, fear and awe, shrinking back before the unjust),[33] if only they but listen to the teaching and desire to be wise. When shame is absent, the fool must be helped with the rod.[34] Wisdom is embodied in one's parents, teachers, superiors, and in the tradition; the whole endeavour is to learn what one does not yet know or has not yet experienced. A willing ear is the chief virtue of the young Egyptian,[35] and the readiness to continue to learn must be the mark even of the adult.[36] The goal of education is self-mastery,[37] interior 'balance', discretion, equanimity[38]—in a word, the cardinal Greek virtue of sophrosyne (with clear inclusion of sophia as wisdom and andreia as discipline and the rejection of everything seductive and hostile to the ideal).[39] Particular praise goes to patience and the ability to keep silence. Whoever cannot attain to this—the 'hotheaded' or undisciplined man—is the [27] 'Le problème consistait pour eux (les scribes inspirés) à construire une théorie du succès qui demeurât subordonnée à la morale de Jahweh', Duesberg, I, p. 456.

---

[28] An easily accessible collection is that of F. W. von Bissing, Altägyptische Lebensweisheit, in the 'Bibliothek der Alten Welt'. We quote our sources with the following abbreviations: Ptaotes (Pahotep) = P; Gemnikai (Kagemmi) = K; Meikras (Mery-ka-Re) = M; Achthoes (Kheti, son of Dwauf) = D; Instruction for Wentai-Amun, Lansing papyrus = L; Iniy (Ani) = In; Amenophis (Amenemope) = A; Demotic Wisdom Book of Phibis = Ph; Ipwer = Ip. We will give the page number of the von Bissing edition. Other texts also in: A. Erman, Die Literatur der Ägypter (Leipzig, 1923).

---

[29] A 57f.; L 67–70.

[30] 'Justice is the great gift of God', A 87f. 'Many a man who understands the teaching does not know how to live according to it', Ph 98.

[31] M 56.

[32] Ph 120.

[33] Ph 98 and passim.

[34] 'Toth, the great god [of writing], has put the rod on earth for the instruction of the fool. To the prudent he has given shame that he may escape all evil', Ph 98. 'Love not thy belly' (to the Egyptian this means: 'Avoid excess in eating and in sexual actions'), 'understand the shame of thy heart; despise not the voice of thy heart', Ph 112. 'Better to die in poverty than to live without shame', Ph 113.

[35] 'Things will go well for a son that has listened', P 50. 'Behold a scribe who hears. One that listens attentively becomes proficient', D 60.

[36] 'Whoever listens is loved by God, but whoever is abhorred by God hears not', P 50. 'If thou listenest thou art a man qualified for an office', L 66; A 80.

[37] Ph 92.

[38] Particularly developed and emphasised in the Seventh Instruction of Phibis, 93f.

[39] Cf. the repeated injunctions to self-mastery with regards to women: P 48; In 74, 77. Likewise, it is much expected that a wise man confront

'fool' who does not quite coincide with the uncultured and simple-minded man, even though, as with the Greeks, 'ignorance' and 'wickedness' are very proximate concepts.[40] Justice and truth are exhibited in one's life by the veneration given to father[41] and mother,[42] by mercy shown to the poor, by compassion, and by forbearance: 'Do not find out the name of a widow when thou meetest her in a field, and listen to her excuse. Do not turn a stranger away from thy oil-jug and it shall be doubled for thy brethren. God loves more him who gives delight to the humble than him who honours the grand.'[43] 'When thou findest a poor man with a great debt, divide it into three portions; throw two of them away and let only one stand. Thou wilt see this to be a way of life' (cf. Lk 16.1–9).[44] And finally: 'When a prudent man is robbed of his clothes, he freely gives them, and a blessing besides' (cf. Mt 5.38f.).[45] 'Eat not bread when another suffers want and thou dost not reach out to him the hand with the bread.'[46]

All of these injunctions proceed from God and his just world-order. God is hidden, but only the fool denies him since God is manifest in the whole order of nature.[47] The 'reprisal' is the immanent justice of the world; no one may presume to retaliate of himself.[48] It is God who judges. 'God is always admirable, but man remains deficient. . . . Say not: 'I am sinless', and do not exert thyself in contradicting God. In God's hand there is no perfect man, but neither does anything deficient stand before him.'[49] 'Entrust thyself into God's arms, injustice: 'Whoever keeps silence in the face of injustice crawls away in ignominy', Ph 113.

---

[40] Cf. von Bissing, loc. cit., pp. 38f. On the 'fool' see especially chs. 7, 8 and 14 in Ph.

[41] Ph 91.

[42] In 76.

[43] A 90.

[44] A 85.

[45] Ph 113f.

[46] In 76.

[47] Ph 117f.

[48] Ph 118.

[49] A 87.

then thou wilt quietly lay thy opponents low.'[50] God tends his flock—mankind—and 'if they weep, he hears them.' God considers man's heart and disposition: 'God prefers to accept the virtue of the upright rather than the oxen of evil-doers.'[51] 'Come to know God's greatness that it may grow in thy heart.'[52] God is all-knowing; he 'knows the tongue's answer even before questions are put to it';[53] therefore, one should entrust oneself to him: 'When God blesses a blind man his way is open; when a lame man's heart is on God's way then his way is even. For God rewards trust with the blessings of protection.'[54]

All of this doctrine of wisdom remains within the confines of this world; uncertainty reigns over the beyond, whether Hades or Elysium,[55] and therefore also over the ultimate value of this earthly life.[56] This is why here, too, as in all cultures, various forms of an unashamed Epicureanism lurk behind the earnest moral teachings.[57]

The variations of these themes in Solomon are of no great moment, even if the name of Toth or of Ra is replaced with that of Yhwh. The concern is still with the education of a good official. Wisdom, on the one hand, is the art of mastering this world: oneself through self-discipline, and life through the knowledge of things, cleverness, savoir faire, all in order to get ahead. But an elegant humility and modesty in God's sight must also be cultivated, since in the end wisdom cannot be acquired without him.

Here, again the ability to listen, docility, and openness are held in great esteem, as well as incessant striving and self-exertion.[58] The ability to keep silence is, therefore, highly praised,[59] also modesty and natural humility[60] as remedies against arrogance, obduracy, presumption, hybris, and sarcasm, all of which are the special characteristics of the fool.[61] The person who is inexperienced but still teachable,[62] and the simple-minded person who has not had the advantage of higher education,[63] are carefully set apart from the fool. In this educational 'curriculum', which inculcates an 'expertise of life',[64] theory and practice, insight and discipline go hand in hand.[65] The paramount objectives are self-mastery,[66] composure and patience,[67] a kindly sense of justice[68] (in the second part of Proverbs the wise man is termed 'the just man' 48 times), industriousness (which alone brings profit),[69] and love of truth.[70]

---

[50] A 89.

[51] M 56.

[52] Ph 116.

[53] Ph 117.

[54] Ph 100f.

[55] Cf. the four contradictory versions of the 'Harper's Song' in von Bissing's collection, pp. 141–145.

[56] Cf. the 'struggle of a despondent man with his soul', pp. 124–128.

[57] 'Drink, inebriate yourselves, do not stop feasting, follow your hearts as long as you are on earth' (from the grave inscription of Petosiris, p. 146).

What the Egyptians called 'conscience', awe, shame, here receives the name of 'fear of the Lord'.[71] Like attentiveness to the Lord, this 'fear' is a basic part of the wisdom of life. God sees everything,[72] tests everything;[73] his eyes protect the wise man.[74] Men have many plans, but only God's counsel carries the day.[75] God directs and leads, and one should entrust oneself to him.[76] Man should not rely on himself[77] or consider himself wise.[78] Only in the last part of the book do we come to the actual prayer to God for wisdom, since by now wisdom has become one of God's own qualities: through wisdom God made the world,[79] and it can be called God's first work, the foundation for everything else.[80] And only God bestows wisdom.[81] Only here does wisdom become personified as a 'sister'[82] (which could also mean 'spouse') and a 'confidante';[83] only here is wisdom portrayed as one calling, one whose voice ought always to be listened to.[84]

---

[58] Prov 10.8; 12.15; 13.1, 10, 13, 18; 14.8; 15.5, 22, 31f.; 16.20; 17.10; 18.13, 15; 19.20; 25.12; 28.23; 29.20.

[59] Prov 10.19; 12.23; 13.3; 17.28; 25.9f.; 30.32.

[60] Prov 11.2; 15.33; 16.19; 29.23. Note that such humility is the way to honour (15.33).

[61] Prov 1.7, 22; 3.35; 9.7f.; 14.8; 15.12; 16.18; 21.24, 39.

[62] Prov 1.4; 8.5; 9.4.

[63] Prov 1.22; 8.5.

[64] Prov 1.5.

[65] Prov 1.2f.; 8.12.

[66] Prov 25.28; 29.11.

[67] Prov 14.29f.; 15.18; 16.32; 18.14; 19.11; 25.15.

[68] Prov 12.10; 15.28; 20.7; 21.26; 29.7.

[69] Prov 14.23; 21.5; 24.30–34.

[70] Prov 4.24; 8.7f.; 12.17.

[71] Prov 1.7; 2.5; 3.7; 8.13; 10.27; 14.26f.; 15.16, 33; 19.23; 21.30; 23.17.

[72] Prov 15.3; 15.11.

[73] Prov 16.2; 21.2.

[74] Prov 22.12.

[75] Prov 19.21.

[76] Prov 16.9; 20.24; 29.25.

[77] Prov 3.5, 7.

The older parts of the book (but also the later ones)[85] strongly emphasise the utility of wisdom: earthly happiness is its reward,[86] as well as popularity,[87] prosperity,[88] and success.[89] Everything comes in the wake of a certain immanent righteousness; the principles work themselves out; destiny takes its course, and through it all God is seen as the founder and guarantor of this order.[90] Selflessness and mercy, genuine love of neighbour[91]—and even of one's enemies[92]—are demanded, but these too are repaid. Poverty could be a consequence of foolishness.[93] The poor man is mostly looked down upon, forsaken and hated,[94] but the wise and just man has pity for the poor and thus honours his Creator.[95] The existence of both is founded on God's plan;[96] but the wise man will avoid both extremes and content himself with the middle-course as standard.[97] [78] 'To deem oneself wise is folly', Prov 26.12; 28.26.

---

[79] Prov 3.19f.

[80] Prov 8.22f.; as in Phibis, this is taught by looking at nature, whose order can be recognised but not plumbed to its depths.

[81] Prov 2.6; 3.19.

[82] Prov 7.4.

[83] Prov 8.1ff.

[84] Prov 8.34 and often in the prologue.

[85] Prov 3.2ff., 8; 8.18.

[86] Prov 19.8, 17.

[87] Prov 22.1.

[88] Prov 24.4.

[89] Prov 15.33.

[90] Prov 1.20–33; 9.12; 10.24; 11.6; 11.24ff.; 12.14, 21; 13.21; 18.3; 19.3; 21.13, 21; 22.4, 8; 26.27; 29.6.

[91] Prov 3.27–30; 10.12; 14.21, 31; 16.6; 17.17; 21.10.

[92] Prov 25.21f. Here we find the verse referred to by Paul: 'If your enemy is hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he is thirsty, give him water to drink; for you will heap coals on his head, and the Lord will reward you.'

[93] Prov 13.18; 20.13; 21.17. The poor man can also be innocent and is in that case better off than the man who speaks foolishly or the deceiver (Prov 19.1; 28.6).

The Book of Proverbs gives instructions. Its intention is to educate, but not to convert the fool. The latter is quite beyond hope, as is shown by the following double proverb, which is dialectical in structure: 'Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest you be like him yourself. Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own eyes.'[98] The book offers no doctrine of redemption, but rather a doctrine of right behaviour and success which is internally quite aware of its limitations. It takes its place alongside the ancient Near Eastern pre-stages of Greek philosophy, with its systematic order and structure; as such, Proverbs offers many a 'point of contact', much in the way of 'prior understanding' that might link the world and man as autonomous entities with the actual theological word which God will speak concerning himself and concerning man. More clearly than anything else in Scripture, the Book of Proverbs impresses on us the fact that God the Creator neither disowns nor rejects his creature's efforts to understand life and to come into a correct relationship with his divine origin; rather, God fulfills such striving by transcending it (gratia non destruit naturam, sed elevat et perficit), even if nature's intimations of and attempts at wisdom must again become foolishness in order to be fully introduced into the sphere of God's wholly different kind of wisdom (1 Cor 1.18–31).[99]

e. Eros and worldly beauty

The Song of Songs presents itself as 'Solomon's most beautiful song' (1.1), but the whole action, as is usual with love-songs, consists of youth and maiden disguising themselves as king and queen ('Shulammite', 6.13 = 1 Kings 1.3; 2.21f.). Even more frequently they play at being shepherd and shepherdess, or garden-visitor and owner of the garden. This loose handful of songs celebrates but one thing: the beautiful, resplendent, and awesome glory of the eros between man and woman: 'Who is she, . . . fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army with banners?' (6.10). Eros hovers freely about its own house, without any other purpose than loving and being loved: nowhere is there talk of marriage, or indeed of children. Eros is the sense-related, airborne, intoxicated condition whereby two persons exist for one another and with one another, and it takes the specific form of 'seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, and tasting.'[100] Eros is through and through lyrical; all of nature—the springtime, the flowers, the birds, the meadows and vineyards, trees, fruit, the wind and the night, sun and shadows, and especially fragrances—everything, impelled by the whirl of love, takes its place about the one event that alone matters. Other

---

[94] Prov 14.20; 18.23; 19.4, 7; 21.13; 28.3.

[95] Prov 14.21, 31; 17.5; 19.17; 28.27; 29.7.

[96] Prov 22.2; 19.13.

[97] Prov 30.8f.

[98] Prov 26.4f.

[99] It is not the 'apocryphal' Book of Wisdom which first introduces the 'corresponding perception of the Creator from the greatness and beauty of created things' (Wis 13.5), and thus also the analogia entis. The presence in the Book of Proverbs of an international doctrine of wisdom attests that there exists in the universally accepted canon of Scripture, too, an ethic and a religion shared with the 'pagans', by which these can be judged no less than the Jews (Rom 2). However, the fact that all, Jews and pagans alike, stand within the all-encompassing embrace of God's judging and saving actions in no way diminishes the significance of the ethical and religious tribunal. Thus, the philosophical injunction to 'listen' which we find in wisdom literature can be heightened and become the true listening of faith, even though such inner-worldly 'listening' can (perhaps out of ambition) be bound up with a certain deafness toward God.

---

On the other hand, it is important to note that all this international wisdom of life, including that of Israel, is ultimately ahistorical, which makes it possible for it to be exchanged from people to people. This ahistoricity, however, which escapes the eminently historical nature of Israel's existence, lends 'Solomonic' literature its peculiar longevity and allows it a second chance in the later period when God's historical instruction will have been abstracted to become the supra-temporally valid and abstract law (torah). Cf. J. Fichtner, 'Die altorientalische Weisheit in ihrer israelitisch-jüdischen Ausprägung', in: ZAW, Beih. 2 (1933), pp. 81f.

[100] Gillis Gerleman, 'Ruth: Das Hohelied', BK 18 (1965), p. 62. 'As long as we have no proof of an older, allegorising interpretation, such an people—the mother, the brothers, the girlfriends, shepherds, the night-watchmen of the city—play only the role of extras: they either help or hinder the lovers, receiving instructions or finding themselves outwitted. Eros is self-sufficient; God is nowhere spoken of, and this is all the more remarkable as the backdrop for this love is indeed the Holy Land: Jerusalem (1.5; 2.7; 8.4), Lebanon and Hermon (4.8; 4.11), Tirzah (6.4), Gilead (6.5), the pools of Heshbon at the Gate of Bath-Rabbim, the Tower of Lebanon which faces Damascus (7.4), Carmel (7.5, etc.). The whole landscape is there, but there is no trace of any historical memory, all the way back to the promise to the Patriarchs and Adam's fall. This is a supralapsarian eros, as it were; only by way of contrast are death and the underworld brought in, as if to be challenged: 'For love is strong as death, and mighty as the underworld is jealous passion' (8.6): this last word snatches from Yhwh's mouth his description of his love for Israel, and eros applies it to itself. Eros here dances out its unending roundelay; it twines and loosens the garlands: it is a seeking and a finding (2.8–14), an almost finding and a losing again (5.2–8), a conjuring of tension and an overcoming of it, a staying hidden and then at once a provoking through partial disclosure, a laughing over remedies cleverly devised (8.8ff.), a bragging about the uniqueness of the beloved ('You, O Solomon, may have the thousand,' 8.12), an endless describing of one another from head to toe and an incessant bestowing of one's own charms on the other, a playing with the veiled descriptions of what cannot be named and yet must by all means be hinted at (the most intimate things are alluded to with special delight in the language of scents: 'mountains of spices', 8.14; 'hill of frankincense' and 'mountain of myrrh', approach remains anachronistic as an explanation for the inclusion of the Song of Songs in the canon,' ibid., p. 51. Gerleman's thought is so convincing in its critique and its positive exposition that we shall follow it without reservation in our own discussion. The integration of the Song of Songs into theology, which is our goal, derives likewise from Gerleman. K. Barth's views are also stimulating (Church Dogmatics III/1, pp. 313–321, III/2, pp. 293–298), even if we must part ways with him on one matter.

---

4.6). Eros is forever preparing new feasts for himself, and the poet introduces strange foreign words for which he draws upon all distant cultures: spikenard and saffron, clove and cinnamon, myrrh and aloe; and when he has quite intoxicated the lovers, then he himself utters the climactic word:

The Maiden: Awake, O north wind, and come, O south wind!
Blow upon my garden,
let its fragrance be wafted abroad.
Let my beloved come to his garden, and eat its choicest fruits.

The Youth: I come to my garden, my sister, my bride,
I gather my myrrh and my balsam,
I eat my honeycomb with my honey.

The Poet: Eat, O friends, and drink:
And become drunk with love! (4.16–5.1)

No poet who intended to express something else—namely, Yhwh's love for his people—would have written in so totally profane and areligious a fashion and with such wholehearted abandon to the joys of the senses. Such an allegorical interpretation emerged only after the translation of the Septuagint (250–150 B.C.), which itself still shows no trace of it, and we first find it attested by Rabbi Aqiba (d. A.D. 135). The allegorical approach made the book bearable for later readers of Scripture, and then, beginning with Origen's commentary, it begun its triumphal march through the Christian church of the Patristic period, the Middle Ages, and even of the Reformation and the Baroque Age. And yet the allegorical explanation was evidently not the pretext for admitting the book into the canon. 'A decisive role was doubtless played by the book's supposed antiquity and, above all, by its attribution to Solomon, which no one contested.'[101] But only outsiders like Theodore of Mopsuestia and the humanist Castellio dared to defend the book's profane sense. The first of these was condemned, and the second forced to leave Geneva. It was Richard Simon who finally gained recognition for the profane thesis. The powerfully secular tone, its 'de-mythologised profaneness,'[102] makes it likewise wholly impossible to see in the book a 'mythico-cultic drama' which would, for instance, be representing the marriage-feast of a divine brother-and-sister pair (Dod, or Tammuz, and Ishtar). When pressed to explain particulars, such an interpretation, too, becomes absurd. Herder found the Song of Solomon to be a piece of folk lyric poetry of unique innocence and purity, 'simple, true, and touching', an expression of love as such, for 'there is only one love, just as there is only one goodness and one truth'. But if there is one classification which the literary art of these songs excludes it is precisely that of popular folk poetry, as Gillis Gerleman has convincingly shown. Down to the details we are dealing with an imitation of Egyptian love-poetry, and this in turn refers us back to the older period of the kings when the political and cultural connections with Egypt were unusually lively. The copying of Egyptian styles was 'highly fashionable especially in courtly circles. . . . The language and concepts of the poems betray a level of culture which could only be conceived of in the upper classes.'[103] Quite apart from the comparison of the beloved with 'a mare of Pharaoh's chariots' (1.9), there are whole scenes (such as that of the festive nocturnal procession, 3.6–8) which can be explained only in terms of Egyptian usages. The descriptions of the human form presuppose a knowledge of Egyptian sculpture,[104] and for the actual form of the poems there are numerous parallels readily at hand.[105] All of this points us to the same milieu where the Book of Proverbs had originated—the enlightened, international culture centred on the royal court. In a similar way the culture-hungry German courts of the Middle Ages imported Provençal love-poetry (Minnelyrik) and on this basis produced poetic creations with a value of their own. While the Proverbs do have knowledge of Yhwh and yet wholly bypass salvation-history, this collection of love-songs dispenses with all references to the God of the people. And it would be totally anachronistic to seek for a hidden mythical meaning here, so long before Hosea!

---

[101] Gerleman, p. 51.

---

[102] Ibid., pp. 52, 64.

[103] Ibid., p. 72.

[104] Ibid., pp. 68–71, 147.

[105] Cf. Siegfried Schott, Altägyptische Liebeslieder, 'Bibliothek der Alten Welt', 1950. For the portrayal of persons, see also Günter Roeder, Mythen und Legenden um ägyptische Gottheiten und Pharaonen, 'Bibliothek der Alten Welt', 1960.

Karl Barth quite correctly has seen that in this strange book the second creation account is fully unfolded. Here we witness the thrill of the man before the woman that has been brought to him, and this thrill is reciprocated by the woman without any reference to family or children. Here reigns only 'eros, for which there is no such thing as shame, as we see from Gen 2.25'. And Barth asks: 'Who, then, was so pure to be able to write these texts as pure texts? And who had such pure eyes to be able to read them as pure texts? For the redactor of Gen 2 certainly knew about the breakdown in such a relationship!' Here Barth finds 'only one explanation, namely, both the author of the creation saga and of these love-songs had in mind another covenant': from the viewpoint of the creation it was the covenant of God with man, and, in an eschatological perspective, the New Covenant of Jesus Christ with redeemed mankind. 'Here God the Lord and the eros between the sexes, known precisely in Israel as a dangerous demon, were to be brought into closest relationship with one another. Here the 'flame of the Lord' and the very different flame of love (Song 8.6) were to be named in one breath.'[106] This is certainly so, but it builds on the even bolder presupposition that this eros, which loses God from sight and almost absolutises itself, is to be captured and domesticated only subsequently. Here, too, the Creator is leading his image, man, 'on a long leash', allowing him to live out his own possibilities. Through it all the Holy Spirit invisibly sees to it that the purely lyrical atmosphere makes the phenomenon unfold with an ahistoricity and a resulting abstractness which exclude all 'infralapsarian' elements. Here neither innocence nor sin nor any form of theological concupiscence holds sway, but rather pure, compressed, blazing eros, which now emerges as a mighty creative force. Eros here stands neither for the God of Israel (allegorical theory) nor for the Babylonian gods (theory of cultic symbolism); it stands solely for itself, and with this it enters that twilight between the divine and the worldly into which it will move as daimon in Plato's Symposium,[107] in a straight line leading later on to the courtly love-poetry of a Gottfried of Strasburg.[108] We have seen what great latitude is given to worldly power and worldly wisdom, with the peculiar abstractness that befits these forces when they provisionally dispense with the final, historical grounding in which the living and historically active God has rooted them. In an analogous way, eros too is allowed to unfold its own dimensions. It is no surprise, then, that the Song of Solomon is the book of the Bible in which the qualification 'beautiful' (yafi) for human appearance occurs most often (11 times out of 28); but Gerleman has shown that 12 other instances derive from the humanistic educational works of the same (post-) Solomonic period (the Yahwist and the story of David's rise and the succession to his throne). The element of worldly aesthetics breaks through in Hebrew consciousness at the same time as interest in power and international diplomacy and in knowledge.[109]

---

[106] Church Dogmatics III/1, pp. 313ff.

But in Israel the Song of Songs remains incorporated in an all-encompassing whole which forces free-floating eros back into the world of historical reality. On the one hand, eros is bound to the ethical and receives its measure from it (Prov 11.22; 31.30; Sir 9.8; 26.13ff.); feminine beauty can blaze up in a brief idyll (Gen 24.16f.; 26.8f.), but it is soon subjected to the laws of family and genealogy (in his prayer Tobit invokes Gen 2.18 and protests that lust is not his motive for wanting to sleep with his wife, Tob 8.6f.) or to those of the people (Judith and Esther). On the other hand, we see the terrible revenge of the abuse of the beauty bestowed by God: what was to be understood as a pure gift from Yhwh is given away by God's bride as if it were hers to dispose of. Now the nakedness in which God finds the maiden is a disgrace, and the punishment for her infidelity and lasciviousness is yet again her stripping down, the 'exposure of your shame before your suitors' (Hos 2.12; Ezek 16.37; 23.25–29; Rev 17.16): this is the shaming, postlapsarian nakedness. And eros, as it floats about without a place of its own, is seized by the gravity of history, brought to a halt, and of necessity impelled in one of two directions. But how burning are the colours with which its image was painted and hung in the gallery of other biblical images! This can only have a prophetic meaning that points to the couple which will realise for all time what had been intimated for an instant in paradise and could not be made to last: the couple formed by the second Adam and the second Eve. This will no longer be a suspended idea, but the full, historical incarnation of the absolute love between man and woman, which is an end in itself and is no longer subject to any law of genealogy. In this sense the Church's many commentators on the Song of Songs are in the end found to be right when they interpret the book with reference to Christ and his 'bride without wrinkle or stain', whose real symbol is Mary and who provides the model according to which the believing soul strives to reach her Lord and Bridegroom.

---

[107] Vol. IV, pp. 188f. (Eng. trans.)

[108] Herrlichkeit III/1, pp. 613f.

[109] Gerleman, pp. 74f. Some things on the theme of beauty in the Old Testament may be found in: T. Boman, Das hebräische Denken, verglichen mit dem griechischen (1954²), pp. 62–74. Claus Westermann, 'Biblische Ästhetik', in: Die Zeichen der Zeit, Evangelische Monatsschrift (1950), pp. 277–289.

f. The world's final dance

The autonomous glory of worldly being before God, which began with the kingship, must in the end necessarily lead to Qoheleth. The scene of the world in all the splendour of spring is inevitably transformed to a panorama of trees stripped naked by the great wind (hebel): 'all is vanity and a striving after wind' (Eccles 1.2, 14 and another 36 times). In this book of the Bible all 'glory' has vanished from both the image of God and the image of the world. When Eccles 8.1

says that 'a man's wisdom makes his face shine' or 'makes him smile', the wisdom meant is precisely that concerning the nothingness of things. There is a particular appropriateness in this late Hebrew wise man's putting on again the persona of Solomon (1.1, 12), and his book takes pains (ch. 2) clearly to explain the internal logic of this: the experiment in worldly power, worldly culture and worldly enjoyment has led its subject precisely to the point where wisdom bites its own tail and completes itself by abolishing itself. Why? Because the wise man who has tried to comprehend the finite things of the world in all their existential fulfilment has, in fact, been driven about by them in circles and, in so doing, has become aware of his own gyrations. Man is wise enough to realise his own radical finitude, but he does not have the power to transcend it. Qoheleth is a critical transcendentalist avant la lettre: the spirit's transcendental structure does, indeed, allow a self-critique on the part of inner-worldly concepts, but it does not permit any permanent dwelling in the realm of ideas. Chapter 3 first rehearses the inevitable polarity of all things: if we attempt to follow any one thing through radically, it will every time revert to its contrary (killing/healing, destroying/building, embracing/distancing, retaining/rejecting, etc.). All things, thus, are subject to the form of temporality, the form of the 'favourable moment' (καιρός: 'for everything there is a season', 3.1).[110] At this point the question is raised: 'What gain has the worker from his toil?' (3.9). Here 'gain' is meant in more than just an economic or promotional sense: What lasting value is produced by earthly efforts? The answer to this is the key to Qoheleth's 'philosophy'. 'I have seen the business that God has given to the sons of men to be busy with. He has made everything beautiful in its time; he has also given them 'olam, (eternity, that which is more than the present moment, the course of time, the 'long view' on what is constantly passing)[111]—'yet so that he cannot find out from the beginning to the end what God has done' (3.10f.). 'This is the only way in which Qoheleth can conceive of man's being the image of God and of his difference from the animals: man must question beyond his present moment. . . . But precisely here is where man feels the full brunt of his oppressive limitation: in everything he undertakes man exists in a world of whirling moments' (W. Zimmerli).[112]

---

[110] K. Galling, 'Das Rätsel der Zeit im Urteil Kohelets', in: ZThK 58 (1961), pp. 1–15.

[111] E. Jenni, 'Das Wort 'ōlām im Alten Testament', in: ZAW 64 (1952), pp. 197–248; 65 (1953), pp. 1–35.

This leads to the pure dialectic of wisdom. On one side, the side of immanence, the superiority of wisdom to foolishness is clearly evident, as clear as the excellence of day over night (2.13). No one can accuse this wise man of equating both things in a skeptical and even agnostic manner: 'I know well that . . .' he answers, and he repeats the traditional teaching on values (2.13; 7.12f.; 8.12f.). The great question comes up only after this insight. For wisdom, in so far as it 'does' something in the world and accumulates finite insights, cannot help arriving at its own opposite pole of foolishness. This can happen in two ways: first, because wisdom is such great 'toil' and 'exhaustion', imposed on man by God, that it shatters the human balance of the poles (12.12), especially if wisdom is practised for motives of ambition (4.4), and plunges man into isolation (4.7–12); and, second, wisdom can turn to folly in the sense that, in the course of time and in the passing of the generations, the efforts for clarity made by the elders become submerged and bear no fruit (2.18–23). From the perspective of eternity, the wise man and the fool have the same lot (2.14f.; 6.6), for the comforting doctrine of the afterlife of the good man no longer applies (6.4). And now we would have to transpose everything to the realm of the good, the realm of justice: certainly there is good and there is evil, but what has become of the reassuring belief that goodness is triumphant in the end? 'The sons of men are but wild beasts to one another' (3.18), the fate of man and beast is in the end the same (3.19ff.). Nevertheless, the farce of justice must be played out for the tranquillising of the people: 'If in a province you see the poor oppressed, right and justice violated, do not be surprised. You will be told that officials are under the supervision of superiors, who are supervised in turn; you will hear talk of the service of the king' (5.7f.).[113] People believe this, even though one constantly sees the social order turned topsy-turvy (10.6f.), even though acts of violence and oppression are the order of the day and remain unchallenged (4.1), and 'man lords it over man to his hurt' (8.9). 'There are righteous men to whom it happens according to the deeds of the wicked, and there are wicked men to whom it happens according to the deeds of the righteous' (8.14).

---

[112] Prediger, ATD (1962), p. 172.

Universal laws that encompass the future cannot be imposed on the course of the world. Not even the individual man knows whether he will love or hate (9.1). 'Who knows what is good for man while he lives the few days of his vain life, which he passes like a shadow?' (6.12). 'For no one knows what is to happen to him' (8.7); 'man does not know the future' (10.4). This is why Qoheleth's thought continually goes back to the standard provided by the present moment; the ever-recurring refrain of the whole book is the advice to enjoy with gratitude and moderation the good things granted us at any given moment, in spite of or precisely because of the concurrent transcendental knowledge that they are finite, perishable, and vain: 'There is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink, and find enjoyment in his toil. This also, I saw, is from the hand of God' (2.24). 'I know that there is nothing better for man than to be happy and enjoy himself as long as he lives; also that it is God's gift to man that every one should eat and drink and take pleasure in all his toil' (3.12f.). 'I saw that there is nothing better than that a man should enjoy his work, for that is his lot' (3.22). 'Better is a handful of quietness than two hands full of toil and a striving after wind' (4.6). And so on and so forth (5.17ff.; 8.15; 9.7ff.). Marriage, too, and political activity are also included in the enjoyable, since none of it is found in sheol. It is not given us to look beyond the limits of this peculiar existence. It appears that in the designing of existence two contradictory elements were indissolubly attached to one another: for, just as the rivers run out into the sea and yet the sea never becomes full, so, too, 'the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing' (1.7f.).[114] Are not these receptacles of the finite, themselves finite? Or what is this relative infinity by virtue of which they can never be filled even while acknowledging that the finite is 'boredom' and a 'turning in a circle' and, therefore, 'vanity'? Death dissolves this contradictory amalgam: dust returns to the earth whence it had come, and God inhales the breath which he had lent (12.7). But 'who knows whether the spirit of man goes upward and the spirit of the beast goes down to the earth?' (3.21). Judging from death, which is the only thing one can observe, it would seem that 'man has no advantage over the beasts' (3.19).

---

[113] Text of the Jerusalem Bible (Pautrel); see the accompanying footnote.

Qoheleth offers a philosophical world-view that has its ethical centre in the μηδὲν ἄγαν. The proper thing always is self-restraint and adapting to the standards of the καιρός, the given moment. Man should remain moderate both with regard to good and to evil ('Be not righteous overmuch, and do not make yourself overwise; why should you destroy yourself? Be not wicked overmuch, neither be a fool; why should you die before your time?', 7.16f.). In religious matters one ought to remain circumspect: in sacrificing (4.17), in making vows (5.4), in speaking with priests (5.5), and also in one's relationship with God. Fear is the proper attitude before God; why irritate him (5.6)? Advisable, too, is to keep one's distance ('for God is in heaven, and you upon earth', 5.1), for God is mighty ('who can make straight what he has made crooked?', (7.13). Qoheleth's God is decidedly a Dieu des philosophes.[115] He exists as 'beginning and end', but neither does one love him nor, therefore, must one love as God's gift of love the life he bestows. 'I hated life, because what is done under the sun was grievous to me; for all is vanity and a striving after wind' (2.17). The unborn have received the better lot (4.2f.; 7.1–4, 8); the meaning of being is abysmal ('that which is transcends my power of comprehension; deep, very deep, who can find it out?', 7.24); 'discouragement' (2.20) is what awaits us in the end.

---

[114] Even if, with the Jerusalem Bible, we translate 'no man can say that eyes have not had enough of seeing, ears their fill of hearing', the paradox still remains.

[115] Isolated notes are struck in a more traditional Hebrew key, but these were certainly introduced by disciples and redactors. We can already see this, for instance, in 11.9b ('for all these things God will bring you into judgment'), 12.1a ('remember also your Creator'), and in the conclusion of the 'second epilogue' (12.13f.).

Just as the eros of the Song of Songs is not God's agape, so, too, the empty and history-less time of Qoheleth is not God's fullness of time in history. Qoheleth's conception of time knows nothing of incursions from the side of eternity which could offer the fleeting character of this world a mainstay and a meaning. His καιρός remains purely within the compass of the world; it has nothing to do with the καιρός of Israel's history or with that of the Gospel. Therefore, contradictory temporal meanings can balance one another out within a form of time which is itself empty of meaning.

It is profoundly significant that God's Holy Spirit included, within the work of his revelation, this final dance on the part of wisdom, this conclusion of the ways of man—the divine image who had set out to be an autonomous world before God. The whole gamut had to be run, and the entire undertaking both begins and ends in the name of the one Solomon. What remains in the end is hebel, the 'great wind'; not ruach, the divine breath that blows where it will, but rather a weightless wind that is tossed about for sheer airiness.[116] This time the stress falls not on the substantial form-quality of what it is to be an image, but on its unreality: in imagine pertransit homo (Ps 39.7, LXX). The breath of unreality blows toward death, and the portrayal of the approach of death, with a great becalming of the movements and sounds of life, is surely the climax of the Book of Qoheleth and one of the summits of the whole Bible (12.3–8). At the great conclusion of this struggle for an understanding of vanity, the breath of God's Spirit snatches the creature's directionless wind up into himself and makes it plain that, just as the Dieu des philosophies had been an abstraction to a wise man of Israel, so, also, the wise man as philosopher had become an abstraction to himself. But the living God subjected his own image to vanity (Rom 8.20) so that, through experience, it might learn that the concrete and unequivocal reality is the grace through which God opens out to his creature a space for living.

---

[116] On the nuances of the concept hebel in Qoheleth, see Dom H. Duesberg, Les Scribes inspirés, II 1939), pp. 197f.

C. GRACE AND COVENANT

I. CONCRETE GLORY

Up to this point, the nature of the glory of the living God of Israel has been displayed only in an abstract form: in the dialectical intimation which was perceptible to the senses there appeared an absolute subject, powerful in its freedom, that revealed itself in the word as the only, holy God and that directed the face of the human person who was addressed to look directly to its own eternal face. The 'cosmic liturgy' was basically nothing other than the act whereby the created 'Thou' gave back all glory to the absolute 'I'. In the second place, the sphere of this 'Thou' was unfolded: it is characterised by the glory, proper to a copy, which falls on it from the original, a glory that grants it space but also leaves it in an all-encompassing twilight, since it cannot perfect itself in itself and give itself an unambiguous meaning, but can do this only with reference back to the original which reveals itself to it.

This relationship can become visible only when the self-revelation of the absolute subject has taken on content and concreteness, when the word which God addresses to the world no longer appears as an abstract communication divorced from himself, but appears as the rich self-disclosure of God that invites us to share in what is his own, i.e. when the abstract 'beautiful' of glory that blazes up and the abstract 'true' of the divine presence are complemented by that 'good' which alone, as grace, makes the beautiful beautiful and the true true. For the Hebrew, the transcendentals are disposed in a total mutual compenetration, such that the statements about the good stand together in the centre, and the truth and beauty of this good scarcely appear in any other way than as its modalities. Thus the truth (emeth, emuna) of God is fundamentally the truthfulness, freedom from deceit and reliability of his person, which is made known to Israel in the grace of his promise, of his covenant and of his conduct in keeping with the convenant. All the fundamental concepts that give expression to this gracious goodness flow into one another; they are not sharply distinct from one another, but are like intersecting circles with a common centre; that is important because the apparent exception, the concept of glory (kabod), itself, has in reality no possibility at all of being an exception. The identification made by the priestly document of the kabod of Yahweh with one particular mode of God's appearing, a mode perceptible to the senses and above all significant in the liturgy, occurs only at a later stage and may not be taken as a standard to measure the contents of the idea of divine glory, for three reasons. First, there was always an accompanying awareness of the ethical-personal root of the concept (weightiness, dignity); second, Judaism and above all the New Testament will employ the concept of doxa in a much more universal way than P; and third, even the thought of Israel with reference to the divine glory cannot be limited to the manner in which P employs the concept. The entire revelation of God in creation and salvation is as such glorious, nor is it possible to expect anything else if the 'beautiful' and the 'good' are only two aspects of the same reality (tob) in the Hebrew manner of thinking.

We have already encountered the statement that Yahweh is 'the glory of Israel', which Israel has exchanged 'for what is empty and powerless' (Jer 2.11), 'for shame' (Hos 4.7), 'for a calf that eats grass' (Ps 106.20; Paul will pick this up in a central passage and say that the people have 'exchanged the glory of the immortal God for an image of mortal man' and of animals: Rom 1.23): here there can be no doubt that glory is much more than one particular form of appearing that is perceptible to the senses, viz. the entire revelation of the God of grace who has disclosed his divine goods to men and made them accessible. It is not that the spheres covered by the concepts of 'glory' (kabod) and 'grace' were identical; but it is the case that grace itself has its own 'beauty' which belongs essentially to the divine glory. It is not the Greek word χάρις that is the first to possess the famous ethical-aesthetical dual meaning, as the favour that bestows gifts and as attractiveness; the corresponding Hebrew words too (chen, chesed, gedula, tob, racham, rason)[1] have all, in varying degrees of intensity, their aesthetic dimension. Thus it can be said at Is 40.6: 'All flesh is like grass, and its beauty (chesed, χάρις but δόξα in the LXX) is like the flower of the fields'. Or, at Ps 45.3: 'You are the fairest of the sons of men; beauty (=grace, chen; LXX: χάρις) is poured upon your lips'.[2] Ben Sirach will know of an 'ethical beauty' that is on the lips of the wise man (21.16) and goes before the modest man (32.10).[3] [1] Hatch and Redpath, 1455 column a.

---

It is important to note that it is the gracious act of God whereby he looks on his creature and pours beauty over it, although this does not mean that one can call the beauty of the creature purely 'forensic'. When the Creator has finished his work and looks upon it and finds it 'very good' (tob)—and the 'beautiful' is already included within the 'good'[4]—then the good and beautiful character of the cosmos is certainly not separable from the act and the gaze of the Creator in whose streaming light the earth is bathed; and yet it is also genuinely given the gift of the goods of his grace, and is entitled to keep those as long as it gives them back to the Creator in recognition and praise of him. The late wisdom teaching will give an exact formulation to this transcendence and immanence of the good and the beautiful, but this is not a discovery by the wisdom teaching. Jerusalem is 'the crown of beauty, the delight of the whole world' (Lam 2.15) and the temple is 'Israel's splendour' (tip'ara 2.1), as long as God dwells in it; he is the splendour (nesach, cf. 1 Chron 29.11) of the pious (Lam 3.18), and the holy land is the 'land of glory' (Dan 8.9; 11.16; 11.41), doubtless in a manner similar to that in which Ezekiel saw the glory of God bathing in light the earth which lay beneath it (Ezek 43.2; cf. Hab 3.3). And yet glory would not be glory if it merely sent forth an external radiance without affecting internally the being that is the recipient of grace. If grace is repeatedly likened to living water that springs up out of God (Is 12.3; 55.1; Jer 2.13; Ezek 47.1ff.; Ps 36.9–10; 46.5; Zech 14.8; Jn 4.14; 7.37; Rev 7.17; 22.17), then the meaning is not merely that man should bathe externally in this, but that he should come in thirst and immerse himself in it by drinking. Grace, together with its beauty, can belong internally to the creature to the extent that the latter is ready to return the gift: thus, Abraham never possessed his son more intimately than after he had gone through the ultimate renunciation.

---

[2] Chen as attractiveness and beauty also in: Prov 1.9; 4.9; 5.19; 11.16; 17.8; 22.11; 31.30; Nah 3.4; cf. Sir 6.5; 7.19; 9.8.

[3] Here lies the exaggeration of the otherwise lovely and serious essay by Claus Westermann, 'Biblische Ästhetik', in: Die Zeichen der Zeit, evang. Monatschrift 1950, pp. 277–289.

[4] G. von Rad, ThOT, Vol. I, pp. 364ff.

Here too lies the key to the understanding of 'nakedness' in Scripture. The one whose heart is disclosed in love before the God who discloses himself in love is naked in the good sense of the word: such a person is clothed with splendour and glory. But the one who is deprived of grace, and thus of the nakedness of love, must clothe himself with the apron of fig leaves and is 'clothed with shame as with a garment' (Jer 3.25; Mic 7.10; Ps 35.26; 109.29). External decoration is always suspect for the Bible: it is a false substitute for the clothing of the beauty of grace, and a day will come when it will reveal its true nature: 'Instead of perfume there will be rottenness; and instead of a girdle, a rope; and instead of well-set hair, baldness; and instead of a rich robe, girding of sackcloth; instead of beauty, shame' (Is 3.24; cf. 2 Kings 9.30; Jer 4.30; Ezek 23.40; Rev 18).

When the 'glory' of God is set in parallel (especially in the Psalms) to other characteristics of God that belong to his dispensation of salvation, this announces the new, higher integration with which we shall be concerned in what follows. The same heavens that declare the glory of God at Ps 19.2 declare his covenantal fidelity (sedek) at Ps 50.6. Ps 97.6 links both attributes: 'The heavens declare his covenantal fidelity, and all the peoples see his glory'. Ps 98. 2–4 makes a similar link between the revelation of glory that all the world can see and the covenantal fidelity of God which proceeds from 'the arm of his holiness'. Ps 104 praises for ever the glory of God (v. 31), after all his gracious acts have been listed, the acts with which God has filled the world. The first Hallel psalm, 113, praises God for the sake of his glory, with which he rises up and descends, and for the sake of his mercy, with which he raises up the lowly. Ps 138.5–6 links both qualities even more closely, by making the dimensions of the glory simultaneously the dimensions of the mercy: 'Great is the glory of Yahweh: though he is high, he regards the lowly (from near at hand); but the haughty he knows from afar'. Ps 145 too continually links both statements: on the one hand the powerful splendour of God's glory, on the other the gracious, loving mercy of God's goodness. God is always both at once for his people: 'He adorns the humble with victory; let the faithful exult in glory' (Ps 149.4–5). The God of glory is experienced by Israel so powerfully as the God of all grace that the mighty splendour of God is never experienced as being terrible, something from which one is repelled: fear of the Lord and love of the Lord shade off inseparably into one another. The light of grace which streams forth from God is not broken or called into question by any darkness; it is pure, unmixed, undisturbed (Ps 19.9–10; 12.7; 18.31a; Prov 30.5; 2 Sam 22.31). All God's qualities are integrated fully in the freedom of the absolute subject and become there the radiant fullness of the divine simplicity.

2. GOD ALLOWS HIS PEOPLE SPACE

When Moses begged that he might see God's glory, God hid him in the cleft of the rock and passed by him, crying out, 'Yahweh, Yahweh, a God merciful (rachum, from rechem) and gracious (channun, from chnn, chen), slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love (chesed) and faithfulness (emeth)' (Ex 34.6). In this experience, Moses was permitted to see the glory of God 'from the rear' (Ex 33.23) as it passed man by. The entire disclosure of God is grace; the phrase 'slow to anger' expresses the fact that grace is not the one part of a two-sided revelation, but rather wrath is a function of grace. When grace is bestowed on Israel, it receives thereby access to God, a place beside him and the right to dwell there. But the primary meaning of grace must be, not that God bestows on the creature, from the far distance of his heaven, a new 'quality', but rather that he bends down to the earth and raises man up to himself, making space for him in God's own realm in a manner that goes beyond all his qualities and possibilities, in, that is to say, an act of 'rapture'. Israel is familiar with a number of words that paraphrase this inexpressibly mysterious process; these all approach the same mystery from various sides, and therefore overlap one another to a certain extent, though never completely. They must be presented here briefly as they are interwoven with one another. If we were to demand that these words display the kind of conceptual clarity that the terms of a secular science must have, this would be both false to the material itself and unjust, for they all have their centre-point in the mystery of the grace of the God who discloses himself.

a. Berith: Covenant

The foundation of everything is the idea of the 'covenant' between Yahweh and his people. It is immediately obvious that the use of this category involves the difficulty that it suggests an agreement between two parties, while the idea of a divine revelation to man evokes above all the concept of a one-sided initiative of free grace. In order to meet this difficulty, one can take two paths of interpretation. First, one can hold on to the idea of mutual obligation and agreement, and then see the origin of the covenantal idea, not in an act whereby God and man obligate themselves, but in the act whereby the tribes come together to a religious federation (amphictyony) bound by oath; these tribes have sworn fidelity in the presence of their common God.[1] On this basis, one can hold the idea of a covenant between God and man to be secondary. But one can also start from a form of covenant-making (which has been demonstrated to be universal in the Orient) in which one who is stronger,[2] e.g. a mighty king, graciously offers an alliance to one who is weaker, e.g. a vassal; this alliance either is binding only on the latter, or else incorporates the graciousness of the Lord at a secondary stage into a legal relationship. But even then, we must still seek the point of transition from this relationship between men to the relationship between God and man. Even similarities in the form of covenant-making do not of themselves bridge this decisive gulf.[3]

---

[1] The thinking of the following scholars goes along these lines: S. Mowinckel, Le décalogue (1927); M. Noth, Das System der zwölf Stämme Israels (1930); idem, 'Die Gesetze im Pentateuch' (1940, now in: Ges. Studien zum AT, 2nd edn. 1966, p. 54); G. von Rad, Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuchs (1938), pp. 11f.

[2] As early as Wellhausen, attention was drawn to this covenantal form which is frequently attested in the Bible (on the earlier history of the concept, cf. R. Kraetzschmar, Die Bundesvorstellung im At (1896); P. Karge, Geschichte des Bundesgedankens im At (1910)). In 'Berit, ein Beitrag zur Erfassung einer alttestamentlichen Denkform' (1944, now in: Ges. Studien zum AT, 1964, pp. 55–66), Joachim Begrich has once again emphatically sought to establish the original structure of the berith in this hierarchical relationship of the partners. 'Berith originally always denotes a relationship between unequal partners. One who is stronger grants the berith-relationship to one who is without power . . . it is only the more powerful one who binds himself vis-à-vis the one who is less powerful, as in the cases of the Israelites vis-à-vis the Gibeonites (Josh 9) and Ahab vis-à-vis Ben-Hadad (1 Kings 20.34). No conditions are imposed upon the one who receives the berith' (p. 56). When the prince Jonathan enters the covenantal relationship with David, he gives him weapons and clothing (1 Sam 18.4). Thus the one-sided promise of Yahweh to Abraham could also be called a covenant, and here it is God alone who carries out the rite by which the covenant comes into force and passes through the midst of the animals which have been cut in half (Gen 15; cf. Jer 34.18; for the same concept, cf. also 1 Sam 11.1; Is 49.8). The covenant with Noah too was one-sided (Gen 9.11, 15), as were the Sinai covenant according to Ex 24.1–2, 9–11 and the covenant with David (2 Sam 23.5; cf. Ps 89.4f.). This original form of the berith was then (according to Begrich) 'increasingly taken over by the concept of treaty and transformed in keeping with this'; in the nature of things, nothing else could have been expected, since it is clear that certain preliminary conditions must exist for one who is weak to dare to ask a covenant alliance of one who is strong, and that there must exist political (and hence legal) advantages as well as the alliance itself for the one who is stronger.

---

From the beginning, clear two-sided alliances exist in the Bible: e.g., in the agreement between Jacob and Laban (Gen 31.44f.). Even in the Sinai covenant, initially conceived as something one-sided, an element of mutuality had to enter immediately: 'the conditions are made known to the people', the treaty document is read aloud when the covenant comes into force, and the legal demands of Yahweh are an integral part of the contents of this document. But this new understanding, which becomes the dominant understanding in Deuteronomy, falsifies (according to Begrich) the original meaning of the berith and indeed the entire relationship between God and man, since the unconditional character of God's offer as grace, and the meaning of his instruction (torah) is obscured, and his promise is made dependent on human conduct. Also, the divine partner is once again free if the covenant is broken by the human partner, and can in principle withdraw from the covenant treaty. For a critical assessment of Begrich's views, cf. M. Noth 'Das alttestamentliche Bundesschliessen im Lichte eines Mari-Textes' (1955, now in: Ges. Studien, pp. 142–154).

[3] Following a study by V. Korosec on 'Hethitische Staatsverträge, ein Beitrag zu ihrer juristischen Wertung' (Leipzig, rechtswiss. Studien 60, 1931), George E. Mendenhall (Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East, Pittsburgh 1955) and Klaus Baltzer (Das Bundesformular, Wiss. Monogr. zum A und NT 4, 1960) have independently of each other taken the form of a 'treaty of sovereignty or vassalage between a great king and his vassal', widespread in the Near East and presented in Korosec's examples, as the starting-point for an interpretation of the covenant with Yahweh. This means that Begrich's idea, which had remained vague in legal terms, becomes historically perceptible, but this also indicates its limitation. 'The treaty character need not necessarily be abrogated by the fact that one of the partners in a covenant is superior to the other. Nor is it necessary that the conditions be laid down by both partners in an equal manner; they need only be accepted freely by both' in order for the character of a genuine treaty to be guaranteed (Baltzer, p. 33, n. 1). The formula of such a sovereignty-treaty, in its unchanging forms, can be glimpsed at several places in the Bible, especially in Josh 24. For Mendenhall, the 'book of the One must therefore make the best of the fact that the chief event on which the relationship of life between Yahweh and Israel is based is something that lacks analogies. It cannot have been primarily a covenant made between human parties, which then at a secondary stage—for example, in sacral celebrations in which the covenant was renewed—had transformed itself into a covenant between God and the people; nor is it a case of a 'covenant' between a king, as the representative of the divinity, and the people—this is certainly quite out of the question because (as Gideon says) 'I will not rule over you, and my son will not rule over you; Yahweh will be your king (melek)' (Judg 8.23), and because the 'mediator' Moses cannot in any way be confused with a representative of God in the world, such that he would have to make an agreement for this God with the people: rather, he presents himself as the servant of an absolute Subject that appears as one acting and disposing freely with unique impact (kabod). And the manner in which this divine 'I' addresses and lays hold of the people that stands before him at the mountain of God shows two things: first, the fact that this living God enters upon a relationship with this crowd of human persons in a special manner that sets a mark of distinction upon them, is in an elemental manner—and in a way that does not need to be mentioned specifically—pure, one-sided grace. Second, the same fact—that God wishes to enter into a unique living relationship with this crowd—lays claim to them in a total and unconditional way: what is at stake here is not something that is merely 'interior' and 'ethical' or 'cultic', but at the same time the whole external, 'legal' and 'political' existence of the group. Precisely this exclusiveness of the relationship between God and the people which is now shaping itself requires, if it is to be incarnated fully, the inclusion of the legal-political sphere.

It is of course possible to point out that in the early period covenant' (Ex 20–23) presents the substance of the contribution of legal materials made by the tribes in the two-sided covenant with Yahweh, and he sees the decalogue as the religious and ethical principle with governs the covenant and is the basis of the 'book of the covenant'.

---

in which the event takes place, there is no question of a separation between the ethical realm and the juridical-political realm. It is the 'father' of the extended family, the kindred group, the clan who is at one and the same time the chief who legislates and judges, and who embodies the spiritual sphere within which open mutual trust and support hold sway; in the same way, alliances can be made between clans that are alien to one another, uniting the realms in which they live[4] and building on a concept of mutual fidelity and loyalty that once again includes the ethical sphere and the juridical-political sphere together;[5] and in the same way, the alliances of sovereignty between great kings and their vassals which have been quoted in comparison, with their terms confirmed by oath and the inclusion of terrible curses for the one who breaks the treaty,[6] do not separate the two spheres from each other, because their aim is to establish between the partners a personal relationship of good behaviour, benevolence and openness even (and precisely) in the political realm. In an analogous way, the covenant of Yahweh, with all the fundamental forms of conduct it entailed, would have been ethical-political. While this is indisputably correct, it does not go beyond analogies and does not explain the terrifying exclusiveness, from which no escape was possible, of the relationship which is established here. In the same way, there is no path that leads up from the gracious character of the offer of a treaty which a great king makes to a weaker king—an act that is built a priori on a relationship of lordship and of service—to the endless grace of the God who leads his people and who points to the impetus of his salvific acts as the preamble to the covenant that is to be made: 'You have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself. Now therefore, if you will obey my voice and keep my berith, you shall be my own possession among all peoples; for all the earth is mine. And you shall belong to the realm of my royal lordship as the first who are at the right hand of the king and as a consecrated people' (Ex 19.4–6a).[7] 'With this office and this consecration, Israel is to realise its election to be a possession proper to Yahweh among all the peoples: this is the berith that he will make with Israel.'[8] [4] J. Pedersen, Der Eid bei den Semiten, 1914.

---

[5] W. P. Lofthouse, 'Ḥen and Ḥesed in the Old Testament,' ZAW 10 (1933), p. 33.

[6] Cf. n. 7.

The people will be granted admittance to God's own royal realm, to the extent that it is willing to accommodate itself to the usages and attitudes that hold good for the king. 'You shall be holy to me; for I Yahweh am holy, and have separated you from the peoples, that you should be mine.' (Lev 20.26) The basis of this belonging is something much deeper than a 'treaty', and precisely for this reason, this belonging surpasses even the obligatory validity and the seriousness of the sanctions of every mere treaty. In the exodus from Egypt, the people has come to know a God who leads them, going with them and ahead of them, levelling the path for those who follow him. The covenant of life is not made between parties who are strangers to one another. God displays his credentials as the one who has led with might and who now makes election. Israel has already experienced him and can assent and say yes to its God when it is chosen, and can therefore also by implication say yes to all his usages, which can and will come upon Israel as requirements in the future too. For God is free. The obligations are included in the rights to belong to God's kingdom. The leader-king has mysteriously kept his name a secret, so that he may be for Israel only the one who will be, at each individual moment, acting and leading. And yet he is not one individual among others, 'for all the earth is mine'. Thus the 'covenant' is directed exclusively to the sovereign, free 'I' who cannot be captivated and controlled through any name used in magic. This is a dizzying, terrifying adventure for the finite human person, something that can be answered only by stripping one's own 'I' down to the naked kernel. This 'I' is demanded and must be presented in sacrifice (all sacrifices in Israel will be borne by the 'intention of presenting oneself in sacrifice');[9] this 'I' must make the appropriate answer. The prophets will always have this immediacy in view, going as far as the 'Servant of God' who gives the total answer (Is 50.4–5) and who thus stands in the direct line to Sinai.

---

[7] Following the translation and interpretation by Martin Buber, Moses (1944), in: Werke Vol. II, Schriften zur Bibel (1964), pp. 120–122, instead of the usual translation, 'a kingdom of priests and a holy people', which obscures the link between Israel and the world by narrowing down the entire covenant which is to be made and seeing it only within a cultic context.

[8] Ibid., p. 122.

Between Sinai and the Servant lies Deuteronomy, which separates the paradox of the living community that has been established (and this ultimately is what is meant by berith) into its two complementary parts: the utter one-sidedness of the grace of God, which establishes the community, and the utter mutuality which is based therein: word and answer, love and answering love, directive and obedience. Both come into view simultaneously: the election of this one people, for which no reason can be given (7.6–7), without any merit on the people's part (8.17), on the basis of love alone (7.9; 10.15); the only possible response to this love is unlimited love (6.5; 11.1, 13), but in such a way that the one who loves 'does not live from bread alone, but from all that goes forth from Yahweh's mouth' (8.3), from that teaching of which the 'ten words' (Ex 20.1–17) are an embodiment. They are 'basic negations', since God 'is content with, as it were, signposts on the margins of a wide sphere of life, to which he who belongs to Yahweh has to give heed', while the sphere of life which has its borders marked out in this way 'remains completely without norms' in its interior.[10] For 'Yahweh has offered life by giving the commandments', he has given Israel the understanding of the grace that befalls it: the first table reminds the people of the gratitude that it owes the one who redeemed it from the house of slavery, and the second table gives realisation to the disposition of gratitude in the social, legal and political realm: 'Love the sojourner therefore; for you were sojourners in the land of Egypt' (Deut 10.19; cf. Ex 22.20; 23.9), 'if there is among you a poor man . . . you shall not harden your heart . . . you shall remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and Yahweh your God redeemed you' (Deut 15.7, 15). Jesus' parable of the servant who has no mercy is a radical synthesis of the genuine spirit of the decalogue. Since the 'covenant' between God and the people is a covenant between the central 'I' on each side, everything that forms a part of the people's existence has its role to play here: nothing in the world is excluded from consideration. God's kingdom extends into even the most profane realm. The obligatory character of the instruction comes from the greatness of the grace. It is therefore pointless to speculate whether the 'covenant', which is the basis of everything, was originally conceived as one-sided or two-sided. It is two-sided because it is based on the one-sidedness of the love of God that makes election.

---

[9] Buber, Königtum Gottes (1932), in: Werke Vol. II, p. 642.

[10] G. von Rad, ThOT, Vol. I, p. 194.

One can therefore properly understand the pure relatedness of God and people—'Yahweh the God of Israel, Israel the people of Yahweh'—as the 'covenant formula', and the long history of the Old Testament as the ever deeper exposition of this formula.[11] The history of this exposition isolates Israel more and more from all other human religions and from all ascetical and mystic paths to salvation, because of its undistracted stance eye to eye with its God, and through its will to be led and governed only by him. It is only right that we should derive this qualitative otherness from a genuine historical origin, even if it is no longer possible precisely to identify this with the methods of the historical. And it is true that the history of Israel always remains a history of ever new backslidings, attempts to flee, and substitutions when confronted with the one 'intolerable present moment'.[12] The substitution begins at the foot of Sinai, and cuts in two the very act of giving the covenant: in place of the imageless power and glory of Yahweh above the world, the image that embodies the natural power of generation is set: the golden bull (Ex 32) that is set up anew at the beginning of the great schism (1 Kings 12.28). Instead of the God who wanders with his people and leads them and directs them, the sedentary Baals are chosen as the numina of the region. Worse still, instead of the 'service with all your heart and all your soul in fear and love' which is demanded, the 'circumcision of the heart' (Deut 10.12, 16), there is set the distorted image of the cruel demon that is satisfied only when one's own children have been thrown into its glowing throat. It is true that Yahweh had revealed himself to the people's ancestor as the one who demands everything, requiring the first-born son of the promise, in order to keep the space between himself and the faith of Abraham pure and emptied-out; when this purity is established, the father can receive his son back again. And (in Israel's brilliant new interpretation of the ancient custom of circumcision) he incises the seal of his covenant on the bodily sphere (Gen 17.13) and thus sequestrates precisely the power of generation that was given full expression, almost as something divine, without any checks, in the cults of the land. Later on, the substitution is less brutal, but all the more perfidious: instead of the living instruction from the mouth of Yahweh there appears the cultic law which has petrified to become something that exists in its own right, and instead of the gift of self made in obedience of human hearts there appears the substitution of the sacrifices with their minutely-regulated activity, despite the protest of the prophets (1 Sam 15.22; Amos 5.21f.; Hos 6.6).

---

[11] R. Smend, Die Bundesformel (Theol. Studien 68, 1963). Nevertheless, von Rad can thereby be correct in his assertion that Israel has no 'mid-point' but rather points out beyond itself, with the whole of its history, to the fulfilled and eternal covenant: Th.At, Vol. I, pp. 229f.

[12] D. Barthélemy, Gott mit seinem Ebenbild (1966), pp. 24f.

The immediate and absolute 'I–Thou' relationship between God and the people requires and justifies the concept of the divine jealousy.[13] For the time being, everything depends on the concreteness and hence the exclusiveness of love, so that any glance cast in the direction of other religious possibilities is to be counted as infidelity to the covenant, or adultery. No value whatsoever is placed on 'universality' and 'tolerance'. Everything that can become a temptation is to be 'banished', i.e. uprooted: at God's command, it must be sacrified in blind obedience to the one thing that matters in the present moment between heaven and earth (1 Sam 15). Every image of Yahweh is strictly prohibited, for it would distort the purity of his personal being and distract the human heart from this. If Israel remains true to the covenant, this opens up for the people a place of breadth and of freedom in God; if it seeks another freedom invented by itself apart from the covenant, it will entangle itself in the most crushing servitude.

---

[13] B. Renaud, Je suis un Dieu jaloux. Etude d'un thème biblique (Lectio Divina 36, 1963), with bibliography.

Israel will not be able to sustain this 'I-Thou' relationship in the long term. It will break the covenant. The original intention is transposed a priori, in Deuteronomy's presentation, to Moses, the representative of the people. For the people, the voice of God rolls in waves that are too high and too dangerous, and the mediator is placed between God and the people as a breakwater: 'You, go near, and hear all that Yahweh our God will say; and speak to us all that Yahweh our God will speak to you; and we will hear and do it' (Deut 5.27). Clericalism is something invented by the laity: even at the outset, at Sinai, the people takes up a position at a distance. The true history of the covenant will be the history of individuals, of representatives. Deuteronomy insists that God's voice with its commands for all the people sounded forth from the pure, formless fire of his glory. And thus the people themselves attest: 'Behold, Yahweh our god has shown us his glory and his greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire; we have this day seen God speak with man and man still live'. God is nothing other than a voice that calls out of the midst of the glory. And man, borne up by God's power, can hear the instruction without dying. For man is ultimately created, in a destiny that goes beyond himself, to support this voice. But the people continue, making mockery of all logic: 'Now therefore why should we die?' (And this, although they have just stated that they had seen and heard God, without dying.) 'For this great fire will' (finally?) 'consume us; if we hear the voice of Yahweh our God any more, we shall die' (Deut 5.24f.). To stand fast is too great an exertion for them: they withdraw and send a representative to the front of their ranks. Moses, who communicates to them in Moab before his death the words of God which he alone has heard, has lost the game before he even begins.

b. Chesed, chen, rachamim: kindness, favour, mercy

On the level of human relationships, 'chesed constitutes the true substance of the covenant'.[14] But here there are various stages of intensity. Chesed belongs primarily to the sovereign Lord who establishes the alliance, and in this sense the word means something close to benevolence, grace, love; but following on from this, the inferior partner who enters the covenant must live in accordance with the favour which has been bestowed on him, he must so to speak reflect it back and order his general behaviour—vis-à-vis the Lord and vis-à-vis others—in keeping with chesed. Thus, chesed is 'originally the relationship of benevolence and appropriateness to the covenant that obtains between a lord and those who are his', and is therefore 'best translated by Huld (kindness) or Holdschaft (graciousness: in old German law, the Holde is the vassal) . . . in his kindness, Yahweh leads the people that he has redeemed from Egypt (Ex 15.13) and the faithful man who fights for Yahweh is called his chasid, his vassal (Deut 33.8)'.[15] Once again, when we consider the use of this concept in interpersonal relationships, we must note that the ethical and legal-political concepts are extremely closely linked in ancient times: members of the family, the clan, of allied tribes have mutual trust; fidelity and reverence are based on the legal relationship and in turn make it possible for this legal relationship to endure. Chesed is given by the host to the guest and is repaid by the guest as the occasion arises (Gen 19.19; Josh 2.12–14); one who has offered help in chesed lays an obligation on the one who has received the help to the same kind of attitude and action (Judg 1.24f.; 1 Kings 2.7). Where the legal element (of a treaty) becomes more prominent, chesed is best rendered by 'loyalty';[16] but this concept belongs more to the world of the 'covenant' than to that of the 'treaty', no matter what the motive for the making of an alliance may have been. If one translates by 'conduct appropriate to fellowship', this is correct only if one establishes as the root of the whole matter a personal, benevolent, loving attitude that indicates and opens up a sphere of mutual trust.[17] Naturally, in the alliance between God and Israel, it is only God who can show chesed in the original sense, but from Hosea onwards, God offers man his 'grace' 'like a gift to a bride', so that the only possible response of man to God is the 'free gift of his heart',[18] and man learns above all how to spread around himself the atmosphere of forgiving love (Hos 2.21; 4.1; 6.4, 6; 10.12).[19] [14] Nelson Glueck, Das Wort Ḥesed im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauch als menschliche und göttliche gemeinschaftsmässige Verhaltensweise (1927), quoted in 2nd edn., 1961, Beihefte ZAW 47, p. 11. Cf. E. Kautzsch, Über die Derivate des Stammes ṣdq im alttest. Sprachgebrauch (1881). G. Dalman, Die richtige Gerechtigkeit im AT, 1897. I. Elbogen, 'HSD—Verpflichtung, Verheissung, Bekräftigung', in: Festschrift für Paul Haupt (1926). H. J. Stoebe, 'Die Bedeutung des Wortes ḥäsäd im AT' (VT 2, 1954, pp. 244–254, summary of typewritten dissertation, Münster 1951: Bedeutung und Geschichte des Begriffes ḥäsäd). W. P. Lofthouse, 'Ḥen and Ḥasad in the Old Testament', ZAW 10 (1933), pp. 29–35. James A. Montgomery, 'Hebrew Hesed and Greek Charis', Harvard Theol. Rev. 32 (1939), pp. 97–102. A. R. Johnson, 'Hesed und Hasid', Interpret. ad VT pertinentes, S. Mowinckel (1955), pp. 100–112.

---

[15] M. Buber, Der Glaube der Propheten (1950), in: Werke, Vol. II, 1966, p. 356.

This permits us to see the extent to which chesed includes other fundamental concepts in itself, although it cannot be simply equated with these: berith and chesed condition each other mutually;[20] chesed cannot be thought of without the idea of reliability and truthfulness (emeth), and both appear very often together in the Psalms; salvation and pacification (shalom) are closely linked to chesed. To appeal to God's chesed does not mean merely to cry out to his grace, but also to remind him of his covenantal fidelity by giving signs of repentance and conversion which allow God to see that one still stands by this covenant of faithfulness. One dares to remind God of his fidelity to the covenant and to depend on this as on something that is already present by grace; naturally, it is not far to the idea that the entire mutuality of the alliance rests on the originally one-sided initiative of God's grace by which Israel was chosen, especially when the man who has sinned has once seen that he has no right to God's mercy (rachamim), but that a new and free bestowal of God's grace is necessary in order for the relationship of chesed and emeth to be restored.[21] [16] Lofthouse draws attention to the ancient Roman relationship of cliens and patronus and to the medieval ethos in the feudal regime: loc. cit., p. 33.

---

[17] Here lies the essential critical contribution made by H. J. Stoebe to the work of N. Glueck. In the historical books from Judges to 2 Kings, chesed in secular use indicates a kind of conduct between human persons with a goodness and kindness that exceeds what one can expect or has deserved, a conduct that rather reveals generous, open readiness. And it is this that first makes fellowship possible (Stoebe, loc. cit., p. 249).

[18] Stoebe, ibid., p. 251.

[19] Cf. Jer 2.2–3, speaking of Israel's 'loyal affection of the youth' (Cheyne) vis-à-vis God.

[20] Glueck, loc. cit., pp. 13, 33; both concepts appear together at Deut 7.2; 8.12; 1 Kings 8.23; 2 Chron 6.14; Neh 1.9; 9.32.

As the word loses more and more of its legal overtones in the late period, and the tone of pure favour and grace becomes dominant (cf. Est 2.9, 17), so the translation by χάρις is the most appropriate rendering possible.[22] But χάρις is almost invariably the translation of chen (from chnn), in which the element of favour, of the bestowal of a favour, is uppermost, the idea of kindness to which no one may lay claim. 'Do I find chen with you?' means: Will you turn your favour freely in my direction? Ruth finds chen with Boaz, David with Saul and with Jonathan; Joab finds chen with David when his request for the return of Absalom is granted. When Hadad flees, he finds chen with Pharaoh; Esther finds chen with the king. No mention is made of covenantal obligation in this universally-known human behaviour. But chen can also be the accompanying quality through which someone obtains favour for himself: charm, loveliness, even on occasion the fact that one is loved.[23] God, however, has the sovereign freedom to bestow his favour, without regard to persons (Deut 10.17), on whomever he will (Ex 33.19; Num 6.25). Yet here the ascent from what is customary among men to God's behaviour is even clearer than in the case of the previous concepts. The same is true of rachamim, 'mercy'—from rechem, 'womb', meaning 'bowels' in the plural as the seat of tender compassion—a reaction that man in hope attributes to God; he cannot actually (in terms of the covenant) presuppose that this exists in God, but he needs it bitterly when he must find God's forgiveness for himself as a sinner, and the re-establishment of fellowship with him (Is 63.15; Ps 79.8; 119.77; 145.9). God himself says that he feels this compassionate mercy for Jerusalem (Zech 1.16). The initial reference of this word is wholly to human feeling, but terminologically it is used only of a man and may originally have meant the act whereby the father expressed his definite will to acknowledge the newborn child (Stoebe). In this tension between the affective and the rational dimensions, it is used of God as the one who has mercy on Israel and especially on the poor, the widows and the orphans in Israel.

---

[21] Glueck, loc. cit., p. 64.

[22] It is true that there is a specifically Greek note in χάρις too, speaking of what is graceful, attractive, communicating joy (Lofthouse, p. 29), while (as Montgomery emphasises) the link between justice and kindness always remains perceptible in chesed. But both authors pay insufficient attention to the extent to which χάρις also includes the notion of making a gift (often mutual) and showing favour (cf. Pindar), so that the distance between the areas indicated by the two concepts is reduced.

[23] Frequently in Proverbs: 1.9; 4.9; 5.19; 17.8; 22.1; 22.11; cf. Eccl 9.11; 10.12; Ps 45.3.

In this way, the covenantal relationship between God and the people takes on an inner richness, light and warmth. A sphere of common life and fellowship is opened up: man has the right of access to this because he has affirmed the covenant, but the contents and the extent of this sphere cannot be calculated, since one may hope to receive more than one knows from the infinitely powerful, free and generous God. Nothing in this relationship tends to make man believe in a limit; God's chesed, chen and rachamim are not bounded by other divine qualities such as his freedom, his 'righteousness', his 'wrath'. The fear of the Lord, which is the basis of all wisdom (Prov 1.7; Sir 1.11–20), places man only in that distance of reverence which permits true and unlimited intimacy with God. The following comprehensive concept gives us a kind of test of this assertion.

c. Sedek, sedaka: right conduct in faithfulness

One of the unfortunate facts of the Greek translation of scripture is that no other word than dikaiosune (which we translate as iustitia and 'righteousness') was available for sedaka;[24] this translation has cast a shadow over the whole of the old covenant, and is 'not only a very inadequate rendering of the Hebrew sedaka, but is often actually a misleading one'.[25] This must be 'described . . . as the highest value in life, that upon which all life rests when it is properly ordered'.[26] Sedek is a value so universal that its totality embraces everything like a 'transcendental quality' of reality, and therefore escapes every attempt at a precise definition.

Once it was realised that it is not possible to find in the Bible any ethical and legal norms of action and behaviour that are absolute in the Western sense, the attempt was made to have recourse to a 'relational concept', 'in the sense that it refers . . . to a genuine relationship between two, but not to the relationship to an idea on the part of an object subject to judgment'.[27] This can be the relationship of the family, the tribe, or the people, and ultimately that of the people to God. This idea, which has been repeated again and again in the past sixty years, is however naive, because the question at once arises, how a relationship between two can be recognised as correct. The Greek, who endeavours by reflection to deduce the norm from the relationship which exists in reality, knows no less than the easterner that righteousness is a relational concept;[28] the easterner lives within the relationship and knows intuitively and generally when it is in good order, without defining the mutual relationship of the various aspects of the experience that have given him this knowledge in such a way that he can see this clearly. Yet here, at two points, the merely formal relationship is transcended. We find in the whole of the Orient the idea that the one who watches over the just order (whether this is an individual judge, or the king, or the divinity itself) must protect the right of the weak against subjugation by the strong.[29] It is well known how central the relevant legal requirement is in Israel and to what an extent this is placed under religious sanction: the covenant God himself is the supreme protector of the right of the poor, the oppressed, the powerless; the laws from the beginning (and with increased frequency in Deuteronomy) ordain that those who represent the law must uphold God's position in law on this matter in an effective manner, and the prophets see this as a chief theme of their preaching. The second point, likewise something common to the whole of the Orient, is the belief (which is almost a matter of knowledge) in an 'immanent righteousness' in the order of the world:[30] the deeds of man have this 'in themselves' in the sense that they posit a state of affairs to which the one who acts is subject, with a power that comes into effect and is fully realised: evil deeds bring at some time or other to light the doom that lies inherent in them for their perpetrator, and good deeds bring to light their blessing. The one who acts may think that his deed lies in his own power, but in fact it is the deed that takes him into the sphere of its power.[31] This link between deed and outcome is felt to be so close that the same roots are employed to speak of 'morally corrupt' and

---

[24] E. Kautzsch (cf. n. 14 above on chesed). F. Nötscher, Die Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei den vorexilischen Propheten, 1915. H. Fuchs, 'Das alttestamentliche Begriffsverhältnis von Gerechtigkeit und Gnade', in: Christentum und Wissenschaft 3 (1927), pp. 101–118, 149–158. K. H. Fahlgren, Sedaka nahestehende und entgegengesetzte Begriffe im AT, Uppsala 1932. H. Cazelles, 'A propos de quelques textes difficiles relatifs à la justice de Dieu dans l'AT', Rev. Bib. 58 (1951), pp. 169–188. Klaus Koch, SDQ im AT. Eine traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung, diss. Heidelberg 1933; idem, 'Gibt es ein Vergeltungsdogma im AT?', ZTK 52 (1955), pp. 1–42; idem, 'Wesen und Ursprung der "Gemeinschaftstreue" im Israel der Königszeit', Z.f. evang. Ethik 5 (1961), pp. 72–90. G. von Rad, 'Jahwes und Israels Gerechtigkeit', in: ThOT, Vol. I, pp. 370f. W. Mann, 'Gerechtigkeit', I, in: Handb. theol. Grundbegriffe I (1962), pp. 468–478.

[25] von Rad, loc. cit., 374.

[26] Ibid., p. 370.

[27] H. Cremer, Die paulinische Rechtfertigungslehre im Zusammenhang ihrer geschichtlichen Voraussetzungen (1901), pp. 34f.

---

[28] Plato, Republic IX, 441 D ff.

[29] 'In order that the strong one may not harm the weak ones': 37–39 of the introduction to Hammurapi's legal code, AOT 381.

[30] Cf. what has been said above about the ethics of Proverbs, p. 126.

[31] On this, cf. esp. Klaus Koch, 'Gibt es ein Vergeltungsdogma im AT?', loc. cit., p. 18. The apocalyptic beasts of the Revelation of John are in the direct continuation of this idea: they proclaim that the deeds which have been carried out have got the upper hand over those who did them. The perpetrator 'encompassed' by his deed: Hos 7.2 and frequently.

'bringing disaster', as of 'evildoer' and 'one who is wretched', etc.[32] Accordingly, sedek means both correct behaviour (as deed) and blessing (as the power or effect that lies inherent in this).[33] No ancient people was able to conceive of this fundamental sensitivity to the righteousness immanent in existence without a link to the divinity, and as long as man does not demand that he be able himself to penetrate the functioning of this righteousness of existence, the idea that the divinity 'is the protector of right' remains unimpaired. Where the divinity is the covenant Lord of Israel, the whole scheme of immanent righteousness can initially be transferred almost unaltered into the reality of the covenant, and this produces the understanding of history of Deuteronomist historiography: Israel's turning away from the Lord of the covenant 'has its effect' as the disaster that God permits, and its repentance and its cry to the Lord 'have their effect' as salvation: God has mercy and sends a judge or a prophet. Sin, as departure from the realm of God's sedaka (as fidelity to the covenant), bears its 'punishment' in itself; God does not need to do anything particular of his own to punish it. Old Testament exegesis has revealed the astonishing state of affairs that God's sedaka is not a righteousness that deals out reward, and above all, not a righteousness that deals out punishment.[34]

But when we have said that the covenant righteousness is conceived as functioning in the manner of an immanent righteousness, we cannot have said the last word on the subject; nor is it enough to establish that Yahweh 'watches' over the link between deed and fate, and even brings about (perhaps 'hastens') this link thanks to his divine sedaka.[35] For this does not take sufficient account of his freedom in the covenant. This is seen in its fulness only where the immanent link in the link posited by God is transcended or removed and set within a larger context in a manner that cannot be comprehended, where God's free act of forgiveness 'bears away', 'covers over' the sin together with its consequences (Ps 32.1, 5; 85.3; 25.18), 'removes' (103.12), 'heals' (103.3; 107.20), 'wipes it out' and 'washes it away' (51.3), where man is 'snatched out' of his sin (39.9), where the might of the transcendent sedaka of the redeemer-God has the last word to say over the immanent sedaka of the creator-God.

---

[32] Fahlgren, loc. cit., speaks here of a 'synthetic understanding of life', cf. Koch, 'Vergeltungsdogma', who adds further to Fahlgren's examples and points out that the Old Testament has no specific word for 'punishment' (p. 29).

[33] Prov 14.34; 21.21; 2 Sam 19.29.

[34] F. Nötscher has upheld the position that God's righteousness in the Old Testament is also a punishing righteousness (loc. cit.), and Descamps too (Studia Hellenistica 5, pp. 69–91, Louvain 1948; 'Justice et Justification', in: Suppl. Dict. Bibl., 1949) holds on the basis of several texts that one must maintain this. H. Cazelles, in the study mentioned above (n. 24), has swept away these last hesitations. 'No references to the concept of a punitive sedaka can be adduced; that would be a contradictio in adjecto': G. von Rad, ThoT, Vol I, p. 377. S. Lyonnet (VD, 1947) discusses in the same sense the Old Testament presuppositions of the 'righteousness of God' in Romans.

The immanent righteousness contains something anonymous and can be made alive at most through the personification of a quality of God (as subordinate deities of law in Egypt, Babylon and Phoenicia).[36] But where the absolutely divine sedaka of the free covenant God of Israel breaks through in the order of the world to create salvation, it shows all the characteristics of glory, e.g. in Ps 97, when the divine king thrones as judge of the world while the earth exults: 'Clouds and thick darkness are round about him, sedaka and mishpat are the foundation of his throne. Fire goes before him, and burns up his adversaries round about. His lightnings lighten the world: the earth sees and trembles. The mountains melt like wax before the Lord, before the Lord of all the earth. The heavens proclaim his sedaka; and all the peoples behold his kabod . . . Light dawns for the righteous, and joy for the upright in heart'.[37] In the same way, it is once again the heavens that proclaim his sedaka (v. 6) when in Ps 50 God goes forth to judge Israel with the theophanous attributes 'in radiant, perfect beauty' (v. 2) and in the fire of the tempest. Here every order that is invested in creation and in salvation history is traced back to the absolute 'I' that reveals himself. Ps 99 too places the praise of God's 'right', 'order' and 'righteousness' within a framework of a theophany (v. 1) and a mention of the exodus glory (v. 7). For this reason, God's sedek has always the quality of salvation,[38] and is 'closely akin' to the concept of chesed 'and frequently overlays it'.[39] [35] K. Koch, 'Vergeltungsdogma', pp. 9, 21. 1 Kings 9.32: 'Condemn the guilty by bringing his conduct upon his own head, and vindicate the righteous by rewarding him according to his righteousness'.

---

[36] H. Ringgren, Word and Wisdom, Studies in Hypostatizations of divine Qualities and Functions in the Ancient Near East, 1947.

[37] Ps 97.1–6, 11.

But what is the relationship between the sedek of man (to the extent that he lives in God's covenant) and the sedek of Yahweh? The answers are varied, and often give only hints. It seems more important for the old covenant not to neglect any of the aspects that come into question here, than to assemble them into a system. As we have seen, there exists an evidential quality, aiming at man as such, of what is right and righteousness in the behaviour of individuals to one another and in the public order; and God is the one who establishes, preserves and watches over this right. This right is promulgated and established in a new way when the covenant is made: as a human mode of being right that must be accommodated to the revealed sphere of the divine mode of being right, and has to be the product of Israel's attitude of thankfulness for the grace of the covenant. Since the realm of the divine mode of being right is disclosed, an ontological point of view predominates over everything else: the one who stands within the covenant and is loyal to it, dwells with the whole of his being in the realm of salvation and is 'justified'. The action that is man's response can make this realm secure and extend it, but it always presupposes the existence of this realm. The only possibility for man to have the confidence that he is behaving correctly, is for him to be able to trust that reality as a whole is right: in this sense, sedek is 'the ability to stand firm, having permanence, finding a reason to exist', and for Israel this is especially God's 'covenant fidelity' which reveals and renews itself daily in one's existence and in which one can place one's trust in future. 'When they trust God's covenant fidelity and live in accordance with his covenant in promise and precept, men acknowledge that God is right and themselves come to their own right. They achieve the right state of affairs, not only in relationship to God, but also among themselves and in their relationship to things.'[40]

---

[38] On the association of sedaka and salvation (yesha') in Deutero-Isaiah, ThoT, Vol. I, n. 6.

[39] Ibid., p. 372, n. 6.

But before we speak of keeping the commandments, it is necessary to indicate the outlines of a sacramental form by which one can place oneself, anew or more deeply, in God's mode of being right, thanks to the sphere of right which his grace has opened up.[41] This form corresponds to the ontological thinking which is active here along with other forms of thought. To observe the ordinances of God is naturally a decisively important part of human 'being right' before God, but, significantly, this is not without relation to cultic behaviour, where the priest who receives and appraises the sacrifices acknowledges them to be 'right' and free of defects or else, perhaps, rejects them as insufficient, and thus has a mediatory function. Man's offer is not immediately pleasing to God: it must be 'declared' to be pleasing to God, in order to be 'reckoned for righteousness' to the man. This procedure, which is repeated again and again in the cultic laws of the Pentateuch,[42] gives man practice in paying heed in his non-cultic activity too to God, who declares on his own behalf what possesses validity in his eyes and what does not possess validity. The whole body of sacrifices is pleasing to him only if it is the parable of an attitude and an activity that are in keeping with what is right.[43] A list of conditions such as those drawn up at Ezek 18.5–9, similar to the lists used in preparation for confession, tells us who counts as

---

[40] J. Moltmann, Theologie der Hoffnung (1965), p. 185.

[41] K. Koch, 'Wesen und Ursprung der "Gemeinschaftstreue"', loc. cit., pp. 83f. He refers to the 'sacrificial meal of sedek' at Deut 33.19, which is also mentioned at Ps 4.6 and Ps 51.21; cf. also Ps 65.6b. Koch thinks of 'a kind of sacramental food' (p. 85), through which the pious man receives a share in God's sedek. There will have existed something like a cultic confession with the declaration of absolution, although it is no longer possible for us to discern the individual details of this (G. von Rad, ThoT, Vol. I, pp. 379–80).

[42] Lev 7.18; 17.4 and frequently.

[43] Is 1.11; Mal 1.10; Ps 51.18f.

'right' before God—one must avoid idolatry, one must respect one's neighbour's wife, give one's bread to the hungry and clothe the naked, oppress no one, avoid lending at interest, give right judgment as judge, etc.—and here man must pay heed to God's declaration: he cannot say that what 'his conscience advises him to do' is right. The decisive factor for the one who lives in God's covenant is that something is accepted as 'right' in God's sight, for he must await his definitive being right as something that comes to him from heaven.[44] According to Gerhard von Rad, even the solitary statement about the faith of the patriarch must be seen as derived from the cultic formula of declaration: 'Abraham believed God (his promise), and he counted this to him as righteousness' (Gen 15.6), 'certainly a striking and perhaps even revolutionary formulation for those contemporary with it'.[45] And yet the formula does no more than go to the basis of the covenant relationship which had existed from the outset: its basis was from the outset obedience, out of reverent and thankful love, to the God of promise and of salvation (Ex 19.5; Deut 7.8f.), and it was here that life in accordance with God's directives had its ground and unity. The declaratory formula only makes it plain that the covenant is built upon the free love of God, as the form of his grace, and that the standard of the 'right' which holds good here is laid down by God. This does not mean that the righteousness of the believing Abraham is 'forensic'; rather, it shares in the existential realm of the covenant to the extent that it admits God to be in the right at all points, in the fullest readiness of obedience.[46]

d. Mishpat: right which comes into effect as salvation

A further all-embracing concept lies very close to sedek and also to chesed: mishpat, mishpatim, with a spectrum of meanings that is still wider than the previous concepts.[47] Before entering the specifically legal sphere, it speaks of what has been laid down in tradition, what is customary, usual (Gen 4.13; Judg 18.7; 2 Kings 17.33). 'What mishpat did the man have?' asks Ahaziah of the men who had met Elijah (2 Kings 1.7). In the legal sphere, then, it denotes the judgment that has been established, the juridical decision itself, but more precisely its meaning and contents: the correct legal judgment (1 Kings 3.9, 28), and ultimately the concern for what is right, right as a whole (1 Kings 10.9, where mishpat is accompanied by sedaka: the legal order that, by God's grace, radiates out from king Solomon). It is never formal law, but is based in what is ethically right (cf. Gen 18.19), and this in turn emerges irrefutably in concrete terms in the claim of the poor to what is right. The older prophecy sets the just treatment of the poor, who are incapable of enforcing their own right and establishing it, in the very centre of God's conventional requirements. In the face of the injustice done to him, the 'poor' becomes simply the one who is 'innocent' (Amos 5.12), and that which is 'right' becomes straightforwardly what is 'good' (5.14–15); once again, mishpat and sedaka appear jointly (5.7, 24; 6.12). In Isaiah, mishpat becomes the all-embracing concept for what is right, with an unconditional seriousness [44] Hos 10.12; Is 45.8; Joel 2.23; cf. 2 Sam 24.23; Jer 14.12; Ezek 20.14; 43.27; Amos 5.22; Hos 8.13.

---

[45] G. von Rad, ThOT, Vol. 1, p. 379; idem, 'Die Anrechnung des Glaubens zur Gerechtigkeit' (1951) now in: Ges. Stud. zum AT, 3rd edn. 1965, pp. 130–135.

[46] G. von Rad has taught us that we should not take even the post-exilic declarations of the pious that they are righteous before God (Ps 26; 73; 119, etc.), which are often difficult to bear with, as psychological or individual-ethical self-assessments, but rather as confessional acts expressing the fundamental desire to be loyal to God—i.e. in fact as acts of faith (ThOT, Vol. I, pp. 380–383). The harsh and unmediated 'either/or' of 'righteous'/'unrighteous' derives from the sphere of the unconditional quality of faith. And the criterion taken to determine whether such a fundamental loyalty to God exists is delectari, the joy in God and in his directive, joy in resting in his presence, 'refreshing oneself' and 'letting oneself be spoiled' by him (Ps 37.4; Job 22.26; 27.10). Jesus will uncover the risks of such acts of pronouncing oneself to be righteous.

---

[47] H. W. Hertzberg, 'Die Entwicklung des Begriffs mišpat im AT', ZAW 40 (1922), pp. 256–287, 41 (1933), pp. 16–76. L. Koehler, 'Die hebräische Rechtsgemeinde', in: Der hebräische Mensch (1933), pp. 150f. G. Quell, 'Der Rechtsgedanke im AT', in: ThW II (1953), 176–180 (with bibliography). K. Cramer, Amos (1930), pp. 165f. The brief analysis which follows here takes up especially the interpretation of Hertzberg.

both in the area of ethics and in the area of law: mishpat is that which must be brought into force in all circumstances and is made clear again and again in the model of the poor and the oppressed, the widows and orphans. As an ethical central concept, mishpat here comes near to what Augustine and Anselm (with reference to the Old Testament texts) will call rectitudo, the cor rectum (Is 1.16–17, 23; 3.14; 5.20, 23). Together with sedaka, mishpat denotes the embodiment of the messianic goods for which one hopes (9.6; 28.17; 32.1, 16f., where it makes the transition into shalom). This shows that there lies something 'urgent' in mishpat: it expresses the right that must at all costs be put into force on earth, the right that also has the power with God to have its way (cf. 5.15).

For the source of mishpat is God: it is from him that 'justice goes forth as the light' (Hos 6.5), new every day (Zeph 3.5), in order to establish itself in Israel, and on behalf of Israel in the case of its foes (Deut 33.21; 2 Sam 18.31). The right that is with God is revealed for the people through his instructions (thus, above all, in Deuteronomy); civil and sacred law, including cultic law (Jus et Fas) form a unity, since the entire realm of what is right is understood, with reference back to Sinai, as the extension of the 'customs of God' which are valid within the sphere of the covenant. But there appears a further motif in Deuteronomy which has decisive importance for the future: when God sees that the right of the poor and the oppressed is not established, he is moved by compassionate love ('hb) to help them to establish their right. God appears, not as the severe judge above the world, but as the kind father who cannot bear that his children should be the victims of injustice. In Jeremiah, legal help for the poor is central;[48] the terrible thing is now that the people no longer knows the mishpat of God (5.1, 4f.; 8.7; 22.15f.) and has lost the disposition of rectitudo (17.11). Ezekiel speaks, in the same way as Deuteronomy, of the mishpatim as the embodiment of precepts and customs of God:[49] the people ought to have found its orientation in these, in a right which was established transcendentally ('my mishpatim', 44.24),[50] for if Israel wanted to prescind from God and to lead its life in accordance with a right that seemed good in an immanent perspective, then it would have been still better if the right had been given to the Gentiles (5.7; cf. Gen 20.9). But God leaves this 'right that blinds' with the people (Ezek 20.25f.), so that he may deal with them according to their conduct and judge them according to their legal statutes (7.27; cf. Matt 7.2), i.e. he allows the immanent righteousness to take its course.

[48] 5.28; 7.5f.; 21.12; 22.3.

[49] 5.6–7; 11.12, 20; 18.9, 17; 20.11, 13, 16, 19, 21, 25; 36.27; 37.24.

The exile brings a decisive turning-point. The immanent righteousness has been accomplished: Israel has paid a more than sufficient penalty (Is 40.2), and now it has landed as a whole among the poor, the downtrodden, the oppressed, the humiliated and humble (ebiyon, ani), i.e. among those who have first claim to God's compassionate work of bringing about justice. Now, mishpat is justice as the fruit of compassion, as grace (Is 51.3, 8). And the raising-up of the 'poor' involves the laying low of the rich and satiated, who are cited before the court of God's justice because of the injustice they have done. But it is the 'Servant of Yahweh' who becomes the especial mediator of God's mishpat to the whole world (Is 42.1–4). The last Song shows how this happens: 'By his sufferings, my servant will make the many to be righteous.' (53.11) Now the way is open for the praise of God's mishpat in the late Psalms: how God no longer remembers sin but permits only grace to have sway, 'leads the righteous in mishpat, and teaches the humble his way' (Ps 25.8–9), how God does not reproach for ever, but has mercy as a father on his children, 'lets his mishpat have sway', since he knows what kind of creatures we are while his own chesed endures eternally (Ps 103.6f.). Mishpat and grace are often set alongside each other (Ps 33.5; 48.10–12; 101.1; 119, 149; Zech 7.9).

It is true that the late period returns in a determined fashion to the idea of mutuality between the justice of God and the justice of men; not only the poor man (who as such is already a saddik, one who is 'faithful') can expect grace, but every 'pious' man who is fundamentally on the side of God can look for this, and this mutuality (cf. what was said above about sedek) threatens to obscure the absolute priority of the divine justice which establishes what is right. Nevertheless, the prayer even of the poor and the sufferers knows that God is free to hear the cry of prayer, and that it is therefore free grace, if he decides in favour of those whom he loves in a special way (and how right he is to do so!). Something in Peter's question expresses the viewpoint of late Judaism very well: 'Behold, we have left everything and have followed you: what then shall we receive in return?' (Mt 19.27). Thus the spectrum of meaning embraced by mishpat penetrates deeply into the sphere of election, covenant, discipleship, faithfulness, and grace. The ground is laid for Paul, but the final step is yet to be taken.

---

[50] The best commentary on this is Ps 147.19–20: God 'declares his word to Jacob, his statutes and ordinances to Israel. He has not dealt thus with any other nation; they do not know his ordinances.'

e. Emeth, emuna: proved excellence

The all-embracing concept emeth, emuna[51]—which is no less flexible and adaptable than the previous concepts—expresses the joy that comes from the fact that it is truly so, that there is no deceit: one takes hold of something firm, something that can give support, something valid and reliable; one can dare to enter into a relationship with it, one can count on it and depend on it. And this is fundamentally important in the case of a covenant with so much that remains in the realm of promise. The usual translation in the LXX is ἀλήθεια and ἀληθινός, etc.; occasionally, δικαιοσύνη and δίκαιος etc., as well as πίστις, πιστός (worthy of confidence), are used instead. Its employment in legal language shows a certain kernel in its meaning: 'de facto state of things', 'state of affairs with legal validity', and thus simply 'truth'. After her son had been raised from the dead, the widow says to Elijah, 'Now I know that you are a man of God and that Yahweh's word in your mouth is truth (fact)' (1 Kings 17.24; cf. Jer 23.28: 'Let him who has my word, speak my word in a reliable manner').[52] [51] H. Holemann: Bibelstudien, I: Die biblischen Grundbegriffe der Wahrheit (1895), pp. 1–53. G. Quell, 'Der alttestamentliche Begriff emet', ThW I (1933), 233–237 (with bibliography). A. Weiser, ThW VI (1959), 183–191 (on 'mn, amen, etc.).

---

Since it characterises the realm of salvation opened up by God and given its form wholly through his own being, the statement is rich in every way: it establishes that one can trust the new territory: God's glory, which has appeared, is no mirage, but a place where one can dwell, and experience teaches that one does well to do so; on the basis of what has been experienced, one can entrust oneself even to the dimension of the promise that cannot be understood, and one can entrust oneself to the word that gives the direction, when a path and conduct are demanded: 'Teach me, Lord, thy ways, so that I may walk in thy trustworthiness' (Ps 86.11). God's reliability requires a corresponding reliability in the man who has entered his covenant, both in his conduct vis-à-vis his fellows and in his conduct vis-à-vis God himself; the one conditions the other. When Hosea laments that emeth is missing in the land, alongside chesed, the feeling for the fellowship, he means primarily reliability in relationships between men, but this stands beside the 'knowledge of God', which is likewise lacking (4.2). And the demand that one 'utter true judgment between man and man' stands in Ezekiel beside the statement: 'He walks in my statutes, and is careful to observe my ordinances, in order that he may live (reliably) truly' (18.8–9). The sinner knows that he does not live in accordance with the transparent truth of God, and so he prays: 'Thou desirest truthfulness in the inward being; therefore teach me wisdom in my secret heart. Purge me, and I shall be clean' (Ps 51.8–9). Emeth can stand as the embodiment of the precepts of God (Ps 119.160), and in the late period it denotes above all the firm rules of life that give orientation to the pious man. Emeth, as a characteristic of revelation, is clearly close to the wisdom of God which is present in the world and gives form to all things. Emeth can also coincide materially with chesed (Ex 34.6) to characterise God's conduct; this is absolutely valid and irrevocable (Ps 132.11), because God is the eternal reliability (Ps 146.6).

---

[52] 'The translation "fidelity" commends itself nowhere', ThW I, 233 n. 2, cf. 237 n. 12.

All this is ultimately addressed directly to the eternal divine 'I'; it bears witness to a unique experience of reality that is able to utter an unconditional 'yes' of acceptance, not only to God, but also to his creation and to history. Here there is nothing of the uncertainty felt in India and Greece about the reliability of the 'world of appearance'. On the basis of the absolute truthfulness of God, a full affirmation of the world is discovered—but precisely on the basis of what God has promised.

f. Shalom: pacified realm of salvation

As the last of the words indicating a totality, we can take shalom,[53] which once again reveals the universality of such concepts—which often become almost ciphers and mere indications. Shalom denotes in innerworldly terms quite generally 'wellbeing, with a clear emphasis on the material side',[54] especially for the people as a whole, and thus political peace is naturally one of the chief preconditions for this, the peace that is assured by peace treaties (shalom with berith: Judg 4.17; 1 Kings 5.4, 26, etc.). But it is clear that for Israel, which dwells in God's land, the wellbeing of the era of peace appears from the outset as a gift of God's salvation and the dowry of his covenant; for this is what God has promised: 'I will give shalom in the land, and you shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid; and I will remove evil beasts from the land, and the sword shall not go through your land' (Lev 26.6). No matter how fragmentary the fulfilment may be in the course of Israel's history—until its hope of peace is transposed wholly into the end-time—it is nevertheless worthy of consideration that the world in itself (apart from man's guilt) is by God's promise a pacified realm of salvation, and that such peace is not (as for Greek philosophy) an immanent or transcendent settling of the πόλεμος ἐμφύλιος, the war that is inherent in all things, but that this pacification goes beyond all realism of natural distress in human existence (Gen 9.2) to be God's institution of salvation with humanity and indeed with the entire cosmos (Gen 9.9f.). The struggle between the prophets of shalom[55] and the prophets of doom (above all Jeremiah and Ezekiel) remains, despite everything, only an episode when seen against the background of this all-embracing understanding of existence; it is true that the prophets of shalom have failed to sense the storms from God which are brewing over Jerusalem, but even if God does shatter the unfaithful city, this is only in order that he may institute a true realm of peace in an utterly new manner, a realm such as the great prophets immediately proclaim (Jer 29.11; Ezek 34.25f.; 37.26). From the time of the exile onwards, where Israel (as we have seen in the case of mishpat) somehow seems to have fallen on the far side of the judgment of God, shalom—often linked to sedaka (Is 48.18; 54.13; 60.17) or to mishpat (Zech 8.16)—becomes the wide-open eschatological expectation, now virtually nothing more than a cipher for the definitive salvation that is coming, and therefore it is linked also to the appearing of the glory of God (kabod) that is awaited for the end-time (Is 66.12).

---

[53] W. Caspari, 'Vorstellung und Wort "Friede" im AT', BFTh 14, 4 (1910). Idem, Der biblische Friedensgedanke, 1916. G. von Rad, ThW II, 400–405.

[54] von Rad, 400.

Ps 85, which comes from the same period, gathers together for the end-time not only the peace of salvation and glory, but all the other great attributes of God too, and their encounter and mutual compenetration in love is the most beautiful image to express the fulfilment of all that is promised, for the end when 'God will be all in all' (1 Cor 15.28): 'Let me hear what Yahweh will speak, for he will speak peace . . . his glory will dwell again in our land. Chesed and emeth will meet; sedek and mishpat will kiss each other. Emeth will spring up from the ground, and sedek will look down from the sky. Yea, Yahweh will give what is good, and our land will yield its increase; sedek will go before him, and shalom with follow his steps' (Ps 85.9–14). This piling-up of attributes is not an isolated instance; very similar terms recur in Hosea (2.21f.) to describe the definitive wedding between God and his people, and likewise at the most solemn point in Micah, where Israel's disposition before God is summarised and embodied (Mic 6.8).

---

[55] 'They have healed the wound of my people lightly, saying, 'Shalom, shalom', when there is no peace' (Jer 6.14). Cf. Jer 28.

The great qualities of God, which make his holy sublimity concrete for man, seem at first glance almost to obliterate his utter otherness, for all are taken from the world of human relationships (where, admittedly, they always had a religious reference), and have taken on a unique character only when they are attributed to the absolute subject. But not for a moment is it forgotten who is the object of the affirmation: i.e., the one who as the only Lord stands alone over against all other beings, which are his creatures and servants. God's remoteness does not actually lie in the fact that he is unknown, so much as in the incomprehensible fact that he, the only one (Is 43.10–12), who is absolutely free and sovereign, deigns to communicate himself to the others, to the many, permitting them to enter the sphere of his uniqueness and holiness. This grace is an unheard-of demand made of the creature, something that snatches it from its own dwelling in the land of servitude into a 'land' that belongs to God, and all the creature's concepts are transformed thereby: a ray of God's glory touches them all, and this makes them more beautiful, but also heavier. Everything is now measured against the standard of divine rightness, of his ethical 'justice' and his aesthetic 'justesse'. In God's covenant, grace and demand are inseparably locked into one another.

3. EXISTENCE OUTSIDE ONESELF

a. A dwelling-place in God's life

1. Israel is chosen, not in order to dwell by itself, but in order that it may dwell where God is. This is how everything began: 'Yahweh said to Abraham, "Go from your country and your kindred and your father's house to the land that I will show you"' (Gen 12.1). And since he obeys—it was a test—he can then be told, 'To your descendants I will give this land' (12.7). The only thing that Abraham acquires for himself there is a grave, as a first instalment. Then the election is repeated, this time from Egypt: God has put himself under obligation to the fathers with an oath[1] that he will give them the land; he remembers this and leads the people out. He promises them the land—even Moses receives only a first instalment, when he looks out from Nebo (Num 27.12f.)—and Israel dwells there, although it inhabits only a part of the country (as a result of its guilt, according to Judg 1.21 and 2.20–21, or out of necessity, according to Josh 15.63, or so that it may be tested and disciplined, according to Judg 2.22 and 3.2), until it is punished by being driven from the land to Assyria and Babylon. Now for the third time there appears a theology of emigration and returning home, but not even this is definitive, for the land which is regained is no longer what it was, or not yet again what it is to be; indeed, it is never what corresponds to the promise. The decisive fact seems to be that Israel is never allowed to dwell in its own place, nor is it able to do so, but—whether at home or aborad—must live in relation to itself as a foreigner.

Two theologies interpentrate here. The first has God say 'The land is mine; for you are strangers and sojouners with me' (Lev 25.23). God possesses the territory, and the people receives the ground from God as his vassals; the sign of this is the great sacral fallowness every seven years, which makes 'Yahweh's real and exclusive right to possession appear clearly once again'.[2] Then lots were cast afresh for the land, which was portioned out anew.[3] Basically, we have here the ancient Sumerian idea that the land belongs to the god, who permits it to be portioned out and cultivated through his representative ('ensi', the priest-king), but always in the interest of the god and through his grace.[4] Buber has drawn attention to an old Sabaean document (700 B.C.) which likewise 'knows the god as 'owner of the goods' and 'private property as a fief'.[5] But in Israel, this idea is raised from the sphere of 'primitive sacrality' into a sphere that is characterised by the unqiue covenant with the God-king Yahweh who leads his people, and is balanced by a second theological conception: God promises (a land) and fulfils his promise (by leading the people there); the Hexateuch (especially P) is above all a training in this theological way of thinking, while it is characteristic of Deuteronomy to combine two conceptions: the commandments of Sinai are to be kept as the condition for receiving the promised land, and they will acquire the force of law when the land is received. In any case, they have a prospective intention: they are precepts for an existence on the basis of hope. Thus we see once again that Israel—irrespective of the theological schema that is used to interpret its existence—exists in a state of being taken outside itself. It lives in the realm of the covenant that is offered and opened up by God, and must acknowledge the existential conditions of this realm as its own. 'Be holy, for I, Yahweh your God, am holy' (Lev 19.2).

---

[1] G. von Rad, 'Verheißenes Land und Jahwes Land im Hexateuch' (1943), now in: Ges. Stud. AT, pp. 87–100, has collected forty-eight texts dealing with this 'oath to the ancestors'.

---

[2] A. Alt, 'Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts' (1934, now in: Kl. Schriften, I, 1953, p. 327).

[3] The requirement existed (Lev 15.4–6), no matter how and to what extent this process may have been carried out in practice. R. de Vaux, Les institutions dans l'Ancien Testament, I (1958), pp. 264–267.

[4] H. Schmökel, Das Land Sumer, (1955) pp. 53, 81f. Schmökel holds that this social theocracy can be compared 'best with the organisation of the medieval monasteries'.

[5] 'Königtum Gottes' (1932, now in: Werke, II, 1964, pp. 583–586. Buber relies on N. Rhodokanakis, 'Altsabäische Texte', in: Sitzber. Wiener Ak. phil.-hist. Kl. 206/2 (1930).—The land west of the Jordan counts as the real 'possession of Yahweh' (Josh 22.19), and this may be the source of the conflicts in Josh 22; in describing the new apportioning of the land, Ezek 48 does not mention the land east of the Jordan at all. G. von Rad, loc. cit., p. 94.

2. If Israel as a whole is a foreigner with God and God's resident alien then the tribe of Levi is like a further concentrated embodiment of such an existence that is handed over to God. When the land is taken in possession, Levi receives no nachala, no hereditary share in the land, and he is separated from those who are themselves separated, in order to be Yahweh's possession in a yet more authentic sense (Num 8.14, 16; 18.6). The Levites are those who have been 'given', handed over (Num 3.9; 8.19): from Israel to God, from God to Aaron for the cult. Is the basis of this a curse of Jacob that had threatened the dissolution of the two tribes of Levi and Simeon among the other tribes because of the cunning way in which they had avenged their sister Dinah (Gen 34.30; 49.5–7), or is this curse in reality a 'blessing', like the blessing that appears in Deuteronomy for Levi (33.8–11), where his tribe already stands as a priestly tribe chosen in order to present the holocausts to God and to make known to the people his directives in the oracle? For when the people were put to the test at Massah, the sons of Levi had taken up their position on the side of God against their own flesh and blood: 'He said of his father and mother, 'I regard them not'; he disowned his brothers, and ignored his chidren. For they observed thy word, and kept thy covenant'. For the word sacer denotes both accursed (excluded from the community) and consecrated. (One can also be 'given' to Moloch: Lev 20.2.) In Num 3.12, P has thought further and discovered that the Levites were set apart from the people for God instead of the first-born, who belonged to God; in the encampment, their tents lie closest to the tabernacle of the testimony, and keep the divine wrath away from the other tribes through their expiation; thus, as men who are chosen, they are also mediators (Num 1.53; 8.19).[6] Levi, the tribe without land, is the token in Israel that it is given over as the people to God. It is predestined to represent, prophetically and in the postexilic period, the ebiyon, the poor man who is expropriated and who must rely on God alone, and thus to embody in a privileged (because existential) manner the covenant and the knowlege of God in the covenant.

---

[6] Once again, we are concerned here with the 'ideology'; the complicated

3. In this ever deeper exproportion there take place finally those strange acts of transcendence which were prepared in a long internal process and which grow organically out of the theological ontology of the state of being taken outside oneself, but which surprise the one who has not given any deeper thought to these implications of the covenant as something sudden and inexplicable. What Paul will describe as faith's act of transcendence—'I live, no longer I, but Christ lives in me' (Gal 2.20)—is experienced and described in 'Psalm texts with an almost fragile tenderness'[7] in postexilic Levitic circles who take seriously their 'being given' to God; this act of transcendence is seen as an ekstasis into the life of God himself. Something of this has already become clear in the description of sedek: the sphere of the right(eous), in which the 'poor man' is permitted to live, is filled by the sedek of God; by the faith which the 'poor man' fundamentally professes in God, he is also fundamentally and 'in toto' right(eous). There is scarcely any evidence of reflection on the question of the extent to which, as an individual person, he corresponds ethically to this ideal; there is horror on the occasion of clear personal guilt, but also the quasi-sacramental confession of sin and the quasi-sacramental priestly assurance of salvation, which makes a clean break with the past (2 Sam 12.22ff.; Ps 51.14f.) and re-integrates the sinner intact into the sphere of salvation. This realm of salvation appears for all the Israelites, but especially for the priests and Levites, in a very concrete form as the realm of the temple. Here are those whom 'God allows to draw near', so that they may 'dwell in his courts'; God takes the place of food and drink for them historical questions, including that of the relationship between priests and Levites, need not detain us.

---

[7] G. von Rad, '"Gerechtigkeit" und "Leben" in den Psalmen' (1930, now in: Ges. Stud. AT, pp. 225–247).

(in the same way as with the manna in the wilderness); 'let us be filled with the good things of thy house' (Ps 65.5). This again is a quasi-sacramental idea that stands close by the experience of the divine glory and makes possible such unheard-of, apparently extravagant statements as these:

So have I looked upon thee in the sanctuary, beholding thy power and thy glory.
Because thy steadfast love is better than life,
my lips will praise thee.
My soul is feasted (on thee) as with marrow and fat (Ps 63.3–6)

Bodily life, which elsewhere in the Old Testament, is the highest of all good things, is clearly relativised here: 'thy steadfast love is better than life', just as thy being is more nourishing than worldly food. Earthly life, food, and light have their source and root in God, and the one who is chosen and 'given' is permitted to penetrate as far as that sphere, in order to dwell there.

How precious is thy steadfast love, O God
The children of men take refuge in the shadow of thy wings.
They feast on the abundance of thy house, and thou givest them drink from the river of thy delights.
For with thee is the fountain of life;
and in thy light do we see light (Ps 36.8–10)

Ps 16 (like 142.6) calls God 'my part', 'my cup', 'my inheritance', 'my lot': this is the most spiritual aspect of the Levitical existence in the temple.[8] Here, Yahweh becomes genuinely and experientially the part and possession of the one who has been caught up to him (Num 18.20); thus there is a snatching out of the realm of death and mortality into the realm of the God who is life and who does not die, in Ps 73. The psalm speaks first of the apparent injustice of the world: the wicked prosper, while the good suffer. Then the one who prays 'seeks to understand this' (v. 16): the one who looks very deeply within sees that there are two paths, one that runs far from God in a 'dream' and 'illusion', and one in God's intimacy. And now the psalm says:

---

[8] 'Here we meet a particular circle of spiritual men, who—as is shown by the continued mention of dwelling in the temple—are to be sought among the personnel of the cult': ibid., p. 241.

> Nevertheless I am continually with thee; > thou dost hold my right hand.
> Thou dost guide me with thy counsel, > and afterward thou wilt receive me to glory.
> Whom have I in heaven (but thee)?
> And there is nothing upon earth > that I desire besides thee.
> My flesh and my heart may fail, > but God is the strength of my heart > and my portion for ever.
> For lo, those that are far from thee shall perish . . .
> but for me it is good to be near God;
> I have made Yahweh my refuge, > that I may tell of all thy works (Ps 73.23–28)

Here it is God who 'takes hold', then 'leads' and finally 'catches up'. The word used to express the last of these is the same used for the rapture of Enoch (Gen 5.24) and of Elijah (2 Kings 2.3, 5). 'There is no reason to question that this is what is meant at Ps 49.16 and 73.24 . . . The one who prays is so sure of his security with Yahweh, the source of his life, that he discovers anew the full measure of what is guaranteed to him by this fellowship of life with God in the Old Testament conception of being handed over.' 'The ancient conception of rapture was stripped of its semi-mythological accretions, and is here certainly the object of hope in God's act post mortem.' But this is not a wholly 'new and revolutionary insight, something like a "breakthrough" to the idea of a "life beyond death"; rather, there grew in the circle of the spiritually-minded a confidence that came exclusively from the certainty that a living community offerd by God could not be destroyed'.[9] God is higher than life on this side of death and then life beyond death, and the one who is permitted simply to dwell with God is definitively certain of God.

---

[9] Ibid., pp. 244–245.

b. Contemporaneity

The endeavour of Deuteronomy[10] to carry out an inexorable reduction of all of Israel's religious instruction, praxis and tradition to the sole fact of the covenant—as election by God in pure love, and as the answering love of the people in obedience—and to confront the people with equal inexorability with the fire of the primal event by casting them back to it at each moment, is something unique in the old covenant. This grandiose project of the late period of the kings, bearing testimony to a burning faith, in order to win back the contemporaneity with the origin, is cloaked in a tragic dimension that has its basis in Israel's temporality; only in the new covenant will the eternal be incarnated in time in such a manner that the historical event can lay claim to validity for all times.[11]

The generation of the eye-witnesses of Sinai is addressed by Moses one last time in Maob, before they enter the land—an experience in which he will not share. 'You have had the experience, not your sons. They have neither seen nor known the majesty of Yahweh your God' (11.2). In Moses' testament, the situation of Horeb is the event that is utterly present today; indeed, it only really becomes fully present when Moses makes its fullness known for the first time. 'Yahweh our God made a covenant with us at Horeb. Not with our fathers . . . but with us, who are all of us here alive this day. Yahweh spoke with you face to face at the mountain, out of the midst of the fire, while I stood between Yahweh and you at that time, to declare to you the word of Yahweh; for you were afraid because of the fire, and you did not go up into the mountain' (5.2–5). There was thus the moment when Israel stood naked and defenceless before God; this moment—its true origin—is admitted by Israel: 'Behold, Yahweh our God has shown us his glory (kabod) and greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire, we have this day seen God speak with man and man still live' (5.24). 'Fire' and 'voice' were the 'glory' of God, before which they stood unprotected: a theophany perceptible to the senses (together with the darkness, 4.11) and a direct word that is not shut off by any form ('you saw no form; there was only a voice', 4.12). All Israel must once against enter this primal event of face-to-face confrontation as covenant ('Nor is it with you only that I make this sworn covenant, but with him who is not here with us this day as well as with him who stands here with us this day (and who was not present then at Sinai)', 29.13f.). It is a covenant as election (7.6f.; 32.8f.) on the basis of love for which no reason can be given (7.7: chashak, 'to be attached to someone'), and the only answer which man can make to this love in the primal event is absolute answering love, obedience, readiness to serve (10.12). Israel has heard only the 'ten words' out of the fire (5.6–21), and 'nothing else' (6.22), but this embodiment of the loving offer that is made in the covenant can be answered only by the embodiment of man—'the whole heart, the whole soul, the whole strength'. As has already been said, the whole problematic of a one-sided berith (of grace) and a two-sided berith (of treaty) is left behind in this theology: the offer of God's love releases in man the whole readiness to follow God's directive, when man says 'yes' in thankfulness. The formula recurs nine times: one must love God, 'with all one's heart and all one's soul' (6.5; 13.4; 30.6), one must seek him and find him (4.29), hear his word and follow it (30.2), return to him (30.10), love God and keep his commandments (10.12; 11.13), put his directives into practice (26.16). In the midpoint of the heart, love and obedience are one. And already there is talk of the 'circumcision of the heart' (10.16; 30.6), which means the same thing. The fire of glory on Sinai is given a deeper interpretation as the 'consuming jealousy of love' (4.24; 5.9; and frequently; Zeph 1.18, as far as 2 Cor 11.2) which forbids all images (4.15f.) and, as word, wishes to nourish the hearts of those who are loved (8.3). This burning jealousy is at the same time a fidelity that goes further than all else, further than every act of punishment and destruction, without repentance (4.31). It is a love higher than erotic love (and this is the reason why Hosea's parable of married love does not appear),[12] a love that takes entire possession of the one who is its object, in the nakedness of soul to soul (4.37). The veiled images, the constellations (which point to the theion) are left to other peoples for worship (4.19–20; 17.3; Wis 13.2); they are subject to angels (Deut 32.8; Dan 10.13f.), while Israel has a direct relationship to God. The terrible thing is that this intimacy with God 'does not go beyond your possibilities'; one cannot make the excuse that what is demanded is too steep ('Who will go up for us to heaven, and bring it to us?') or too far away ('Who will go over the sea for us, and bring it to us?') for: 'The word is very near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart, so that you can do it' (Deut 30.11–14). Israel is already 'handed over', it is kadosh, 'consecrated', 'sacrificed', 'holy'[13] (7.6; 14.2, 21; 26.19; 28.9), delivered up to the power of the naked divine 'Thou'. And this is something that happens at each present moment ('today' occurs fifty-two times). The strong emphasis on the present fulfilment of the covenant promise—expulsion of the foes, shalom and earthly prosperity—submits the truth of the event to proof at each moment: that which is most spiritual, most internal, has a reality that goes to the limits of what is material.[14] Much of the formulation of the primal moment takes the form of a preview, bringing the future into the here and now ('when God shall have brought you into the land', etc.: 12.1; 17.14; 18.9; 19.1; 21.1; 26.1); this is therefore not eschatological, but refers to the present time. The total absence of eschatology is striking: the 'historical' today is only the unfolding of the primal historical 'today'. Everything is composed with a view to emphasising the uniqueness of the 'I-Thou' relationship in the covenant of grace:[15] the absolute 'uniqueness of Yahweh' (4.35; 6.4), of the chosen people, the strict unification of the place of worship (12.8–12), of the sacrifices (12.13f.), of the Passover (16.1–6), and of the supreme court (17.8–10). Finally, prophecy too, without limitation of its freedom, is set in relationship to the absolute point of the covenant and measured against this: here is the definitive truth (the truth of love), which not even God himself can now any longer contradict in his free word.[16] Against the self-evident character of the covenant faith, signs and wonders, and even prophecies that come to pass, have no external, evidential character (13.2).

---

[10] On what follows, cf. G. von Rad, Das Gottesvolk im Deuteronomium (BWANT III/11, 1929); idem, Deuteronomy (with bibliography); idem, ThOT, I, 219–231.

[11] Great renewals in the period of the Church always proceed from the contemporaneity with Christ, which is always presupposed and created anew by the hodie of the liturgy. Thus with Francis of Assisi, Luther, Ignatius, Kierkegaard (who opposes the idea of contemporaneity with Christ to every temporal and conceptual mediation: Phil. Fragmuents ch. 4), Karl Barth. The relationships to Ignatius are particularly close: a Christian in the original sense of the word comes into being as he returns to the moment of the word of God which becomes event in Christ and out of the existential act of being present there and hearing (as a Spirit-filled eyewitness). 'To fear God, to follow him on all his paths, to love him and to serve him all one's heart and all one's soul' (Deut 10.12) characterises the relationship to God of the 'Exercises' (nr. 23. 91). Cf. also what was said in Vol. I of this work about the eyewitnesses and the archetypical experience of revelation.

---

[12] Although Deuteronomy must presuppose this intensification of the covenant as the event of love which is found in Hosea.

[13] On the meaning of this holiness: von Rad, Gottesvolk (n. 10 above), pp. 25f.

But precisely at this point, where the highest degree of unification seems to have been achieved, the fissure breaks open; and that not only subsequently, but already in the primal event itself. The people has seen and heard the glory of God, the unbearable fire and the even more unbearable word, and they have even admitted that one can 'stand' God without dying.[17] Nevertheless, it expresses its mortal anxiety and appeals to the generally acknowleged truth: 'who is there of all flesh, that has heard the voice of the living God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as we have, and has still lived? Go [14] 'Through a holistic conception, the accent of what is absolutely endless falls on something finite that is utterly abandoned in its relative creatureliness': von Rad, Gottesvolk, p. 64.

---

[15] Berith and chesed occur together: 7.9, 12.

[16] 'The prophet has lost his free position, since he is the object of a positive estimation only when Israel's relationship to Yahweh is recognised to be absolute, for in Deuteronomy this stands above even the prophet': von Rad, Gottesvolk, p. 54.

[17] On the anxiety that one will not be able to stand before God, cf. 1 Sam 6.20; Ps 76.9; Nah 1.6; Zech 3.7. The title 'Fear of Isaac' (Gen 31.42, 53) is also rendered in recent translations as 'kin of Isaac'.

near, and hear all that Yahweh our God will say; and speak to us all that Yahweh our God will speak to you; and we will hear and do it' (5.25–27; cf. Ex 20.18–21). The people themselves withdraw from the glowing centre and send their representative ahead of them. But Moses stood from the outset as the mediator between God and the people (5.5), clearly without disturbing the immediacy which is so much emphasised here. The people received the decalogue in this original situation. Only subsequently does the withdrawal take place, and now it is Moses who hears everything else (5.31) and who later proclaims it to the people in Moab as his testament. The great 'speaker for God' (prophet) stands in twilight: he has already been instituted in this function (clearly by God), and he is instituted in this function once again by the people, who wish to spare themselves the necessity of hearing to the end. Not only the Law, but also prophecy was instititued in the first hour, at Horeb (everything in Deuteronomy is concentric), when God explicitly agreed to the people's request that they might send one ahead in the place of all (18.16). And since the one, this singled out Moses, will now die without entering the land, once again one is promised to the historical 'today': 'Yahweh your God will raise up for you a prophet like me from among you, from your brethren—him you shall heed' (18.15). He, this single one, will have withstood the glory of God to the uttermost and what he will communicate will be this glory, no longer as a glory seen by the senses, but in an interpretation of which the innermost principle is: God has loved you groundlessly, so you must love God wholly, be wholly faithful, wholly with God (tamim) (18.13). From Deuteronomy onwards, the true kernel of glory emerges from the kabod Yhwh: absolute love. And the single ones who stand their ground under this love are the ones who communicate it.

At this point the book is not afraid to take even the ultimate step. In the earlier portraits, Moses is punished because of a personal mistake, when he is refused entry to the promised land (Num 20.12); but here he becomes the one who suffers vicariously: 'Yahweh was angry with me also on your account, and said, "You also shall not go in there"' (1.37; 3.26; 4.21). The role of the mediator of the covenant, which Moses already has in Exodus, is thrown into sharper prominence: now he lies twice stretched out without nourishment for forty days and nights on the mountain before the face of God, in order to perform penance in substitution for the people (9.9f., 18f., 25). Earlier, he had asked God to delete him from the book of life, if this would bring about forgiveness for the people; but God has said, 'Whoever has sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book' (Ex 32.32f.).[18] But even if God wishes to understand Moses' intercession as meant in an 'exclusive' sense, it is understood on Moses' side in an increasingly 'inclusive' fashion;[19] he speaks of 'our guilt' (Ex 34.9), he stands alongside the people, alongside the sinners, in solidarity with them.

It is from the Deuteronomistic absolutisation of the covenant reality that there grows the figure of the mediator, the vicarious representative who prays and suffers, the figure that will characterise all the high points of the covenant history in ever new realisations.[20] If we except echoes of the general history of religions in the early period, where particular persons have a magical power with God and over God,[21] intercession lies initially in the sphere of competence of such individuals as are entrusted by God with a particular mission: Abraham, who is commanded by God to intercede for Abimelech so that he may not die (Gen 20.7) and who appeals to God for Sodom in a dialogue of reverent boldness, saying that perhaps a few righteous people can be found there;

---

[18] The other intercession at Ex 32.9–14 is a Deuteronomistic addition.

[19] Althaus, Grundriss der Dogmatik, II (1932), p. 128; idem, Die christliche Wahrheit, II (1952), pp. 255f.

[20] On intercession, cf. especially: Nils Johansson, Parakletoi, Vorstellungen von Fürsprechern für die Menschen vor Gott in der alttestamentlichen Religion, im Spätjudentum und Urchristentum, diss. Lund, 1940; Frank Hesse, Die Fürbitte im AT, diss. Erlangen, 1949; H. Thielicke, 'Grenzen der Fürbitte', in: Theologie der Anfechtung, 1949; H. W. Hertzberg, 'Sind die Propheten Fürbitter?', in: Tradition und Situation, Festschrift for A. Weiser (1963), pp. 63–74.

[21] Above all Ex 8–10 is surely to be classified in this category. P. A. H. de Boer, 'De voorbede in het Oude Testament' (in: Oudtest. Studiën III, 1943), interprets all intercession in the Old Testament only on the basis of this stratum, and thereby gets its particular reality wrong.

although he does not meet with success, he reveals the legitimacy for him (as bearer of the promise) in such an appeal. Alongside Abraham, who is given the name of prophet by God precisely in this context, alongside Moses[22] and Joshua (7.6–9), who bear responsibility for the people, there stand the 'men of God' of the early and middle periods of the kings, men who cannot be precisely separated from the 'prophets' and who are given the power of intercession thanks to their union with God (1 Sam 3.20; 7.5f.; 12.12f.; 1 Kings 13.6; 17.20; 18.42; 2 Kings 4.33; 6.17–20). The kings in their turn who live as God would have them live and who intercede for the people whom they shepherd, are bearers of a commission: David (2 Sam 24.17), Solomon (1 Kings 8), Hezekiah (2 Chron 30.18–19). Then we have many of the great prophets: Amos (7.2,5), and in the period after the Deuteronomist, Isaiah (2 Kings 19.2–7; 20.2), Jeremiah[23] and Ezekiel (9.8; 11.13), and standing all by himself, the 'Servant of Yahweh' in Second Isaiah (53.12c). After the exile, when prophecy has died out, it is the high priest who is invested with the office of representative of the covenant with the power and the right to make intercession.[24]

The offices and their titles change, but the place where the mediator and intercessor stands is always the same: it is the heart and point of intersection of the covenant. This can be seen in the case of Moses: he is no disinterested third party who mediates an alliance between God and the people: he has poured himself into the reality that is the 'covenant', and he embodies the covenant with God over against the people, and the covenant with the people over against God. The whole dialogue between God and man passes through Moses in such a way that he must not only continuously represent God's standpoint over against the people, but can equally continuously set out before God the standpoint of the people, where this is at all defensible. This takes place when he takes God at his word, i.e. at the word, the covenant, that has been given once and for all. He reminds God of the earthly and historical consequence of his union with the people. He represents the immanent God against the transcendent God. Yahweh, who has bound himself to Israel, is quite simply no longer free. What would the foes say, if they saw that the protector God had become weary of his alliance and had destroyed the chosen people in the wilderness (Num 14.16)? And what would become of the sworn promise to the fathers? Would not God contradict himself, if he began to build and did not finish (cf. Ex 34.11–14)? The mediator must defend what is divine against God: God's commitment and obligation against God's freedom, God's will to bestow grace against his punitive righteousness, ultimately God's 'weakness' against his strength. He does not represent things that God does not know, things that God would have to learn only from Moses: what men are like, and how one must deal with them. He merely 'reminds' God of the consequences of his covenant: here he can place the emphasis of his mediatory work on the side of the sinful people (Ex 34.9). And precisely becaue he can do this, God too can lay the weight of the sinful people upon him: this is the new mystery of the Servant of Yahweh. But if God does something like this—how deep is then his commitment to his covenant! How divine are the functions and qualities that he lays upon the shoulders of the man who embodies the covenant in his mediation! This is the reason why the only ones who stand in this place are those who are absolutely obedient to God: from the blind obedience of Abraham (Gen 22) to Moses the servant of God, to Elijah and to the Servant of Yahweh whose 'ear is opened every morning', who 'makes no resistance and does not withdraw' (Is 50.4–5): in this obedience, he hears God's word and receives at the same time the blows and the spittle of the people. An obedience that is open on both sides permits the covenant to be embodied substantially on earth. And the one who is 'wholly' with God, like Abraham (Gen 17.1), will also be initiated into God's plans (18.17) in order to be able also to understand how God rules in the world.

---

[22] Ex 32.11–14; 33.13; 34.9; Num 11.1; 14.13–20; 21.4f., 13; Deut 9.25–29. At the end of the Pentateuch, Moses receives the title of 'prophet' (Deut 18.15; 34.10); but he is already characterised as such at Num 11.24–30, indeed as more than a prophet at 12.6–8.

[23] Four times he is forbidden to intercede for the people: 7.16; 11.14; 14.11; 15.1. Cf. 15.11; 18.20; according to the narrative of Baruch: 37.3; 42.2. At 2 Macc 15.12–16, Jeremiah appears beside the high priest Onias as the great intercessor for the people with God.

[24] As early as Joel 2.17 we have a description of a liturgical act in which the priests carry out intercession. See too Zech 3.7. According to Jer 15.1 and Ps 99.6, the great intercessors are Moses and Samuel. 2 Esd 7.106–111 completes the list: Abraham, Moses, Joshua, Samuel, David, Solomon, Elijah, Hezechiah.—Here, we are considering the intercession of human beings; there is wide attestation in the late period of the intercession of angels (also at Job 33.23, although we are not convinced by Johansson's interpretation of Job 16.19–22 and 19.25–27 in this sense).

Deuteronomy states that 'Moses had to die vicariously for the sake of Israel's sin',[25] and 'therefore this portrait of the prophet converges on that of the suffering Servant of Yahweh in Deutero-Isaiah'.[26] By withdrawing from the immediacy of hearing God (already at Ex 20.19f.) and sending Moses on ahead, Israel, without fully realising what it was doing, was both helping to institute the office of prophetic mediation (Deut 5.27; 18.6) and unloading its guilt on to the mediator: it kills the prophets whose office it has instituted (Mt 23.34ff.). This structure of the covenant event is clearly seen in Deuteronomy. Without the mediation of Moses (5.5), the immediacy of the people to the glory of fire and word would not have occurred (5.24), and in this mediation God has a priori calculated and overcome the withdrawal of the people, in such a way that the mediator, who bears the sin of the people, must die in its place.

c. Reaching backwards and forwards

The Mosaic covenant, as the basis of the confederation of the twelve tribes, stands abruptly and unmediated in the midst of the history of the peoples of the world. Its self-understanding necessarily requires us to reach back into prehistory and primal history (provenance, Genesis) and to reach forwards into existence alongside other peoples and the world as a whole: what is the relationship taken to them by God's glory which has appeared? In both movements, a double movement must become clear: a centripetal movement—the lines of history converge on the God of Israel and on his covenant—and a centrifugal movement—the light of the God of Israel shines out into the peoples and into the world, and ultimately, Israel exists not for itself, but for the world. In both movements, the double relationship displays the inner compenetration of the world of creation and salvation history. The Book of Genesis says that he was at work and coming even before Moses; the covenant has preliminary stages: there were the Noachic covenant with creation and the covenant of promises with Abraham. The Psalms say that the God who shines forth from Zion is the God of the whole world, both of the history of the peoples and of all of nature. It is the prophets who bring the ultimate understanding for this paradox, the opening-up of the future.

---

[25] von Rad, Deut., p. 201.

[26] Ibid., p. 124.

Genesis is prehistory (from Abraham onwards) and primitive history (from Adam onwards). The prehistory is given an artistic and dialectic articulation by the way in which the three sources J, E and P are fitted into each other: the 'God of the fathers', with the plural name Elohim (E)[27] that brings the individual gods together, was always from the outset Yahweh (J), even if he revealed himself at that time as this one God under the name El Shaddai (P). This as yet fragmentary state of affairs, still in the process of coming into being, indicates on the one hand that shadows of twilight still lie over the glory of God, but on the other hand also that one could look backwards from Moses and declare with the same certainty: our God was already then in the process of coming, wholly personally, just as one day the apostles will declare, after the resurrection of Jesus, that he was already then the Son of the living God, under the veils of the flesh. The stupendous liberality of the Jahwist has not been ashamed to declare the 'mythical' anticipatory forms of the religion of Yahweh to be its wholly genuine roots in the soil of the world religions, thereby establishing even for that preliminary period open relationships of kinship between Israel and the peoples. In his study Der Gott der Väter, Albrecht Alt[28] has shown the existence of a type of numina which is not bound to the holy places at which it appears (like the Elim),[29] but to the person of a tribal lord (θεὸς πατρῷος) whose name the god continues to bear precisely in the case of (semi-) nomadic tribes for the members of the clan, for those in the following generations, and even for foreigners.[30] Not only does there exist in the being of such a numen 'a priori the possibility of free movement in space',[31] but its revelation to the tribal lord emphasised the personal element of the obligation which was entered upon: 'no subsequent experience of second and third persons was the equal in significance of this first encounter',[32] and thus the form of the union already offered an analogy to the Mosaic covenant from the perspective of religious sociology. The difficulty with Alt's thesis lies in the connection—for Alt a secondary connection which occurred during the possession of the land of the 'patriarchs' to the local El-numina, who do indeed 'appear only for a moment' in Genesis,[33] but whose local ἱεροὶ λόγοι are clearly superimposed on the original sagas of the nomadic period; however, enough has been preserved of the original character of the numina who are now bound to localities and sancturaries ('the God of Abraham', 'the fear of Isaac', 'the strong one of Jacob')[34] to make possible the later genealogical linkage, not only of the fathers themselves, but also of their protective deities, and to identify this one God of the fathers still later with the one God of the covenant of the amphictyony.[35] Such an inherent relatedness is discovered between the certainly extremely ancient scene of the making of the covenant with Abraham in Gen 15 and the Mosaic covenant that even originally polytheistic materials (like the theophany at Mamre, Gen 18) could be fused into the whole, and that it did not entail 'any μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος but merely an elevation of what had existed hitherto',[36] when 'the gods of the fathers' were understood as 'παιδαγωγοί leading to the greater God' and the promises of those gods (above all of the occupation of the land and a great progeny) were integrated into the universal scheme of promise and fulfilment in the Hexateuch as a whole, which now portrays the first occupation of the land as something provisional, while the long detour via Egypt is seen as providential for the coming into being of the people, which can then take definitive possession of the promised land.

---

[27] According to E, it is only before the eyes of Moses that this 'God of the fathers' accomplishes the synthesis with Yahweh (Ex 3.15).

---

[28] 1929, quoted from: Kleinschriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel, I (1953), pp. 1–78.

[29] El-Bethel (Gen 28.12f.), El-Olam (Gen 21.33), El-Elyon (Gen 14.18), El-Shaddai (Gen 17.1f., etc.).

[30] Alt adduces convincing parallels from a later period, loc. cit., pp. 29–45. Martin Buber's distinction between the 'leading gods' (melek) who accompany the people and the 'land gods' (baal) who are bound to a place continues the trend of interpretation begun by Alt.

[31] Alt, p. 22.

[32] Alt, p. 42.

[33] Alt, p. 19.

[34] There were certainly more of these, cf. 'the God of Nahor' (Gen 31.53).

While the stories about the fathers, to a great extent, narrate profane family episodes, which permit us to see above all the guidance of God's providence (the wooing of Rebekah, the marriages of Jacob, and the magnificent story of Joseph), individual scenes emerge of immediate encounter and relationship to God with a terrifying precipitousness, scenes that transpose the whole consuming unconditional character of the later covenant back into the archaic forms of the early period, in their final redaction. G. von Rad[37] has taught us to evaluate the deep strata of such texts which shimmer through, strata that reach back into myth, in their polarisation towards the final meeting. The relevant scenes concerning Abraham are composed with a view to emphasising absolute, 'blind obedience':[38] this is true already of the making of the covenant, which passes by in silence Abraham's anxious, doubting question about the realisation of the promise and sends in 'deep darkness' a 'dread' and a 'stupor' down upon him after the customary cutting in two of the sacrificial beasts 'after sundown', while the invisible partner passes as 'a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch' between the pieces of the animals (Gen 15.7–12, 17–18). This one-sided act by the one who gives the promise is continued in the miraculous rescuing of the ancestress, which is narrated three times,[39] in the delaying of the promise when man himself wishes to bring it about (the first story of Hagar, ch. 16), in the fertility of the barren woman (ch. 21), in the sacrifice of Isaac (ch. 22) which puts to the uttermost test the total commitment to God which is required (17.1), the sacrifice that once again seems to destroy the whole promise and its fulfilment which has been begun. Israel could have found no more grandiose way to portray its own self-understanding in its tribal ancestor, and this then allowed it to go on to interpret itself ever anew from the basis of this origin.

---

[35] Alt, pp. 58–59.

[36] Alt, p. 62.

[37] Das erste Buch Mose, ATD 1953. Thus, e.g., on the story of Peniel (Gen 32.23f.): 'Who will venture to say how the Yahwist and his readers came to terms with this trait (of the god who attacks by night)? Probably they held that not every individual detail of such sagas is able to be interpreted . . . The puzzling word . . . belongs to the category of broad and really vague statements that are so characteristic (of such sagas that are taken over)' (pp. 280–281). 'Material that has been taken over is employed, but it is not completely worked through and penetrated' (p. 283).

If Isaac is above all the one who was potentially sacrificed,[40] while the theophany to him appears colourless and formed in imitation of other stories (26.23f.), this only serves to make the two theophanies to Jacob, embedded as they are in wholly secular novelistic materials, all the more impressive: the appearance at Bethel (28.10f.) with the zikkurat ramp on which the 'angels' descend from heaven to earth—an image whose powerful echoes reach into the New Testament (Jn 1.51)—and the nocturnal struggle with God at the Jabbok (Gen 32.23f.), where despite all the mythical and demonic elements in the background, the intention is to give expression to an encounter with the living covenant God of Israel, a fortiori because here the patriarch has deserved to receive the honorary name Israel, the name of the covenant partner tout court. This time, it is not an experience of God in the dread in darkness, as in Gen 15, but a wrestling match in mortal

---

[38] von Rad, Ges. Stud., p. 91.

[39] Chs. 12, 20, 26.

[40] D. Lerch, 'Isaaks Opferung in der Auslegungsgeschichte', ThZ 5 (1949), pp. 321–338; idem, Isaaks Opferung christlich gedeutet (1950).

combat. When God and man depart from one another, each takes with him the permanent experience of the long, undecided struggle: Jacob's hip-joint remains wrenched out of place, but apparently he has 'got the upper hand' vis-à-vis the god (or the former nocturnal ghost, which becomes weak with the dawn), as is suggested by v. 27; he was 'strong against God' (v. 29). But although he received his name in this struggle, he was not able to loosen God's grip upon his own name: all that he received was the blessing. The final statement almost overtakes the event at Sinai: 'I have seen God face to face, and yet my life is preserved' (v. 30): the covenant is established and set in a night-long struggle between God and man, which becomes the primordial form of the 'face-to-face' encounter, with the outcome of mutual acknowledgment and weakening, and a blessing for the man. Naturally, this gruesome event (which is repeated once again, and in an even more puzzling manner, for Moses: Ex 4.24–26) does not call into question the absolute obedience of Abraham and of Moses.

The God of the fathers is to the highest degree a personal and living God. He 'sees' and he 'is seen' (Gen 16.13; 22.14). He is also seen when man does not see, when he permits Abraham to see the promise in the stars of heaven (E), but takes from him seeing, hearing and feeling when the covenant is made (J). And even if the theophanies, espeically in dreams, are colourful and impressive, the images remain functions of something more important, viz. of the words of the promise, and they are noted down by Israel for the sake of these words. Much that is typical and national is linked to the figure of the fathers and thus personalised, in order that it too may share in the personal leading of the covenant God. In the great finale of the story of Joseph, this God already appears almost as incarnate, so transparent is his loving guidance in Joseph's acts of concealing and disclosing, convincing and forgivng (Gen 45.5–8).

The prehistory is preceded by a primitive history. While the former displays the liberal tendency to show that all the surrounding peoples are originally related to Israel through the clan of Abraham (and thus are by no means originally Israel's foes), and indeed to set up brotherly relationships between Abraham, Nahor and Lot, between Isaac and Ishmael, and between Jacob and Esau (Edom) that bridge the boundaries between religions, the primitive history in its turn embeds Abraham (and Israel) in the context of the peoples of the whole world (chs. 10–11, P). The line from Adam to Abraham does not run unbroken, as if Israel were concerned egotistically to trace its provenance back to the first man; twice, it widens out into the universal dimension, in the covenant with Noah, which is made with the world as a whole, and in the universal list of the peoples.[41] But with its eye made keen by the history of the covenant, Israel has been able to distinguish as far back as the event of creation the free, personal God who is not dependent on any matter nor oppressed by any chaos, the God who has created man by admitting him to the intimacy of his own breath and who, despite man's failure, accompanies him even in punishment with forgivness and grace, even protecting the murderer; this is the God who catches up the righteous Enoch to himself and has saved Noah with his family in their passage through the universal judgment. Once again, one with whom a covenant is to be made is compelled to 'blind obedience':[42] he is to build a ship on dry land. After the flood (in which an ancient motif from saga is made to serve as a vehicle for theology), the strange covenant is made with the cosmos. In this covenant, while the decisive step is taken beyond judgment to the grace that outweighs it (9.9–17), account is still taken of the fact that the constitution of the world as a whole has been disordered since what happened in paradise (9.1–7): the covenant of peace, sealed in the sign of the rainbow, is established, and is at the same time the covenant of the shed blood of beasts and the covenant that requires vengeance for the blood of man that is shed—each of these is a regulation for punishment as well as a regulation for expiation. The sign of peace that is set up between earth and heaven 'brings to mind' the covenant not only to man, but also to God himself: God too is bound in the covenant. Like the covenant, the list of the peoples has a universal intention, even if its starting-point is a Palestinian model: the history of the world as a whole stands under the sign of salvation. When a new beginning of explicit salvation history is made with Abraham, the very first notes make the universal goal known. 'I will bless those who bless you . . . in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed' (12.3). Even the mighty confusion of hearts and then of languages when 'culture' strives titanically to conquer heaven can no longer call all this into question. Now the shadows of dispersal come down on the world of the peoples, while Israel's gathering begins; but Israel is preparing the light in which the scattered world is to receive its definitive mid-point (Is 60; Acts 2).

---

[41] von Rad, ThOT, I, p. 162f. 'Israel did not simply draw a straight line descending from a myth of primordial time to itself as existing within time. This direct linking with the myth is the essence of the religion of the polis . . . (but) Israel saw itself without illusions and quite unmythically in the midst of the world of the peoples . . . In terms of biblical theology, the insertion of the list of the peoples signifies the radical break with myth': von Rad, Genesis, pp. 120–121.

[42] Ibid., p. 98.

The form of the reaching backwards justifies the reaching forwards which is carried out above all in songs of praise, for in the prehistory and the primitive history, Israel appeared again and again as the exceptional form of something universal: the intention of the exclusiveness in the covenant was from the outset the inclusion of the whole world at its end. While it is true that the covenant with Noah is a stage en route to the covenant with Abraham and Moses, the latter cannot forget their foundations but must retain an openness in this direction. The lateral progeny of the line of the ancestors (Ishmael, Edom) are not left without their blessings, for all the peoples are to be blessed in Abraham, and thus those who stand in the shadow encounter those who are in the light again and again as blood-brothers, despite all enmity (Gen 33). And Abraham bows down before the king of (Jeru-)Salem, Melchisedek, priest of the Most High God, and is blessed by him: 'Blessed be Abraham by God Most High, who has made heaven and earth'; Abraham picks up this divine title in turn and only prefixes the name Yahweh to it (Gen 14.19, 22): Elyon can be understood in a relative sense (the highest of the gods) or in an absolute sense (the one who is the highest, beyond all compare).

There is no doubt that Jebus-Jerusalem, the city of the Jebusites which David conquered, was familiar in its cult with the 'highest god' or 'god of the gods' or 'heavenly Baal' or 'god-king' who was venerated everywhere in Babylon and Phoenicia, the god who claimed a universal lordship both as the one who shaped the world and as the one who judged it. When Yahweh's ark makes its entry into Jebus, Israel's God inherits the cultic titles of Canaan: the other gods are reduced at once to servants, to the court of the one God, and Yahweh is the true 'king of glory' (Ps 24.7–10) to whom the entire heaven cries out, 'Glory!' (Ps 29.9). He is creator, judge, lord over his court and over the world from his heavenly throne. 'In the characterisations and concepts that are linked to Yahweh in the Psalms, we see everywhere the struggle for the true reception and integration of the pre-Israelitic cultic traditions into the faith in Yahweh. Here it must be affirmed as clearly as possible that the "universalism" . . . is no late product of a process of religious development within the history of Israel, but is rather an element of the Canaanite world which already existed in the typos of the veneration of the "highest god"'.[43] There is no kind of 'struggle' about the understanding of the uniqueness of Yahweh, but only about the question of how he can be clothed in the correct, reverent manner with the foreign splendour which has been won as booty. When the ark is borne in procession in Jebus, the question can be raised again: 'Who is this king of glory?', and the answer is decisive: 'He, Yahweh Sabaoth, is the king of glory!' (Ps 24.10). How will be prove himself to be the right Elyon over against the other heavenly kings? Not merely by means of the attributes that God assigns to himself—Amon-Re too was all-seeing and all-present and therefore judge of the world, and Hadad the storm-god too was all-powerful—[43] H. J. Kraus, Psalmen, I, 2nd edn. 1961, pp. 199f. The relevant bibliography is also given in the important excursus on the cultic traditions of Jerusalem.

---

but exclusively by means of his own incomparability that he communicates in his covenant and in his covenantal instruction. Only the one who is caught up out of himself into the covenant and into the world—like the singer of Ps 119, the great song of praise of the world of grace—can bear witness to the uniqueness of Yahweh, and to the reason why he only is the king of glory.[44] And precisely this God who is recognised as unique by Israel is the creator, ruler and judge of the whole world. Thus the Psalms speak a dialectic language from several points of view.

Since Jerusalem is built on Jebus, Yahweh himself demonstrates his own reality and legitimacy by raising the claim of the earlier El Elyon. His reality and legitimacy are shown in the power of the word of Yahweh: 'Has he said, and will he not do it? Or has he spoken, and will he not fulfil it?' (Balaam: Num 23.19). 'I, Yahweh say it, and I do it'(Ezek 36.36; Ps 33.9), and since the word of my promise has been fulfilled hitherto, absolute trust can be placed in my power (Is 42.9; 48.3f.). Israel's thought moves from the word of history to the word of creation; from God's free power to act within history, it arrives at the inner understanding and the affirmation that the world was created through his free word. Thus in Ps 135: God is good and lovable and great, since he has chosen, and therefore he can do all that pleases him in heaven and on earth, in the sea and in the abysses (vv. 3–6). He has power over nature (v. 7), because he has demonstrated his power in history to save Israel (vv. 8–11) and has in the occupation of the land bestowed the fufilment of the word of the promise (v. 12). The gods are shown to be unspiritual nonentities (vv. 15–17); those who are devoted to them and trust them, fall accordingly into nothing (v. 18). The true God is praised by Israel and 'from Zion' (vv. 19–21). God shows himself to be the lord of nature, when he strikes Pharoah within history by means of the elements (vv. 7–9),[45] and when he continually employs the powers of nature for deeds of salvation in the whole period in which he leads Israel through the wilderness (Ps 77). Thus the great litany of thanksgiving in Ps 136 can list the 'great wonders' in such a way that the creation is set at the beginning (vv. 4–9); then come the wonders of history (vv. 10–24), and the Psalm closes with the vista of the universal goodness of the creator (v. 25). Again, in Ps 146 it is the gracious favours of the faithful God that include his power in creation (v. 6) as their presuppostion; and these gracious favours (vv. 7–9; Is 61.1 = Lk 4.18f.) are known only to Israel at present, so that only Israel is capable of truly understanding God's grace in the creation and is therefore right to demand the conversion of the peoples who are at any rate not deprived of the graces of nature (Acts 14.15–17).

---

[44] A. Deissler, Psalm 119 und seine Theologie, Münch. theol. Stud. I, 11 (1955).

[45] Above, in the section on the 'cosmic liturgy', pp. 74f.

Ps 104, the great Psalm of nature, shows that Israel is able, on the basis of its historical experience of God's grace, to interpret the entire cosmos in joy and admiration as God's 'splendid garment' (v. 1), and can invite God himself to rejoice in his works (v. 31). Kraus is correct to speak, in the case of the double Ps 19, which first praises the wordless, silent speech of nature and then the public speech of the historical word of God, of the 'disclosure of the code-word that deciphers'.[46] When the word of instruction is compared to the sun, what is at issue is the purity, genuineness, clarity and total transparency of the word (cf. Ps 12.7; 18.31; Prov 30.5). so that it is possible to entrust oneself fully to it in order to be oneself totally illuminated and purified (Ps 19.12–14) and in order to integrate into the transparent song of praise all the apparently hostile forces in nature—darkness, cold and dread (Ps 148.7–8; Dan 3.65–73). As Israel knows, these powers have been restrained from the outset by the creator (Ps 89.10–11; 65.8), and one can remind him of this so that he may hasten to Israel's help with his power (Ps 74.12–17). He can send his word twice: once to work in nature (Ps 147.15–18), and again as instruction for Israel (vv. 19–20). It is the total transparency of the creative word of instruction—and not the (Egyptian) comparison with the sun—that also determines the biblical understanding of the disclosure of all hearts before God (Ps 33.13–15, 44.22; 94.9–11), and of the impossibility of escaping from God's sight (Ps 139; 2 Kings 19.27; Amos 9.2–3; Jer 12.3; 23.23–24; Job 7.17–20; 11.8–9; 12.22; 23.8–9; 31.4; 34.22; Prov 15.11; Jonah; Dan 2.22), and of God's righteous judgment of all men (Ps 67.5; 76; 82.8; 95–98; 99.4).

---

[46] Psalmen, I, p. 160.

This means that God in himself (and from himself, i.e. from heaven) is revealed to the whole world; but for man, he is revealed in Israel and in the place of his cult, Zion. The temple and the ark are the special 'stool for his feet' (Ps 99.5; the general 'stool' is the earth: Is 66.1). This is the reason for the recurring phrase 'out of Zion': it is from the heart of Zion that instruction goes forth, that glory shines forth, that power proceeds and blessing streams out. It is true that here too, Zion inherits certain of the privileges of Jebus: as the seat of the 'highest God', it is the 'mountain of the gods' (as the 'mountain in the north', Is 14.13f.; Ps 48.3), the mid-point of the world, from which holy streams flow out (Ps 65.10), which cannot be conquered (Ps 87.5; 125.1f.) even when it is the object of battle (Ps 46.7), etc.[47] But this 'safe stronghold' was in fact then overthrown and reduced to ashes; and therefore this early theology of the 'glorious city of God', over which mythical shadows still lie, is replaced by a late, eschatological theology which implores that Zion be re-established, in order that it may be once and for all the light of the world and the sacrament of the presence of God among the peoples (Trito-Isaiah; Ps 102.17–18, 23). Even when Israel expresses the wish that God's glory may rise over all the world (Ps 57.6, 12; 72.18), it is always clear that this wish rises from the midst of Israel: 'I will give thanks to thee, O Lord, among the peoples; I will sing praise to thee among the nations!' (Ps 57.10; 68.33–36). God himself shines forth upon the world from Zion (Ps 50.1–2), and here too Zion has taken over an attribute of the earlier mountain of God, Seir (Horeb; Deut 33.2)—although this naturally does not prevent God from riding forth in judgment from heaven and earth against [47] Ibid., I, pp. 342–345. On the whole question: J. Schreiner, Sion-Jerusalem, Jahwes Königssitz. Theol. d. Hl. Stadt im AT (1963).

---

Zion, when Israel's worship becomes decadent and offensive (Ps 50); indeed, God can condemn the sacrifices offered to him by comparison with the purer sacrifices of the Gentiles (Mal 1.11).

When we speak, further on, about the exile, we shall have to say more about Israel's reaching forwards into the totality of history. Our aim here has been to understand how Israel could enter upon a mythical inheritance without in the least being unfaithful to itself,[48] and how the universalist tendency could be assumed into the exclusiveness of the covenant relationship in order to take on a wholly new form as a result of this. Israel alone knows God's plans of salvation (Ps 147.20), thanks to the special election which he has made in love (Deut 7.7–8): 'Wisdom has not been heard of in Canaan, nor seen in Teman . . . our God gave her to Jacob his servant and to Israel whom he loved. Afterward, she appeared upon earth and lived among men' (Bar 3.22, 37–38). This wisdom which Israel—and Israel alone—receives, is none other than He himself.

d. Integration of glorification

God's glory, integrated in the grace of the covenant, exists for Israel: 'His splendour is over Israel' (Ps 68.35). But Israel itself is integrated in its own answer, viz. thankfulness as glorification: 'My mouth is full of thy praise, of thy splendours all the day' (71.8). Israel's self-understanding, so difficult to attain, comes to rest in praise which is the affirmation, the profession of the historical facts which have their source in God.[49] The word 'I will' resounds through all the songs of praise: 'I will bless you all my life' (63.5), 'I will bless you all my days' (145.2), 'I will bless Yahweh all my life, will sing praises to my God while I have being' (146.2), 'I have chosen' (119.30). It is necessary to see clearly how all the facets of Israel's existence meet in this point, overlap and become identical. Just as the fullness of the God who is to be praised can be separated into its individual components—'immeasurable greatness, glory of the promise that is made, wonderful events, goodness, proven reliability, favour, mercy, patience and kindness, power and sovereignty, closeness, truth, holiness . . .'—only to be reunited in the one statement 'kingdom for ever' (Ps 145), so the fullness of human dispositions is integrated in the will to give glorification. This is called 'giving back to Yahweh his kabod' (Josh 7.19; 1 Sam 6.5).

---

[48] Israel's continuous unfaithfulness consists in projecting the living God back into mythology by attributing to him the characteristics of Moloch and Baal, whereas we have here the opposite process of a genuine demythologisation.

[49] H. Grimme, ZAW, 1940, pp. 234f. On the whole question: C. Westermann, Das Lob Gottes in den Psalmen, 3rd edn. 1963.

When Israel sees all wisdom as based in the fear of God (Prov 1.7; Sir 1.14), this means the affirmation of God as God. 'The fear of God is obedience, the constant acknowledgement of his greatness through carrying out his will'.[50] In this way, it is the opposite of all mysticism of absorption into the deity, because the act whereby man transcends himself to enter the covenant realm which God has opened up always presupposes and displays the difference between the eternal God and man who passes away. Man 'raises up his soul' (Ps 25.1–2; 86.4; 143.8) by yearning for God (119.20, 40), thirsting for him (63.2; 143.6), losing the ground under one's feet as one hangs on his words (Ps 119), pressing one's soul against God (63.9; 119.31), leaning against God's breast silently, weaned, in the spirit of childhood (131), looking fixedly at God as the servant looks to the hand of his lord (123.2), constantly admitting his need of grace (51.7; 130.3; 143.2), being satisfied with the imperishability of God's love (103.15f.) instead of stopping short at the realisation of his own perishability (37.2; 39; 90.5), and being ready to interpret the puzzling process whereby creatures come into being and pass away as the breathing in and out of the breath of God (104.29–30). If only God's word remains (33.11; 119.89; Is 40.7–8)![51]

The man who lives through the word and for the word will recall this to himself at every moment; this is how the precept runs (Deut 6.6–9), but it also corresponds to the yearning of his heart: he lives from the meditation on the mighty deeds of God (Ps 77: 105; 114; 135; 136), in a continuous act of 'remembering, repeating, reflecting' (143.5) on the basis of which we can 'bring it to the consideration' of others too (145.4–5), because God himself has founded the being of Israel on 'tradition' (78.5–7). As philosophy consists for Plato in the struggle against forgetfulness and in the recalling of what has been seen in the presence of God, so Israel's existence consists in overcoming the forgetfulness of the grace that has been experienced in history (Deut 32.7; Ps 78.11); God's word should continuously 'murmur' like a spring of water in the heart and mouth of the pious man (Ps 1.2; 19.15; 63.7; 77.13; 143.5).

---

[50] L. Koehler, ThAt, 1936, p. 28.

[51] Mt 24.35; 1 Pet 1.24–25; Jn 1.1f.

Man stands transparent before God at the point at which he says 'yes' and accepts the instruction unconditionally; the object of his wish and his plea is to be freed of all disturbance of the heart (even that of which he is not conscious) by God, in order to stand before him in absolute clearness as a mirror (17.3; 26.2–3; 139.23); indeed, he goes so far as to demand the painful (66.10) thorough examination of his heart, so that he can then 'walk in thy truth'. The seemingly offensive protestation of one's own purity denotes the will to be transparent before God. The plea for 'purification' and 'spotlessness'(119.80) is one with the plea for humility and obedience (19.12–14), for the strange alienation, expropriation and poverty (73.25; 119.19a, 54b) that are the presupposition for the total mutual transparency between God and man that is aimed at, the transparency that is described in the second part of Ps 19. Here there is the realisation of that intimacy and familiarity in the mystery between God and man that is the life of the covenant: to dwell beside God, hidden in the mystery of his tent (27.4–5), to take refuge in his face (31.21), and also to be received into the very heart of the word (119.11, 88, 131) which in itself is joy and delight (119.14, 16, 24, 47, etc.) and thereby bears its reward in itself (119.33, 47, 112, 162); one opens one's mouth wide and sucks in greedily (119.131), one promises to preserve it faithfully (145), not to forget it (119.16, 61, 93, 141, 153, 176), to accompany God to the end of the road (119.81–82, 123) and to be undivided in oneself (119.113).

For it is only in this way that it is possible to attain the mutuality that is demanded by the word of God. 'If there had been evil in my heart, the Lord would not have listened to me' (66.18f.). 'I seek Yahweh, he answers me' (34.5), 'look to him and be radiant' (34.6). This is a dialogue of mutual blessing: man sends God's blessing back to him (65.5; 113.2; 115.12f., 18; 134).[52] The two acrostic Psalms 111 and 112, which are doubtless placed intentionally alongside each other, reflect upon each other the archetypical disposition of God and the disposition of man which copies this and thus illuminate in the best way to what a degree Israel wanted to be pure answer and pure light reflecting back light, and this even (and precisely) when it sends back God's own word to him in prayer like a reproach: the deed of promise, which the word contained, has not yet been put into practice (Ps 60.9–19; 89)! Where man endeavours not to forget, there is no room in God for forgetting. It is impossible that his love or his word should be exhausted (77.9–10). Thanks to the covenant, Israel is completely convinced that God's grace is superior to his wrath; the latter lasts only a moment, but grace lasts for ever (30.6; Is 54.7–8).[53] For otherwise, the covenant would be impossible, since it is built by God on the foundation of grace, and by man on the foundation of hope, trust and love.

By giving back the word to God in the unconditional act of praise, Israel is perfect, i.e. in the state in which God requires it to be in order to make out of the word of answer a word of God himsef. Israel's answer to God is not only an inspired word of sacred scripture: it is a word of revelation. God's revelation contains not only the statement about himself, but also the divinely-constructed dialogue between the partners of the covenant. This dialogue is perfect where man accepts that it be determined by the place of fidelity to the covenant, of fear of God, of obedience to God. Since this dialogue is entirely shaped by God's grace, it is formally a trinitarian revelation, even before the Trinity is materially revealed in the new covenant. Naturally, Israel intends that this giving back of the word to God should not exclude, but rather include the obedience of its own existence, as is attested, e.g., continually by Ps 119: God's instruction is to be the 'path' that is 'maintained' and 'kept to', the word is to be the 'lamp for the steps and light for the path', etc. The protestations of faith, of confidence, of hope, that overflow from the 'exultant lips' (63.6; 71.23), are not at all meant as mere words. And yet all achieves its measure of satiation in the act of confessio, in its double, Augustinian sense: profession of the grace of God and, included in this, profession of one's own sin, powerlessness, need of grace. God has kept his word perfectly (Ps 105), and Israel has continually broken it (Ps 106): but in the confession of sin, the broken word becomes whole again, because it is changed into the praise of grace. Israel's true 'originality' lies in the fact that it is able to transform everything into praise, to invite everyone to join in its song of glorification, and even to draw them into this whether they wish to take part or not. It has employed its best powers in this endeavour: thus the 'incarnation of the word' as holy scripture is Israel's true fruit. Israel's blood sticks to the pages of the Bible. The correctness (justesse) of its praise cannot be formally surpassed by the New Testament, and this is why the Twelve of the old covenant stand before God's throne with the same right as the Twelve of the new covenant who are beside him (Rev 4.4). Israel's apostolate lies in confessio; the individual has known in an elemental manner that he must give thanks for God's grace as a witness before the 'community', in public: 'I will make thy name known to my brethren, praise thee in the great assembly' (Ps 22.23; 26.12; 35.18; 40.10; 51.17; 52.11; 66.16, etc.).[54] This is a matter of 'making public' the praise of God, of its publication (64.10; 71.14f.; 75.2; 92.3, 6). No matter what the spiritual locus from which the confession proceeds—whether from a feast celebrating a king's victory or a marriage, from a great liturgical celebration in the temple or 'out of the depths' (Ps 69; Jon 2.3–11; Ps 130; Lamentations), or as 'the gift of praise in the night' (Job 35.10)—and no matter what the object of the confession is—whether the absolute, cosmic glory of Yahweh as an eternal fact (Ps 93; 96–100) or as an event that is present at each moment (Ps 47),[55] or the grateful praise for unique victories of God (the song at the Sea of Reeds, the song of Deborah), or a king or a community or an individual gives thanks—always, the world as a whole is laid bare in principle before God (Ps 104), the earth and precisely the Gentile peoples too are summoned to praise or included in the praise as something taken for granted (66.1, 4, 8; 67.4–6; 96.1, 3). Here, in giving back the word, Israel best understands its universal mission to give back to God, in the name of the world, God's word which goes forth to the world as a whole. It is not for nothing that so many psalms and hymns speak of Yahweh's theophanies:[56] in a linguistic form which is laid down for the purpose of the cult and yet is continually varied by the poets, what is spoken of here is the witness to God's manifestation in the cosmos, a manifestation which does not limit itself to the non-material sphere, but in sovereign fashion takes hold of the bodiliness which is perceptible to the senses. This pictorial language is employed in a free, almost playful way: the freedom which Israel possesses thanks to its knowledge of God's disposition and concerns gives it the right to use even such metaphors as these.

---

[52] F. Horst, 'Segen und Segenshandlungen in der Bibel', Ev. Th. 1–2 (1947), pp. 23–37.

[53] Ex 34.6f.; Num 14.18; Ezra 3.11; Neh 9.17; 1 Chron 16.34; Ps 86.15; 103.8–10; 106.1; 107.1; 136.1; 145.8; Is 57.16; Jer 3.12; 33.11; Joel 2.13; Jon 4.2.

---

[54] The wisdom literature too is full of this need: cf. Sir 39.12f. It can express itself as an irresistible compulsion (Job 32.6f.) or as the involuntary streaming forth of 'fragrances' (Sir 24), since wisdom (even the wisdom communicated to man) is 'a wholly pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty' (Wis 7.25).—Proclamation to sinners is also reparation for sin: Ps 51.15.

---

[55] As the taking into possession of something that (in Israel's understanding of God) was possessed from the outset: if it is the case that elements of a Canaanite or Babylonian-Ugaritic inthronisation feast were taken over in Jerusalem (for example, in connection with a procession with the ark, which was brought back to its place on high), then this was done only in order to express the wholly unmythical fact that God is always king from the outset. H. J. Kraus, Psalmen, I, excurusus on the cultic traditions of Jerusalem, pp. 197f.; 'Was a "feast of Yahweh's inthronisation" celebrated in Jerusalem?', pp. 201f.

[56] See above on 'cosmic liturgy', pp. 74f.

G. von Rad judges correctly, therefore, when he discusses the aesthetic of the Old Testament in speaking of Israel's praise. 'The artistic peculiarity of Israel's poems undoubtedly stands in a very close relationship to her faith, from which in the last analysis it received its stamp, though it is hardly possible any longer to ascertain the relationship scientifically, for it is faith which creates for itself the form and the style. Israel's most intensive encounter with beauty was in the religious sphere, in the contemplation of Yahweh's revelation and action, and because of this concentration of the experience of beauty upon the credenda, Israel occupies a special place in the history of aesthetics.' 'When Israel contemplates the created world (Ps 104), it considers God's creative working 'with every evidence of a joyful emotion', with a sublime 'delectari'. 'In this creation, all is splendid, splendid even without purpose.' These poetic compositions overflow with an inebriation with beauty that had reached the ultimate limits. But it is not the real things described in the poems that set the poet into such an ecstasy, but the fact that at the same time their relation to God becomes visible. Therefore for man too, to sing praises is 'fair' ('pleasing', 'comely', Ps. 92.2; 147.1)—it means aesthetic satisifaction for him when he can offer up to God in praise the splendour which God granted to the world and man. This means that, for Israel, the beautiful can never be separated from the covenant, but remains 'something increasingly bestowed by God on the world' and thus 'a datum of faith', and the enjoyment of this beauty of God is truly present as early as the hymns and is most certainly present in the utterances of the prophets as something anticipated, that is, it is orientated towards an eschatological fulfilment: it is perception in faith and faith perceived. It is a contemplation of world and history with the eye of God. Finally, the beautiful in Israel remains conditioned by the manner in which God bestows himself; it is characteristic that Israel accompanied the condescension of Yahweh, 'which went even to the point of a divine Kenosis, with statements about beauty':[57] if Zion is 'perfectly beautiful' (Ps 50.2)[58] and 'the joy of all the world' (Ps 48.3), and if the king is termed 'the most beautiful of the children of men' (45.3), then Israel could not approve of 'setting' such statements 'in an absolute contrast to the other, the Servant of God who has no form of beauty (Is.53.2), for with the latter as well there is a splendour (otherwise he would not be pictured in poetic prose), only it is much more hidden. This bold accompaniment of the movement of the hidden God, in which Israel was still able to perceive splendour even in the deepest kenosis of God's action, is certainly the most noteworthy characteristic in the Old Testament's utterances about beauty.'[59]

---

[57] See the following section on 'the staircase of obedience.'

Israel is happy when it sings. By giving back his glory to God, it fulfils itself as God's image, and also understands why it is not permitted to make for itself any carved image of God. In the exchange of the divine word, the archetype and the copy must stand uncovered in each other's presence. Only so is the space made ready in which God's Word can become flesh.

---

[58] The LXX transposes what is said about beauty of God himself: 'Εκ Σιων ἡ εὐπρέπεια τῆς ὡραιότητος αὐτοῦ. At Ps 96 (95). 6 we have the ἐξομολόγησις καὶ ὡραιότης ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ (hod and hadar before his face) understood as 'kingly glory', as the 'aura that surrounds the God-king' (Kraus, Psalmen, ad loc.). It is only the next hemistich that goes on to praise the beauty of the temple. Thus, beauty is understood here as the irradiation of the living God into the world, something that Wis 7.26 will call his 'emanation', 'mirror', 'image'. Ps 149.5 (cf. vv. 11–12) can pile up the words in the sense of Ex 33.18–19 and speak of the 'splendour of the kabod of the honour of God, of his mighty deeds and of his kingdom'.

[59] All quotations here (without marks of elision) from von Rad, ThOT, I, pp. 364–367.

II. THE STAIRWAY OF OBEDIENCE

A. THE BROKEN COVENANT

1. SIN AND MALEDICTION

Everything that has been said up to this point has—let us repeat it—an abstract validity, because it is seen in isolation from history. It is only history, which convicts man as a sinner and confronts God with the fact of the broken covenant, that permits us to see the concrete reality of God's glory. We shall not portray all the details of Israel's long history of infidelity to the covenant; in keeping with our theme, all that needs to be illustrated is the way in which God's glory responds to sin. In the perspective of the 'covenant', sin appears essentially and formally as infidelity, whatever the precise contents of the trespass may be.

This means, first of all, that for Israel, the central concept of evil—whatever its peripheral filling and supplement may look like—is derived from its fundamental experience of God and concept of God. Indeed, the uniqueness of Israel's concept of evil is nothing other than the negative mirror-image of its concept of God, and thereby the counter-evidence of the uniqueness of this concept of God. Although the reality of evil comes into action in the field of interpersonal ethical conduct, its deepest roots are not there, but lie in the field of conduct towards the covenant God: it is the central failure of Israel to give the only acceptable answer to the covenant which was offered, i.e. Israel's infidelity. It is true, as we have seen, that there exist analogies between a berith between men, with the appropriate sanctions, and the berith with Yahweh, which likewise has its severe sanctions; but Israel is aware, and becomes more and more strongly aware, that its relationship to God is isolated and exceptional, and that the claim made on Israel by this relationship is of an incomparable quality. On the other hand, there is no possibility of seeing evil as rooted anywhere in the divine sphere: neither in Yahweh himself, since he is all-holy, nor in any divine powers hostile to him, for no such powers exist, nor, finally, in a demonic sphere, for classical Israel knows of no devil, and the concept of an accusing angel (Satan) plays an unimportant role. Israel is alone with its God and has sufficiency of all things in its God; evil arises precisely at the point where this God seems insufficient to Israel, which therefore turns away from him to look for other gods. Evil is this very act of turning away.

This understanding of evil is as unique as the divine covenant itself. It is a fully theological understanding that transcends every 'metaphysical' understanding of evil, whether mythical or (in later periods) philosophical. When biblical theology later takes up the Greek concept of the μὴ ὄν and στέρησις in order to come closer conceptually to the essence of evil, this is not an error on the level of metaphysical truth, but it does not reach the distinctive essence of theological guilt, which consists in the incomprehensible refusal of an answer of love to the incomprehensible offer of eternal love.

The few decisive vistas which are opened up in the Old Testament by the theme of guilt are very conciously governed by the concepts of infidelity to the covenant.

Thus, the story of the golden calf is pitilessly set by the Yahwist right in the middle of the event of the making of the covenant: the all too near God with his terrible demands is replaced with the image and likeness of worldly power and fertility, to which one gladly 'sacrifices', and before which one can calmly 'eat and drink' and then 'play' (Ex 32.6). God is the one who is immediately affected by this: he draws Moses' attention to what is happening, his anger flames forth and he wishes to destroy the people (32.10). Moses, the mediator, must stand on both sides: he must let himself be kindled by the flame of God's anger at the people and incarnate God's reaction in the gesture of breaking the tablets (32.19); but in the same kindling of anger, as the one who embodies the anger, he must 'turn back to God' (v. 31), confess the sin and offer himself for a self-immolation in which anger and sin would become one: 'But now, if thou wilt forgive their sin—and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written' (v. 32).

Here, sin is an open 'no' in the face of the God who is in the precise act of disclosing himself to make a covenant, a 'no' that is itself built into the making of the covenant. This is how the Yahwist interprets historical man as a whole, when he looks back: he begins from this point. Adam, placed in the state of original grace, at once renounces obedience, in order to create for himself a relationship to God after his own liking in 'eating and drinking and playing', outside the grace and the space given him by God. As the 'no' to God (between the first and second acts of making the covenant) enters constitutively for Israel into the history of the covenant in such a way that its 'original sin'—in the Deuteronomist's interpretation of history—will be idolatry, so does the 'no' of the first human pair enter, in the Yahwist's view, constitutively into the structure of historical human nature.[1] This is seen by the malediction which attaches to all existence after paradise (Gen 3.14–24) and also by the clear Yahwist statement about the corruption of the human heart (6.5) before and after the flood (Gen 8.21). But once more, the 'no' of the first human pair—in actu primo of the relationship of grace which God had established—strikes the as yet unveiled, unalienated face of the God of grace; it is infidelity and ingratitude that is not excused by the subsequent lack of understanding by alienated man.

The third vista is opened up by the Deuteronomist historiography, which in its own way sets the entire history of Israel under the heading of the chief commandment and thus evaluates the people only in terms of its turning towards or away from the living and only God, measuring how and to what extent the 'existential' factor of the 'golden calf' has the effect of something 'constitutive' throughout the history. It is true that in this view of history, in keeping with Ex 32, Israel's original sin is read off almost exclusively from its cultic conduct, while the prophets then indicate that the chief commandment has been transgressed also, and decisively, by pointing to the transgression of the commandments of the second table; and it is true that this historiography excessively simplifies and makes too straightforward the historical state of affairs at each point: when Israel turns away from God afresh, it comes under the malediction, but when it turns back to God, the benediction comes into effect. Such a way of looking at things can shed light—on the basis of the catastrophe that happened to Jerusalem—only on some partial aspects of the history which actually occurred. However, the essential point is that here too the entire history is interpreted under the single heading of fidelity/infidelity.

---

[1] The constitutive significance of the texts is given insufficient prominence when Herbert Haag discusses the biblical foundations of 'original sin': Biblische Schöpfungslehre und kirchliche Erbsündenlehre (Stuttg. Bibelstudien 10), 1966, pp. 46f.

In fact, the making of the covenant was subject to the sanction of mighty and utterly unforeseeable maledictions which were added to and intensified as time went on (Lev 26.14–16; Deut 28.15–68). While such curses were usual in contracts in the ancient Orient, here (where God himself is partner) the seriousness and significance of the curses naturally surpass immeasurably the juridical schemas. The promises of benediction are formulated much more briefly and vividly than the maledictions, since the grace of the covenant is, as such, the benediction; the occupation of the promised land belongs to the clauses of the covenant. The good conferred by the covenant, that one is allowed to dwell with God, is so great that only the most destructive maledictions can indicate this—negatively. And whoever is taken up into God's love and fidelity through his election can never again become what he was earlier, if he loses God's grace through his infidelity. He burns in the fire of love which he has rejected and offended; like Cain, he will be one preserved and protected by God himself for this existence in flight from God or (what amounts to the same thing) for an existence pursued by the God from whom he cannot escape.

Existence in flight and in catastrophe, since the glory of God has changed to blazing wrath, is one of the fundamental themes of the old covenant. The great lists of maledictions in Leviticus and Deuteronomy are already in part the verbal expression of the experience of such catastrophes; the books of the prophets are full of the descriptions of these. Round about Israel too there are more and more descents into hell and 'pursuits into the darkness' (Nahum 1.8): from the flood to the destruction of Sodom in the fire of God, to the destruction of Samaria (Hosea, Amos, Is 9.7–10.4), Tyre (Ezek 26–28; Is 23), Egypt (Is 19, Jer 46; Ezek 29–32), Niniveh (Nahum 2–3), and Babylon (Is 13; 21.1–10; 47.1–15; Jer 50–51), to the final ruin of Babylon and the concluding lamentation in Rev 17–18. But in the midpoint stands the rejection which is the necessary reverse side of the privileged election: the rejection of Israel and of its holy mountain, Zion. God's glory has withdrawn; Zion stands an abandoned wilderness, a dwelling place for the jackals (Is 34.13f.; Lam 4.1; 5.18). 'Behold, your house will be left forsaken' (Jer 12.7f.; Matt 23.38). The Israel of the millennia represents the side of God's salvific activity in which he rejects; this is the inexorable inner consequence and logic of the grace which had entered into history.[2] [2] On this, see above all Karl Barth's doctrine of election: Church Dogmatics II/2 (1942), pp. 1–506, especially: 'Israel and the Church', pp. 195ff., 'The Determination of the Rejected', pp. 449ff.

---

2. SHEOL AND GOD'S MOBILITY

But what insoluble questions are posed by these statements, what contradictions that are not to be smoothed over by men in any way! Did not God make his covenant of peace with creation after the flood? Whence then do these flames of fire come that destroy cities and kingdoms and, above all, the holy city of God? There opens up an abyss of hostility to God in man's 'no': how will God's glory respond to this? Whoever falls out of the sphere of the covenant, which is the sphere of divine life, falls into the grasp of the sphere of death: is God's glory there—perhaps in the form of his wrath? Or is God absent from there? But if there exists a place where God is absent, does not that mean that he is subject to limitation? The language of the Bible must become dialectical at this point.

The mythical images of a 'creation battle' with the powers of chaos had at any rate expressed God's victory in which he disposed of all hostile powers and kingdoms. Leviathan, Behemoth, Rahab, Tiamat-Tehon: all are subdued.[1] As we have seen,[2] traits of the miracle of the Red Sea are present in many descriptions of this creation event: Yahweh's power and his 'rebuke' dries up the sea (Nahum 1.4; Is 50.2; Ps 18.16; 106.9), the fire of his anger burns down to the depths of Sheol (Deut 32.22). Thus Sheol too lies naked before God (Job 26.6; Prov 15.11; Ps 139.8, 12), and its darkness is light before God. Yahweh's glory overwhelms all the glories of the abyss:

> Yahweh on high is glorious > above the glory of the surgings of the sea (Ps 93.4)

But is he glorious even in the abyss itself?

Sheol, as the realm of those who have died in the body, is first of all the boundary for life in the dimension of time, but at the same time also the boundary for the relationship to God, which is available only to those who live in time: 'in death there is no remembrance of thee; in Sheol, who can give thee praise?' (Ps 6.6).[3] This is a central statement which is not shaken by question-marks on the margins. But Sheol lets its kingdom cast shadows over into life: the one who is sick, opposed by foes and persecuted, the prisoner, man in every kind of poverty, misery, shame and oppression is always 'on the edge of the pit', 'at the gates of death', and 'the great waters' threaten to swallow him up: here Babylon and Israel have the same understanding.[4] When those in such distress cry to the Lord 'out of the depths', he can still save them; in their lamentation they say only that they are 'close to Sheol', and it is only when they look back and give thanks that they declare that they have truly been saved out of Sheol (Ps 30.4; 86.13; Sir 51.2, 5).[5] Sinners too and wicked men are in the shadow of Sheol: they walk in the darkness (Prov 4.19) and their path goes towards the realm of the dead,[6] but they do not beseech God to save them. They themselves—as 'fools'—strive to leave the realm of life and of standing in the gaze and the remembrance of God (cf. Ps 88.6), they skid away, fall into emptiness, are like a dream (Ps 73.18f.). In a hidden way, they already share in the powerlessness and inessentiality of existence in the realm of the dead.

---

[1] Texts in: H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos (1895), pp. 29–111. On the role of the sea in the Bible: A. J. Wensinck, The Ocean in the Literature of the Western Semites (1918); O. Kaiser, Die mythische Bedeutung des Meeres in Ägypten, Ugarit und Israel (Beih. ZAW 78), 1959.

[2] See above, pp. 77f.

The songs which celebrate the fall into hell of the Titanic great powers and emperors tell of their arrival in the kingdom of Sheol. They are finished for ever (Is 14; Ezek 32). It is different with God's curses and punitive judgments on Israel: the faithless people which now is rejected never sinks into the cold, clayey depths of Sheol without light: rather, it exists in the fire of the curse; it can indeed apply to itself again and again the assertion that 'Yahweh kills and gives life, he brings down to Sheol and brings up again' (1 Sam 2.6; Deut 32.39;

---

[3] Cf. Ps 30.10; 88.11–13; 115.17; Is 38.18; Bar 2.17; Sir 17.27.

[4] Christoph Barth, Die Errettung vom Tode in den individuellen Klage- und Dankliedern des AT (1947), pp. 93–118.

[5] Ibid. p. 111.

[6] Prov 2.18f.; 5.5; 7.27; 11.19; 12.28; 21.16.

Tob 13.2; Wis 16.13), but all this expresses is the absolute power of God over life and death. God could indeed save sinful Israel; he has the power to do this. But does he will to do so? Sin—interpreted as conscious infidelity—must in its intensification necessarily reach the point where the limit of the bearable is attained, where the covenant, which was made with a view to mutual fidelity, must count as broken and therefore as dissolved. It is true that the mutual relationship was based on a prior one-sided election made by God in grace and love: but can one play off this prior act against the mutual relationship of the covenant? Can the covenant, which must be dissolved, nevertheless continue to exist because of grace? And how then is a covenant to continue to exist beyond the boundaries of the realm of life into the realm of death? If the godless 'make a covenant with the nether world' (Is 28.15; Wis 1.16), will God wish to enter into something like that? Would not his entire glory wipe itself out, if he were to enter into a relationship with that which is opposed to himself?

This is a knot of mutually-entangling questions. As soon as an element of what is definitive and exclusive is caught sight of, a suspicion arises somewhere that this element in its turn can be surpassed by something else.

It is clear for Israel that God does not need to struggle against the realm of death, any more than he needs to exert himself in the chaos at creation in order to bring it into order through his struggle. And yet: can it suffice that Yahweh is enthroned 'gloriously on high', indisputably superior to all the regions of death and of reprobation? Must not God also subdue the chaos from within and from below, in some kind of analogy to the Sumerian and Babylonian concept of the descent of Innana or Ishtar into the underworld[7]—but now stripped of the mythology? Does not God owe it to himself 'to glorify' his glory even there (Ezek 39.21) and 'to sanctify' his holiness even there (Ezek 28.22, 25) where all glory has been extinguished since all is empty unholiness? Where man has utterly failed, the history of the covenant of God becomes a history of God with himself. There was absolutely no way to foresee the manner in which this history ultimately turned out. God wills to construct for himself a stairway in the men whom he has chosen, a stairway that is to lead him down into the god-less darkness. A stairway constructed of obedience.

---

[7] AOT, 2nd edn., pp. 206–210. A Falkenstein, 'Innanas Gang zur Unterwelt', Arch. f. Orientforschung, 1943–1944, pp. 113f.; S. N. Kramer, 'Innana's Descent to the Nether World', Journ. Cun. Stud. 4 (1950), pp. 220f.; 5 (1951), pp. 1f.

Right from the outset the God of the old covenant possesses a remarkable mobility, based not in imperfect anthropomorphous concepts of him, but in his inconceivable inner freedom, in virtue of which he can do all that he wills. We have seen to what extent he was from the beginning a God who 'goes with' men: it is precisely his 'glory' that wanders with his people through the wilderness; God leads the war in the wilderness for those who belong to him: indeed, he himself is this path. At the start in paradise, he was a God who came and went (Gen 3.8), and later he was a descending God (Gen 11.5, 7) who went in the opposite direction to man who strove to ascend into heaven. He shows himself ascending and descending in his angels to Jacob, and promises once again that he will go with him (Gen 28). To this outer mobility there corresponds an inner mobility which can already be seen in the fact that he freely and personally commits himself at specific moments of history. He makes decisions, but he can also 'repent' (Gen 6.6; 1 Sam 15.11, 35; Amos 7.3, 6); he proclaims, but he can be persuaded to change his mind (Judg 2.18; Joel 2.14; Jon 3.9). We see into his troubled heart (Gen 5.6), we share in his taking counsel of himself (Gen 18.17–19); he is tired of saving his people, and yet in the end he cannot endure their situation any longer (Judg 10.16). Indeed, not only does he 'lead them down to the realm of the dead', but he accompanies man there, for he says to Jacob, when he appears to him by night, 'Do not be afraid to go down to Egypt' (where things will go so terribly for the people for hundreds of years), 'for I will there make of you a great nation. I will go down with you to Egypt, and I will also bring you up again' (Gen 46.3–4). A similar promise is made even to the sufferers in the Psalms (Ps 91.15; cf. Is 43.2). God brings about such 'utterly strange things' in his freedom (Is 28.21) that he himself is astonished at this (Jer 31.20), although he owes himself—as God—precisely these incomprehensible things (Hos 11.8–9). Perhaps these are only the consequences of his mishpat, since he cannot do anything else than take up the cause of the poor and of those who have no rights, or because his weariness at the sin of the world brings him into an ever deeper solidarity with the weary. Perhaps it is because he is treated so shamefully in his covenant that he loves from the very beginning to be with those who are weakened and treated shamefully: with the men who cannot have children and with the barren women (Gen 18.10f.; Judg 13.2f.; 1 Sam 1; Lk 1.7), with the exiled son of a harlot, Jephthah (Judg 11.1), with the one who is 'poorest' and 'least', Gideon (Judg 6.15), with the man who is unable to speak, Moses (Ex 4.10); with the lad from the smallest family of Benjamin (1 Sam 9.21), who is the object of scorn (10.27), Saul, and with the least significant of the sons of Jesse, David (1 Sam 16.11).

This solidarity with the lowly occasionally poses insoluble puzzles. It is God himself who 'humbles' Israel, in order to put it to the test (Deut 8.2–16), and he will humble Job too in this way to the uttermost and make him the 'mockery' of all and the butt of their scorn (Job 30). Thus a man can become a puzzle for many, for the sake of God (Ps 71.7); the solidarity can be reserved: 'for thy sake I suffer scorn, and insults cover my face . . . the insults of those who insult thee falls on me' (Ps 69.8, 10). The knot of the covenant history is tied here: it will be untied only in the new covenant.

B. THE OBEDIENCE OF THE PROPHETS

1. ABRAHAM, MOSES, SAUL

The image of the great founders, Abraham and Moses, must be accepted in the way that Israel's self-understanding ultimately formed it for itself and for the world. The essential point of this image is not that they gave commands, but that they obeyed. Whereas the great kings of Egypt and Mesopotamia were caught up in a charismatic dialogue with their gods, so that the divine word of command resounded through the sacral earthly institutions and their regulations and was perceived to be such, the glory of the living God of Sinai and (in his light) even of the God of the fathers breaks through this magical continuum and replaces it with the infinite difference between God and creature, Lord and servant. To know God means to fear God, and this means to obey.[1] Since everything depends on this first principle, it must be put to the test, to see if it holds when things become serious. So Adam is tested with the apple, Noah is tested with the command to build the ark, and the ancestor of the people, Abraham, is tested most severely, to see whether he can sacrifice not only his 'son, the only one, the beloved' (Gen 22.2), but also the promise which in him has come within reach, to the God who disposes over all things in invisible freedom. Since every last trace of magic has been expelled from this deed (for Abraham has no designs upon God and does not wish to get his own way with him in anything) to make way for the pure blind obedience, the transparent beginning of the history of revelation is posited here. Man serves God by making his will the servant vessel for the absolute will.

In order to bring the 'unruly people' later to bow under this will, a leader like Moses is necessary, one who initially himself seems to be a pure exponent of this unruliness before God as he issues his demands to God and who ultimately must be routed in the harsh disputation by the God whom he has angered (Ex 3–4). While Abraham's obedience is a purely abstract function of the covenant of grace, untouched by the sinful condition of humanity, the covenant which God will enter upon through Moses is deeply coloured by the concrete state of sin. The very event in which Moses is called involves the crushing of a revolt, and the outcome of the argument is the dualism (which was not foreseen at the outset) of Moses and Aaron as 'hearer' and 'speaker' (Ex 4.16; 7.1), 'prophet' and 'priest'. Moses will be an incomparably faithful servant over the house of God (Num 12.7), to whom it never occurs to play God on earth, and who will receive a punishment, imposed by his Lord for an error of bad temper, that looks like divine ingratitude: he is not allowed to enter the land of grace. If Moses stands in solidarity with the people in what is bad, he also stands in solidarity with it in what is good: the transformation of his picture in Deuteronomy—from one who is punished to one who is stricken vicariously—is consistent.

---

[1] Gen 22.12; Deut 10.12.

The tragedy of the first king, Saul, must be interpreted (no matter how difficult this may be) on the basis of the final redaction of the narrative, which has been painted over so many times.[2] The ruach (inspiration) which Moses had possessed and which had been distributed among the elders of the people too (Num 11.24–30), had repeatedly fallen on individuals during the period of the judges and inspired them to deeds that freed the nation. But the loosely united tribes could no longer resist the surrounding peoples, who were skilled in war and internally united: it was no longer possible to avoid the establishment of a central, institutional leadership. The dominant figure of the transitional period, Samuel, had to proclaim the end of the weakened and corrupt priesthood which had charge of the ark; this was destroyed in the next war with the Philistines, in which the ark was taken as booty, while Samuel, accredited by the fulfilment of his prophecy, rose to be the one in Israel who bore the Spirit ('prophet', 1 Sam 3.20), with the important support of a group of inspired men (nebiim) over whose 'assembly' (ἐκκλησία) he presided (19.18f.). As one who bears the Spirit and enjoys high spiritual prestige, he does indeed exercise the function of a 'judge' within Israel, but he does not take the place of the warlike judges of old in the sacred war of resistance ad extra: instead of fighting, he offers intercessions and sacrifices, which God answers (according to the narrative) with a miraculous theophany that repels the foe (1 Sam 7.9f.; cf. 12.18). He attempts to institutionalise the prophetic role of the judges within Israel (thus continuing tendencies of the 'minor judges') by installing his sons as judges alongside himself. The representatives of the people, disturbed by these half-measures, demand the full institution, which must also encompass the dimension of foreign politics: kingship. The judge-prophet opposes this, but God bids him accept and do what the people want, though naturally in such a way that the king who is to be instituted for the first time must remain one who obeys, despite the institutionalisation. The opinions sound shrilly as they interrupt one another in the text: is not kingship the abandonment of God's lordship (8.7)? Voices from the later period sound a warning note in the midst of this, a warning that comes from their dire experience with a kingship which has become absolutist (8.11–18). But God grants—indeed, he himself sends—the new nagid (chief, prince) who is to free and govern 'my people' (9.16–17). Samuel anoints Saul who is sent to him (ch. 10), who is also chosen by lot in the assembly of the people and acclaimed as king after the great victory over the Ammonites which he wins as the Spirit-possessed warrior (ch. 11); after this, Samuel retires, after he has drawn attention once more to the conditions of the new statute: 'Your God is your king. And now behold the king whom you have chosen, for whom you have asked; behold, the Lord has set a king over you. If you will fear the Lord and serve him and hearken to his voice . . . if both you and the king who reigns over you will follow the Lord your God, then it will be well . . .' (12.12–14).

---

[2] On this, cf. above all the unfinished work of M. Buber, 'Der Gesalbte', in: Werke, Vol. II (1964).

Samuel has introduced the anointed Saul to the possession of the Spirit. On his way home, he will meet the band of prophets: 'Then the Spirit of the Lord will come mightily upon you, and you shall prophesy with them and be turned into another man. Now when these signs meet you, do whatever your hands finds to do, for God is with you' (10.6–7). When he joins the guild of prophets, therefore, the new political ruler is equipped with the Spirit and so enters into his majority. His mature act and his great hour are related at 11.1–11. But is it possible for the Spirit of God, which falls freely on a man on individual occasions and is bestowed charismatically, to remain guaranteed to a continuing institution? Samuel believes not. By linking the bestowal of the Spirit on the king to the encounter with the fellowship of prophets, he binds the institution of the kingship to something like an institution of prophecy as to a corrective; and from David to the last king of Judah, this painful and yet fruitful dualism will dominate history: the close confrontation between the king, who obeys the political necessities, and the prophet, who relates the whole political sphere to the direct word of God and points to direct obedience.[3]

Thus the text lets both stand beside each other in almost unbearable harshness: the permission, which has been mentioned, to 'do what the occasion requires', and the strict instruction to wait at Gilgal seven days for Samuel, with whom the sacrifices are to be offered: then 'I will show you what you shall do' (10.8). Urgent political necessity—the army is dispersing, the foe is coming nearer, one must act without delay—leads Saul to offer the sacrifice himself on the seventh day; then Samuel comes, upbraids the king for what he has done, and declares that he has been rejected by God, who has already selected another who is better (13.7b–15). In the doublet in ch. 15, Saul's disobedience is somewhat more clearly manifest: Samuel has ordered destruction 'without mercy' for the holy war against the Amalekites, but Saul spares the captive king and the best of the cattle, in order to sacrifice it to God when he comes home (15.15). But

---

[3] The opus of Reinhold Schneider shows how this problematic continues to work in the realm of Christian history. Cf. my book, Reinhold Schneider, Sein Weg und sein Werk, 1955.

'obedience is better than any sacrifice' (15.22), and no penitent prayer of Saul, indeed no intercession by Samuel is of any help now: God has repented that he made Saul king over Israel (16.1). From this point onwards, in the histories of David, Saul is the figure of the one rejected: 'the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord tormented him' (16.14).

And yet, Saul had been a pious king. He would not have gone into battle without offering sacrifice (13.12); on the day of the battle he orders that the whole army shall hold a great fast (14.24), and when his son Jonathan breaks this fast unawares, he is ready to sacrifice his son in expiation of the vow that has been broken (14.39, 44); he also cleanses the land of witches (28.3), and it is a part of his tragedy that he ultimately goes to inquire of a witch, because God no longer answers him in any way. Samuel contrasted obedience with witchcraft (15.23): for in magic (as in sacrifice) it is man himself who is in charge, and it is only in obedience that he lets God be in charge of him.[4] And yet Saul, like Samson, was one whose election lay far back, at the beginning of his life: the infancy narrative which now has Samuel as its central figure once belonged quite clearly to the saga material about Saul, as is shown by the fact that the play on words with sha'al (to request, demand, choose) which occurs nine times points to the name Sha'ul, not to Samuel. Saul is the one who is first 'requested' by his barren mother, who takes an oath to make him a Nazirite, he is 'asked for' and is then 'required back' by God (1 Sam 1.27), and finally is 'chosen' by the people (12.13), consecrated to God for the whole of his life (1.11, 28). He has had to yield up even the history of his own election to another, so unhappy and rejected is Saul.

Does not Samuel overreach himself when he demands of the mature king on whom the gift of the Spirit has been bestowed a seemingly petty obedience, indeed—in the case of the seven days' wait—a blind obedience that contradicts every raison d'état? Whatever one may say about the present state of the text, however the divergent voices may be distinguished from one another and fitted into historical categories, it is certain that the new institution of the kingship, as 'the replacement of the immediate primitive theocracy by the mediated theocracy',[5] needed to be bound inexorably to the obedience of Abraham and Moses, and in the concrete state of Israel this was possible only by binding the kingship to the office of the nabi in which it shared: sharing with it the effusion of the divine ruach, but sharing likewise precisely in a wholly concrete, incarnated obedience. Only so can the new kingdom, which emerges from the primitive pansacrality into the secularity of the new period, be a function free of compromise in the people that belongs to God (1 Sam 9.16–17).

---

[4] H. W. Hertzberg, Die Samuelbücher, ATD (1965), pp. 101–102.

---

[5] Buber, loc. cit., p. 759.

2. EARLY PROPHECY

In the period of the judges, there was no distinction between the bestowal of the Spirit and political action, even though the intensity with which those chosen by God experienced Spirit – possession and their consecration to God could vary considerably. The solid establishment of the political leadership function which emerged with Saul and which, historically, was unavoidable called prophecy into existence as a counterweight and corrective. Its beginnings lie far back in time and it is scarcely possible to shed any light on them; but where prophecy enters history and takes on theological significance, it stands in tireless confrontation with politics; it retains an orientation to politics that can take very various forms (very clear in Elisha, then again in the great literary prophets and still in the post-exilic period), just as in its turn the kingship in Israel cannot divorce itself from prophecy.

Although prophecy had strong ecstatic traits in its beginnings (corresponding to a primitive stage of consciousness in which God's act of falling upon the prophet expresses itself in the man as a whole, in his body and his soul, and takes on communal form at the same time), another characteristic appears at once: that of obedience. In the case of the boy in the temple—whether he is called Saul or Samuel—this is initially obedience to the God who calls to him: 'Speak, Yahweh, for your servant hears' (1 Sam 3.9). Three times, the Lord does no more than call: he waits for the agreement of the boy before he makes proclamation of the word, the message, the fourth time. The necessity of such a willingness to hear is presupposed in the whole history of prophecy. In the ancient period, his Spirit can also fall from heaven without prior warning; but his word (dabar)—which moves into the centre in the eighth and seventh centuries and dislodges the concept of Spirit—is an address to one who has the willingness to hear. The one who hears must be ʿanaw, subordinating himself, feeling himself to be a servant, humble: his ʿanawa, humility (Zeph 2.3; Prov 15.33; 18.12; 22.4) becomes the vessel in which God's 'anawa, his 'condescension' (Ps 18.36;45.55?; 2 Sam 22.36), is received. Thus something like a fellowship in attitude and destiny becomes possible between God and the prophets, as is attested in God's word to Samuel: 'According to all the deeds which they have done to me, from the day I brought them up out of Egypt even to this day' (i.e., they have abandoned me and served foreign gods), 'so they are also doing to you' (1 Sam 8.8).[1]

This willingness vis-à-vis God, leading the prophet to live in expectation of the word, is something which, in the beginnings of the prophetic movement, has to be consciously inculcated with an almost incomprehensible harshness that directly equates the superior's word of command with the divine word. Many of the fragmentary accounts from the early period cast light virtually exclusively on this obedience, which seems to be raised to the status of a life or death criterion of the prophetic role, as for example in the story of the man of God in the reign of king Jeroboam, who is charged by God to eat and drink nothing on his way, and is then tricked into eating by a prophet who appeals to his function as prophet and to an inspiration from an angel, with the result that the man of God must pay with his death for his disobedience of the direct word of God (1 Kings 13.11–32), [2] or in the other story of the 'man of the sons of the prophets' who, again charged by Yahweh, commands one of his fellows, 'Strike me', and when he refuses, tells him, 'Because you have not obeyed the voice of Yahweh, behold, as soon as you have gone from me, a lion shall kill you' (1 Kings 20.35f.). Here there blows the same wind as in the early Christian Apophthegmata Patrum. The call of Elisha to be the successor of Elijah is significant: Elijah throws his mantle over Elisha as he ploughs. Elisha leaves the oxen and asks permission to take leave of his father and mother, receiving a brusque reply (similar to that in Lk 9.62); he slaughters the oxen and uses the wood of the ploughs to cook the meat, which he gives to the people to eat; 'then he arose and went after Elijah, and ministered to him' (1 Kings 19.19–21). The fact that Jesus takes up this scene shows that here already the definitive, New Testament obedience has been formally attained. In the miracle stories too, it is always necessary first to obey—this is seen most beautifully in the episode of Naaman (2 Kings 5.10)—before God's word of power shows itself to be effective. All of this is characteristic of the atmosphere of the new prophecy, and is, at it were the training of a novitiate. The image of Moses and doubtless that of Abraham too have acquired their final theological profile directly or indirectly from here.

---

[1] It is possible that this sentence is a later interpolation, which misunderstands the context, but it gives expression to one aspect of prophetic existence.

[2] cf. also the exemplary obedience of the Rechabites (Jer 35). Deut 13.1–5 requires an obedience to the naked word of the Law, even in contradiction of prophetic signs which are fulfilled—if the prophet himself is in contradiction of the commandment of God.

In the period of the great prophecy, which is coextensive with the period of the kings, God enters into a hitherto unheard-of kind of dialogue with the chosen people. He sharply attacks the people's disobedience, desertion and distance from God. No longer does he send thunder and lightning from heaven: he incarnates his word in those whom he has chosen for the perfect ministry of obedience. Certainly, it is individuals (a concept which probably enters the consciousness of the world for the first time through the prophets) who are set in this immediacy to God, and from God's perspective are set in the distance taken by the authorised proclaimer vis-à-vis the people;[3] but the consciousness and the whole existence of these individuals undergoes (although in very varied degrees of expression) an incomprehensible broadening-out, leading initially to the direct encounter with the divine glory (Elijah, Micaiah son of Imlah, Isaiah, Ezekiel), and from thence to acceptance of the mission into the uttermost hopelessnesses of the erring people. The prophets must be acquainted with these dark remotenesses, in order to give the word the right, pertinent formulation, so that it can be understood. A prophet must make himself so available in his ministry that he can embody what God has to say—and God's word is always God himself in his majestic act of deciding and working, but always in the act of laying bare his heart. G. von Rad is so bold as to say that the prophet in the state in which he receives the revelation 'became detached from himself and his own personal likes and dislikes, and was drawn into the emotions of the deity himself. It was not only the knowledge of God's designs in history that was communicated to him, but also the feelings in God's heart, wrath, love, sorrow, revulsion, and even doubt as to what to do or how to do it. (Hos 6.4; 11.8; Is 6.8)'.[4] One dimension of this in the case of many prophets is that the bodily sphere is taken decisively into service, with bodily functions, states and gestures (which however are profoundly connected with the spiritual dimension) being laid hold of as the sphere in which God's emotion and action are expressed. Ezekiel must eat the scroll, he and Hosea are expropriated in their married life so that they become parables of the relationship between God and the people, and so on: 'we may ask whether this entry of the word into a prophet's bodily life is not meant to approximate to what the writer of the fourth Gospel says about the word becoming flesh'.[5] For it is certain that in the prophet, God intends truly to reach the sphere of darkening and backsliding; and for this reason we see the prophet in many places, as he stands in profound solidarity with the members of his people, suffering more deeply under their situation than they themselves suffer because he sees and understands them in the truth that comes from God. Thus suffering becomes a fundamental word in prophecy, going far beyond the θεὶα παθεὶν of the Greeks (in the Apolline-Delphic realm as in the Dionysiac realm): the prophet must take up his position at the place where God can penetrate only in a hostile manner, only as fire, judgment and annihilation, into the realm of what is opposed to God, where men must be utterly terrified of falling into the hands of the living God.

---

[3] The idea that one day all the people can become prophets is a wholly extravagant, eschatological idea of Joel (3.1f.) which is fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 2.17–21).

---

[4] ThOT (1960), Vol. II, p. 63.

[5] Ibid., p. 92.

Accordingly, even where the most grandiose visions of the divine kabod present themselves (Is 6; Ezek 1; 10), the prophet remains without curiosity (unlike many later apocalyptists); in obedience, he sees as much of God as God thinks good to show him, and the vision is always the spring-board for the main thing, the mission. Thus it is with Isaiah, who begins his book in the midst of his carrying out of his commision, and relates the sending only at a later point; the decisive thing for him is that the fire of God's kabod becomes the glowing coal that purifies the prophet's lips and that God's question, 'Whom shall we send?', is followed without any delay by the prophet's answer, 'Send me!' and by the commission to harden Israel's heart. In Jeremiah, no vision of glory perceptible to the senses is required: God's word of election, the prophet's shrinking back, God's assurance that the commission can be fulfilled, are sufficient, and at once two tests follow: 'What do you see, Jeremiah?' 'I see a rod of almond.' 'You have seen well, for . . .' And the second time: 'What do you see, Jeremiah?' 'I see a boiling pot, facing away from the north.' This time, there is no further need to praise the prophet: God explains the image at once. The uniquely decisive matter is that the prophet sees and translates exactly, for the glory of God now wishes to entrust itself to the capacity of this bridge to bear it. In this 'descent', the kabod becomes a fire of judgment; it will soon become plain in the prophets how much it assumes this form, becoming a 'consuming fire' even in their hearts (Jer 20.9).

But the prophet is not only inwardly consumed by the fire of God; since he becomes the one who exposes the word of God to the people, God exposes him to the opposition and hate of the sinners. The unheard-of element in this process is that God himself exposes himself to sin in the suffering and dying of those who are obedient to him. Jesus will emphasise that it is necessary that the prophetic obedience should lead to martyrdom: 'For it cannot be that a prophet should perish outside Jerusalem' (Lk 13.33b); he raises to a general principle what happened under Joash (2 Chron 24.20–22), Manasseh (2 Kings 20.16) and Jehoiakim (Jer 26.20–23). And even if the prophet does not perish physically, he must at the very least suffer as the one who embodies God's word. It is God himself who uncovers his heart to blows in the prophets, for they are the men who belong to him and he loves them because they obey him. By having them obey and sending them ahead against the battle-front of the sinners, he commits himself to the very hilt. He is already en route to the incarnation. He creates the necessities which will make his own death necessary: 'But how then should the scriptures be fulfilled, that all this must (δεῖ) happen thus?' (Mt 26.54).

Everything takes on an unheard-of presence and contemporaneity. God speaks and issues demands now, he wants an answer now; the great religious traditions have no independent value in the present moment, and no emphasis is laid above all on the significance of the past for the present, as in Deuteronomy. Rather, the mighty deeds of God become proofs of the fact that he is living now, images that show how he acts today and tomorrow, and thus the glory of God, which essentially belonged to yesterday for Israel as it celebrated the cultic feasts, can change unexpectedly in the focal point of the prophetic present to become tomorrow:

'And one can see as only now coming from afar what one believed had already happened.' (Novalis)

3. AMOS AND HOSEA

In the earliest of the literary prophets, Amos, 'Yahweh roars from Sion' (1.2), no longer only with the majestic thunder that announces the storm (Ex 19.16; Is 30.30), but with the power of the wild beast that is certain of its prey in advance (Hos 5.14). The seven oracles with which the book of Amos begins show this determination in the refrain which occurs every time, 'I will not revoke the punishment' (1.3 etc.). Such is the force with which Yahweh's voice insists: 'Does a lion roar in the forest, when he has no prey? . . . The lion has roared; who will not fear? Yahweh the Lord has spoken; who can but prophesy?' (3.4, 8). And when this word of prophecy is literally 'unbearable' for the land, according to the judgment of the priest of Bethel, and the prophet is told to depart, he replies: 'I am no prophet, nor one of the sons of the prophets; but I am a herdsman, and a dresser of sycamore trees, and the Lord took me from following the flock, and the Lord said to me, "Go, prophesy to my people Israel"', and he immediately prophesies terrible things that will happen to the priest (7.14f.). But surely it will not be so terrible as that? Will not a remnant always escape? 'Thus says the Lord: "As the shepherd rescues from the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear, so shall the people of Israel who dwell in Samaria be rescued . . ."' (3.12)—after they have thought they could forbid the prophets to prophesy (2.12). The destroying fire breaks forth each time from the seven oracles. But ever again in the course of the whole book, there resound words of glorification, a song of glory that justifies God out of the midst of the fire of judgment.[1] The judgment goes forth because God's righteous ordering has been disrupted among the people: 'You oppress the poor, you crush the needy' (4.1). 'They sell the righteous for silver, and the needy for a pair of sandals[2]—they that trample the head of the poor into the dust of the earth and turn aside the way of the afflicted' (2.6–7; 8.6). God is in solidarity with the poorest. And in the oracles against the pagan peoples, who do not know this legal ordering, God truly defends 'natural law': he sends his fire, because they have crushed men under threshing sledges, deported whole peoples, handed them over, persecuted them, ripped open pregnant women, etc. God uses his 'plumb line' (7.7–8), a measurement that is valid for him and that ought to be known to man too, but which finds man lacking.[3] Man is essentially one who falsifies measurements (8.5).[4] The essential point in Amos is that God's application of this measurement is irrevocable. During the first two visions, the prophet turned to intercessory prayer; but with the third vision, where the measurement is applied, this is no longer possible (7.8). And when in the final vision Yahweh destroys his sanctuary with his own hand, and says that no one can escape from him through flight, even if he were to hide in Sheol or in the depths of the sea, for even 'there I will command the serpent, and it shall bite them' (9.3); when the one who seeks to escape from Yahweh runs directly into him ('as if a man fled from a lion, and a bear met him', 5.19); and when finally he holds all Israel in his sieve and sieves it through (9.9), then the essential point everywhere is that God acts alone: he has his whole judgment in his hand alone, including the serpent of the abysses which is always at his service for this. He does not have a relation of necessity vis-à-vis Israel such that he must show his gracious favour,[5] nor does he need an opposition in order to be the victor: he himself creates light and darkness (4.13) and changes [1] So-called doxologies of judgment: Amos 4.13; 5.8–9; 9.5–6. F. Horst, 'Die Doxologien im Amosbuch', ZAW 47 (1929), also in Gottes Recht (Theol. Bücherei 12), 1961, pp. 155–166.

---

---

[2] On the meaning of this verse: R. de Vaux, Les institutions de l'A.T., vol. I (1958), pp. 258f.

[3] If God applies his measurements, numbers and weights to the world (Wis 11.21; but cf. already Is 40.12; Job 28.25), he has the right to apply this measurement of his anew as judge, to test men: 2 Kings 21.13; Is 28.17; 34.11; Lam 2.8.

[4] In the falsification of the measurements which are valid between man and man there occurs also the falsification of the measurement that is valid between God and man: Lev 19.35; Deut 25.13f.; Mic 6.10–11; Hos 12.8.

[5] This is seen in God's astonishing, sovereignly carefree statement that he has not only 'brought up' Israel (from Egypt), but has also brought up the the one to the other (5.8). This God calls to Israel, whose 'time has come' (8.2): 'Prepare to meet your God' (4.12) in a 'dark night' (5.20).[6] In this night, there will be 'a famine in the land; not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of the Lord . . . but they shall not find it' (8.11–12).

In Hosea, who prophesies a decade later, we find initially the same certainty that God, and God alone, will deal with Israel. 'I will be like a lion to Ephraim, and like a young lion to the house of Judah. I, even I, will rend and go away, I will carry off, and none shall rescue' (5.14). He will punish the faithless wife, 'and no one shall rescue her out of my hand' (2.10). 'So I will be to them like a lion, like a leopard I will lurk beside the way. I will fall upon them like a bear robbed of her cubs, I will tear open their breast . . .' (13.7–8). But already in these words we can sense that something completely new is beginning to surface in Hosea. Israel's falling away from the God of the covenant to the Canaanite fertility gods and their rituals was literally a sinking down to a cultically justified fornication. When the people 'departs' from Yahweh to 'go whoring' (4.12; 9.1), this ends in the drastic situation in which sexuality becomes central, a situation that shows the depth of the abandoned and desecrated covenant in a completely new light. And although the first sin of this kind is to be dated back in the scene in Baal-Peor on the edge of the wilderness (Num 25.1–5), it is only here that the unheard-of consequences are seen, when God takes hold of the sexual dimension of his prophet Hosea in order to portray himself therein in his supra-sexual relationship to Israel. God embraces the sphere of male and female gift of self in the flesh, in order to make use of it as an instrument of revelation on the basis of the total obedience of the prophet—the exact opposite Philistines from Caphtor and the Arameans from Kir (9.7). Thus, he does not need Israel's sacrifices either: he is weary of them (5.21–25).

---

[6] The people 'yearn for the day of the Lord', since they hold that God will appear as a warrior, like one of the mythical gods, and vanquish their enemies for them. They have not yet understood that they themselves are the enemy, and that therefore the day of the Lord will be 'dark, without any light' for them (5.18–20).

of what the people had done by 'going off whoring'. Two actions are prescribed: first, the prophet must marry a 'harlot'[7] and have 'children of harlotry' with her, whose names make it clear that they do not belong to Yahweh. Later, Hosea must act out an analogous parable: '"Go again, love a woman who is beloved of a paramour and is an adulteress; even as the Lord loves the people of Israel, though they turn to other gods . . ." So I bought her[8] for fifteen shekels of silver and a homer and a lethech of barley. And I said to her, "You must dwell with me here for many days; you shall not play the harlot, or belong to another man; nor will I come to you"' (3.1–3), for it is thus that God wishes to have his relationship to the people embodied. In both cases, Hosea's sexual conduct is determined by obedience to God and by renunciation: both in the exercise of his marital rights, which humbles him, and in the non-exercise of the marital relationship. His love and the form which this takes in each case are prescribed for him, and his obedience makes it possible for a bridge to be built where this had seemed impossible: the Canaanite emphasis on sexuality is integrated into an entire scheme which utterly supersedes it, and thus God's relationship to the people is disclosed—for the first time in the history of Israel—as love, burning and tender love, because this love appears in the deepest humilation. Through this, with disconcerting suddenness, we are given a proleptic view of the final act of the drama: that which is divine in God, his glory, becomes understandable as love, so that everything that God (in the image of the prophet) will undertake vis-à-vis his people—including the most terrible measures—is necessarily set under the sign of love. Israel's prophecy will never again be able to deny this breakthrough of Hosea: with it, the transcending of the old covenant into a new and definitive form, and a fortiori the transcending of every form of myth in the attainment of the revelation of the divine love[9] is a fait accompli. Hosea is so overwhelmed by this disclosure of the humiliated love of God that he is very far from being able to conceive of attributing to it the traditional splendour of the kabod. He says only that Israel will see its 'glory' flying away because of its fornication (9.11), and also that the calf of Beth-aven (=house of iniquity, instead of Beth-El=house of God), which was the object of idolatrous worship, will lose its 'glory' since it will soon be carried off to Assyria together with those who live there (10.5).

---

[7] We can leave aside here the question of whether Gomer was a harlot in the usual sense of this word, or had only offered her virginity to other men in the sacred precincts in accordance with the Canaanite fertility ritual; but H. W. Wolff, Dodekapropheten, I, Hosea (BK XIV/1, 1961, p. 14), who decides in favour of the latter interpretation, is correct to emphasise in this case that 'The woman whom the prophet is to marry is thus precisely no wicked exception, but represents contemporary Israel'. The children whom Hosea must procreate with her are called 'children of harlotry' 'because the mother wanted to achieve her fertility in marriage by means of a rite that is foreign to Yahweh, a rite that is harlotry according to the judgment of Yahweh' (ibid., p. 15). But Gomer need not have been a professional hierodule (temple prostitute). Naturally, the theological significance of the symbolic action is increased if we accept a cultic context for the fornication of the woman.

[8] Not the same woman as in ch. 1, since the second woman is explicity called an adulteress.

Everything begins with God's statement—concerning Hosea's first act of obedience—that 'the land commits great harlotry by forsaking the Lord . . . You are not my people and I am not your God' (1.2, 9). This is the situation: the covenant has been de facto dismissed and dissolved. The people no longer knows who God is; they have lost the 'knowledge of God',[10] and the chief guilt for this belongs to the priests who have themselves fallen prey to fornication and have taken the people with them, causing the great 'forgetting' (4.6; cf. 2.15; 8.14; 13.4–6). The people has 'abandoned' God (4.10) and 'rebelled' against him (7.13; 8.1); they have 'fled' from him (7.13) and 'turned to others' (3.1), 'letting themselves be initiated into shame' (9.10); thus God too has 'withdrawn' and, if one were to seek him, he would not be there (5.6). The people has 'spurned' him (8.3), and so he too will 'spurn' them and 'depart from them' (9.12).

---

[9] H. Braun, 'Der Fahrende', ZThK 48 (1951), pp. 32–38, emphasises the incomparability of Hosea and Oedipus, despite all external similarities.

[10] Certainly this is a knowledge due chiefly to the living tradition of salvation history (H. W. Wolff, 'Wissen um Gott bei Hosea als Urform von Theologie', 1953, now in: Ges. Stud., Theol. Bücherei 22, 1964, pp. 182–205), but in such a way that the living memory of the grace received (in the occupation of the land and in the fact that Israel was permitted to dwell in the land) was transformed into ever new 'experience'.

But while this is revealed and openly proclaimed by Hosea's first symbolic act, God's relationship to Israel secretly moves to take up a position under the second symbolic action, the weaning of the adulteress from her ways. The mythical fertility mysteries to which she hands herself over are vain infertility: 'no birth, no pregnancy, no conception!' (9.11). And precisely this barrenness will itself be an act of love that heals her in a hidden manner: 'Give them, O Lord—what wilt thou give? Give them an infertile womb and dry breasts!' (9.14). 'The wind of the Lord shall come, rising from the wilderness: and his fountain shall dry up, his spring shall be parched' (13.15; cf. 9.16). Thus the fertile land, the perceptible sign of the covenant, will be dissolved backwards into a wilderness that bears no fruit—precisely the wilderness out of which Israel came to begin with. This is God's judgment: '. . . I will strip her' (the unfaithul one) 'naked and make her as in the day she was born, and make her like a wilderness, and set her like a parched land, and slay her with thirst' (2.3). Many paths converge in the key word 'wilderness', which is the second focal point of Hosea's ellipse. The 'wilderness', with which 'Egypt' is linked, is the place out of which Israel was chosen. 'Egypt', alongside Assyria, is the superpower with which Israel is consorting politically today, so that it is literally flirting with the place where it was not chosen. And when God in judgment promises Israel that it will 'return to Egypt' (8.13; 9.3; 9.6, 11.5), he thereby declares that salvation history is at an end. The produce of the land, 'grain and wine and oil' (2.11), which has been squandered on foreigners, is taken back by God to himself, so that the land is desolate and automatically reverts to the wilderness, quite apart from the deportation which is shortly to take place. The 'zero situation'[11] is established once again. But 'wilderness' also means something quite different for Hosea: the origin of the love between God and his people, as yet prescinding from all work and reward. 'When Israel was a child, I loved him, and out of Egypt I called my son . . . it was I who taught Ephraim to walk, I took them up in my arms; but they did not know that I healed them. I led them with cords of compassion, with the bands of love, and I became to them as one who lifts a child up to embrace it; and I bent down to it and fed it' (10.1–4). 'Like grapes in the wilderness, I found Israel' (9.10), 'Israel was a luxuriant vine' (10.1). And so the God who judges reveals his plan, indeed virtually blurts it out incautiously: 'Therefore, behold, I will allure her' (the harlot), 'and bring her into the wilderness, and speak tenderly to her . . . And there she shall answer as in the days of her youth, as at the time when she came out of the land of Egypt' (2.16–17). In the aspect of judgment, this undoubtedly means a total stripping (2.5) which goes to the point of shameful nakedness (2.12): 'I will hedge up her way with thorns; and I will build a wall against her, so that she cannot find her paths. She shall pursue her lovers, but not overtake them; and she shall seek them, but shall not find them' (2.6–7), and this will be the inherent end of her deeds: 'her deeds have encompassed her' (7.2). But in the aspect of love, this means that she is weaned from the interior 'spirit of prostitution' (4.12; 5.4) so that she becomes accustomed to something else, but only through a search in a void: 'they shall go to seek Yahweh, but they will not find him; he has withdrawn from them' (5.6). This is the 'nothing' of the Bible—oscillating between shameful judgment and love of election—a higher midpoint between the Indian nirvana and the nada of St John of the Cross. It is the oscillation between the final point of 'departure to practise harlotry' (9.1) and the initial point of 'coming in trembling' (3.5), 'coming with quaking' (11.11) to God. Here there is no anticipated grasping at a re-appearance of God, who 'comes back as surely as the dawn' (6.3); Yahweh is no Osiris or Tammuz or Baal,[12] who return with regularity or who can be brought up with ritual lamentations and prescribed sacrifices. It is into this situation that the word is spoken: 'For I desire steadfast love' (i.e., faithfulness to the covenant), 'and not sacrifice' (6.6). Hosea sharply criticises the patriarch Jacob, who secured election for himself surreptitiously in his mother's womb and presumed to struggle with God (12.3–5), and did service for a foreign woman (12.13): it is necessary to go behind even the period of the patriarchs into an emptiness which is nevertheless the place of the prophetic word and of the encounter with God in every specific today (12.10–11).

---

[11] Wolff, Hosea (n. 7 above), p. 78.

---

[12] Ibid., pp. 127, 147, 151.

From this point, the promises of a new, a definitely faithful love between 'I' and 'thou' flow out in a great torrent: 'I will betroth you to me for ever; I will betroth you to me in righteousness (sedaka) and in justice (mishpat), in steadfast love (chesed), and in mercy (rechem). I will betroth you to me in faithfulness (emuna); and you shall know Yahweh' (2.19–20). And following on this rightness (justice) between God and man will come the great parallel answers (justesse):[13] 'in that day . . . I will answer the heavens and they shall answer the earth; and the earth shall answer the grain, the wine and the oil, and they shall answer' (the fertile land of) 'Jezreel' (2.21–22).[14]

Thanks to the mediating obedience of the prophet in the most intimate sphere of human life, there occurs in Hosea a disclosure of the heart of God which is new and unheard-of when compared with all that has gone before. In pure obedience, Hosea overcomes ab intra the world of the mythical deities which has fallen prey to sexuality, and is able, precisely through this, to bring to light the love of God which is supra-sexual. 'God suffers under Israel's false love-affairs';[15] he cannot bear them, and we see him as it were wavering between mercy on the guilty wife and the necessity of punishing her ruthlessly. 'What shall I do with you, O Ephraim?' (6.4). It is love that wins the day: 'How can I give you up, O Ephraim! . . . My heart recoils within me, my compassion grows warm and tender. I will not execute my fierce anger, I will not again destroy Ephraim; for I am God and not man, the Holy One in your midst' (11.8–9). Although the word is not used, it is the kabod of Yahweh that reveals itself in a new, incomprehensible depth as the love that lies beyond wrath and has to do with God's being God, with his absoluteness. But this unattainably transcendent element is at the same time profaned by human beings in the world and humiliated by them, since its love carries it to the point of defencelessness. The adulteress is purchased 'for fifteen shekels of silver and a homer and a lethech of barley' (3.2), so that she may sit still beside the Lord once more. And he 'allures her seductively' (2.16) so that he may speak to her heart. Hosea is commanded to 'love' this woman: this is the word that expresses the love between man and woman ('hb), with the difference that in him it is selflessly helpful while in her it is lascivious and full of desire. Hosea's message meets with no greater acceptance than that of the major literary prophets: 'The prophet is a fool! The man of the spirit is mad!' (9.7); he is expelled from the land. Even in this fate, he declares something of the 'foolish' God's love (1 Cor 1) as he runs after a faithless harlot. God has begun to do something here that will not come to a stop until Golgotha.

---

[13] Cf. vol. III of this work, pp. 465ff., 512ff., cf. pp. 233ff.

[14] The eschatological correspondence appears in Hosea, with inherent logic, above all under the image of fertility. The fatal fertility of the beginnings (10.1–4) changes at the last into a paradisal fertility without danger, with the presupposition that Israel now grasps that 'you bear fruit thanks to me' (14.9).

[15] Wolff, Hosea (n. 7 above), p. 53.

4. ISAIAH

Just as Isaiah represents the very summit of Old Testament prophecy, so too his vision of the glory of God at his call stands in a dominant mid-point between the glory of Sinai (and of the temple) at the beginning of the history of the people and the eschatological glory which was expected at the end of this history. Just as his whole work summarises the tradition and carries it forward without any rupture,[1] interpreting it beforehand in terms of the messianic future, and has a particularly weighty significance for the present moment in which he writes, so too his vision of glory, without explicitly mentioning this, binds together the various historical periods in the present moment.[2] It is a vision of what cannot be seen: the one who 'sits on a high and lofty throne' now fills the whole of the temple with his train: the space in which Isaiah stands is broken open in an unimaginable manner; in the heights fly the seraphim with their tireless cry of 'Holy!', and they in their turn make everything that is drawn together in the temple shake and break open; in that unapproachable height is God, the holy one, at rest in his absoluteness, separated from all the world, a glory so all-consuming that it remains inaccessible even for beings of fire, who must veil themselves in its presence—and yet what they have to say to one another cannot be anything else than the incessant utterance of what cannot be uttered. But while God's train fills the temple, which is his place on earth, the 'stool for his feet' (Ps 99.5), 'his kabod fills the whole earth' (Is 6.3) and is thus precisely not restricted to the temple and the holy land, although this is without any doubt the place from which it radiates forth and the place where it at once conceals itself again in 'smoke' (6.4). Nothing at all is said about what this kabod of the most holy God is: certainly it is a primal presence of the dignity and weightiness of his holiness, which permits itself to be perceived and establishes its authority, but in a visibility that can be grasped by the 'earth' which is God's work and which opens up to the earth in an elemental way in the infinite contradiction: 'Woe is me! For I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people with unclean lips; for my eyes have seen the King, Yahweh Sabaoth!' (6.5).

---

[1] The commentary by Otto Kaiser in ATD 17 aims to show this.

[2] Precisely in the case of this vision, one should keep most strictly to the consciously brief account given by the prophet and refrain from looking for analogies that may be discovered in contemporary literature and art (thus especially I. Engnell, The Call of Isaiah, 1944). For who will say to what extent God, when he reveals himself, takes up one or another motif which is familiar to man (though undoubtedly with the intention of breaking through its limitations at once), or to what extent the prophet on his part takes up images and concepts which are familiar to his hearers, in order to make comprehensible, at least in some measure, something that is unique and scarcely capable of expression?

It would be beautiful—but it remains unlikely—if Isaiah himself had linked the glory of God which he saw backwards to Sinai and forwards to the eschatological glory: 'When the Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion and cleansed the bloodstains of Jerusalem from its midst by a spirit of judgment and by a spirit of burning, then the Lord will create over the whole site of Mount Zion and over her assemblies a cloud by day, and smoke and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for over all the glory there will be a canopy and a pavilion. It will be for a shade by day from the heat, and for a refuge and a shelter from the storm and rain' (4.4–6).[3] But the image is probably too elaborate to be attributable to the master of the great and strict form.

The vision communicates to the seer an ineradicable knowledge of the utter exaltation of the holy God. He repeatedly calls God, with emphasis, the 'holy one of Israel',[4] in order to remind the people of its incomprehensible privilege. This is the God before whom everything must bow, so that he alone may always be exalted higher (2.11, 17). From this height, he contemplates what happens on earth: 'I will quietly look from my dwelling, like clear heat in sunshine, like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest' (18.4). But the prophet's vision was only the starting-point of his mission: it was not an end in itself, but served to point his commission in the right direction. His deep horror at his own sinfulness has already opened up the fissure which is the first thing that must become visible before salvation can come. The lips of the stained man are touched by the seraph with the burning coal: 'Behold, your sin is taken away, and your guilt is forgiven' (6.7). And before he can reflect on the consequences of this event, he hears, as one who has been admitted to the royal council of God, the voice of the Lord: 'Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?' 'Then I said, "Here am I! Send me."' He has just experienced his solidarity with the impure people: now, in an obedience which is antecedent to all reflection, he is the man who apprehends what God wills and needs, in highest freedom, because he must do this and nothing else comes into question.[5] Thus, after a moment of apparent discontinuity, the solidarity of the one who is sent with the 'impure people' is re-established, but now from above, in the commission which is given. Isaiah will suffer this to the full and will also express it in his refined way, on occasion,[6] although it does not become a major theme for him as it does for Jeremiah. He is a pure instrument of transmission for God's activity.

---

[3] Cf. in the 'Isaian Apocalypse' 24.4. There we find also the reminiscence of the appearing of the glory of God 'in the presence of his elders' (Ex 24.9f., (16f.), which however is now transferred from Horeb to the 'mountain of Zion in Jerusalem'.

[4] 1.4; 5.19, 24; 10.17, 20; 12.6; 17.7; 29.19, 23; 30.11–12; 31.1; 37.13.

The commission on which he is sent has 'hardening' as its direct aim: 'Go, and say to this people: "Hear and hear, but do not understand; see and see, but do not perceive," Make the heart of this people fat' . . . 'Then I said, "How long, O Lord?" And he said, "Until cities lie waste and without inhabitant . . . and the forsaken places are many in the midst of the land"' (6.9–12). A hardening of the heart, therefore, with a 'time limit': a mission to dismantle until there is a great emptiness—the wilderness of Hosea—which is the only place in which the glory of the Lord can arise. And a hardening of the heart, so that there is no possibility of making connections too early, out of a misunderstanding: this is why the Lord, who cannot be separated from his glory, appears first in an 'utterly strange' form (28.21) that corresponds to the sinful state of Israel, and 'will again do marvellous things with this people, wonderful and marvellous' until at last 'the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the discernment of their discerning men shall be hid' (29.14). The aim which is laid down at the outset ('how long?') is of decisive importance for the many discourses about judgment which the prophet makes: he is to humble everything that rises up in rebellion and exalts itself, until the sublimity of God has become inescapably evident through his act of judgment, and the glory can emerge as present salvation from its disguise in the 'terrors of majesty'. In Isaiah, this salvation always appears very concretely immediately in the wake of the 'emptiness' that has been attained: it is a salvation that is certainly intra-historical, near at hand in a messianic sense, attainable, following on the judgment as its telos and not separated from the judgment by any pause. 'Yahweh Sabaoth is exalted in justice, and the Holy God shows himself holy in righteousness' (5.16).

---

[5] G. von Rad has pointed out this highest freedom of the prophet, who here gives full expression to the concept of the ego—for the first time in world history: ThOT, Vol. II, pp. 70–79.

[6] E.g. 22.4.

The radicalness with which the entire private sphere of the prophet on earth is laid hold of by God corresponds to the radicalness with which he was laid claim to before the throne of God. Isaiah is expropriated for his mission in his marital life—in a manner that is less dramatic than in the case of Hosea, but no less fundamentally. How else would he have come to give his first son a name with such a nakedly clear reference to salvation history as Shear-jashub ('a remnant shall return')? It is only within the living tradition of Hosea that such a name can have been given, either by a direct instruction from God or by a certain deduction on the part of the prophet that this was what God wanted. Isaiah, bearing the directive of God, goes out to meet Ahaz accompanied by this boy who has become the embodiment of the prophecy (7.3f.). The second prophecy, concerning the destruction of Damascus and Samaria, is first written down in a document in the presence of trustworthy witnesses at God's command:

'The spoil speeds, the prey hastes', but this does not suffice, for the same prophecy must become flesh. Isaiah had drawn near to his wife, the 'prophetess'—a term that doubtless indicates that the marital relationship of both has become a function of the prophetic mission—and when she is to give birth, the prophet is told to give the boy the name 'The spoil speeds, the prey hastes' (Maher-shalal-hashbaz): thus, he too becomes an embodied word of God and a living testimony along with the 'written' document. And as in the case of this boy, the first babbling of the names of father and mother becomes a fixed date of salvation history (8.4), so in the case of the young woman who is to bear a child, the attaining of the age of discernment by the boy 'God with us' becomes a fixed day in salvation history (7.13f.). Man, woman, child, the periods of human growth: all directly serve the word of God as its vessel. And whether a prophet is to serve Israel as a sign in celibacy (like Jeremiah later on) or, like Isaiah, 'together with his children' (8.18), is unimportant, for every possibility of human existence can be employed for revelation.

A short time after the vision in which Isaiah receives his calling, there sounds forth the song of the 'Day of the Lord' (2.6–22 and 5.15–16)[7] with the threefold refrain: 'Enter into the rock and hide in the dust from before the terror (pachad) of Yahweh and from the glory of his majesty (hadar), when he rises to terrify the earth'. The one theme that, with all its variations, is played out is that everything in the world that rises up and climbs on high, everything that towers aloft and thinks highly of itself, will bow down, sink and be humbled, until God 'is exalted' (5.16) and compels adoration for himself alone against all the idols of man. The linking of 'terror' and 'majesty' shows that the kabod has the form of judgment. In the song about Yahweh as a 'snare' (8.11–15), God takes the prophet himself by the hand in order to draw him away from the path of the people: he is not to fear what the people fears, but God himself is to 'be your fear, and let him be your dread. And he will become a sanctuary, and a stone of offence, and a rock of stumbling . . . a trap and a snare . . . and many shall stumble thereon; they shall fall and be broken; they shall be snared and taken'. This is because the 'speech and the deeds' of the people 'are against the Lord, defying his glorious presence' (3.8). 'They draw near with their mouth and honour me with their lips, while their hearts are far from me' (29.13); they 'hide' themselves from Yahweh (29.15), they 'say to the seers, "See not", and to the prophets, "Prophesy not to us what is right"' (30.10), and thus they 'bring evil upon themselves' (3.9). This is why they must wither away (1.30; 19.6–7; 33.9); indeed, God is forced to uproot his own vine and let it wither (5.5–6) and to drive the one who errs into 'darkness and terror', where he 'sees only night' (8.21–22). At the end of his ministry, the prophet must admit that he has no idea what further blows could be inflicted on Israel: 'From the sole of the foot even to the head, there is no soundness in it, but bruises and sores and bleeding wounds; they are not pressed out, or bound up, or softened with oil' (1.5–6), and yet despite all this—as he confides to his testament, in exact correspondence to the original command to harden their hearts—they are 'sons who do not wish to listen' (30.9), for they think they know better. Already after his first failures with Ahaz, the prophet learns that Israel divides itself into a great majority from whom God hides his face and the small group of the faithful, the prophet and his disciples, his 'children', who set their hope precisely on this God who veils himself.

---

[7] The vision is in the year 740, the song of judgment between 738 and 735.

> Bind up the testimony, seal the teaching among my >   disciples.
> I will wait for Yahweh, who is hiding his face from >   the house of Jacob, > and I will hope in him.
> Behold, I and the children whom Yahweh has given >   me are signs and portents in Israel > from Yahweh Sabaoth, who dwells on Mount >   Zion (8.16–18).

They portray and signify no other conduct in life than that which would be possible for all in the people, even for the leaders, even for the king. They embody no other ethics than that which ought also to be the basis of politics. It is the ethics of the one who allows himself to be humbled by God and, standing before him in littleness, has the ability to perceive the directives that come from God's sublimity. The one who does not twist the good into evil and the evil into good, who does not call the bitter sweet and the sweet bitter (5.20), the one who helps God's righteousness to be established by protecting the poor and the one who has no rights[8] (3.14; 10.2; 11.4; [32.8]). The entire purification of Israel in the crucible aims at the establishing of this divine justice (1.25–27).

But the only one who is able to hear God's directive—this is Isaiah's particular message—is the one who has the inner stillness that allows him to give the word a place within himself, and to grant it at the least an importance greater than that of all of his own opinions which rush ahead on their own: 'the one who trusts will not wish to rush anything' (28.16 in Buber's translation). A lack of faith presses forward: 'Let him make haste, let him speed his work, that we may see it; let the purpose of the Holy One of Israel draw near, and let it come, that we may know it!' (5.19): i.e., God is to accommodate himself to the tempo of human beings. Against this, the testament says in conclusion: 'For thus has my Lord spoken, Yahweh, the Holy One of Israel: in returning and rest you will be set free, in quietness, in composure will your heroism take place. But you do not wish this' (30.15 in Buber's translation). The clay figure ought to lie open and quiet in the hand of its potter (29.15–16), and man ought to 'pay attention' and 'look to "the potter", God' (22.11).[9] But precisely the opposite happens: 'they do not regard the works of Yahweh' (5.12). They 'carry out a plan, which is not mine' (30.1). They 'rely on horses, and trust in chariots because they are many . . . but do not look to the Holy One of Israel or consult Yahweh!' (31.1). They are afraid of political conspiracies, but: 'do not call conspiracy all that this people call conspiracy, and do not fear what they fear, nor be in dread. But Yahweh Sabaoth, him you shall regard as holy; let him be your fear, and let him be your dread' (8.12–13). Therefore, in the decisive moment when the only political solution against the armaments of Damascus and Samaria seems to be to take refuge in Assyria, God tells Ahaz: 'If you will not believe, surely you shall not be established' (7.9).

---

[8] Invective against the big landowners: 5.8–10.

[9] The post-Isaian verse 17.7 is similar.

Should one say that prophecy meddles here without authority in political matters and demands an absolute, blind obedience where a king ought to reflect well and take his own decisions? Is this perhaps a late, decadent form of what was 'holy war on God's behalf' in the naively sacral early period of Israel, a form that can no longer be made plausible?[10] No, for Israel has only one 'king, Yahweh Sabaoth' (6.5), and even the kings of the people must be his obedient sons; and as yet the Spirit incarnates himself in individual prophets for individual directives, before he goes over to the people as a whole in the new covenant in keeping with Joel's prophecy (Joel 3.1–2). The 'keeping still' and 'not rushing' the 'work of God' (Is 5.12, 19; 28.21; [29.23]) would be the way for Israel—in the position of perfect humility—to allow God's judgment to change into its salvation. At the end of his 'work' stands the newly-promised possession of the land:

---

[10] G. von Rad (Der heilige Krieg im alten Israel, 2nd edn. (1952) has shown how the charismatic 'holy war' was an undertaking of God together with his people in the ancient period, and how the people ventured into the fight 'in the state of a primitive pan-sacralilty' but also in the knowledge of 'Yahweh's freedom and unpredictability', to such an extent 'that the idea of faith, i.e. the assured trust in Yahweh's action, had its true origin in the holy war' (p. 31)—but then he shows how in the 'post-Solomonic fictional literature' the holy war came for many reasons to be understood increasingly as a one-sided miracle worked by God and how this understanding was imported, with appropriate images, into the ancient narratives (where the people do virtually nothing more than 'look on': cf. Ex 14.13b–14.30)—and how ultimately, in prophecy, this scheme of the miraculous working of God alone and of the mere trustful keeping still on the part of the people continues in the word of God which lays down something of political import. When, therefore, Isaiah directs the king to be still, instead of taking direct action, he has undoubtedly 'put into effect' in this desperate situation 'the ancient regulations of the holy war . . . that one should let Yahweh act', but now precisely not in the original sense; rather, we see him 'pretty accurately representing the understanding that we find in variations in the later novelists'. 'On the other hand, the difference is clear: the one is telling a story, giving edifying instruction, while the other is a prophet who wishes to prepare the way for the miracle by calling the people to faith in a genuine situation of trouble' (pp. 57–58).

> If you are willing and obedient,
> you shall eat the good of the land;
> but if you refuse and rebel,
> you shall be devoured by the sword (1.19–20).

God will deal with Israel: so much is implied, too, in the promises of unconditional forgiveness of sins (1.18; 1.25), in keeping with which the prophet was purified (6.6); God's

One should also recall here that, even after the problematic separation of prophecy and kingship under Samuel (which was initially, and even subsequently, harmonised by the idea of the charismatic endowment of the king and the clearly political authorisation of the prophet), Israel had to remain conscious of its own nature as the chosen people with an immediate relationship to God (Deut 32.8) and thus led by the God-King, and also that the conflict of the year 753 in the Syro-Ephraimite war signified a borderline case or an exception, since there was always an aspect of political reasoning to be seen in the other political interventions of the prophets: the Israel of the period of the kings is no longer the Israel of the period of the judges, but is de facto hemmed in between expansionist superpowers. The nervous conspiracies of the small states of the area in their relationships with these superpowers were questionable from the very outset, and it could be an aspect of the faith which God was entitled to demand of the people that they accept the fact that, under the temporary hegemony of a superpower, 'being still' was more correct than a will to be autonomous at any price, since Israel's vocation lay elsewhere. The people understood much of this under Cyrus.

Finally, one must consider the recognisably political function of pre-Israelite prophets in some recently-found texts of the archive of letters at Mari (c. 1700 B.C.). 'In the great Isaiah . . . we are aware of vivid reminiscences of those prophets' (von Rad, ThOT, Vol. II, p. 11), in a manner that goes beyond any form of 'fiction' which could mean that his demands would ultimately appear to be a misunderstanding. What he requires is—for the state which Israel had reached at that time—a genuine, politically-incarnate obedience which would have been able to demonstrate its inherent correctness through 'paying heed to Yahweh'—this is perfectly clear in Jeremiah's conflicts—and did not in the least need to be a mechanically-blind obedience.

decisions are irrevocable and no one can cancel them out (14.24–27). The new kingdom which God will set up stands clearly before the prophet's eyes: the kingdom with Israel's temple in its midst, from which Yahweh's instruction for all the peoples goes forth, and which, in turn, is willingly accepted (2.1–5). Under this lordship, the eyes of those who see and the ears of those who hear will be open, 'the mind of the rash will have good judgment, and the tongue of the stammerers will speak readily and distinctly' (32.1–4). The 'wonderful Counsellor' and 'prince of peace' will sit on David's throne (9.5) and will exercise justice and righteousness. The 'precious corner stone of the foundation' (28.16) will be set in place, and everything will be the work of God alone, but in a genuine (though now scarcely visible) continuity with the tree that was broken down: a 'stump' remains (6.13) and puts forth a fresh shoot (11.1). It does not matter that Isaiah in his vision leaps across the centuries; but it is important that the salvation which he sees is the wholly concrete end of the concrete judgment which is now taking place. It is not for nothing that the unknown prophet who shines as a light in the exile will pass over the whole development of the storms of destruction in Jeremiah and Ezekiel and incorporate what he has to say in the Book of Isaiah. For he will realise Isaiah's words, as no one else does, in his Servant Songs: 'I was not rebellious, I turned not backward' (50.5), 'dumb like a sheep under the hand of its shearers' (53.7).

5. JEREMIAH

Jeremiah comes from Anathoth, a tiny place outside the gates of Jerusalem which still belongs to Benjamin and thus to the northern kingdom; and the prophet begins, before Josiah's reform, with a proclamation that is completely permeated by Hosea. Later, after the 'discovery of the law' (621), he adopts the thinking of Deuteronomy, which likewise seems to come from the northern kingdom, until his own prophetic commission takes full hold of him and isolates him. In Hosea, the breakthrough occurs to a God who is near in a hitherto unknown, incomprehensible manner; in Jeremiah, this nearness becomes so oppressive and burdensome that almost the only aspect of it which is experienced is the incomprehensibility, which means a new, paradoxical distance: 'Am I only a God at hand, says Yahweh, and not also a God afar off?' (23.33). Jeremiah is attacked, taken hold of and inhabited by this incomprehensible Other who lays claim to him as a whole, down to the very marrow of his existence. It is not (as with Hosea) one piece of the intimate sphere of his life that he must make available to God, but everything: 'You shall not take a wife, nor shall you have sons or daughters in this place' (16.2), i.e. a total virginity so that he can be utterly obedient to Yahweh, even with his body. He must share in God's withdrawal: 'Do not enter the house of mourning, or go to lament, or bemoan them; for I have taken away my peace from this people, says the Lord, my steadfast love and mercy . . . You shall not go into the house of feasting . . . Behold, I will make to cease from this place the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride' (16.5, 8–9). He is cut off from other people in loneliness. 'I did not sit in the company of merrymakers, nor did I rejoice; I sat alone, because thy hand was upon me, for thou hadst filled me with indignation' (15.17). He is a vessel for the divine feelings, which are foreign to him: 'I am full of the wrath of Yahweh, and I am weary of holding it in' (6.11). He must proclaim him, therefore, but this brings him only scorn and a new isolation: 'The word of the Lord has become for me a reproach and derision all day long. If I say, "I will not mention him, or speak any more in his name," there is in my heart as it were a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I am weary with holding it in, and I cannot' (20.9). If we take into account also the message that the prophet must proclaim more and more unambiguously and inexorably—the national defence must be abandoned, they must capitulate before the king of Babylon who is first drawing close and then besieging Jerusalem, they must above all bid farewell to every false hope set on the temple, for this time God will not rescue it—a message with which the prophet will draw upon himself only the mortal enmity of 'all right-thinking people', hatred, persecution, imprisonment and assault—then we have without any doubt the picture of an excessive demand which was scarcely bearable in human terms.

The constellation in which Jeremiah is set can be resolved only christologically. No psychological resolution is possible, because the word that lays hold of him and exploits him is a word external to him; the will that drives him is the will of another who compels him to keep on saying, 'Let not my will be done', and to keep on doing and proclaiming precisely what he would like to avoid at all costs. He must sacrifice all his powers and all the circumstances of his life to this will. Indeed, he is already—thanks to his calling—to such an extent the one who has been laid hold of, that his own gift of self actually comes too late: he always limps on, trying to catch up with his own vocation. And here lies his problem: not only the problem of how he, Jeremiah, is to bear and live out such an existence, but the much deeper problem of the justification that the portrayal of his inner struggle can have within the Bible as a whole. In Amos, Hosea and Isaiah, man's silent obedience was the precondition for the pure appearing of God, indeed the appearing of the inner suffering and struggling of God. But in Jeremiah, it is a struggle between God and the prophet that comes into the forefront. Is this correct in terms of the history of revelation? Or would Baruch have done better to destroy the 'confessions' of his master? Is this tension meant to shed light on some christological aspect—or does it rather obscure this? Jeremiah is essentially sad, unlike any other of the prophets.

The glory of God is like the sinking of the sun, as the shadows lengthen. 'Give glory (kabod) to the Lord your God before he brings darkness, before your feet stumble on the twilight mountains' (13.16). 'Woe to us, for the day declines, for the shadows of evening lengthen!' (6.4). The approaching destruction is brought about by something unheard-of, something that never happens anywhere else in the history of the peoples: 'Has a nation changed its gods, even though they are no gods? But my people have changed their glory (kabod) for that which does not profit' (2.11;[1] cf. Hos 4.7; Rom 1.23). Israel, which itself was God's glory, praise and beauty (13.11) and has in itself the throne of his glory (14.21; 17.12), sees this glory as it were dissolving into darkness on the one hand and into a devouring fire on the other side. Jeremiah, who feels both darkness and fire in himself, is doubtless the first to experience a kind of supratemporal burden of the divine presence, of the actions and decisions of God. The realities of 'eternal, unquenchable fire' (4.4; 7.20; 21.11) and 'eternal love' (31.3; 33.11), 'eternal covenant' (32.40),[2] appear at the same time. This is linked to the fact that the prophet, when he was called, instead of seeing the glory as Isaiah had done, received the assurance that God had personally chosen him in his eternity, before he was formed in the womb of his mother, and consecrated him for his mission (1.5); his shrinking back, with the anxious objection that he cannot speak, has already been anticipated and overcome by the terms of his mission: 'I have put my words in your mouth . . . they will fight against you; but they shall not prevail against you' (1.9, 19), and by the threatening prohibition: 'Do not be dismayed before them, lest I dismay you before them!' (1.17). He is constantly aware that something eternal is laid upon him, even in his first objection, 'I do not know how to speak' your word (1.6). It breaks him open: 'My anguish, my anguish! I writhe in pain! Oh, the walls of my heart! My heart is beating wildly!' (4.19). 'Is not my word like fire, says Yahweh, and like a hammer which breaks the rock in pieces?' (23.29). God's fire is to blaze in the prophet himself: 'I am making my words in your mouth a fire' (5.14); if he does not utter them, they burn him himself (20.9).[3] But naturally, he loves this terrible word; it is everything for him. He cannot call the word God's glory, so he calls it at least his present revealed state, his name: 'Thy words were found, and I ate them, and thy words became to me a joy and the delight of my heart; for I am called by thy NAME, Yahweh, God of hosts!' (15.16).

---

[1] Cf. 18.13–16.

[2] And independently of this text, after the exile: 50.5.

But this burden which is laid upon him utterly slays him. God opens the eyes of the credulous Jeremiah to the plots against him: 'I was like a gentle lamb led to the slaughter. I did not know it was against me they devised schemes!' (11.19). This image becomes more and more serious as the prophet comes up tighter against a wall of obstinacy and unwillingness to learn when he proclaims his word. He must speak, but with the certainty that it is futile: 'So you shall speak all these words to them, but they will not listen to you. You shall call to them, but they will not answer you' (7.27). Indeed, worse than this is in store: although the prophet must represent the people before God, he is told beforehand that all intercession will be in vain: 'As for you, do not pray for this people, or lift up cry or prayer for them, and do not intercede with me, for I do not hear you' (7.16; 11.14; 14.11). This means also that any concept of his suffering having a vicarious meaning on behalf of the people is excluded in advance. Everything must seem totally futile to him, whether he is put in the stocks (20.2), or the king burns his book (36.23), or he is suspected of being a defector (37.11–16), or imprisoned for a long time (37.16), or thrown into the muddy cistern (38.6), or finally, after the destruction of the city, is deported to Egypt against his will (43.7). He himself has only the word of Yahweh, which sounds impotently in his mouth, because he cannot prove what he says about the future and has at the moment no argument against the prophet of success, Hananiah, who breaks the symbolic yoke which Jeremiah has to bear on his shoulders (28.1–11).

---

[3] Fire is repeatedly threatened and promised, much more extensively than in Amos and Hosea: 11.16; 15.4; 17.27; 21.14; 22.7; 48.45; 49.27; 50.32; 51.30, 58.

In this, the prophet has to stand at once in time and above time: in time, he must continue to offer a fresh chance, until finally king Zedekiah in his vacillation and uncertainty asks him for counsel—and there would still be the possibility of capitulation. But above time, he knows simultaneously that the chances have all been lost and that the final disaster cannot be averted. And so a great bitterness rises up in him: basically, his commission is no commission at all, but only something that humiliates him and deprives him of his dignity; God has 'tricked' him with this vocation. 'O Lord, thou hast deceived me', just as a girl is seduced, 'and I was deceived; thou art stronger than I, and thou hast prevailed' (20.7). 'Wilt thou be to me like a deceitful brook, like waters that fail? . . . Why is my pain unceasing, my wound incurable, refusing to be healed?' (15.18). It is as if they were engaged in a duel, as at Jabbok; as if in a dialogue between partners, and not simply a making space for God. In the three passages where God deigns to give a reply, we see that such a parleying was not foreseen in the original commission. In the first passage, Jeremiah has admitted at the outset that God 'has right on his side', but has then asked about the meaning of the injustice in the world. The reply is a question to the questioner:

> If you have raced with men on foot, > and they have wearied you,
> how will you compete with horses?
> And if in a safe land you fall down, > how will you do in the jungle of the Jordan? (12.5).

The second text is even more severe: God replies to the complaint about loneliness and hurt and to the accusation of deceit simply by calling back to the prophet:

> If you return, I will restore you, > and you will stand before me.
> If you utter what is precious, and not what is >   worthless, > you shall be (once again) as my mouth (15.19).

And then God adds once more the words of promise of the original mission: although people will fight against the prophet, they will not overcome him.

The third reply is made to Baruch, who has likewise complained to God. 'Thus says Yahweh: Behold, what I have built I am breaking down . . . that is, the whole land. And do you seek great things for yourself? . . . I will give you your (naked) life as a prize of war in all places to which you may go' (45.4–5).

Does not the instrument of God become himself excessively the central theme everywhere here, so that the transmission of God's emotions suffers under this?

Nevertheless, Jeremiah gave forth mighty notes as the Aeolian harp struck by God's stormwind. Having developed Hosea's themes in his like-minded song at the beginning (2.1–4.4), he is caught up into the incomprehensible great wind of destruction which he senses approaching; he sees beforehand, in visions of undoubted authenticity, the desolations which this will bring, and sings of them in a terrible song-cycle.[4] He ends with the summons to Zion to roll in the dust and to strike up a threnody as for an only-begotten son (6.26)—a theme that had already been taken up by Amos (8.10) and which resounds again significantly in the last prophecy (Zech 12.10). The great burning wind of destruction, 'a wind full of menace' (4.12), changes everything anew to wilderness,[5] but the hidden intention of God to teach, as in Hosea, cannot be seen here. It is the wilderness of God: God dries everything up, because he found no grape on the vine, no fig on the fig-tree (8.13); God turns his back (18.17), because the people has shown its back to him first (2.27). God departs: 'I have forsaken my house, I have abandoned my heritage . . . they have made it a desolation' (12.7, 11). 'I am weary of relenting' (15.6). Through their sins, the sinners have reached a point beyond mercy (16.13); for 'all faithfulness has perished' (7.28). 'The Lord has rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath' (7.29). 'I will dash them one against another, fathers and sons together. I will not pity or spare or have compassion, that I should not destroy them' (13.14). The prophet must smash a potter's flask symbolically before invited spectators and comment: 'Thus says Yahweh Sabaoth: So will I break this people and this city, as one breaks a potter's vessel, so that it can never be mended' (19.11). And God shows the prophet in the potter's house how one reworks a spoiled vessel on the potter's wheel, in order to make something else out of it (18.4–6). The end is the unburied corpse, the public putrefaction lying on the fields (8.2; 9.21; 16.4; 22.19; 25.33; 36.30), the poisoned water (8.14; 9.14; 23.15).

---

[4] 4.5–8; 4.9–12; 4.13–18; 4.19–22; 4.23–31; 5.1–6; 5.7–11; 5.12–17; 5.26–31; 6.1–8; 6.9–15; 6.16–21; 6.22–26.

[5] 4.11–12; 4.26; 6.8; 7.34; 9.1; 9.11; 10.22; 12.11; 18.16; 19.8; 22.6; 25.38; 33.10, 12; 44, 22; 46.19; 49.33; 50.3; 50.12; 50.40; 51.26, 29; 51.43.

What is transparent in Hosea, and will once more be transparent in Ezekiel—the fact that God's glory, indeed his love, blazes in the midst of his consuming fire—remains obscured in Jeremiah, for it is precisely at this point that the prophet's own lamentation rises on high. Thus his prophecies of salvation retain something that is oddly uncommunicated. Of course, one sees that although God turns his back, he 'attends' (23.2) very precisely to the people that is to be punished and follows all its paths, even to its exile, with his eyes (16.17; 44.11,27); but one does not sense a hidden love therein. The bridge between judgment and love passes through the prophet's heart and is secretly built where he knows that his whole struggle against God within time is overtaken by the grace of his mission before and above time: where his rebellious, bitter heart has acknowledged from the outset that God is in the right (12.1), where the 'God of terror' (17.17) whom his imagination portrays to him has always been perceived to be in reality the God of mercy, where the artificial ignorance of God which he imposes on himself is always based in a knowledge of God that is not to be clouded. This is the source of the promises that are sketched out: above all, the 'new heart' which God himself will give, so that they may 'know that I am the Lord . . . for they shall return to me with their whole heart' (24.7); 'one heart and one way, that they may fear me for ever' (32.39). This process penetrates the interior: 'I will put my law within them, and I will write it upon their hearts' (31.33), in that abyss in man which is accessible only to God and which can be interrogated only by God (17.9–10; 8.6a); then no external instruction about God will be necessary any longer, for 'they shall all know me, from the least of them to the greatest'. And this is because 'I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more' (31.34). And since the old covenant is broken and the shattered vessel can no more be mended, this grace which is bestowed on what is interior in man will have to be called the 'new covenant' (31.31), and then, since this forgiving grace (50.20) comes from the supratemporal dimension in which the mission of the prophet was rooted, it will be an 'eternal covenant' (32.40; 50.5).

The saga links this wholly spiritual promise of the prophet with a parable-like action which he is said to have carried out on his last flight to Egypt: he had the holy tent, the ark of the covenant, and the altar of incense dismantled, found a cave on Mount Nebo, placed the holy vessels there and closed the entrance; those who accompanied him could not find the entrance again, when they looked for it. But Jeremiah reproached them: 'The place shall be unknown until God gathers his people together again and shows his mercy . . . and the glory of the Lord and the cloud will appear, as they were shown in the case of Moses, and as Solomon asked that the place should be specially consecrated' (2 Macc 2.1–8).

6. EZEKIEL

The same event that takes place in Jeremiah's quivering heart under the aspect of subjectivity occurs in the priest-prophet Ezekiel under the aspect of the objectivity of purely sacral ministry: this permits the glory of God to become once more the chief reality that makes itself visible in the existence of the prophet, which is expropriated for God's service; this only intensifies the subjective dramatic quality, both because the servant's responsibility is emphasised much more explicitly (3.16f.; 33.1–9) and because the dimensions of the divine invade the dimensions of the servant with less consideration, to the point of breaking through the ultimate boundary, and thus the harshnesses of the commission appear to be intensified beyond all human attempts at moderation.

Ezekiel's theophany of glory is the greatest and most detailed of the Bible; it is no wonder that the curiosity of religious gnosticism in the late period was strongly attached to this book and, in the form of Merkabah mysticism, became a preliminary stage to the Kabbalah.[1] 'By the river Chebar the heavens were opened' (1.1)—this phrase stands alone in the Old Testament, for it 'goes far beyond the opening of the windows of heaven, mentioned elsewhere, so that the gifts of heaven can be bestowed', 'it has true parallels only in the New Testament' (Rev 4.1; Acts 7.56).[2] In terms of event, the only thing comparable would be Elijah's assumption to heaven with a vehicle of fire and whirlwinds, but the event here is the opposite of this: here, it is the glory of heaven that storms down from the open heaven. And in exact contradistinction to Isaiah's sublime, static vision of the glory of God in and above the temple on Zion, it appears before Ezekiel, incomprehensibly, in the impure land of exile, and with a clear character of judgment which refers backwards, more clearly than the glory which Isaiah saw, to the mysterious and terrifying phenomena of the exodus.

---

[1] Gershom Scholem, 'Merkabah Mysticism and Jewish Gnosticism' in; Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1961), pp. 40–79; 355–369.

[2] Walter Eichrodt, Der Prophet Ezechiel, ATD (1959 and 1966), p. 5.

'As I looked, behold, a stormy wind came out of the north, and a great cloud, and fire flashing forth continually, and in the midst of the fire, as it were gleaming bronze. And from the midst of it came the likeness of four living creatures. And this was their appearance: they had the form of men, but each had four faces, and each of them had four wings. Their legs were straight, and the soles of their feet sparkled like burnished bronze. Under their wings on their four sides they had human hands. As for the likeness of their faces, each had the face of a man in front; the four had the face of a lion on the right side, the four had the face of an ox on the left side, and the four had the face of an eagle at the back. And their wings were spread out above; each creature had two wings, each of which touched the wing of another, while two covered their bodies. And each went straight forward; wherever the spirit would go, they went, without turning as they went. In the midst of the living creatures there was something that looked like burning coals of fire, like torches moving to and fro among the living creatures; and the fire was bright, and out of the fire went forth lightning. Over the heads of the living creatures there was the likeness of a firmament, shining like crystal . . . and above there was the likeness of a throne, in appearance like sapphire; and seated above the likeness of a throne was a likeness as it were of a human form. And upward from what had the appearance of his loins I saw as it were the appearance of gleaming bronze; and downwards from what had the appearance of his loins I saw as it were the appearance of fire, and there was brightness round about him. Like the appearance of the bow in the cloud on a day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about. Such was the appearance of the likeness of Yahweh. And when I saw it, I fell on my face' (1.4–28).[3]

All this is only a manifestation, without a single word; it is only in the next verse that Ezekiel, who has sunk to the ground, is addressed. It is, then, an 'open heaven' with a vitality and a differentiation that goes far beyond Isaiah. The three seraphim which sing praises as they fly are replaced by four cherubim, each with four faces: and this twelvefold character is closer to the world of human beings, while at the same time it is red-hot with the Spirit of God who drives it on always to something new, something that lies in the future; there is never any turning back to what has been in the past. Each is driven on individually, but is in contact with the others through the tips of its wings; each is a personified mission, like the mission that the prophet will have to accept: the unity of highest spontaneity and highest availability to the Spirit of God, and all the space between them and within them is filled with the fire of God which is alive and throbs as it emits lightning-flashes. All of this is the base on which rests the firmament with the throne, and the invisible God sits upon this—for the first time!—in a form comparable to the human form, which makes clear the mysterious 'form' of Yahweh which Moses (while not seeing the face: Ex 33.20) had seen (Num 12.8). And this 'form' of God is differentiated into a form 'upwards' and a form 'downwards' (in the direction of the world) and a rainbow light that flows around everything.

---

[3] The text as reconstructed by Eichrodt, omitting the glosses and the description of the 'wheels' that accompany the four living creatures, which has been taken over from the second vision of kabod in Jerusalem (ch. 10) and worked into the first vision.

When visions of such impact and strangeness, which fall on the seer with the vehemence of the 'wholly other', are described, it is wholly misguided to suppose that the seer has pasted the individual elements together from some motifs or other which were well-known at that period.[4] The very repetition by Ezekiel in this passage of 'as it were', with its rejection of any inner-worldly univocal character, shows clearly that we have no interlacing of images from his memory here, but something that surpasses all normal dimensions and imposes itself with sovereign force from above. Here, Sinai becomes present in a new form: in the unity of the darkness of the cloud and of the lightning-flashes and flames that break forth from its midst. But while at Sinai there was a vertical descent of Yahweh (Ex 19.20), here it is a driving storm from the north, whence invasion and catastrophe customarily come: it is explicitly the glory that arrives for judgment, glory that becomes judgment through its 'mobility', because it is not bound to the holiest place, the temple on Zion, but is able to leave it (as once in the past the glory passed from the ark to the foe: 1 Sam 3–6; Ps 78.61), as it does in fact do demonstratively, taking off eastwards before the prophet's very eyes: 10.19 = 11.22–23. This glory will become judgment in a yet more terrible way, because one of the seven angels of destruction will fetch from the midst of its flames the burning coals with which Jerusalem is to be burned: 9.1–10.2,7. Both events are linked in the second great complex of visions, chs. 8–11.

---

[4] Eichrodt must ultimately admit that: 'Ezekiel himself clearly felt more strongly what distinguished his vision from the Old Testament world of images than what these had in common'. But he had previously spoken of a 'spontaneous coming to life of a familiar world of images'—a phrase that is very mild when compared to other evaluations—and had pointed to the well-known Phoenician thrones of Astarte, with their seat borne by two winged beings on the right and the left, and to an ancient Babylonian statue in bronze of a god with four human (!) faces; he finds a source of the wheels and the throne chariot in a portable framework in the temple at Jerusalem for the ark when this was carried in processions (pp. 53–54). Once one ventures upon such speculations, one must also suppose that the seers

The first vision, at first wordless, culminates in God's address to the prophet, now prostrate on the ground: the word penetrates him as the power of the Spirit and sets him on his feet again. The glory is almighty to such an extent that it itself creates its partner and sets him on his feet. Throughout the book, the one who is now to be sent is called 'son of man', marking out afresh every time the distance which is proper to reverence, adoration and service. Once again, this is from the very beginning a vocation to go to the rebellious and stiff-necked, a commission to do something futile, without anxiety, but without any genuine hope (2.3–7). 'Whether they listen to you or not' (2.5,7), God will of the Bible have simply copied from each other, which means that the concluding vision of the open heaven, the Apocalypse of John, is degraded to the level of a literary product. One must rather insist on the 'vision world' with its objective contents, a world that makes its fullness, transcending the world, visible in ever new aspects through the centuries, although it is not possible to use earthly concepts to calculate what there is of progress all in this. On this, and on the form of reality of the contents of the vision, cf. Adrienne von Speyr, Apokalypse, vol. I (1950), pp. 13–44.

establish his power, and in judgment or salvation 'they will know that I am Yahweh'.[5] Nor is it for the sake of those who refuse him that God will establish his power, but solely for his own sake, because God owes it to himself, because he owes it to his own name, because he swears it to himself[6]—the various phrases are piled up to make it clear that every relationship between God and others in salvation history can find its ground only in God himself. Whatever there is of love within this salvific act of God, it is initially enclosed within the circulation of the tremendous, absolute divine 'I' which is filled through and through with his own glory.

From this 'I', there goes forth a commission to the 'son of man', summarised in a scroll which he must eat and 'fill his stomach' with (3.3), although it contains 'words of lamentation and mourning and woe' on the outside and the inside. Ezekiel as it were receives his mission in the form of communion: no longer will he live, but the mission will live in him. He is taken hold of in a more total and more brutal manner than the earlier prophets, but not in such a way that Ezekiel would thereby become a mechanical instrument: quite the opposite is true, for his own responsibility grows beyond all measure, since he is not only required to proclaim and to carry out symbolic acts, but is explicitly made responsible for those whom he addresses. If he fails to warn the sinner, and the sinner dies without having been rebuked, then while it is true that the latter will bear the consequences of his guilt, nevertheless 'his blood I will require at your hand' (3.18). An aspect of this ministry as 'watchman' is the intercessory prayers of the prophet, which however are brushed aside both times without explanation (9.8f.; 11.13). Through his mission, therefore, the prophet is both the personified word of God for the people and also one who has totally entered into its destiny of destruction and is thus fully in solidarity with the people; he is the anger of God that breaks upon their heads, and the one upon whose head this anger breaks. He unites these two natures in his person, and their unification reveals the absolute contrast between the transcendent glory of the absolute Lord and the weak, tortured bundle of humanity that Ezekiel is, as he stands at the head of his guilty fellow sufferers. It is but a step from here to the 'Servant of Yahweh' of Second Isaiah and to the 'Son of Man' of the new covenant.

---

[5] W. Zimmerli, 'Erkenntnis Gottes nach dem Buche Ezechiel', 1954, reprinted in: Gottes Offenbarung (1963), pp. 41–119.

[6] 'For the sake of my name': 20.9; 20.14; 20.22; 20.44. God swears by his own life: 5.11; 14.16; 14.18; 14.20; 16.48; 17.19; 18.3; 20.3, 31, 33; 33.11; 33.27; 34.8; 35.6; 35.11. God will sanctify his name: 36.22–23; 39.7; 39.25. God reveals his glory: 39.21; his holiness: 39.27.

Once again, what is significant is God's laying hold of the bodily dimension, a process which had begun with Hosea and appears here in intensified form: the prophet is stricken with dumbness (3.26) and paralysed for a long time (4.8), and he will be freed from the defencelessness of not being able to explain himself only when one who has escaped from the catastrophe of Jerusalem comes and confirms his prophecies (24.26–27; 33.22). He must act out a symbolic siege of Jerusalem in the land of exile (4.1–8), taking upon himself 'the punishment of the house of Israel' and then 'the punishment of the house of Judah' (4.4, 6); during this time, God 'binds him' like a beast that is to be sacrificed. He must content himself with siege-food, prepared in a disgusting manner (4.9–17), and he must cut his hair and his beard, burning a third, cutting up another third with the sword, and casting the last third to the wind: only a tiny remnant is to be sheltered in his mantle, and even a part of this is to be burned—even Isaiah's 'remnant' is called into question, and what holds out in Jerusalem will be destroyed. The prophet must pack his goods and escape from his house at night through a hole in the wall in deep darkness (12.1–16): he is the departure into exile. He must eat his bread in trembling and drink his water in fearfulness (12.17–18), for he is the existence of Israel scattered abroad. And when he is declared to be a '(land-)mark' (12.6b; 12.11; 24.24), then one must bear in mind that the bodily sphere is not only an allegory for the spirit, but the place where the spirit realises itself and portrays itself. The symbolic actions of the prophets[7] are more than an 'autonomous means of proclamation':[8] while they certainly do display 'a striking similarity to magical action', they yet lack any magical quality, since they are actions carried out in obedience to God; the best way to look at them is as the beginning of something that will become the sacraments of the new covenant (sacramenta continent quod significant, 'the sacraments contain what they signify': Trent session VII; Denzinger-Schönmetzer 1606), in that the bodily existence of the one sent is expropriated in favour of the incarnation of the divine word and commission. This becomes terribly clear one final time, in the commission that comes upon Ezekiel at the death of his wife: 'Son of man, behold, I am about to take the delight of your eyes from you at a stroke; yet you shall not mourn or weep nor shall your tears run down'. 'I spoke to the people in the morning, and at evening my wife died. And on the next morning I did as I was commanded.' And he explains to the people that the destruction of the holy city, 'the pride of your power, the delight of your eyes, and the desire of your soul' will take place so suddenly that there will be no time left for songs of lament (24.15–24). There is nothing in the bodily sphere that is too personal to be expropriated for God's purposes and made an instrument for these. Ezekiel gesticulates with his whole existence. He is charged to clap his hands and stamp his feet while he prophesies (6.11), to 'cry and wail' with broken heart (21.11); indeed, it looks as if the terrible 'song of the sword', in which Yahweh's sword takes on a life of its own and jumps and flashes on all sides in the desire to kill—while Yahweh himself beats time to this with his hands—was sung in a genuine sword-dance (21.14–22).[9] But every effort is in vain and pointless: people listen for a while to the prophet, as to one singing on the streets, and then go on their way (33.32), as will happen to Jesus too (Lk 7.32).

---

[7] G. Fohrer, Die symbolischen Handlungen der Propheten, 1953.

This humiliation of the prophet is the salvific mediation between the ever deeper involuntary humiliation of the disloyal people and the hidden ever deeper humiliation of the glory of God as he carries out his judgment.

---

[8] W. Eichrodt, op. cit., p. 26.

[9] Van den Born, Ezechiel uit de Grondtekst vertaald en uitgelegd, 1954; quoted from Eichrodt, op. cit., p. 192.

In order to understand the humiliation of the people, one must see that for the priest Ezekiel—who agrees here with the Deuteronomist(s)—all sin is faithlessness against the one God of the covenant, above all the profanation of his holy presence through foreign cults. It is not for nothing that the aim of the second great vision of glory is to lead the prophet in the spirit through the rooms of the temple and to show him there one after another the cult of Ishtar (8.5–6), Egyptian secret cults (8.7–13), the Tammuz cult (8.14–15), and the Babylonian cult of the sun (8.16–17). But had things ever really been better? Ezekiel paints the entire history of Israel in great frescoes: for him, Israel's faithlessness goes back to the remotest times. The fresco in ch. 20 puts the origin of the cult of idols at the time of Israel's election in Egypt and traces its development in four stages, in which God spares the people for the sake of his name. The same is true of ch. 25, where the northern and the southern kingdoms appear as two harlots whom Yahweh has chosen in love: 'they played the harlot in Egypt; they played the harlot in their youth' (23.3, 19); Judah's fornication changes from the Egyptians to the Assyrians, but is not satisfied with that, and finally woos the Chaldaeans. At the close, Yahweh gives the harlot the cup of his wrath, which Samaria has already drunk, with a drinking-song (23.32–34): 'you shall drink it and drain it out, and its sherds will tear your breasts'. Ch. 16 summarises the whole theology of harlotry since Hosea in a final, detailed fresco which was subsequently expanded twice (16.44–52, 53–63, perhaps also vv. 30–34): Jerusalem (as the beautiful girl is called this time) is told, 'Your origin and your birth are of the land of the Canaanites; your father was an Amorite, and your mother a Hittite'[10]—thus she has already idolatry and fornication in herself as a part of her inheritance. Unwashed, exposed in the open field contemptuously, she is weltering in her blood when Yahweh finds her and brings her up; when her body blooms and her breasts swell, at 'the age for love'

---

[10] The 'casual remark . . . is amazing . . . because the two terms exactly fit the actual historical conditions which obtained in Jerusalem before the time of David—a Canaanite population and a 'Hittite' governing class': von Rad, ThOT, vol. II, p. 221.

Yahweh binds himself to her, makes a covenant with her, clothes and adorns her as beautifully as possible. 'And your renown went forth among the nations because of your beauty, for it was perfect through the splendour which I had bestowed on you. But you trusted in your beauty, and played the harlot because of your renown, and lavished your harlotries on any passers by': on the Egyptians, Assyrians, Canaanites, and Babylonians. Indeed, the harlot does not even require payment, for she herself pays her customers with the presents which her true husband has given her. Thus (as in ch. 23) the unfaithful one will be utterly humiliated: she will be stripped naked in the presence of all her lovers (this was always the embodiment of shame for Israel), her bed of lust (the holy land) will be laid waste, she herself will be mutilated (23.25), then stoned and burnt: 'So I will satisfy my fury on you'. The first addition is fully Ezekielic:[11] it sets Jerusalem, which was the first thanks to its election, mission, and responsibility,[12] in the last place after the disloyal Samaria and Sodom, the very embodiment of sin: through the shame of her fornication, she has 'justified' her sisters, relatively speaking. Therefore, as the second appendix adds, she will also be the last to be re-established. And when God, out of sheer mercy, wishes to recall the covenant which he once made with the girl, then she will 'remember and be confounded, and never again open your mouth again because of your shame' (16.62–63).—Although Hosea, Isaiah and Jeremiah had sung of the vine which God had planted, Ezekiel initially uses this image only as a further means to humble the people (ch. 15): the wood of the vine cannot be used for anything, the carpenter cannot find any use for it, 'it is given to the fire for fuel'. What Jerusalem could have been, would have been the product of grace alone: in itself, it is worth less than the woods of the other peoples; the word here is en route to Jesus' parable of the vine. Israel will be humiliated until it is utterly disgusted at itself (6.9; 16.63; 20.43; 36.31); and since this ultimate goal seems far off to Ezekiel, he must prophesy the destruction of Jerusalem with uttermost harshness and mercilessness. Everything must be put in the smelting oven (22.17–22) and a wild 'cooking song' (24.3f.) stokes the fire of wrath, until the brew is completely cooked. All compassion is out of place now (7.9; 24.14), and even children will not be spared because of their pious parents (14.12f.), or, if they are spared, this only for the sake of a deeper judgment (14.22). On the margin, as an accompaniment, Ezekiel sings of the fall into Hell of the superpowers of the world, in extensive poems that belong to the most powerful passages in the Bible.[13] But while these Titans are being buried in Hell, God will take another path with Israel: it will be led into the 'wilderness of the peoples' (20.35). This wilderness is only remotely reminiscent of the event of the exodus, and it has only external connections with the image of Hosea's and Jeremiah's yearning, the image of return to the solitary intimacy of the early period. Ezekiel's wilderness is a space empty and burnt out after all the fires of destruction, a state that lies almost on the far side of death in direct confrontation with the God who chooses and rejects, who is judge and loving husband. 'I will bring you into the wilderness of the peoples, and there I will enter into judgment with you face to face . . and I will make you pass under the rod', as the shepherd does when he counts the herd and brings it home, 'and I will let you go in by number' (20.35–37). This is a judgment that establishes justice by separating: 'I judge between sheep and sheep, rams and he-goats' (34.17).[14] It is only by passing through this wilderness that Israel can find the path back to God, for even now he is with the exiles and not with those who are in Jerusalem and still believe that they possess the sanctuary (11.14–18): for his glory has appeared at the river Chebar and has withdrawn from the temple to the sound of the rushing wings of the cherubim (11.22–23).

---

[11] Its motif is anticipated at 5.5–7. The theme goes back to Jer 3.6–11, and even the comparative justification is present there already (3.11).

[12] The navel of the world: 38.12; 5.5; cf. 17.22 (Jerusalem on the mythical world-mountain).

God undertakes the task of Ezekiel's purification more personally than with any other prophet. Thus it is deeply significant that the fire which is to destroy Jerusalem is fetched with a liturgical solemnity out of the midst of the burning glory of God. After the six angels who have been sent out have marked the sign of the cross[15] on the forehead of the chosen, the seventh is addressed: '"Go in among the whirling wheels underneath the cherubim; fill your hands with burning coals from between the cherubim and scatter them over the city". And he went in before my eyes . . . And a cherub stretched forth his hand from between the cherubim to the fire that was between the cherubim, and took some of it, and put it into the hands of the man clothed in linen, who took it and went out' (10.2, 7).[16] Here God commands him first to strike the temple, to 'make it impure' by filling it with corpses (9.7). God in his judgment often comes into such an unprotected proximity to sin in Ezekiel (cf. 14.9;[17] 20.25–26), a proximity that makes a scandalous impression on a pious person, but with a shocking effect that is intentional. God reserves Israel's punishment to himself (35.11) a punishment he will deal out at close quarters. He knows what he is doing: 'As I live, I will deal with you' (20.33f.). All that can be done now is to understand this pitiless surgery as an act of utterly secret tenderness, a tenderness that humiliates itself more deeply in Ezekiel than ever before. God burns his faithless bride and tempers her with his own glory. It would be very superficial to see in Ezekiel's judging God only an unapproachable sublimity removed far above the world, and in the prophet himself only an iron servile obedience that is often cruel. The fire that blazes around God and the prophet is the inexorable glow of absolute love,[18] humiliated by the harlot Jerusalem and by the two harlots Samaria and Judah in order to be given up through them to the mockery of all the peoples with whom the harlots dally.

---

[13] Chs. 26–32.

[14] In the context, this oracle, which points ahead to Matt 25, refers above all to the judgment against the wicked shepherds of the people.

---

[15] The letter Tau, as an upright or diagonal cross (Fohrer, op. cit., p. 54).

[16] One must certainly also set alongside this passage the fall from Heaven of the king of Tyre, who was initially (in an image from the myth of the original man) set by God in a heavenly paradise of 'marvellous beauty' as a 'seal of perfection', provided with a cherub to protect him, 'walking in the midst of the stones of fire', until hubris took hold of him and he was 'cast down' by God 'from the mountain of God,' 'and the guardian cherub drove you out from the midst of the stones of fire', and God 'brought forth fire from the midst of you' and 'turned you to ashes upon the earth' (28.11–18). Although the mythical poetic images which Ezekiel employs here are not precisely the same as those of the vision, the latter is still recalled by the sequence of existence within the realm of God's fiery glory and then a judgment that makes the consuming fire break forth from within the sinner.

[17] Cf. here 1 Kings 22.

It is only from the utter desolation of the scene of the fire and the wilderness that the love of God can set up a pure kingdom: through forgiveness of sin, washing the stains away with pure water, without any merit (ch. 20; 36.25), through nothing less than a resurrection of the dead bones to living life as the work of the Spirit of God (ch. 37). Here it is God himself who plants his 'humbled tree' anew and makes it grow into a 'wonderful cedar' so that 'the birds of heaven make their nests therein' (17.22–24). It is God who deposes the bad shepherds and himself undertakes to be the shepherd of his people, going in search of the lost sheep, binding up the wounded and healing the sick (34.16). It is true that a final battle must still be fought against the great enemy from the north; but God must fight this battle all alone for mankind, until the weapons of the foe can once and for all be burnt (chs. 38–39). Then will God's glory radiate out over his people (39.7, 13, 21). As in Jeremiah, the turning-point is the moment at which God carries out the inner purification and preparation of hearts for the covenant of his love: 'A new heart I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you; and I will take out of your flesh the heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes and observe my ordinances . . . and you shall be my people, and I will be your God' (36.26–28).[19]

The external image which corresponds to this interior process is the vision of the return of the glory of God to the renewed temple (43.1–9), with the earth reflecting the glory of God. Once again 'the glory of Yahweh now fills the temple', and this is 'the place of my throne and the place where I set my feet', as in the time of Isaiah. But the sanctuary which Ezekiel sees, recording its measurements together with a measuring angel, is an eschatological temple, like the Jerusalem whose measurement Zechariah and then John will see. The mighty image of the spring of living water that flows out of the new temple and swells mightily as it descends to the Dead Sea, is doubtless the last thing that is from the hand of Ezekiel himself, and it will be given new life in John's Apocalypse.[20] [18] This point is made insistently and very correctly by W. Eichrodt, op. cit., pp. 126–127.

---

[19] Disciples have subsequently placed this high-point of the book in an anticipatory position in the section dealing with judgment (11.19–20), where it is out of place.

---

[20] It seems impossible to attribute to the prophet himself the petty prescriptions of ch. 44.4–46 and ch. 48: it is only too clear that the eschatological image is being dragged down to the level of the superseded legalism of the priestly circles of Jerusalem. Precisely this synthesis was something desired by these circles, but we cannot attribute this to the mighty spirit of the prophet. These chapters document the attempt of Judaism to narrow down the breadth which had been attained in the exile and to bring it back to an earlier format.

7. LITURGIES OF LAMENT

Israel prays even in the period in which the glory has departed; at the site of the temple, after its destruction by fire in 587, it celebrates the liturgy of the 'Lamentations'. As charred beams make present the absence of the once-beautiful house, so the desolation of Jerusalem makes present the absence of Yahweh. Only the one who once was chosen knows what it is to be rejected; only the one who once was cherished and loved knows what it is to be abandoned. Israel has no possibility of interpreting this emptiness, which is all that remains to it, as a mode of the divine presence, or the evident character of its present rejection as a mode of its election. Israel can do only one thing: see its situation and take it to heart, and this above all in prayer, presenting itself in its greatest shame and nakedness before the God who has justly brought all this about. And since this is a liturgy, petitions and the expression of hope will not be wholly absent; but they give the impression of soullessness, they reach up to Heaven like stumps of trees stripped of their leaves. The community in its lamentation is far from a positive assessment of its suffering as fruitfulness or even as vicarious representation in any sense.

This separates the lamenting city from Paul, when it calls itself 'offscouring and refuse' (3.45), for 'her uncleanness' clings to her, 'therefore her fall is terrible' (1.9). Once she was beautiful, because God's glory shed its light on her. But 'the perfection of beauty, the joy of all the earth' has passed away (2.15), her 'splendour' (tip'ereth, 2.1), her majesty (hadar, 1.6), have vanished, her 'crown has fallen' (5.16), her 'gold has grown dim, the pure metal is distorted' (4.1). For God's anger 'surrounds her like a cloud' (2.1), 'he will regard them no more' (4.16). When his glory dwelt in her, she was in heaven, but now she has been 'cast down from heaven to earth' (2.1), 'into darkness without any light' (3.2). Since God's being is revelation, his absence is the interruption of communication: 'the law (Torah) is no more, and her prophets obtain no vision from Yahweh' (2.9); all that they can do now is to sit in silence on the ground (2.10).

And this is the outcome of what has been done by God, who once had fought on behalf of Zion but has now become her declared 'enemy': 'he has destroyed all its palaces', 'he has broken down his booth, laid in ruins the place of his appointed feasts','in his indignation has spurned king and priest' (2.5–6).[1] But this raging of God against his people is understood as the fulfilment of the promise, or rather the threat (2.17), and this already means that it is the consequence of Zion's own guilt. What is bitter is not (as in the case of Job) to think of the incomprehensible act of God in surrounding Zion with a cloud; rather, it is 'wormwood and gall' (3.19) to think unceasingly of one's own sin, which is greater 'than the sin of Sodom' (4.6): 'the sins of her prophets and the iniquities of her priests' (4.13), and already the sins of 'our fathers', with whom the people of today stand in solidarity (5.7). The liturgy here above all indicates, discloses and spreads out the terrible reality. But the liturgy calls on God to look. 'Behold, and see our disgrace!' (5.1). 'Yahweh, behold my affliction' (1.9). And, with a certain trepidation, there is also the prayer: 'Look, Yahweh, and see! With whom hast thou dealt thus?' (2.20). But this is not a judgment on the Lord, but rather the admission that he is right: 'Yahweh is in the right, for I have rebelled against his word' (1.18). This is judgment on oneself, within the judgment made by God, and thereby 'doxology of judgment',[2] giving God the glory of which one had deprived him and which he himself has withdrawn and veiled.

---

[1] Cf. 4.11. It is clear from the comparison with the Sumerian hymns of lamentation that the 'lament for the destroyed sanctuary' exisits in other cultures of the Near East: Falkenstein and von Soden, Sumerische und akkadische Hymnen und Gebete (1953), pp. 187f., 192f.; cf. H. J. Kraus, Klagelieder (1960), pp. 9f.; S. N. Kramer, Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur (Oriental Institute of Chicago, Ass. Studies 12, 1940). Here too we have a lament for the divinity that has departed, leaving its 'perch empty', with the divinity itself beginning the lament in some cases. But precisely where the forms correspond to one another, the distinctiveness of the experience of abandonment because of the guilt of broken fidelity to the covenant becomes all the clearer.

A text from Leviticus, probably contemporary with Lamentations (26.27f.), describes the same wrath of Yahweh that rages against people, city, land and sanctuary until everything is destroyed, driving the human hearts into anxiety (vv. 36f.) in order thus to compel them to confession of sin and self-humbling, something that is then understood explicitly as expiation and is accompanied by forgiveness (vv. 41–42). But the liturgy of Lamentations does not wish to anticipate this forgiveness.

The third liturgy, in its middle section (3.21–33), modulates into hope. Old themes from the Psalms emerge, but everything remains subdued. 'One must hope in silence.' 'Perhaps there is still hope.' And there is the direction 'to turn the other cheek to the one who smites'. It is as if the lamentation was ashamed to ask for further graces after all that has happened.

Like the Book of Job, and like many passages in Jeremiah and Ezekiel and many Psalms, the Lamentations seek to sketch an absolute suffering. They do this, not by intensifying the subjective element, but by drawing on their knowledge in faith about the darkness that comes into being where God turns away and withdraws. The shadows of death from the nether world far removed from God, the embodiment of what is not redeemed, cast the darkness of their definitiveness upon the living. Here the Biblical lament is quite different from the Greek tragedy which likewise attempted to portray absolute suffering in the face of a black heaven.[3] It is not the capacity of the human heart to suffer (a capacity that permits it to grow beyond the gods themselves) that provides the measurement of absolute suffering, but the reality that is brought about by the turning away of the living God. The one who laments and implores stands in this reality, determined and judged by it, without being able to forge out of it an argument against God, since it furnishes him with nothing that can be measured in human terms. Although the darkness surpasses his human format, since it is the shadow and the emptiness of God, the smashed sanctuary in which he now sits is the image of his own guilt. It is only one who has been chosen that can be rejected, and this means that he has no other choice—if he wishes and is able to escape from his condition—than turn to the one who has turned away, or (as Augustine puts it) to take flight to the one from whom one is in flight. This is why the hymns end with a question:

---

[2] Kraus, op. cit., p. 33. On the theme of the doxology of judgment, cf. F. Horst, 'Die Doxologien im Amosbuch', ZAW 47 (1929). pp. 45f.

[3] Vol. IV of this work, pp. 101–154 (Eng. trans).

'Or hast thou utterly rejected us? Art thou exceedingly angry with us?' (5.22).

8. JOB

In Ezekiel, God's 'glory' had appeared in a 'stormy wind out of the north', blazing in lightning-flashes in the dense cloud that accompanied this wind (Ezek 1.4), and already in the later Isaiah God's visitation could take this form of 'tempest and the flame of a devouring fire' (Is 29.6). But in Job, all that is left of God's glory is the 'tempest' (se‘ara); Yahweh had not been present in the 'tempest' for Elijah (1 Kings 19.11), though he had in the end caught him up to himself in the 'tempest' (2 Kings 2.1, 11). In Job, however, the God who appears in the 'tempest' is not the God who appears in wrath (Jer 23.19; 30.23), but the one who is utterly stripped of the splendour of his appearing, a 'naked kabod' that corresponds to Job's stripping and nakedness before God.

No matter when the ultimate redaction of the poetry may have taken place, in terms of ideas it belongs between Ezekiel and Lamentations on the one hand and Deutero-Isaiah on the other: between the departure of the glory of God, leaving behind burnt-out ruins, and the mystery of the night of the 'Servant of Yahweh', although there is as yet no intuition of this figure.[1] Since Job is not an Israelite,[2] he stands outside the problematic of covenant and covenantal solidarity. With Noah and the Ugarite Daniel, he is one of the exemplary wise men of the primitive period (Ezek 14.14, 20); the framework narrative presents him as the type of the man who stands in integrity (tam)[3] before God, and he will himself appeal in his speeches to the integrity (tumma: 1.1, 3, 9) which is acknowledged as his at the beginning of the story (27.5; 31.6). When he is robbed of all his goods and his wife incites him to blasphemy, he does not sin with even a single word, but blesses the name of God from whom he is willing to receive misfortune as a present, just as he is willing to receive good fortune; God, who sent him forth naked from the womb of his mother, can strip him naked as a preparation for his death (1.21; 2.10).

---

[1] On this dating, cf. D. Barthélemy, Gott mit seinem Ebenbild (1966), p. 23.

[2] On the whereabouts of Uz: cf. Friedrich Horst, Hiob (1962), pp. 8f.

[3] Thus at once in 1.1 and then frequently: 1.8; 2.3; 8.20; 9.20–22.

The integrity of Jacob's 'yes' to God forms the indispensable framework for his struggle with God, whose image becomes so distorted for him in the dark night of suffering that it takes on demonic form. We shall find the definitive answer to the question of how this obscuring of God's image is possible only at the conclusion, but we shall not be wrong to see the answer as connected with God's 'wager' with the accusing angel, even although the 'prelude in Heaven' is concerned only with the withdrawal of Job's external possessions and ultimately of his physical health. The fall into the inner spiritual darkness is the prolongation of these withdrawals and a hidden intervention of the heavenly world is at least one of the presuppositions of this fall.

Job does not transpose himself, but comes into a condition that is unknown to him and that cannot be brought into any proportion to the states that could be envisaged on the basis of the relationship with God which he has had hitherto; this also means that it is not possible to identify the path taken from those old religious experiences to this new experience, since a yawning gulf lies between the two worlds of experience that forbids any spiritual linking, any common language, any dialectical reconciliation. On the one side sit the three friends with the old experience (which was Job's experience too), on the other side sits Job by himself; and when both sides speak with one another, their monologues pass each other by without meeting. The friends continually appeal to their experience, which is the universal experience crystallised by tradition.[4] Job rejects this impatiently with an 'I know, I know'.[5] 'I also could speak as you do, if you were in my place; I could join words together against you, and shake my head at you', as you now do at me (16.4). But precisely this is the point: Job speaks out of the pain of an experience of being robbed, an experience that the others do not know. 'If I speak, my pain is not assuaged, and if I forbear, how much of it leaves me?' (16.6). Just as the friends who draw near to Job initially do not recognise him, because his external appearance is so disfigured (2.12), they do not recognise him internally during the whole conversation. He has been robbed of all dignity, all the splendour (kabod) that his being earlier possessed and irradiated, the kabod that is bestowed on man by creation[6] (19.9). This makes him spiritually one of those cast out, and he describes himself thus in great detail (30.1–8). He has lost his human honour, he is the object of mockery (30.1), of scorn (30.10), one on whom people spit (17.6). Thus he has come into absolute isolation, which has the bitterness of abandonment for him: he is 'avoided', 'evaded', 'forgotten', he becomes 'a stranger and an alien' for those who live in his house; indeed, he becomes one whose 'evil stench' is repulsive to them (19.13–19).

---

[4] 'I speak from experience' (4.8); 'Lo, this we have observed; it is true' (5.27); 'consider what the fathers have found' (8.8); 'what I have seen, I will declare, what wise men have told' (15.17–18).

[5] 'Truly I know that it is so' (9.2). 'Lo, my eye has seen all this, my ear has heard and understood it. What you know, I also know; I am not inferior to you' (13.1–2). 'I have heard many such things; miserable comforters are you all' (16.2).

This isolation is so deep that only God himself can have caused it. 'In your light do we see light,' says the Psalm (36.10), and these deeply mysterious words must mean that where the light of human existence, its dignity and its communication, has disappeared, the deeper 'light of the face of God' (Ps 27.1; 89.16) has been taken away too (29.3). God 'hides his face' (13.24), as the traditional expression says, although this reveals only one side of the paradoxical relationship. Ps 139.7–10 had described the impossibility of fleeing from God, since he is present everywhere, but Job harshly upholds the contrary position:

> Behold, I go eastwards, but he is not there;
> and westwards, but I cannot perceive him;
> in the north I seek him, but I cannot behold him;
> I turn to the south, but I cannot see him (23.8–9).[7]

---

[6] Ps 8.6.

[7] At this point the mighty poem about the essentially hidden, unsearchable wisdom of God in the creation, which is interpolated in ch. 28,

But just as, in the Psalm, man meets God who is present everywhere, even when he flees, so Job unfailingly encounters the God who is absent. He is 'encircled' by him (3.23), just as those who lamented in Jerusalem were 'walled about with hewn stones' (Lam 3.9), he is put in a prison (12.14), besieged (19.12) by the God who shows himself to be his enemy, as he was the enemy of those who lamented in Jerusalem too (13.24; 16.12f.; 19.11). God hunts him down (10.16) and covers him with war (10.17); but in such a war it is clear from the outset that God has the 'upper hand' (9.2–3; 9.19; 12.13–25) and therefore 'ravishes' the frail creature and 'despises the work of his hands' (10.3). 'Thy hands fashioned and made me; and now thou dost turn about and destroy me' (10.8). Did God have the thought of destruction at the back of his mind at creation, when he set in work the whole business of procreation (10.9–10)? Even then, this humiliated creature would still stand under God's gaze, but God's act of noticing, observing, indeed of staring relentlessly (7.16–20; 10.20; 14.3) from an invisible ambush (9.11) would then be only the terrible parody of the feeling of security in the wings and in the embracing gaze of God, of which the pious in Israel sing.

Job has come adrift from the old relationship to God, and all the arguments drawn from this relationship have no further power to reach him. 'Your maxims are proverbs of ashes,' he tells the three friends when they suggest that he should cultivate patience and trust (4.6), that he should keep to the traditional wisdom (8.8–22), that he should pray (11.13), and above all that he should admit his guilt before God, since his suffering can be understood only as a punishment. Indeed, it is at this point that the dialogue breaks down into a dialectic: for the friends, Job's speeches convict him irrefutably of the sin that he refuses to admit, and his is given its justification. Just as Job does not doubt the reality of God, so this poem does not doubt the reality of the wisdom that conceals itself behind all that exists: but 'The deep says, "It is not in me," and the sea says, "It is not with me" . . . It is hid from the eyes of all living, and concealed from the birds of the air. Abaddon and Death say, "We have heard a rumour of it with our ears"' (28.14, 21–22). This is the extension to the whole cosmos of Job's experience: God is present as the one who is absent.

accusations against God are blasphemous (15.6); but from Job's perspective, the insistent exhortations of the friends are nothing other than the proof that God has become his enemy, for now he has turned even his friends into opponents:

> Men have gaped at me with their mouth, > they have struck me insolently upon the cheek . . .
> God gives me up to the ungodly, > and casts me into the hands of the wicked (16.10–11).

The lethal dialectic is driven to its extremes by the intervention of a fourth speaker, Elihu, who dismisses the arguments of the three friends as inadequate and makes himself 'God's advocate' vis-à-vis Job (36.3). His weapon in argument—with full justification from his own standpoint—is the divinity, i.e. the absoluteness of God: God is right a priori, because he is God and also because as creator he has established all innerworldly justice (34.13–17). On this basis, it is easy to disqualify Job's claims—that he has not sinned in such a way that he would deserve such a punishment, that he is obliged to go to law against God because he has been denied the justice owed him, and that it does not affect God whether or not a man sins (33–35)—with reasons that Elihu finally summarises in a hymn to the transcendent God (36.22–37.24). This hymn goes beyond a similar hymn of Bildad (25.2–6; 26.1–14): while Bildad describes the greatness of God with strongly mythical hues—the trembling of Sheol and of its inhabitants before God, his stripping Abbadon naked, God's fight against 'Rahab' and the 'fleeing serpent',[8] and the appearing of God in the epiphany of the storm—these mythical images recede in Elihu to make way for praise of the greatness of God in nature and in its wonderful works, praise of the obedience of the natural beings to God's instructions, praise of God's inscrutability, culminating once again in the traditional image of the divine epiphany in the storm. The emphasis lies on the idea that man 'is to look with astonishment' on God's working in nature and in the world of mankind in 'reverence' and 'at a distance' (36.25; 37.24). Man knows God through the phenomena of nature, which serve him as the Lord by rewarding the good and by punishing the evil (37.13). God himself is clothed in a 'sublime majesty'[9] which remains inaccessible to us (37.22). Both speeches, the 'more primitive' speech of Bildad and the 'more learned' speech of Elihu, ultimately demand the creaturely reverence that is the beginning of wisdom for Psalms and for sapiential writings (Prov 1.7; 9.10; 15.33).

---

[8] I.e., Babylonian-Ugaritic mythical images of creation as the conquest of Tiamat (the sea of primal chaos) and of the primal serpent; thus frequently in the Book of Job (3.8f.; 7.12; 9.13; 26.12; 40.25) and generally in the Bible: Ps 65.8; 74.13–14; 77.17; 89.10–11; 93.3–4; 104.6–7, 26; 107.29; 148.7; Is 27.1; 51.9.

Job opposes this somewhat watered-down 'fear of the Lord' with an elemental 'terror' in the presence of God. In astonishment, he asks those who are supposed to be his friends: 'Will not his majesty terrify you, and the dread of him fall upon you?' (13.11), while he says to God himself: 'Withdraw thy hand far from me, and let not dread of thee terrify me' (13.21). When he thinks of God, the hairs rise on his flesh (21.6). 'I am terrified at his presence; when I consider, I am in dread of him . . . for I am hemmed in by darkness, and thick darkness covers my face' (23.15, 17). 'God's poisoned arrows'[10] dart at him out of this darkness, 'the terrors of God are arrayed against me' (6.4). So he calls for an advocate and a referee, so that 'he may take away his rod from me, and let not dread of him terrify me' (9.34). 'Terrors are turned upon me' (30.15), active and aggressive: these are the glances from God that the sufferer constantly feels directed at him with unbearable hostility (7.17–20).

On the one side there is reverence, on the other terror before God: this is what separates the two levels and makes the conversation impossible, since it is precisely this fear in the presence of God that the friends take as the tell-tale sign of Job's secret guilt. They recognise sin in his fear.[11] And precisely these charges drive Job away from all communication with others, deeper into the loneliness of his fear in God's presence. The two worlds collide with each other in chapters 18 (Bildad) and 19 (Job): for Bildad, the wicked man is pursued by the furies who finally drag him before the 'king of terrors' (Pluto, the Babylonian Nergal, the lord of the nether world), while Lilith (the female Babylonian storm-demon) makes her home with him (18.11, 14–15). He is one 'uprooted' (v. 16), banished (v. 18), condemned to infertility (v. 19). Job is not troubled by the fact that he must make use of the same images in order to describe his suffering (19.10); it is precisely here that he presses forward to his highest, most truly valid statement: 'Oh that my words were written! Oh that they were inscribed in a book with an iron pen!' (19.23–24). 'O earth, cover not my blood, and let my cry find no resting place. Even now, behold, my witness is in heaven, and he that vouches for me is on high. My cry is my advocate with God, while my eye pours out tears to God' (16.18–20). The situation is very close to Greek tragedy, in which the cry of suffering finitude becomes a memorial in eternity, raised up like a host to the gods, equal in rank to the glory of Olympus and perhaps superior to it.[12] The pain towers so high, growing so far beyond the transitory subjective dimension, that it sets up something objective between Heaven and earth, something that can never be destroyed again—transcending the struggle and the enmity with the cruel God (30.20–21) who listens to no prayer. 'Earth' means here a human life lived in an honest and pure endeavour in accordance with God's commandments (29.11f.; 31.1–40), and 'Heaven' means the closed darkness in front of which this life was lived. Suffering is the 'caution money' (17.3) which earth lays up in advance in Heaven, giving it an inviolable right to an existence beside God. The one element of what is otherwise totally perishable[13] that can remain standing in the presence of the divine is the terrible weight of the sufferings, when this is weighed on just scales between Heaven and earth (6.2). And for this reason Job too must pose the challenging question of Euripides' heroes: 'Does it seem good to thee to oppress, to despise the work of thy hands? Hast thou eyes of flesh? Dost thou see as man sees? Are thy days as the days of man?' (10.3–5). He demands justice for himself from God and speaks in the concepts of a court case:[14] he laments the lack of a referee (9.32–33), and he makes his suffering itself an advocate for himself (19.25f.). There are certainly ethical concepts and questions standing behind the legal concepts—'Why do the wicked live?' (21.7), why are they punished in their children rather than in their own persons? (21.19), what remains of God's righteousness? (24.1–17)—but these questions do no more than accompany Job's own problem from the sidelines, illustrating it; it has a different structure. Behind the legal thinking there stands ultimately an aesthetic intuition: the proportions between Job's life and Job's suffering are wrong; no matter how sublime, transcendent and absolute one's description of God may be, he remains responsible for such elementary failures in proportion. And so the 'man of integrity', Job, dares everything, 'takes his flesh in his teeth and puts his life in his hand' (13.14), and 'this boldness will be my salvation, that a godless man would not dare to come before him' (13.16); since a genuine dialogue with God is not possible now (23.3f.), he dares to 'rebel' (23.2). But Job's concern here is not himself, but—and in this he can be compared to the Prometheus of Aeschylus—the absolute order between Heaven and earth; he appeals from a reduced god (the 'Zeus' of the new generation of gods) to the total God who is truly worthy of the divine name.

---

[9] LXX: μεγάλη ἡ δόξα καὶ τιμὴ Παντοκράτορος.

[10] The 'poisoned arrows' which God shoots at the sufferer are a frequent term for illness, or also for famine: Job 6.4; 7.20; 16.12–13; Deut 32.23; Ps 38.3; Ezek 5.16; Lam 3.12.

[11] 15.20; 18.11, 14; 20.25; 27.20.

---

[12] Cf. Vol. IV of this work, pp. 101ff. (Eng. trans.). — The theme is taken up by Rilke in the Duineser Elegien, where likewise the angel stands in amazement at the suffering of man who perishes, and the ultimate reality is the 'landscape of lamentation'.

[13] The theme of finitude and transcience is continually brought up by

When the Jews put such questions out of the perplexity in the broken covenant and the exile in Babylon, God will answer in the 'Book of Israel's consolation' and in the Servant Songs. This answer is not anticipated in the Book of Job. The inner disunity of the answer corresponds to the inner disunity Job, in the tone of lamentation which however threatens all the time to turn into accusation.

[14] 6.29; 9.19f.; 13.3, 6, 18; 14.3b.

of the formulation of the problem. For in point of fact, who is this non-Jew Job? Does he come before or after Israel? Is he the representative of 'the world of the Gentiles', which has not yet received any promises and is left to shape for itself an image of God on the exclusive basis of its understanding of existence? Or is he the result of Israel's experience of exile, which must transcend its previous understanding of the covenant and abandon its religious wisdom-teaching (as this is represented by the three friends) for something obscure that lies on the far side of death? The resolution of this question remains open; the whole story remains a mashal, a poetic parable that projects the sketch of an unattainable totality. Its significance is that it rejects every solution that would too quickly transfigure harsh reality, while giving a very exact outline (in negative form) of the conditions of the possibility of a redemptive synthesis, which will not be available at any price lower than Job's experiences of abandonment and his terror—and than his total inability to understand. The concept of 'vicarious representation' is not yet present; even although it will soon appear in the Servant Songs, it remains something not understood in the depths of suffering—for otherwise the suffering would not be complete.

Since this is how things stand, God's reply to Job out of the stormwind can only start with the tone taken by the 'rebel' and with his demand for a court case with due process of law, exposing the inner contradiction in what Job says. This is the source of the divine irony, which crosses the border of humour in the description of the wonders of creation.[15] The vision of the glory of the covenant God of Israel, which would have to be presupposed for an answer on the far side of the exile, cannot be supplied in a speeded-up process where this is lacking; so God speaks only of his absoluteness and eternity, in respect of which Job is only a latecomer: 'Where were you when I laid the foundations of the earth?' (38.4), and he speaks of his power and wisdom which he has invested in the world. The great riddle of the cosmos and the touchstone of every valid world-philosophy—the reason of the irrational animals—is quite properly evoked. Man, with all his problems, lives in a world with a wisdom which he has not established, but which he cannot exclude from his consideration so that he can relate as an isolated individual to God and thereby play at being 'God's censor' (40.2). 'Deck yourself with majesty (ga'on) and dignity (goba); clothe yourself with glory (hod) and splendour (hadar)' (40.10), the distinctively divine attributes, 'then I also will bow down before you' (40.14). Job must concede that he is beaten in the presence of the 'omnipotence' and the 'things too wonderful for me' (42.2, 3b), and he sinks down sighing[16] before the majesty 'in dust and ashes' (42.6). And he utters the beautiful saying: 'I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees thee' (v. 5), although this is a word that more veils than reveals the true situation and fits ill with God's justification of Job to his friends: 'You have not spoken of me what is right, as my servant Job has' (v. 7). God calls Job his 'servant' ('ebed) four times in his concluding speech. Does this mean, then, that Job had spoken in the closest proximity to the 'Servant of the Lord', and that the friends had embodied an obsolete, superseded stage of the religion of Yahweh? And had God himself, in all seriousness, led Job into this darkness, to which he alone has the key and for which he alone is answerable, with all the lamentations and the apparent blasphemies which are uttered in this darkness? And would this mean that the building-blocks have been gathered together for the final synthesis which a fortiori only God can achieve: the unity of the glory of God and uttermost abandonment by God, Heaven and Hell?

---

[15] The texts in the third exchange of speeches were already hopelessly confused and fragmentary (22–24: even transpositions cannot restore a whole text); and God's speeches too are certainly expanded at a secondary stage (as is shown by the repetition of 38.1, 3 at 40.6.7 and of 38.2 at 42.3) and thereby deprived of much of their effect; 39.13b–18 and 40.15–41.26 are additions. Job can have spoken only one concluding answer: 40.4–5 and 42.2–6 belong together.

---

[16] Not: 'regretfully' (Hölscher).

9. DEUTERO-ISAIAH

The vocation of the anonymous prophet who was introduced more deeply than any other into the mysteries of God's grace in the night of the exile is threefold (Is 40.1–8): he is called to console those who have suffered more than enough (vv. 1–2), he is called to hear the cry: 'In the wilderness prepare the way of the Lord . . . and the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together' (vv. 3–5), and he himself is called to cry: 'All flesh is grass . . . the grass withers, the flower fades, when the breath of the Lord blows upon it . . . but the word of our God will stand for ever' (vv. 6–8). In this vocation to bring consolation, the glory of God remains a future reality for everyone, and the personal mission takes the one sent into the origin of the absolute antithesis between the origin—the word of God which exists forever—and the total frailty of flesh which is like hay, together with all its loveliness.[1] This glory is so absolutely a future glory that the cycle of God's previous self-manifestations appears complete and completed; now something utterly new arises, something that is 'hidden, that you have not known',[2] not a continuation, but 'created even now',[3] something that returns to the absolutely creative moment of the first beginning.

Jeremiah and Ezekiel have come to an extreme end-point, to an end of the ways: hence there is a hiatus, and a new beginning arising again out of the origin, with a God who has no relationship to anything else, a God who is utterly 'incomparable',[4] who gives his glory away to none other[5] and, if he creates, can do so only for his own glory.[6] This

---

[1] V. 6: chesed (LXX: δόξα), suggested alterations in Gesenius.

[2] 48.6.

[3] 48.7.

[4] 'Who can be compared to me?': 40.25; 44.7; 45.5; 46.9. 'To whom will you liken me and make me equal, and compare me, that we may be alike?': 46.5.

[5] 42.8; 48.11. This means also that God, as in Ezekiel, can forgive sins only for his own sake: 43.25.

[6] 43.7.

God exists before all time, he is absolutely the First and precisely for this reason is also the Last, and there is nothing higher than the future appearing in glory of his word, of his righteousness, and of his salvation, nor can anything higher be thought of.[7] All that the creature can do is to entrust itself totally to the shaping hand of its creator;[8] everything else on which people had relied has failed to come up to expectations; the anonymous prophet is able to do and to demand what Job was unable to do and what Jeremiah achieved only with effort.[9] 'There is none who can deliver from my hand; I work and who can hinder it?'[10] This too, once again, is directed against Job.

The prophet does then give consolation, with flattering, almost deluding words from which the possibility of judgment is far removed (for the first time in the old covenant); God openly professes his love ('Because you are precious in my eyes, and honoured, and I love you', 43.4), a love greater than that of a mother (49.15), a love that makes the creator a bridegroom (54.5), an 'eternal love' (54.8, 10). But a price is paid for this unheard-of admission of love: viz., that Israel's boundaries are broken through and it is led into a future which it cannot foresee; it is expropriated and becomes a model, reduced in significance so that it may serve an historical act of God that has its origin further away than Israel and makes for a goal that likewise lies beyond Israel. When Israel is thus left dangling outside its historical form, it experiences its own nothingness (41.14) and that of all the peoples (like drops of water in the bucket, like dust on the scales, 40.15–17) and of the kings and judges (40.23), and its own weariness contrasted with God's eternal, indefatigable strength (40.28–30). Being is divided in its very roots, and in the primal act, whereby God creates and the creature is created, there stands, beyond all analogy, incomparability (46.5).

---

[7] God as 'the first and the last': 41.4; 44.6; 48.12; cf. 52.12. His salvation is eschatological: 51.6.

[8] The creator is repeatedly called the 'sculptor' or 'potter': 42.5; 43.1; 43.7; 43.21; 44.2; 44.21; 44.24; 45.9–11; 45.18; 49.8.

[9] 50.5, perhaps with a sidelong glance at Jeremiah.

[10] 43.12.

Thus Israel, which possesses the historical analogy between God's promise and God's fulfilment and is thus witness to God's veracity in his active word, is expropriated together with its 'proof of God's existence', set within the framework that goes from the sovereign First to the sovereign Last, who is not at man's disposal, and left dangling in oscillation before his presence. Its proof of God's existence is valid, and thereby nullifies the claim of all the idols to authenticate themselves by fulfilment within history.[11] Israel—with the terrible fulfilment which it is suffering now from the prophecies of God—is a witness before all the world,[12] 'so that you may know and believe me and understand that I am He' (43.10). But precisely because Israel gives objective testimony to the exact proportion within history between promise and fulfilment and thereby to the power within history of the only true God, it is suspended within the pouring-out of his power and cannot itself have any power over this proportion. Is the promise simply one of returning home, so that a second exodus through the wilderness would correspond to the first, rounding it off by going backwards? With the Lord going before, and also as rear guard (52.12), with water from the rock (48.21) and food in the wilderness (49.10)? But is this in keeping with the idea that the Lord, as the good shepherd, will himself bring his sheep home, kept safe in his arms and in his heart (40.11)? No, the proportion known within history is superseded, and the God of the origin, of creation, of what is new every moment, is now creating, prophesying and sketching out a new future. 'From this time forth I make you hear new things, hidden things which you have not known. They are created now, not long ago; before today you have never heard of them, lest you should say, "Behold, I knew them"' (48.6–7). The 'scheme of things that is Israel' is broken through, and therefore Israel must 'remember'[13] (in order to know who it was who made the promise then), and yet at the same time 'remember not the former things',[14] so that it can

---

[11] 41.21–24a; 44.7; 44.25–26; 48.3–6.

[12] Israel as witness of what God does to it: 43.10, 12; 44.8; 55.4.

[13] 43.26; 44.21; 46.8–9; cf. 42.20; 23, 25.

[14] 43.18.

'hearken'[15] without distraction, precisely when the 'ways and thoughts' of the Lord 'are higher than yours, as the heavens are higher than the earth'.[16] Against the horizon of what is new, going beyond 'Abraham my friend' (41.8), the 'wretched worm Israel' must pay heed to the Noachic covenant with all creation (54.9–10), and indeed to the order of the creation of Heaven and earth which bears witness to the immense 'I' of the God who freely makes election,[17] and this is to be the basis from which Israel dares to spring out into what is unknown and to accept the new prophecy of what is new, the prophecy which is created at each individual moment.

But can a prophet give an anticipatory clothing in words to the new thing that is oriented towards the eschatological revelation of the glory of Yahweh? It is true that 'The Lord God has given me the tongue of those who are taught, that I may know how to sustain with a word him that is needy' (50.4), and that the work of the prophet contains many well-hewn, pugnacious answers; but when he continues, 'Morning by morning he wakens, he wakens my ear to hear as those who are taught. The Lord God has opened my ear, and I was not rebellious, I turned not backward . . .' (50.4–5), this hints at an intimacy with God that goes beyond everything known in the old covenant, a permanent initiation by God, going deeper and deeper, to which there corresponds on man's part pure 'non-resistance', a state in which the only desire is to let oneself be drawn in. The sharp struggle between the divine 'I' and the human 'I' in Jeremiah and Job, and the lordly gesture with which God took hold of Ezekiel's spirit and body, have given place here to a mystery of penetration that finds nothing in the old covenant with which it can be compared, no category into which it can be fitted; even the one of whom God thus takes possession will himself speak of it in a remarkably quiet, foreign, wholly impersonal manner, as if it were something that ultimately did not concern him—although this matter lays hold of him in a way that pierces to the very centre of his being. Two names sound forth from this sphere: Cyrus as the ‘Messiah’ chosen by God (45.1) and Ebed-Yahweh as the Servant of God.

---

[15] 48.18.

[16] 55.9.

[17] 40.12f.; 40.26; 42.5, and in stereotype formulations throughout the whole book.

‘Cyrus’ is the name under whom the future salvation must first submit to a sober intra-historical perspective which is in contrast to all the vivid traditional images of Israel’s hope, such as the Yahweh who fights miraculously for the people as a hero in war,[18] and the exodus filled with miracles.[19] The first thing the mind of the prophet will have seen is the overwhelming of the Babylonian power and the release of the captives and the freedom given to practise their cult; and since he recognises the Persian here as the willing (although unconscious)[20] instrument which God himself has fetched from a far country,[21] he inevitably sees here the eschatological incarnation of the divine will and word in the deed that is carried out. Israel, as a people, is not the place where the deed is carried out, since as a whole it is still blind and hardened in heart.[22]

The ‘Servant of the Lord’ stands even more in the place which is opened up by the ‘blind’ Israel, although it does not know this; the commission to set free which he receives is not the external commission, as in the case of Cyrus, but the internal commission. He is the one in whom God ‘will glorify himself’ (δοξασθήσομαι, 49.3), but in such a way that the Servant feels ‘the weariness of futility’ and the ‘fruitless abrasion of his strength’ (49.4), and ‘is glorified in the eyes of Yahweh’ (δοξασθήσομαι, 49.5b, likewise 52.13)[23] only in this way, in a manner that lies beyond his experience: the glory of God lies in the Servant, the glory of the Servant lies in God. We are shown, with the concealment and discretion which have been mentioned, what this glory consists of immediately after we are told about the intimate refusal of the Servant to oppose the Lord who awakens him every morning: 'I turned not backward. I gave my back to the smiters, and my cheeks to those who pulled out the beard; I hid not my face from shame and spitting' (50.5–6). After the confessions of Jeremiah and after what happened to Hosea, Isaiah and Ezekiel, it is quite impossible that the language here should be metaphorical, just as it is impossible that the sufferings should be endured by a collectivity. There is no break in the continuity of verses 50.4–6; besides this, the Servant has a mission to Israel which he must fulfil (49.5). In the same way, there is no break in continuity from the Moses of Deuteronomy (who suffers and dies for the people)[24] to Ezekiel and to the Servant: an individual offers himself, or is chosen, to make vicarious expiation. Ultimately, this is a heaping-up here of external and internal suffering: blows and spitting, 'being pierced through' (53.5), 'ulcers' that take him to the point of being killed and to a grave among the godless and evildoers; 'mockery' to which he must oppose 'a face hard as flint' (50.7) just as he must oppose this face to the prophets of doom, 'contempt' (49.7), 'being counted of no value', 'being abandoned' to the point that all cover their faces before him, and that he has no longer 'form or beauty' (53.2), but 'has lost his form' and no longer has 'human semblance' (52.14).[25] But unlike Job, 'he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; like a lamb that is led to the slaughter' (53.7), although he too, like Job, asserts that he has never 'done violence, and there was no deceit in his mouth' (53.9). The Servant knows something that Job did not know: that one cannot submit God to questioning (45.11). He bears the guilt of the sins of 'many' (i.e., of all).[26] God's plan of expiation is realised in a way that cuts through him (53.10). He pours out his life in death and is reckoned among the sinners, and it is precisely through this that he wins from God those whose sins he bore, and whom he justifies (53.11–12). An individual who has been called experiences this (49.1), one who is at once 'a sharp sword, a sharpened arrow'—and 'hidden in the shadow of his hand, hidden away in his quiver' (49.2). This takes place in a mystery, and despite everything it happens in public (45.19; 48.16). The one who passes through this night casts the deepest veil over himself: to the extent that he is aware of his election to this wholly isolated destiny—and aware also that he will come into the light after his disgraceful death and that God will win for him the victory and acknowledgment on the part of the kings (49.7) and will 'exalt' him (52.13)[27]—then he must enter totally into the anonymity of the pure personification of the task that is to be carried out. He is clearly aware that he must give up his name, indeed more than this, that he is drawn into an area of destiny in which he remains a foreigner, although he would not be able to say who—other than himself—would have the right to occupy this area.

---

[18] 42.10–13; 52.8–10.

[19] 41.17–19.

[20] 45.4–5.

[21] 41.2, 25.

[22] 42.16, 18; 43.8; 48.4.

[23] On this slightly overtaxed use of the concept of doxa in the LXX compared to the MT, cf. Zimmerli in TWNT V, 676.

---

[24] Deut 1.37; 3.23f.; 4.21; 9.9, 18–19.

[25] The LXX forms three world-pairs: εἶδος and δόξα (to'ar: beautiful form) at 52.14, εἶδος and δόξα (hadar: beauty as dignity) at 53.2a, and once again εἶδος and κάλλος (chemed: beauty as attractiveness) at 53.2b: the great terms of Greek aesthetics are collected, in order to be negated: everything that has form, all attractiveness and dignity, is turned into its opposite, deprived of its form and thus made unbearable to look upon.

[26] J. Jeremias in TWNT VI, 536f.

Thus the initial vocation (40.1–8) is fulfilled: to bring consolation as a preparation of the way for the coming glory, but by 'crying out' the distance that separates the eternal God and the flesh that is grass. And now God himself, who has hitherto maintained a restrained silence, 'cries out' with him, as a woman in childbirth cries out (42.14). This means that the ultimate point in Deutero-Isaiah is not a word. Perhaps his message was somehow become stiff in face of the difficulty in which he finds himself, the excessive demand that he give an answer.[28] And out of necessity he must turn back to the traditions of the exodus, and of David and Zion, in order to have images of the coming glory. It is wholly clear that the non-image of the Servant is expressed by the 'new world'; the task of drawing a definitive image of him goes beyond the power of the old covenant. The last thing we see is God accompanying the redeemed humanity in its wandering (49.10–11; 52.12).

---

[27] Here too the LXX has δοξασθήσεται.

[28] Joachim Begrich, Studien zu Deuterojesaia (1938), pp. 121–124, 130.

III. THE LONG TWILIGHT

A. THEOLOGIA GLORIAE

The task entrusted to the five centuries which remained until the coming of Christ was difficult to the point of impossibility. While the form of the covenant stood before their eyes as an idea which had been half-realised at individual points in the past (although the reflection of the major prophets expressed ever greater reservations about this realisation), the history of the covenant was not only the history of a periodic decadence (as in the Deuteronomistic historiography), but an unstoppable rush into the arms of catastrophe: God's glory abandons his earthly sanctuary, and the people of twelve tribes, with which the covenant had been entered upon, is definitively scattered abroad, with at most a remnant permitted to come together again; is it possible at all now to speak of a continuation of what had begun so greatly? There were indeed revelations like lightning-flashes as the sentence was carried out, in the depths of abandonment by God, that seemed to hint at a unity of glory and night, but who could think of taking such flickerings as the starting-point for the interpretation of the worldwide light of God's covenant with humanity?

But had not even the prophets of doom themselves promised a salvation that lay beyond judgment, in the coming age of history? Were not their words of darkness balanced by their words of light? Had not Israel, which had gone through the deepest depths, the right—precisely because of the promises of the prophets—to await God's great coming in glory behind the judgment? After all, the Second Isaiah, who disclosed the mystery of the Servant of the Lord, had given the most unambiguous promises of salvation for the future.

This salvation did not come, and prophecy as a whole ended in the historical non-fulfilment of the prophecies of salvation. The echoes of post-exilic prophecy are insignificant, petering out in the concerns of the priesthood (Zechariah) and the cult (Malachi). The silence that takes the stage after the prophetic voice has fallen still is ominous. Has God really given up his people now? Are the endeavours that it will now undertake in order not to lose God—clinging to the Torah, the wisdom teaching, the sacrificial cult, even apocalyptic—ways willed by God, or are they defiance and the wrong path? There is no longer any positive historical continuation of the form, which had been readable in history, that God had inscribed upon the history of humanity in his history with Israel. This form, which was supposed to have proclaimed the eternal in the transitory, remains a code abruptly broken off, sealed up.

At the end of the long twilight, the seals will be broken for a moment in Jesus the Christ, who accomplishes what is impossible for the Old Testament and reveals the glory of the Father in the abandonment of the Son. But precisely this long twilight, with the distance it created, was necessary in order that the definitive sign of salvation in Jesus might be set up over and in the history of the world and that it could be understood as such (in the midst of the scandal): the twilight is both failure and opening. Failure, because it compels the acknowledgment that man is not able to establish the synthesis of the covenant idea and the historical reality of the covenant; opening, because in the half-millennium of prophetic silence, the event of salvation from Moses via David to the 'Servant of the Lord' draws closer to an historically recognisable form: distinct from a present that cannot simply interpret itself as the inner future of this form, distinct also from a space that opens up between Heaven and earth (precisely because the earth is not the future of this form), and distinct lastly from any kind of universal perception of God in the world and in human life as a whole (for here that form would be seen virtually as only a particular instance of something general). These three openings are necessary, if the synthesis of the history of the covenant which has taken place and also its totally new establishment in Jesus the Christ are to be possible; but they must likewise necessarily remain in the twilight, taken as a whole and individually, because they must inevitably seek to anticipate the synthesis and because these attempts must fail, since they are hybrid (not to say hubris).

The three undertakings of Judaism can be understood from the starting-point of the theme of glory as attempts to force the glory of God into the open, despite its elusive hiddenness. The first attempt (which failed at once) is the proclamation of the messianic-historical glory of God which is now infallibly coming: it was for this reason that prophecy broke down. The second attempt, apocalyptic, wanted to get hold of the glory of God, which was not coming in the future within history, through mysticism, in Heaven 'above' or in the anticipation of the second (heavenly) aeon; this fails because it leaves behind, as something insignificant, the form which God has inscribed on history. The third attempt, the Hellenising wisdom theology, does not seek to get hold of glory either in a purely futurist sense or in a purely mystical-eschatological sense, but seeks rather to see and experience it contemplatively out of the totality of creation and salvation-history: in this way it creates the broadening of perspective that will link the wisdom of Israel to the wisdom of the peoples and will create a common language as the presupposition for mission, while however losing its feeling for the sharp distinctiveness of what Israel had experienced as the event of the glory of God.

Without messianism, apocalyptic and wisdom theology, there would be no New Testament: all three are indispensable mediators, because they permit the historical form of Israel to become transcendent in three directions. But where they propose themselves as solutions with their function of broadening, they at once obstruct the place for God's solution and become its opponents—the same is true precisely within Christianity too. It is only by accepting the providential mediation of Judaic theology with its inherent oscillation that one can link ancient Israel's experience of glory with the Christians' experience of glory. Messianism, apocalyptic and wisdom teaching are only a 'climate' in which Christianity was embedded and came to development; it is not bound to the historical form taken by these mediating forces, but makes use of them in order to say what is its own and to be itself; and this looks directly to the mystery of glory in old Israel.

If here the three dimensions in which Judaism developed its theology of glory are presented under the title of 'Theologia gloriae', this is done bearing in mind the further meaning that this phrase has acquired in more recent Christian theology: it is a theology that has somehow put the nights and terrors of the judgment behind itself, without integrating them in depth. And when at places here we see points of transition from the theological glory to 'philosophical' beauty (with the splendour of the theion which points to its fulfilment above), then such places shows us clearly the loss of substance involved, no matter how meaningful such openings of the biblical perspective into the general metaphysical sphere may be from another point of view.

1. GLORY AHEAD

a. The glorious image of Jerusalem

In the deeply tragic futurist dynamics of messianism in exilic and post-exilic prophecy, one element comes to fruition that had characterised Israel's theology from the beginning. The dynamics of the religion of the patriarchs was essentially oriented to taking possession of the land; the Yahwist had to make the fulfilment for the patriarchs only provisional, in that Abraham was permitted only to acquire a burial place for himself in the field of Ephron the Hittite. The dynamic of the period of Moses and Joshua, and most strongly of all in the Book of Deuteronomy, was totally oriented to the definitive occupation of the land: but no matter how splendid the description of the entry may be in the saga of Joshua, the historical reality was no less questionable (Judg 1–3). The conquest of the remaining parts of the land by the first kings, who thereby incorporated ancient pagan peoples into the realm of their sovereignty, led directly to the flagrant breaches of the covenant that the covenant God answered through the destruction of the amphictyony. From of old, the glory of this God had lacked true presence; the model of promise and fulfilment within historical time remained a mere model that left space for a future and for hope, all the more strongly in that the prophets must condemn the present. In the case of Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, there exists a certain equilibrium between judgment (going as far as total destruction) and promise of a subsequent 'new Zion', a 'new and eternal covenant' with the purification from all sins and the pouring-out of the divine Spirit into the hearts. Was this reversal then not intended in an historical sense?

Deutero-Isaiah declares: Israel's 'iniquity is pardoned, she has received from the Lord's hand double for all her sins' (40.2; 51.17, etc.). It is thus that the sweet, almost intoxicating song of consolation by this prophet can sound. At one point of her history, Israel has the judgment behind her and has come into the area of sheer mercy. Thus the return of the exiles can be proclaimed as a pure event of salvation. But the historical reality became almost the opposite of this: arrival at a heap of ruins, poverty, hindrance, loss of rights, with boundless disappointment as the consequence.

Here Trito-Isaiah (Is 55–66), a disciple of the exilic prophet,[1] dares to take an extreme step: the coming of God's glory in the re-established union of the tribes and in the redeemed Jerusalem will be seen in the immediate historical future. His central message (chs. 60–62, as well as 57.14–20; 65.16b–25; 66.6–16) is a pure and extravagant declaration of salvation, using the vocabulary of glory with a hitherto unknown lavishness.

'Arise, shine; for your light has come, and the glory of the Lord has risen upon you. For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and thick darkness the peoples; but the Lord will arise upon you, and his glory will be seen upon you. And nations shall come to your light, and kings to the brightness of your rising' (60.1–3). And already the kabod (i.e., the wealth and beauty) 'of Lebanon' too is on its way, especially 'the cypress, the plane and the pine' in order to 'make glorious' the temple (v. 13), and Jerusalem sucks the breast of kings (v. 16). 'Your people shall all be righteous; they shall possess the land for ever, the shoot of my planting, the work of my hands, that I might be glorified (or: in order to be beautiful)' (v. 21). There is an eternal marriage between God and the people (61.10; 62.4–5) and eternal exultation, while God creates Heaven and earth anew round the glorified Jerusalem (65.17–25). The image of glory, which the author certainly initially understands as earthly,[2] is raised to a yet higher plane (doubtless by another hand): 'The sun shall be no more your light by day, nor for brightness shall the moon give light to you by night; but the Lord will be your everlasting light, and your God will be your glory (tip'eret)' (60.19).

Apart from its projection into the future, two things about this concept of glory are noteworthy. It is positive that it is an 'integrated' kabod: glory that is understood at the same time as God's salvation in the widest sense. Thus, at 62.2 'glory' stands together with sedaka (cf. 58.8); and the glorious light of Jerusalem, to which all the peoples flow (66.18), is at the same time the great peace of God (57.19; 66.12). On the other hand, the original kabod, which was to be described only in a dialectic way, has risen into a curiously unambiguous 'light'. God rises almost like a star; instead of the event of revelation we have a kind of mild state of being revealed. 'The element of war is completely missing, and all that remains of the accompanying phenomena of the coming of God is the shining forth of the light; thus the older concept of epiphany is strongly spiritualised, and the words resemble the manner in which the New Testament (especially the Gospel of John) speaks of light and darkness.'[3] Other concepts (e.g., that of 'anointing', 61.1) appear 'worn down,' the language becomes literary. And beside the divine glory, the worldly beauty of the 'bride' on whom God heaps so many privileges becomes a theme at the margin too. Nevertheless, it is Trito-Isaiah too who has composed the great ch. 58 on false and true fasting, the latter understood as corporal works of mercy, portrayed with almost as much urgency as in Jesus' discourse on the judgment of the world (Matt 25): if one frees those unjustly imprisoned, shares one's bread with the hungry, shelters the homeless poor, clothes the naked, does not turn away from 'one's own flesh' (cf. Deut 22.2), then one's 'light shall break forth like the dawn'. 'Your righteousness shall go before you, the glory of the Lord shall be your rear guard' (58.6–8): here, then, the light that is embraced by the glory of God is the light of love, which is at the same time sedaka, doing what is required by God's covenantal will. Chs. 59 and 63, the two great psalms of the people's lamentation from the time of the exile (63) and from the post-exilic period (59), underline the seriousness of the expectation of salvation: the prophet has dared to answer this expectation with the words, 'We look for light, and behold, darkness, and for brightness, but we walk in gloom! . . . We look for mishpat, but there is none; for salvation, but it is far from us' (59.9, 11). The remembrance of the history of the people makes their sin known, and the cry in need rises up to the only 'Father' God, who must let himself be moved and must not let the hearts of the children become hardened: 'Oh that thou wouldst rend the heavens and come down!' (63.16; 64.1). The word 'face' is used repeatedly in this context—expressing the directness from person to person—as is the word 'Spirit': for the fathers have offended God's holy Spirit, and the Lord's Spirit led the people into rest (63.10, 11, 14; cf. 59.21; Hag 2.5; Zech 4.6b; 12.10). These are words expressing intimacy, which scarcely call for an external manifestation of glory. The cry is deeper than anything that the prophet knows how to promise, even when he leaves the fullness of salvation indeterminate behind the extravagance of the images of glory: earthly, material contents are predominant in the promises (60.16, 17). At the same time, the consciousness becomes stronger that Israel's light exists for the world. Even if, to begin with, its light 'draws' the peoples and the kings, and they bring their presents, a movement in the opposite direction begins too: the temple opens for the foreigners (56.3f.), God will even choose some of them as priests and levites (66.21), and some of those who return from exile will be 'sent out' again by God to the peoples, 'and they shall declare my glory among the nations' (66.19). It is a premonition of the new covenant.[4]

---

[1] K. Elliger, Deuterojesaia in seinem Verhältnis zu Tritojesaia, Beitr. Wiss. ANT IV 11, 1953.

[2] C. Westermann, Das Buch Jesaja Kp. 44–66, ATD (1966), pp. 238ff.

---

[3] Ibid., p. 284. The interpretation of the glory of God as a dawning light is already present at Is 9.1.

A song-cycle which has been introduced into the Book of Baruch (4.5–9a, 9b–16, 17–29, 30–37; 5.1–4, 5–9, the last song almost identical to Psalms of Solomon 11.2–7, from the first century before Christ) shows that the spiritual situation which is caught by Trito-Isaiah did not lose its relevance in the course of the centuries. Now it is Jerusalem herself, the 'nursing mother', who is the 'abandoned one' who speaks words of consolation to her exiled children and indicates that they will have God's help to return soon; here too, extravagant use is made of glory (δόξα), radiance (λαμπρότης) and beauty (εὐπρέπεια), here too δόξα and light are virtually one and the same (5.9), and δόξα is understood in an integrated sense; the author can speak of the 'glory of the fear of God' (δόξα θεοσεβείας), and glory is closely linked to 'joy', 'mercy', 'righteousness' (5.9). In the hymn of Tobit (Tob 13.9–18), a bright radiance goes forth from the rebuilt Jerusalem, because 'the glory of the heavenly King' dwells in it, and the whole city with its gates and towers is made of precious stones and pure gold (cf. Is 54.11f.). Thus, when Judith carries out her mighty deed 'for the glorification of Jerusalem' (Jdt 13.4), it is not for nothing that the radiant splendour falls on the heroine: she is the glory of Jerusalem (15.9), who struck down the enemy 'with the beauty (κάλλος) of her countenance' (16.7). In order 'to lead him astray', she adorned herself: 'her sandals ravished his eyes, her beauty captivated his mind' (16.8–9).

---

[4] The Book of Jonah takes up problems of mission in its own way: Israel may not flee like Jonah from God's missionary commission, and above all it may not be jealous like Jonah of the Gentiles who could come to salvation.

But these are only intermezzi. It is the prophets of the second building of the temple who carry the great lines of thought forward: in order to stimulate those who have become discouraged, Haggai takes up afresh the promise of the Second and Third Isaiahs, but with a new, significant nuance: 'Who is left among you that saw this house in its former glory? How do you see it now? Is it not in your sight as nothing?' (Hag 2.3). But one must have patience, for 'in a very little while' God will shake all the peoples, and then all the treasures of the world will be brought together here (for 'the silver is mine, and the gold is mine, says the Lord of hosts'). Then 'the latter splendour of this house shall be greater than the former, says the Lord of hosts; and in this place I will give shalom, says the Lord of hosts' (2.6–9). But today, when the splendour seems 'as nothing', in the interval between the glories, 'My Spirit abides among you'. This Spirit must take the place of the missing glory, or is he indeed its full equivalent? This Spirit 'today' (2.15, 18, 19) means: first one must seek and build the house of God, then one's own; the temple is the image of the covenant and the kingdom.[5] This Spirit means therefore: transcendence even in tribulation and disappointment. And the temple is to be built without foreign help (which would then have led to a right to shared authority on the part of Samaria and Persia), and without ecumenical excuses (2.14); salvation is to radiate forth, not from a mixtum compositum, but from Israel as representative.

Zechariah, with whom prophecy ends and apocalyptic begins, sees in the third of the eight visions of a single night how an angel measures the extent of Jerusalem and another resists him: 'Jerusalem shall be inhabited as villages without walls, because of the multitude of men and cattle in it. For I will be to her a wall of fire round about, and I will fill her with my glory within' (2.5–9). Despite this protest, Nehemiah will soon afterwards complete the walls around the earthly Jerusalem (Esr 4.12; Neh 3). And yet the defencelessness of the city promised by God seems to go together with the promise of the glory within the city and its protective fiery light that radiates out from it. The picture sketched here is still earthly (men and cattle in multitudes dwell in the city), but, as in Trito-Isaiah, nevertheless goes beyond itself into the supernatural dimension. As in Haggai, the immediate expectation is earthly and concrete: this even dares to identify an historical figure, Zerubbabel, as the Messiah-designate, as the 'branch' meant by Jeremiah (Jer 23.5f.; Hag 2.23; Zech 3.8; 4.6b; 6.12);[6] the expectation of the coming of God as king (2.14; 8.3) and of the complete fulfilment of the covenant (8.8b) is likewise concrete. No less concrete are the prophecies about the Jerusalem of the last times which are fully developed in Deutero-Zechariah (9–14). This will at first be beset by an attack of hostile peoples,[7] then it will be raised up on a high mountain after a miraculous transformation of the landscape, where it will give light and water to the world and will become the place of pilgrimage for all peoples; from this place, according to Isaiah, Jahweh's will and law will be proclaimed to the whole world (Is 2.2–4). But before this elevation of Jerusalem in the last times through the prophets from earth to Heaven[8] takes place, apocalyptic has already come in: Ezekiel sees 'in divine visions' (40.2) the city on a very high mountain, and for Zechariah there opens up a whole visionary space that shows future reality as proleptically present where God is. From the perspective of apocalyptic, the city which is raised up in the last times is the holy city that descends from God 'in the radiance of the glory of God' (Rev 21.10–11).

---

[5] G. von Rad, ThOT II, 282.

[6] The designation here has passed from Zerubbabel to the high priest Joshua; both figures are united, as bearers of the kingly and the priestly ministries, in the fifth vision (ch. 4). On a further layer added to the text, cf. Elliger, Kleine Propheten II, ATD (1951), p. 122.

[7] Here there may also be pre-Davidic mythic motifs which have already been 'historicised' in the Canaanite period, as Ps 110.5–7 seems to hint. On the whole question, cf. K. L. Schmidt, 'Jerusalem als Urbild und Abbild',

b. Messianic hope

The attempt, shown here, to make the coming of the glory of God—which recedes at every point—immediately follow the present age, in the aftermath of judgment, must be located within a larger context. What appears in the final stadium as an extravagant utopia has its roots in the entire phenomenon of Israelite prophecy, which in turn is based in the preceding self-understanding of Israel as the partner in God's covenant. To put it very briefly: as reflection on the essence of the covenant goes ever deeper (as happens, for example, in Deuteronomy), the people are confronted in an ever more terrifying degree with the glory of the absolute subject, to whom ultimately no historical situation has truly been able to make the proper response: the historical books had pitilessly disclosed the sin and failure of even the greatest representatives, and the Jahwist had set his pessimistic anthropology as a preface to the whole course of history. In

---

Eranos-Jahrbuch 1950, pp. 207f.; J. Schreiner, Sion-Jerusalem, Jahwes Königssitz, 1963 (bibliography); E. Rohland, Die Bedeutung der Erwählungstraditionen Israels für die Eschatologie der alttestamentlichen Propheten, diss. Heidelberg (1956), pp. 145f.

[8] Zech 14.6–11, to be compared with Is 2.2–5; Mic 4.1–5; Ezek 17.22; 40.2.

the origin on Sinai,[9] against which no historical period could truly measure itself with any positive outcome, there lay not only a power that pointed essentially into the future—for Israel had never been tempted to understand its covenant history in an evolutionary manner, as an increasing approximation to the grace and the requirement of the origin—but also a power of the future such that the people were directed, beyond any human capacity for realisation, essentially to an original new action of Jahweh himself. The increasing depth of reflection on the absoluteness of the starting-point requires that the realisation too be absolute, not only extensively—in that God shows himself to be the only God, and thus the God of all peoples and of the whole of history—but also intensively, in that the personality of the absolute divine subject finds a corresponding personality also in the subject of the partner, a personality that translates into reality everything that in the actual making of the covenant as yet remained only in the realm of ideas.

Here lies the theological origin of all the expectations that clustered around a Messiah or a figure like the Messiah. The inherent unclarity of all these concepts is due to the fact that they must at one and the same time remain within history and burst the bounds of history. Within history, they must link up with the origins, in order to make clear what is coming,[10] but they must also explode history, because the full answer to these expectations could be expected only from God, in a coming of God upon earth such that this must necessarily be both absolute judgment and absolute fulfilment. Drawing on the conceptual material of myth in the ancient cultures that lay at hand[11] in order to describe this paradox was indeed permissible, but remained secondary; its expressive power was in the end limited when compared with what was to be said on the basis of Israel's religious understanding of its existence.

---

[9] The merit of being the first to see this anew belongs to E. Sellin, Der alttestamentliche Prophetismus, 1912. His line of thought is carried further by L. Dürr, Ursprung und Ausbau der israelitisch-jüdischen Heilandserwartung, 1925.

[10] A new exodus is to take place (Hosea, Deutero-Isaiah), a new covenant is to be made (Jeremiah, Ezekiel), a new David is to come (Is 11.1) with a new Zion (Is 1.26).

[11] W. Eichrodt. ThAT I (4th edn. 1950), 252 n. 4.

Israel, like the rest of the ancient peoples,[12] had no (linear) understanding of time at the outset. Although the theological reflection of the period of the kings and prophets made such an understanding necessary from within Israel, this was true only in a dialectical sense, because it always transcended the (linear) understanding of time: the fulfilment which was prophesied, for which one could live and hope, lay both in the future (which, as time, corresponded to the historical past) and in another dimension of duration which could be encompassed and made accessible only through the transition through what H. W. Wolff calls the 'situation of zero-point', of total discontinuity in judgment. Therefore there was also a germ of apocalyptic in all prophecy (in intratemporal language, a germ of utopia). And since prophecy could not admit any kind of temporal (evolutionary) mediation of God's new action—which had an absolute urgency that became visible in the impossibility of delaying the judgment on Jerusalem—all prophecy has imminent expectation as its inner form in which there lie both the fulfilment and the transcendence of historical time which as a whole stands under judgment. This alone explains why the 'tragic dimension' of Old Testament prophecy cannot be removed: it must make an absolute promise and demand for the imminent future, and the coming of this absolute must and will be recognisable in historical events on the level of historical continuity.

In the Hexateuch, there was the naively-applied schema of promise and fulfilment (promise of the land and occupation of the land); we have already seen that this was continually transcended.[13] Within this schema stood the first messianic promises: the prophecy about Judah in the blessing of Jacob (Gen 49.8f.) and the last of Balaam's oracles (Num 24.7, 17), which find their preliminary fulfilment in the coming of David. But David is not the end: he himself receives new promises for his house (2 Sam 7), and precisely the introduction of the oriental court ceremonial, with its creation of mythical qualities, into Jerusalem becomes an occasion and a stimulus to reflect on the extravagant royal titles from foreign sources in the light of the covenant relationship: is David, the heir of the old Jebusite royal ceremonial, to be seen as the adoptive son (Ps 2.6), indeed as the natural, 'begotten' son of God (Ps 2.7; 110.3), as a 'god' (Ps 45.7)? Is the king the representative of the entire divine salvific righteousness on earth, instituted by God himself in all seriousness (and not only in the words of courtly flattery), so that all who are deprived of their rights, the poor and the oppressed can set their sure hope on him (Ps 72)? In that case, he must be a king who sits with full right on the throne of Jahweh himself (1 Chron 28.5; 29.23; 2 Chron 9.8) while giving the honour and the kingdom back to God in fullness (1 Chron 29.11f.). 1 Sam 8 had seen through the historical character of the king once and for all in its deeply questionable nature; but Isaiah takes up the spotless image, adds the spotless Zion as the seat where God is present, and projects the whole into the future. It is significant, and characteristic of Isaiah's seriousness, that the messianic king on David's throne is precisely not clothed with words of glory, but is characterised by means of two concepts: divine justice (9.6; 11.4–5)[14] and divine Spirit (11.2), and further, that he appears, not simply as a descendant of David, but has an origin in what is David's own origin (11.1; Mic 5.1; cf. Amos 9.11). Isaiah's Messiah stands in a unique manner in the covenantal space of God which has been opened up; the extent to which this is true is illustrated by the mythical image used in the Psalms, which the prophet dares to take up afresh: 'mighty God' (9.5).

---

[12] G. von Rad has set this out almost too strongly in: 'The Origins of Hebrew Thought about History', ThOT Vol. II, 99–112.

[13] Above, pp. 178, 195.

In the messianic text in Micah which depends on Isaiah, the king who comes from the clan of Ephrathah (the clan of [14] On the basis of these texts, 2.3b too can be understood of the function of the Messiah in proclaiming and enforcing God's law from Zion. The effect of the covenant when it is put into action is salvation and peace (11.6–9) and 'the knowledge of God' in the whole land (11.9). Only in the secondary text Hab 2.14 do we find the pleonastic expansion: 'knowledge of the glory of God'.

---

David: 1 Sam 17.12) 'shall stand and feed his flock in the strength of Yahweh, in the majesty (ga'on) of the name of the Lord his God' (5.3); the imminent expectation is that this king, together with his mighty men, will drive off and pursue the menacing Assyrians (5.4–5). In Jeremiah, the 'true branch of David' (23.5) is not only the 'true king', but is also admitted to an unparalleled intimacy with God himself (30.21): this statement is the counterpart to what Isaiah says about the sixfold gifts of the Spirit. And thus, when he comes, Ezekiel can say that the whole judgment is entrusted to him by God (21.32). But at this point the figure of the Messiah definitively goes beyond his royal prototypes, and it is now around this figure that other, likewise transcendent images cluster.[15] The intimacy with God identifies the Messiah as the 'prophet' whom Moses promises at Deut 18.15f.: equal to him in rank, since Moses had an intimacy with God that was never equalled (Num 12.6–8) and was the true mediator for whom the people had asked at Horeb (Deut 5.25f.). This intimacy likewise identifies him as the (high) priest, since David too was already 'according to the order of (the Jebusite priest-king) Melchisedek' (Ps 110.4); and Ezekiel too had characterised the Messiah as priest (44.3; 45.16f.; 46.2f.). Deutero-Zechariah adds, at the margin of the image of the Messiah, the perfect image of the one who is faithful to the covenant as docile and humble (9.9). But it is also important to note that other great figures of the history of the people could no longer be included in this image: above all, that of the Servant of the Lord and silent lamb in Deutero-Isaiah (who had, moreover, already bestowed the title of Messiah on Cyrus), whose successor is doubtless the one 'pierced through' for whom lamentation is made at Zech 12.10; the same is true of the angel or messenger of God and of the returning Elijah (Mal 3.23), and above all of the Son of Man of apocalyptic (Dan 7, Books of Enoch, 2 Esdras), whose clear pre-existence in Heaven cannot fit into the traditional image of the Messiah. It is only when prophecy falls silent and a distance is achieved from it that the immanent apocalyptic element in prophecy can then be seen, and the unity of Messiah and Son of Man be established.

---

[15] It is more correct to discuss the Messiah as Jahweh's warrior (cf. Ps 2 and 110) when we discuss apocalyptic.

c. Poor before God

If the Messiah of the final times is to establish on earth the divine justice (sedek, mishpat) which is based on God's grace, and if this deed essentially affects those without rights, the oppressed, who cannot help themselves, then the 'poor man' moves more strongly than before into the centre of attention. The poverty of the population of the land, who were shamelessly exploited in the time of Amos and Isaiah in the newly-founded royal system of government, was seen by the prophets both as a scandal of economics and ethics and as a scandal in terms of covenant theology. Poverty as such is not a value,[16] should not be, and must at all costs be abolished.[17] It humiliates the human person to the status of a needy beggar ('ebjon), to one who is bowed down ('ani), thin, physically and intellectually weak (dal), one who is absolutely poor (rash). Job describes how the poor are naked and hungry at night, like beasts in the fields and in the vineyards of the rich where they look for food—and it is these same rich people who have stolen their fields and garments (24.2–12). Deuteronomy thinks of these poor when laying down the law, and the wisdom teachers warn against turning away one's eyes from them, lest their curse follow the one who is well-fed (Sir 4.5). But if Yahweh's justice is incarnated in his people, then a very close relationship is established between idolatry and the oppression of the poor, so that these become interchangeable terms: then God takes zealous action both for his name and for the poor, and his judgment extirpates the proud and haughty, who have taken this attitude vis-à-vis God and the poor simultaneously.

---

[16] This is clearly set out by H. Bruppacher, Die Beurteilung der Armut im Alten Testament, 1924. On the whole question, see the well-balanced study by A. Gelin, Les Pauvres de Jahwé, 3rd edn. 1956 (German trans.: Die Armen—sein Volk, 3rd edn. 1957).

[17] Naturally, the realism of the Old Testament knows about the poverty that is one's own fault, and Proverbs especially rebukes laziness: 6.9–11, 24.30–32; 27.19 and frequently.

Zephaniah is the first to understand this, and thereby raises poverty to a theological concept.

I will remove from your midst your proudly exultant ones, and you shall no longer be haughty in my holy mountain.
For I will leave in the midst of you a people humble and lowly ('ani, dal).
They shall seek refuge in the name of the Lord, those who are left in Israel (Zeph 3.11b–13a).

The concept of spiritual poverty is now made available: 'Seek righteousness (sedek), seek humility ('anawa); perhaps you may be hidden on the day of the wrath of the Lord' (2.3); the Psalms develop this,[18] but it is Jeremiah, persecuted, ridiculed and humiliated, who describes himself as 'ebjon (20.3), who offers the visible model, so to speak, and later becomes the true patron of the spirituality of the poor. Poverty is now the condition of helplessness, without rights, that unfailingly draws God's attention to itself. Even if he dwells in the lofty heights, yet he is 'with him who is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite' (Is 57.15). 'Heaven is my throne . . . but this is the man to whom I will look, he that is humble ('ani) and contrite in spirit, and trembles at my word' (Is 66.2). And as we have seen,[19] when Israel as a whole becomes poor and deprived of rights in exile, it receives the right of admission to the mercy of God.

But here there begin once again the unclarity and the dialectic that are characteristic of the old covenant as it draws to a close. The one who is concretely poor, and likewise the one who openly confesses his poverty before God, knows that he belongs to those whom God favours, to those who are in the right situation, the righteous. The great 'anawim-prayers like Ps 9–10, 25, 34, and 37 make a close connection between humiliation and triumph; the poor know that they are God's true people, whom God is obliged to save and to glorify:

---

[18] S. Mowinckel, Psalmenstudien I (1921), pp. 113f. H. Birkeland, 'Ani und 'Anaw in den Psalmen, Oslo 1923. J. van der Ploeg, 'Les pauvres d'Israël et leur piété', in: Oudtest. Stud. 7 (1950), pp. 236–270.

[19] Above, p. 172.

> For the Lord takes pleasure in his people, > he adorns the humble ('anawim) with victory.
> Let the faithful (hasidim) exult in glory (kabod)
> (Ps 149.4–5).

The more deeply the 'poor' man bows down before God, the higher can he also triumph over the 'proud' when they are judged and when they fall—and they will fall soon. The expressions of the vocabulary of poverty have 'become proud titles of honour' (R. Kittel),[20] especially after the exile. And just as everything in Judaism comes together in groups ('sects'), so there exists now the group of the poor also, not precisely as an organised brotherhood,[21] but still as a movement that is visible in some way.[22] They have understood the demand made by the Lord of the covenant, to let go of themselves and be stripped of everything, throwing themselves into his grace; the stripping takes place in the confession of sins, which—in keeping with the continuing power of the theory of immanent righteousness[23]—is also a confession of misfortune; by giving both, inextricably bound with each other, into the hands of God, they have the right to immediate, concrete rescue. 'I am poor ('ani) and needy ('ebjon); but the Lord takes thought for me. Thou art my help and my deliverer; do not tarry, O my God!' (Ps 40.18). For the Bible, humility is only one aspect of 'anawa as the condition of being bowed down before God (like Moses at Num 12.3); but the Old Testament constellation, which does not know of any opening into a life beyond death, and above all offers no trinitarian foundation of lowliness and humiliation, makes this fundamental attitude continually reflect upon itself, and establishes a clear relationship between humiliation and glorification.

---

[20] Die Psalmen (1922), p. 286.

[21] As was held especially by A. Cause, Les 'Pauvres' d'Israël (1922); cf. also A. Rahlfs, 'Ani und 'anaw in den Psalmen (1892).

[22] W. Baudissin, 'Die alttestamentliche Religion und die Armen', in: Preuss. Jb. 1912, pp. 209–224.

[23] Above, pp. 126, 164f.

> The reward for humility (ʿ*anawa*) and fear of the Lord > is riches and honour and life (Prov 22.4).
> The fear of the Lord is instruction in wisdom, and > humility (ʿ*anawa*) goes before honour (Prov 15.33).
> Before destruction a man's heart is haughty, but > humility (ʿ*anawa*) goes before honour (Prov 18.12).

Since it is precisely the 'person that is greatly distressed, that goes about bent over and feeble' who 'will ascribe to thee glory and righteousness, O Lord' (Bar 2.18), God cannot respond to these in any other way than with exaltation. While this path can lead directly to the Magnificat and to the beatitudes of the Sermon on the Mount, it can also lead, with equal directness, to the Jewish arrogance which Jesus rebuked in the Pharisees.

This dialectic of poverty takes on an ultimate, almost intolerable intensification in the Qumran community, where it is united to the dialectic of the figure of the Messiah which was described above. Here we find the usual declarations of lowliness piled up and strengthened: the pious man is not only poor, wretched and small,[24] despised and scorned,[25] thrust down into the realm of the dead,[26] but he is above all the radical sinner who can never justify himself[27] and who therefore trusts utterly in justification through the grace of God and must spring with both feet into this grace.[28] But when this leap has been made, i.e. once one has entered the community of 'purity'—which is a sign of divine predestination—then the praise of God sounds just as 'Pharisaic' as the figure whom Jesus describes in the temple: 'I praise you, Lord, for you have not let my lot fall in the community of deceit, nor determined a place for me in the fellowship of those who belong to darkness . . .'[29] The one who is elect walks 'in perfection in all the ways' of God,[30] and knows that he is determined for eternal life.[31] The War Scroll, one of the most appalling documents of religious aberration, portrays the eschatological battle of the two Messiahs—one a layman from the tribe of Judah, the other a priest from Levi—against the sons of Belial: the disciplined battle-array of those who once were 'poor' and 'humble' cuts the ranks of the evil to pieces in a kind of liturgical battle ceremony, led on by the clergy blowing trumpets.[32]

---

[24] 1QH (Thanksgiving Hymns) II 32, 34.
[25] 1QH II 9–13; IV 8; V 14.20–21.
[26] 1QH VIII 26f.; IX 3f.
[27] 1QH I 25–26; IV 29–30; VII 28.
[28] 1QS (Community Rule) XI 2 XI 9–15; 1QH IV 37.

Although the fellowship of goods in Qumran was meant as an expression of the renunciation of hated riches, of 'the net of Belial',[33] one cannot speak of a genuine 'ideal of poverty' in the sociological sense.[34] In the Old Testament, genuine (not spiritual) poverty remains clearly an evil that is to be avoided; the new evaluation by Christ presupposes a new basis for the whole concept of the covenant.

[29] 1QH VII 134.

[30] Damascus Document II 15–16; VII 5.

[31] Damascus Document III 19.

[32] On the dialectic 'of radical awareness of one's own nothingness and consciousness of sin on the one hand, and of the highest awareness of election and perfection on the other hand', which is 'the special characteristic of the anthropology' of Qumran, and on the distance between the teaching on justification by pure grace and Paul's teaching on justification, cf. J. Maier, Die Texte vom Toten Meer, Vol. II, Anmerkungen (1960), p. 68. On the 'piety of the poor' at Qumran, cf. ibid., pp. 83f.

[33] This is how wealth is described in the Damascus document (A) IV 15; but there is no fellowship of goods in force here.

[34] A. Gelin will be correct to say that 'there is no spiritual poverty without real poverty', and that the meaning of the renunciation of private property (at least to a certain extent) at Qumran was 'to create anew also the material preconditions for poverty', the conditions that stood at the basis of the theological-spiritual evaluation in the earlier prophets. But he is also correct to draw attention to the ethics of community in Plato and in Pythagoreism, to which the atmosphere of Qumran stands closer than to the ideal of Christ and of the primitive Church: op. cit. (n. 16 above), pp. 95–97.

2. GLORY ABOVE

a. Daniel

The hope of glory in the purely temporal future lacked one dimension, which had indeed been present, sensed in the background, after Elijah was taken up to Heaven, Isaiah saw the majesty of God, and Ezekiel saw God's glory in the fury of the storm as he carried out judgment, but which opened wide only in the Maccabean period with Daniel's visions. This newly-opened space between the Heaven of God and the earth of men and their history not only creates distance: it is a space that takes its life from the tremendous tensions of the heavenly action, that is filled with transcendental powers of history and catches up what happens in the world into the transcendence, in a way that serves only to intensify yet further the impact of the temporal-eschatological pressure as the gaze is directed vertically on high. The opening-up ('apocalypse') of the space between Heaven and earth in the central vision of the Book of Daniel (ch. 7) allows one to see both the drama of the forces of history in the presence of God—in the form of the four 'monstrous' apocalyptic beasts—and the scene of judgment in Heaven: the judge's throne set up, the fiery seat of God's glory, the myriads of angels, and 'with the clouds one like a son of man, and he came to the Ancient of Days', who then 'was given dominion and glory and kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom one that shall not be destroyed' (7.9–14). At least this vision is something genuinely seen in a revelation,[1] something that cannot be derived from the already existing mythological elements,[2] and something that looks across directly to the concluding revelatory visions of the Apocalypse of John, whereas everything that lies between these two, above all the Books of Enoch, is obviously mere literary imitation. In particular, there is nothing derivative—unless the source be the reserved hint of Ezekiel (1.26)—about the figure of the pre-existent Son of Man in Heaven on whom the messianic kingdom of the final age is conferred, although there is not the least explanation of how this heavenly figure could at the same time be a descendant of David, and there is no hint of a connection with the vicariously suffering Servant of the Lord. The dimension which opens up in Daniel is fundamentally a christological dimension, although one in which no kind of synthesis is foreseeable between the elements which are put forward, and the inquisitive imitators of Daniel—the apocalyptists of the two last centuries before Christ and of the first Christian century—will take possession of the space opened up here in a wholly unprovidential manner.

---

[1] 'One is strongly tempted to hold that here we have the description of an actual ecstatic experience, whatever may be said about some of the later visions': Norman W. Porteous, Daniel (1965), p. 107.

[2] The derivation of the four beasts from known or 'unknown' myths (Gunkel, Bentzen, Heaton) offers little help to the interpreter. The fact that

Although the genuinely visionary character of the three last visions of Daniel (chs. 8, 9, and 10–12) is less assured (since everything there aims at an exact calculation of the imminent coming of the Messiah), the aspect of the judgment which is being carried out at every moment by the battles of the heavenly forces attains greater prominence at 10.13, and thus it is possible that 'the holy ones of the Most High' (7.22, 25, 27) were originally the angels,[3] who belong to the Son of Man and form a kind of heavenly community together with him, before this expression was transferred to the community of the pious on earth. We sense the outlines of a society of angels and men that spans Heaven and earth; and this means that is is possible to think—though still only by way of an unclear perception—of a resurrection that bursts the boundaries of death, at least for the pious who are worthy of the beasts rise out of the stormy sea may indeed be a reminiscence of the Babylonian creation-myth, but the motif is not developed in Daniel; nor do we have a 'creation battle' here, but the historical struggle in the last period of history.

---

[3] M. Noth, 'Die Heiligen des Höchsten' (1955), now in: Ges. Stud. AT (1957), pp. 274–290.

eternity (12.2); there had been only one hint of this hitherto, in the apocalypse of Isaiah (Is 26.19) which is very difficult to date. But when once the space between time and eternity has been opened up, then it is not only world history that find its representation there: the individual too enters this space with his destiny—however mysterious this may be.

With the appearance of the fighting angelic powers, the seer feels that the definitive judgment of the entire history of the world has begun. Storms break over the heads of men, as described in the Hellenistic-rhetorical images of the Second Book of Maccabees; the glory of God in the sacred war has taken on a new eschatological-historical form of theophany: 'About this time Antiochus made his second invasion of Egypt. And it happened that over all the city, for almost forty days, there appeared golden-clad horsemen charging through the air, in companies fully armed with lances and drawn swords—troops of horsemen drawn up, attacks and counter-attacks made on this side and on that, brandishing of shields, massing of spears, hurling of missiles, the flash of golden trappings, and armour of all sorts . . .' (2 Macc 5.1–3). When we read this, our mind wanders over to Homer and Vergil and to German mythology; in Daniel however everything remains oriented to the time of the Messiah.

The midrashim on the ancient stories from the period of the exile (Dan 1–6) are also oriented to the principal theme: Daniel and his companions are introduced into the world of the pagan court; but this is not like Joseph and Moses, for they are representatives of their people; when they take part in the international 'literature and wisdom' (1.17, 20), they are not like Solomon, but do so as men who have been deported and therefore humiliated.[4] Their career (2.48f.) does not excuse them from the obligation of bearing testimony with their lives in the fiery furnace (3.19f.) and the lions' den (6.17f.; 14.31f.): in situations evocative of the final times. And the royal dreams which must be interpreted are likewise dreams of the final times: the composite colossus will fall because of the Messiah (2.44), the worldly king must go down into the ultimate humiliation in order that the lowest of men can be exalted (4.14), and the proud king who did not give God the glory will be measured, weighed and cut off, and must yield to another (5.22–30). In the first part of the book, as in the second part, God establishes his sovereignty over all the great powers of the world.

[4] The prayer of penitence in Dan 9 shows the deep solidarity of Daniel with the members of his people: he feels the exile to be a punishment by God and a 'confusion of face', dishonour (9.7, 8).

A final characteristic of Daniel's prophetic ministry is connected with the opening-up of the space between earth and Heaven: the seer and his various states take on a certain thematic quality—powerlessness, fainting, falling down, and being touched and raised up again by the revealing power (10.11, 16, 18). The man who is to rise from the dead into the eschatological sphere already has his home there, from a certain point of view, and something of the one who reveals and of his revelation is even now able to be discerned from the situation of the seer, as from a mirror. In the biblical seers—Daniel, Paul, John—this 'mystical' element remains strictly related to the commission of revelation and is measured through this commission; the situation is a part of the mission, and the seers have their existential share—although this is the share of an instrument—in the event that they must proclaim. If this criterion and this pure relatedness to the matter in question is missing, then there is no way of avoiding the fall into the ambiguities of the occult, of inquisitive gnosis, and of the process whereby the human person makes himself the theme of the revelation, as is seen in what follows.

Daniel says very little about the glory of God, just as the Apocalypse of John likewise displays a chaste reserve. This, however, is not true of the apocalyptic literature that spreads out between Daniel and John. In their inquisitiveness, they press forwards and break through, making inquiries about the heavenly realm like tourists and having angels lead them even to the throne of the glory on high. It is worthwhile taking a brief look at these side-shots of Jewish literature, because it is easier then to follow the development of the chief line.

b. At the throne of glory

Just as previously the messianic hope had unleashed an extravagant flourishing of declarations of glory concerning the earthly future, so now the apocalyptic which was unleashed by Daniel unleashed in turn a flood of experiences of glory in the heavenly realm, which is at the same time the still-hidden new age which the mystic proleptically reconnoitres.[5] But since the world has grown old[6] and is hastening at greater speed towards its end,[7] this new age will soon be the age of all men. 'Everything that is corruptible passes away, everything that is mortal departs; thus the whole of the present time passes from the memory . . . We wish what is future to come now, we create what comes afterwards. For there exists a time that does not pass away; the time that remains forever is coming, the new world which no longer hands over to corruption those who attain it in blessedness. But it has no mercy with those who go into the torment.'[8] While the earthly messianism has somehow put the judgment behind itself, this judgment is once again expected in the future, as the transition between the ages. The transition from time to what lies above time,[9] from this world to the new Heaven and the new earth,[10] brings at the same time the definitive divorce of good and evil, a righteous judgment that is found in all this literature, without exception. The link between the old covenant theology with its requirement of absolute decision for God, with its either/or of blessing and curse, and the new doctrine of the ages automatically generates such an eschatology with Heaven and Hell. The old age, which is making swiftly for its end, is most profoundly mixed, mutable, polarised, two-sided and ambiguous; this experience of existence was already familiar to Ecclesiastes, and it is more strongly the experience of the apocalyptists,[11] who therefore count the temporal dimension as a dark 'cloud'[12] and a 'prison',[13] yearningly praying for the great turning-point: 'Show thy glory with all speed, and delay not with thy promise!'[14] Baruch is instructed to teach the people: 'They are to learn that in the last time they will no longer die',[15] for even now the old age is in labour like a pregnant woman who can no longer hold in the fruit of her womb.[16]

---

[5] The apocrypha and pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament are cited according to the editions of E. Kautzsch (1900) and P. Riessler (Altjüdisches Schrifttum ausserhalb der Bibel, 1928 = R). The latter collection is much fuller. [English translation: H. F. D. Sparks, ed., The Apocryphal Old Testament, Oxford 1984.]

[6] 2 Esd 5.50; 14.10, 16; Ascension of Moses 7.1; Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch 85.10.

[7] Syriac Apoc. Bar. 20.1–2; years of life growing fewer: Jubilees 23.9; Enoch 80.2; 2 Esd 4.26.

[8] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 44.9, 11f.; 74.2–3.

[9] Slavonic Enoch 65; 2 Esd 7.30f.; Testament of Job 36.3, 5.

[10] Ps.-Philo 3.10; Enoch 93.16.

In such a pervading expectation of the end of the world, Daniel's vision of the open heaven was bound to unleash the flood waters: there is a way out; a very few people have borne witness to it, and one may believe them and perhaps follow them on the paths they have taken upwards. To give the guarantee of authenticity to the new revelations, they are attributed to the great fathers of the people, to Adam, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Moses, Solomon, Elijah, Isaiah, Baruch, Ezekiel, Job, Zephaniah and Esdras, all of whom have transmitted in secret writings[17] their mystical experiences of the heavenly realm. We have, first, a great quantity of information about cosmological and astrological mysteries, dealing with the geography of heaven;[18] as in Hellenism[19] and later in Dante,[20] one may enjoy looking back on tiny earth from the height of the spheres.[21] More important is the inspection of Hades, Hell, or at least of the preliminary torture chambers where the wicked are tortured even before the last judgment.[22] The journey upwards goes into 'glory':[23] Enoch is able to describe the kabod of Yahweh in all its details, by employing and developing the visions of Ezekiel and Daniel,[24] and he can describe and name the four angels of the face of God;[25] the Slavonic Enoch, who cannot see God, is nevertheless clothed in 'garments of glory' at God's command[26] and anointed with the 'oil of glory'.[27] He becomes like one of the heavenly beings: fear and trembling drop away from him, and he can remain standing before God for all eternity. When Abraham is caught up in rapture, he does not see God himself,[28] but he sees 'a splendour of invisible glory' spread out over the whole of heaven;[29] Baruch is repeatedly promised that he will see the glory of God.[30] [11] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 21.15f. 'In what now exists, passes away, and appears, the good is not fully good, the evil not wholly evil': ibid., 83.9.

---

[12] Ibid., 56.3.

[13] Apocalypse of Elijah 19.3. On the nothingness of the present period of the world: Syr. Apoc. Bar. 82.2–9.

[14] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 21.25.

[15] Ibid. 76.5.

[16] 2 Esd 4.40–42.

[17] At 2 Esd 14.46, Esdras (Ezra) is told to keep in reserve seventy secret writings.

[18] Apoc. Abraham 15; Greek Apoc. Bar. 2–17; Apoc. Zephaniah passim; Eth. Enoch's journey narratives, 17–36; 41; 72–82; almost the whole of Slavonic Enoch; Test. Levi 3.

[19] See Vol. IV of this work.

The Essenes of Qumran were particularly fond of this apocalyptic literature, and they succeeded in building into their system of life the anticipatory entry into the heavenly world on the other side of the grave which this literature contains. In the Book of Jubilees, which divides the history of Genesis and the beginning of Exodus into periods of jubilees of seven times seven years, Qumran created a system embracing cosmology (comparable to that of Pythagoreism), sacred history and the liturgical feasts, a sacred network of numbers into which the biographies of the patriarchs were forcibly incorporated, but which also regulated the rhythm of the life of the members of the community. This numerical system was as valid on the 'heavenly tables' (the 'prototypes of what happens on earth')[31] as on the earth: 'the whole world moves in the number seven'.[32] Since the Essenes feel themselves to be the bearers of the true priesthood of Levi, and Levi (according to his Testament) saw the heavenly liturgy in a rapture,[33] and was indeed invested in his office in person by the angels[34] and thereby became one of 'those who stand near God',[35] the earthly liturgy celebrated in Qumran is a participation in the heavenly liturgy. This becomes even clearer in the Testament of Isaac to Jacob, the father of Levi, to whom is transmitted the entire ethics and ascetic system for the priests: 'Their service on earth is like the service in heaven, the angels are their companions because of their perfect fidelity and purity.'[36] Here, apocalyptic turns into the strictest liturgism: no day may be omitted, no festival transferred to another day,[37] 'new moon, seasons of the year, sabbaths and feasts': everything must be observed with painstaking attention to detail. The patriarchs in the Book of Jubilees enjoin on their sons as the most important matter the feasts (which arose much later), the laws and rites (circumcision, sacrificial customs):[38] a legalism extended out to cosmic dimensions and now truly subordinate to the 'elements of the world'. There can also exist parallelisms between the stars and the saints on earth.[39] This is the Essene way to be simul justus et peccator: a sinner in this corrupt world, righteous in being joined to the new age, but in such a fashion that the righteousness still displays itself clearly now in that liturgy of existence which Paul will reckon among the 'works'. Although the awareness of sin has become deeper than in the period before the exile, widening out from the consciousness of individual sins (2 Sam 11–12) to become a consciousness of the hatitual state of sin, the dialectic of the ages introduces a motif that is foreign to the old concept of the covenant. The widening, which is indispensable in order that what is coming may be received, involves a narrowing-down at the same time, and thus remains ambiguous.[40] [20] See Vol. III, p. 70 (Eng. trans.).

---

[21] Apoc. Abr. 21.

[22] Greek Apoc. Bar. 4; Vision of Esdras; Eth. Enoch 22; 103; 108.5; Slavonic Enoch 10; 42; Test. Isaac 7, etc.

[23] 'Now I am no longer in the glory in which I was above': Apoc. Abr. 30.3.

[24] Enoch 14.8–25.

[25] Ibid. 40.

[26] Slavonic Enoch 22.8.

[27] Ibid. 22.9; 56.2.

[28] Apoc. Abr. 16.3.

[29] Ibid. 19.5.

[30] Greek Apoc. Bar. 6.12–13; 7.2; 11.2.

---

[31] Kautzsch (n. 5 above), II 285, n. c.

[32] Aristobulus 2.79 (German text: Riessler, p. 184).

[33] Test. Levi 5.

[34] Ibid. 8; there is indeed mention of a threefold ministry: prophecy, priesthood and kingdom: 8.11–14.

[35] Ibid. 2.10.

[36] Test. Isaac 5.9.

[37] Jubilees 6.32.

[38] E.g. Jubilees 2.17–33; 6.17: renewal of the covenant. 'This whole festival is celebrated in Heaven too': 2.18; feast of tabernacles: 16.20–31; sacrificial prescriptions: 21.5–20; sabbath: 50.6–13, etc.

[39] Enoch 43.4.

The image of the Son of Man in Daniel is continued in the Ethiopic Enoch and 2 Esdras. He is certainly an eschatological-messianic figure: he is called the 'chosen', 'anointed', 'righteous', the 'light of the peoples', he is set apart by the Creator (before the creation of the world: Enoch 48.6) to redeem the creation (2 Esd 13.26; Enoch 62.7). He can be called 'servant' (or 'son': pais) of God (2 Esd 13.32, 37, 52), but the vicarious suffering of Deutero-Isaiah's Servant of the Lord is nowhere attributed to him.[41] He sits on the 'throne of glory' (pleonastically in Ethiopic Enoch 45.3; 55.7; 61–62; 69.27, 29) when the 'totality of judgment' (69.27) is entrusted to him. Here the tradition of First Isaiah is continued,[42] and the pouring-out of the gift of the Spirit and of holiness upon the Messiah can be understood as simultaneously the pouring-out of glory.[43] In the final battle, he destroys the enemies of God with the breath of his mouth (2 Esd 13).[44] Whatever may be said of the mutual influences of Judaism and Christianity in these texts, the Son of Man of the apocrypha is a figure of glory in the post-exilic, non-integrated sense, who nowhere recapitulates the depths of opposition to God by transforming them in himself.

---

[40] It is true that the doctrine of 'original sin' also flourishes in this twilight, but it is characteristic that the form this takes is itself a twilight form. Adam is accused: 'What have you done, Adam to all your descendants? . . . Now the entire mass is subject to corruption; those whom the fire devours are countless' (Syr. Apoc. Bar. 48.42f.). But does this not mean that there was a kernel of evil from the outset in Adam, who belongs to the temporal age? 'Already the first Adam had an evil heart: so he came into guilt and was conquered. The same is true of all his descendants. Thus the illness became lasting' (2 Esd 3.21–22; cf. 4.30–32; 7.118). On the other hand, each person is once again placed in the original situation: 'Adam bears the guilt for himself alone, we are all Adam, each one for himself' (Syr. Apoc. Bar. 54.19). Each one is placed with his free will between the good spirit and the evil spirit (Test. Judah 20, Test. Asher 1.4–5). But, in general, guilt appears as a common doom in which original guilt and personal sin are inextricably mingled with each other, and this situation gives rise to the great lamentation: 'O Adam, what have you done? For though it was you who sinned, the fall was not yours alone, but ours also who are your descendants. For what good is it to us, if an eternal age has been promised to us, but we have done deeds that bring death? And what good is it that an everlasting hope has been promised us, but we have miserably failed? . . . Or that the glory of the Most High will defend those who have led a pure life, but we have walked in the most wicked ways?' (2 Esd 7.118–122).

c. Emphasis on man

There is often a morbidity in the interest taken by the apocalyptic literature in the glory above; it is inclined to transfer the emphasis of thinking and life into the world that is coming after death and to discount the earthly world, forgetting that this is the good creation of God, the place of his covenant and the abiding foundation of all the promises. By contrast with the wisdom literature, Enoch says: 'When wisdom came to take her dwelling among the sons of men and found no dwelling-place, wisdom returned to her place and took her seat among the angels.'[45] Human reason is too weak to be able to know more than what belongs only to this earth.[46] 'Heaven, earth and the depths tremble before the glance of his majesty, but the sons of men sin and are quite indifferent to all this.'[47] The simple life that looks to the God of the covenant, protected by his grace and therefore without reflection on oneself, seems to have become unattainably distant. But this means that an excessive emphasis is laid on man: as moral and ascetic subject, or as an existential rebel.

---

[41] Cf. P. Volz, Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde (1934), p. 217.

[42] Psalms of Solomon 17.29 and 18; Test. Levi 18.1–5.

[43] Test. Levi 18.6.

[44] On the question of what is Danielic, possibly pre-Danielic, or a Christian interpolation in Eth. Enoch (2 Esdras was written after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70), cf. the discussion (with bibliography) by H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic, 3rd edn. 1963. In Eth. Enoch 71, Enoch himself is equated with the Son of Man: this may be the oldest kernel of the Enoch speculations (thus T. F. Glasson) or else a later (presumably Pharisaic) attempt to neutralise the figure of the Son of Man which could not be localised in terms of the ancient biblical material.

[45] Eth. Enoch 42.2.

The moralisation of the great figures of salvation history in late Judaism is a trait that is carried out with thoroughness and an appalling universality. The Book of Jubilees is interested in edifying and moving, indeed in sentimental family scenes, for example when Jacob sleeps in his old grandfather Abraham's bed, on his bosom, unaware that his grandfather has died in the night, and sees when he awakens in the early morning that he is embracing a cold corpse, whereupon Rebecca rushes to Isaac while Jacob lights the path ahead of her, Ishmael weeps, etc.[48] The various Vitae of Adam too give novelistic descriptions of how the first family come to know pain, longing and penitence, and ultimately death, after they are driven from paradise, and how Eve and Seth attempt during Adam's mortal illness to fetch the healing oil from paradise: Seth is bitten by the serpent and both are rejected, while the devil reveals to them the true reason for his hatred—God had commanded the angels to venerate the image and likeness of God in the future human being[49]—and finally they describe how Adam's corpse is taken up by the angels and borne to God, because God 'demands the vessel that he himself has formed',[50] and he will remain there until the last day. 'He is his image, and therefore he has mercy on him.'[51] The dead Moses too is borne in this way before

---

[46] 2 Esd 4.21.

[47] Test. Levi 3.9–10.

[48] Jubilees 22–23.

[49] Life of Adam and Eve 13–16.

[50] Apoc. Moses 31.

[51] Life of Adam and Eve 46. The dialogue of God with the dead Adam becomes a dialogue of the Messiah with Adam in the Christian interpolation in Test. Adam 3: 'Adam, Adam, do not fear! You wanted to be God: I make you God—though not now, but after many years shall have passed . . . I do not permit you to remain in the nether world . . . For love of you,

God.[52] Biographies of the prophets are composed;[53] in the work of Jewish propaganda, especially in the Egyptian diaspora, episodes of scripture are narrated anew in enthralling novels, such as the lively and intensely moral narrative of the chaste Joseph and the equally chaste Asenath,[54] or the descriptions of the final days of Jerusalem as it was destroyed.[55] Psychological sensitivity describes the most various attempts of the Egyptian woman to subvert Joseph's chastity,[56] and indeed a tragic poet does not disdain to bring the calling of Moses on to the stage in the form of a Greek tragedy, having the voice of God sound forth from the bush and the obligatory 'messenger' giving the account of the destruction of Pharaoh's army in the Red Sea.[57]

Above all, the leitmotiv now is 'virtue' and 'good works'. But one should bear in mind that these good works are the same that are sketched in the Sermon on the Mount and in Jesus' parable of the world judgment and that are prominent above all among the Essenes: to help the poor, to protect orphans, to clothe the naked, to take care of the weak and ill, to lead the blind, to bury the dead.[58] 'Blessed is the one who judges aright, who helps every one of the oppressed, who clothes the naked and breaks his bread with the hungry . . . Blessed is the one in whose mouth is mercy and meekness.'[59] Several of the Testaments of the Patriarchs are oriented entirely to these virtues: Zebulun is concerned with mercy and compassion, and with the commandment to love one's

---

I taste death and enter the house of the dead'. (On the relationship between Apocalypse of Moses, Testament of Adam, and Life of Adam and Eve, see Sparks, op. cit., pp. 141–143.)

[52] In the surviving fragment of the Assumption of Moses, this is hinted (11.7–8); the lost continuation must have narrated this, for v. 9 of the Letter of Jude alludes to it.

[53] Reissler, pp. 871–880.

[54] Sparks, op. cit., pp. 465ff.

[55] Paraleipomena of Jeremiah: Sparks, pp. 813ff.

[56] Test. Joseph 1–10.4.

[57] Ezekiel the Tragedian: Reissler, pp. 337–345.

[58] 2 Esd 2.20–21. Whoever has not done so comes into the eternal fire: Slavonic Enoch 10.5.

[59] Slavonic Enoch 42.7–13; cf. 63.1–2.

neighbour as oneself and to prove this in the case of the poor, the naked and the needy,[60] while Joseph praises God as the one who performs the good works for him: 'I was sold as a slave, but the Lord gave me freedom; I was a prisoner, but his strong hand helped me; I was tortured by hunger, but the Lord himself nourished me; I was alone, but the Lord consoled me; I was sick too, but the Most High visited me . . . I was the victim of calumny, and he pleaded my cause.'[61] Gad, who has sinned against love of neighbour, praises this above all:[62] 'Love one another in deed and word and dispositions!'[63] Benjamin admonishes his brothers not to requite evil with evil,[64] but to practise the love of enemies.[65] For the Fourth Book of Maccabees, the martyrdom of Eleazar, of the seven brothers and of their mother is the occasion for an ethical diatribe about control of the senses through the reason.[66]

Natural ethics is accompanied by natural religion. Abraham possesses a meritum de congruo for his election: through his own reflection on the nothingness of the idols of his father Terah and through his burning of these, and through a rational conclusion from the creatures to the existence of the Creator, he earns the reward of being addressed by God and being led by him in a particular way.[67] It was, further, useful for apologetics to have Abraham (who was familiar with the study of the stars because he knew the 'Chaldeans') bring astrology to the Egyptians,[68] to make Moses (= Musaeus) the teacher of Orpheus[69] and to characterise him as the great mediator of culture to the Jews, the Phoenicians and the Greeks.[70] Job underwent the strangest transformation of all: in the new version, there is no longer any trace of a night of abandonment by God, and Satan's rage against Job is given a psychological explanation: Job has cut down the image of an idol and refused to receive a devil who visits him.[71] Job's virtues, especially his unheard-of generosity to the poor, are described ('I was already then so noble'),[72] as is his exhortation to patience in suffering; the devil 'weeps' and is 'in turbulent confusion',[73] while Job can draw the attention of the three friends who lament over him to his merits which are laid up in heaven: 'My throne stands in the world above, and its splendour and glory stand at the right hand of the Father. The whole world passes away . . . but my kingdom stands for eternal times, its splendour and glory rest on the chariot of the Father.'[74]

---

[60] Test. Zebulun, especially chs. 4–8.

[61] Test. Joseph 1.

[62] Test. Gad 4.

[63] Ibid. 6.1.

[64] Joseph and Asenath 23.9; 28.14; 29.3.

[65] Ibid. 28.12; cf. the speech of the dying Rebecca to her sons: Jubilees 35.20f.; Test. Joseph 17.2.

[66] Eng. trans.: The Common Bible (1973).

[67] Apoc. Abr. 1–8; Jubilees 11.16–17.

[68] Artapanus 1.

[69] Ibid. 3.5–6.

[70] Eupolemus 1 (Reissler, p. 328).

This transfer of attention to man has its reverse side: when his virtues become the theme, his problematic necessarily also receives attention, and since the glory from on high does not shine through these darker sides, the latter imperceptibly become more important than the former, the glory which is deemed to have insufficient weight. The Job of the period of the first exile will be far surpassed as one who struggles with God by the Esdras of the second Book named after him and by others like him who write after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

The first thing we note is the role assumed by death in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature; while it is in keeping with the Bible that this literature contains mostly Testaments, these are Testaments in which the necessity of dying is a leading motif. Naturally, this is true above all in the Vitae of Adam, where death is experienced by man for the very first time. It is only now that the first ancestor knows: 'I am stripped of my righteousness, with which I was clothed . . . I am removed from my (!) glory.'[75] And again: 'God, our Lord, was very angry with me and banished me from our (!) glory.'[76] The whole world of plants and animals has changed around him, 'our nature too has changed'.[77] And now that death is a certainty, life as a whole is empty: it is of little importance now whether it is short or long.[78] This is the experience of being cast forth: 'We did not say to our fathers, "Beget us!" We did not send down to the nether world to say, "Take us in!"'[79] 'You came without asking, and you depart against your will.'[80] In such a situation, the fundamental rebellion against dying is understandable. God requires that Adam be ready to die, because only this can lead him back anew to the tree of immortal life.[81] But Isaac protests when the angel fetches him to die,[82] and ultimately Esdras and Shadrach refuse point-blank. Esdras feels that he is man's advocate against God:

---

[71] Test. Job 2–6.

[72] Ibid. 13.6.

[73] Ibid. 27.2.

[74] Ibid. 33. The 'chariot' will be the vehicle of the divine glory in Ezekiel. The three friends are saved for the sake of Job, but the fourth, Elihu, who had mocked him, must go to Hell. Job gives his new three daughters magical girdles with which they can see the heavenly things.

Lord, if thou takest my soul from me, who will remain to plead with thee on behalf of the human race?
And God said, Since you are mortal and of the earth you should not plead with me.
And the prophet said, I will not stop my pleading with thee.
And God said, Even so, give up now what has been entrusted to you: the crown has been made ready for you.
Come die, so that you may obtain it.
Then the prophet began to weep and say,
O Lord, what have I gained from my pleading with thee,

---

[75] Apoc. Moses 20.
[76] Life of Adam and Eve 16.
[77] Apoc. Moses 11; 24.
[78] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 17.
[79] Ibid. 48.16.
[80] 2 Esd 8.5.
[81] Apoc. Moses 28.
[82] Test. Isaac 2.

if I am now to sink down into the earth?
Alas, alas, for I am to be consumed by worms.
Weep for me, all saints and righteous men; for I pleaded much. Weep for me, all saints and righteous men, for I have entered the depths of Hell.[83]

When Shadrach's death is announced to him, he asks for a postponement, and then bids his body farewell in a great lyrical monologue:

O head, so marvellous and adorned like heaven! . . .
The head controls the whole body's movement.
O fairest and most beloved of all my members, now must you sink into the earth and be forgotten.
O hands, so gentle, docile and hard-working . . .
O feet that walk so well, that run of your own accord,
most agile, that cannot be restrained! . . .
Body most beautifully adorned, light-giving, elegant, all-knowing!
Now you must sink into the earth, and beneath the earth your beauty disappear.[84]

One would expect these two by profession to argue continually and about everything with God; they think that it would be best if the creation had not taken place. What is the point of creating a free being and then allowing it to go to its destruction?[85] Why did not God kill the devil? Why does not God take hold of man by the foot, when he is setting out to sin? Shadrach declares himself at any rate to be in solidarity with the sinners: 'Remit thy punishments: or else, count me also among the sinners!'[86] 'I will not be separated from our race.'[87] And when he is to die, he says: 'I will not give my soul to thee.'[88] Esdras is no different: he too demands that God's hand have mercy on his image: 'Pass sentence on [83] Apoc. Esdras 6.18–26.

[84] Apoc. Shadrach 11 passim.
[85] Apoc. Shadrach 3.5.
[86] Ibid. 5.7.
[87] Ibid. 8.12.
[88] Ibid. 9.3.

me rather than on the souls of the sinners; for it is better to punish one soul than to bring the whole world to destruction.'[89] He continues with his obstinate questioning: Why did God allow Adam to fall? Why did he give him, as companion, Eve, who was to seduce him? How can God accept patiently that the human race should be deceived in this way? And ever anew: 'Lord, why didst thou fashion man and deliver him to judgment?'[90] Baruch's questions are much the same.[91] The refrain of all these people is: 'It would be better for us not to be here than to come here and live in ungodliness!'[92] 'This is my first and last word, that it would have been better if the earth had not produced Adam, or else, when it had produced him, had restrained him from sinning'.[93] Esdras is familiar with the torment of the reason which is forced to ask questions: how much better off are the beasts![94]

God's answers to these bitter and desperate questions are distinctly feeble, for they leave the chief accusation, about the existence of judgment, damnation and Hell, unanswered. God's righteousness must simply be implemented.[95] And is it not shameful when a man abandons God, his Father, and leaves for a foreign country with the goods that belong to God? What will the Father do then? He will 'take his property back, and banish him from his glory'.[96] And does Esdras really love his people more than he loves his God?[97] If men choose what is vain, then they meet a just fate when vanity becomes their lot,[98] and so on. Sometimes the concepts of the late Jewish 'theology of suffering'[99] appear; this seeks to correct the questionable character of the old theory of the immanent righteousness[100] by saying that God permits the pious to suffer on earth in order not to be obliged to punish them any further in the judgment, whereas the wicked are permitted to enjoy good things for a time because they are reserved for a merciless judgment.[101] But, especially in 2 Esdras, the radicality of the questioning goes beyond these attempts at a solution.

---

[89] Apoc. Esdras 1.10–11.
[90] Ibid. 2; 4.34; 5.16.
[91] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 14.
[92] 2 Esd 4.12; Apoc. Esdras 5.9; Apoc. Shadrach 4.2.
[93] 2 Esd 7.116.
[94] 2 Esd 7.62–66.
[95] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 48.27.
[96] Apoc. Shadrach 6.5–7.
[97] 2 Esd 5.33.
[98] 2 Esd 7.25.
[99] Wolfgang Wichmann, Die Leidenstheologie. Eine Form der

A final characteristic of this anthropocentrism is the importance that the sexual sphere acquires within it. It is not by chance that the myth of the fall of the angels through intercourse with human women (from whom the giants descend: Gen 6.1–4) takes on a disproportionate weight: this ἱερὸς γαμός is the original sin, described at length and in detail in the Book of Enoch[102] and mentioned in other sources too.[103] The sin in paradise too can be given a sexual interpretation;[104] or procreation is termed the result of sin and mortality.[105] In Essene accounts, there is also a division of paradise into separate areas for male and female animals.[106] The Book of Joseph and Asenath upholds an ideal of chastity that is almost unhealthy; the Book of Jubilees declares, when speaking of Reuben, that harlotry is the greatest sin;[107] Edom's corruption is seen in his attachment to the women;[108] Rebecca exhorts Jacob above all to 'purity'.[109] The Testaments of Reuben and of Joseph glorify this virtue above all. The Essene angelism is a form of apocalyptic pessimism about the world.

Leidensdeutung im Spätjudentum, Beitr. Wiss. ANT 1930. The principal emphasis of this work is on the rabbinic texts.

[100] See above, pp. 126, 164f.

[101] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 13.9.; 52.5–7; 78.3; 2 Esd 8.46ff.

[102] Eth. Enoch 6–16. According to Jubilees 5, all anarchy on earth has its origin here.

[103] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 56.12; Eth. Enoch 67.

[104] Apoc. Abr. 23.

[105] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 56.6.

[106] Apoc. Moses 15; likewise Philo, De vita contemplativa II 471f.

[107] Jubilees 33.20.

[108] Ibid. 35.14.

[109] Ibid. 25.

d. The barrier of judgment

The decisive fact for us in this image of the world of 'the glory above' and of the two ages is the fact that this superior glory does not penetrate the final judgment. The dualism is posited in a definitive and absolute way. We are nowhere told that any kind of thoughts of hope could overcome the division of good and evil, of right and left, of Heaven and Hell. The language of the great prophets was always a double-sided, existential language that proclaimed judgment and salvation, but here this hardens into a cosmological system in an apocalyptic gnosis about the double outcome of the final judgment. Daniel gives the initial impulse (12.2). But it is the apocalyptists who by way of anticipation take a journey to Heaven and above all to Hell, in order to inspect the place and the forms of punishment of the damned. The one who struggles with God finds an insuperable obstacle in two things: the fact that the majority are damned and only very few ('a remnant'!) are chosen, and that all mercy for the condemned ceases with judgment day. The 'multitude' stand on the left side at the judgment, those separated out stand on the right.[110] 'Here bliss and rest—there pain and fire!'[111] 'The multitude'[112] are lost, 'the whole great mass', 'innumerable',[113] 'almost all who have been created;'[114] 'the lost outnumber the redeemed, just as the flood is more than the drops'.[115] Those who follow 'the broad path to perdition'[116] are lost. Esdras' desperation comes from the fact that he knows this for certain. God's answer is that it is natural that what is precious in the world, like gold and jewels, should be rare, while lead and clay, which exist in great quantities, are counted as nothing. Such a God declares that 'what is more rare is more precious . . . he who has what is hard to get rejoices more than he who has what is plentiful . . . I will rejoice over the few who shall be saved . . . and I will not grieve over the multitude of those who perish.'[117] Since the sinners themselves have chosen their path, 'there shall not be grief at their destruction',[118] but rather the righteous find satisfaction in the righteousness of God.[119] At the judgment, mercy ceases to exist.[120] 'And the Most High shall be revealed upon the seat of judgment, and compassion shall pass away, and patience shall be withdrawn; but only judgment shall remain.'[121] The sins surpass the mildness of God,[122] and the temporal cursing of the wicked, which was a part of Israel's prayers,[123] will become an eternal curse.[124] And when Esdras goes through Hell and breaks out into the cry, 'Lord, have mercy on the sinners',[125] each time he sees a fresh kind of torment, when he is called by the angels into Heaven and answers, 'As the Lord lives, I shall not come until I have seen all the punishment of the sinners',[126] when he remonstrates with God that he would display his love and his goodness by having compassion with those 'who have no treasure of good works',[127] then he is told clearly that he must cease his intercession,[128] and must think of himself and of the glory of the chosen brethren.[129] There is no more place now for the entreaty 'of the fathers for the children, of the children for the parents, of the brothers for the brothers, of friends for their fellows';[130] not even the great intercessors from Abraham to Moses and Elijah[131] would be heard now. Now one must 'have no regard for the evildoers' and 'pray for the pious'.[132] His own election must suffice for Esdras.[133] The whole tormenting dialectic, that the Christian Middle Ages will stir up again in its depths, above the existential conduct of the Christian vis-à-vis the supposedly 'known' damnation of Christian brothers—a dialectic that finds its violent resolution in Dante[134]—has its true locus in these apocryphal Jewish apocalypses which grew in an inauthentic position between the genuine old covenant and the Gospel of Christ.

---

[110] Apoc. Abr. 23.5–6.

[111] 2 Esd 7.38; Ps. Sol. 2.37–38; 3.12–16; Test. Zebulun 10.3–4; Apoc. Abr. 31.3f.

[112] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 44.15.

[113] Ibid. 48.43.

[114] 2 Esd 7.48.

[115] Ibid. 9.15.

[116] Test. Abraham 8.16.

---

[117] 2 Esd 7.58–60.

[118] Ibid. 7.131.

[119] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 51.5.

[120] Ibid. 44.12.

[121] 2 Esd 7.33–34.

[122] Apoc. Esdras 2.21.

[123] Cf. in Slavonic Enoch 52; the great curse of Isaac against the Philistines in Jubilees 24.28–33. The curse in the Prayer of Eighteen Benedictions is a post-Christian addition (Reissler, p. 9).

[124] Eth. Enoch 102.5.

[125] Vision of Esdras; only in the Christian interpolation about king Herod does Esdras say, 'You have judged rightly, O Lord': v. 40. At Apoc. Esdras 5.28, the seer bursts into tears 'when I saw the human race in such a punishment'.

[126] Vision of Esdras (Sparks, p. 950).

[127] 2 Esd 8.36.

[128] Ibid. 8.47.

[129] Ibid. 8.50–51.

This dialectic is the consequence of a misunderstanding of the meaning of election in the Old Testament: Israel was to stand before God as representative of the peoples and in an attitude of openness towards them. The break-through in Daniel to the glory above discloses initially a living supratemporal dimension of Heaven which accompanies history on earth, imparting a compelling understanding not only of God's universal presence and omniscience, but also of his sovereignty and predetermination of the future too. Predestination becomes a determining religious experience,[135] but loses its function within salvation history thereby and hardens in the same way as the concept of the final judgment. The future is already present to God in the new age; in place of the Jerusalem which was destroyed, the new Jersusalem is already present in Heaven, and the mystic can have access to it: 'It is not this city which lies before you with its buildings that is the future city . . . which is made ready here beforehand . . . I showed it to Adam before the fall . . . I showed it also to my servant Abraham . . . I showed it to Moses on Mount Sinai, where I displayed to him the image of the tabernacle and all its equipment. Thus it lies ready now for me, together with paradise.'[136] But this means that the contribution of the old age to the new has become superfluous and despised; it is impossible for the earthly to enter the heavenly realm, and salvation history has been robbed of value. Revelation becomes a gnostic mysticism in flight from the world. And since for Qumran everthing stands written in advance on the 'heavenly tablets' and the only concern of man is to live beforehand in accordance with those tablets, the eschatological division between the chosen good and the non-chosen wicked can already be made validly here below. The spirituality of Qumran is one of purity through separation, and the renunciations, vows and rites of the community members are the attempt to avoid any contact with the impurity of the corrupt world:

---

[130] Ibid. 7.103; cf. Syr. Apoc. Bar. 85.12: 'No more opportunity for repentance of soul, no intercession for sinners, no petition of the fathers, no pleading of the prophets, no help from the righteous'.

[131] Ibid. 7.106–109.

[132] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 48.48.

[133] 2 Esd 7.76.

[134] Cf. Vol. III, pp. 82–101 (Eng. trans.).

[135] 'You saw the future things already present': 'Syr. Apoc. Bar. 21.5; cf. 23.3; 'He knows what the world is, before it was made, and what will happen from age to age': Eth. Enoch 39.11.

'I see, my son,' says Abraham to Isaac in the Book of Jubilees, 'that all the works of the children of men are sin and wickedness; all their deeds are impurity, abomination and stain, and there is no righteousness with them. Take care that you do not walk on their paths . . . keep far from all their doings and all their impurity.'[137] And to Jacob he says: 'Separate yourself from the peoples! Do not eat with them! Do not do as they do! Do not be an associate of theirs, for all their work is impurity'.[138] 'For there is no hope at all for the godless in the land of the living: they descend into the nether world and go to the place of judgment, and they have no memorial any more upon earth.'[139] The Book of Enoch too ends with this sharp dissonance: 'Those born in darkness will also be thrown into the darkness, while the righteous shine in glory; the sinners cry out loudly, when they see how the others shine, but they go to the place where days and times have been determined for them.'[140]

---

[136] Syr. Apoc. Bar. 4.2–6.

[137] Jubilees 21.21–23.

[138] Ibid. 22.16.

[139] Ibid. 22.22.

This means that while the broadening of the horizon, which was indispensable for the Christian dimension which was coming, has indeed taken place formally, the attempt to fill the new space with the elements of the old covenant was bound to fail; for Christianity too will have grave problems even in the period of its foundation, and even more in its later intellectual history, with these distortions of the original covenant idea.

---

[140] Eth. Enoch 108.14–15.

3. GLORY ANTICIPATED

a. Success and danger of the wisdom literature

Yet a third form of development is characteristic of the end of the old covenant, and this too is indispensable in view of what comes later, since it involves something of decisive importance for world history: the broadening-out of Israel, which had become closed in on itself, to the surrounding culture of Hellenism. This broadening-out, through language and thought-forms, for the very first time, created the presupposition for Christian mission (which is something other than the Jewish affiliation of proselytes). Such a broadening-out must necessarily mean making contact with the 'sphere of metaphysics', which was described in the preceding volume of this work: with myth, philosophy and religion. But this initial contact was very difficult for Israel, since it meant engaging in an authentically genuine dialogue with Hellenism, without rejecting or even merely lightening the burden of Israel's own unique election, of the exclusive covenant relationship to Yahweh. Formally speaking, the difficulty lay in the fact that a certain contemplative distance to Israel's own heritage was required, in order to be able to have a simultaneous view of this and of Hellenism, while at the same time this distance could not be allowed to affect the immediacy of the relationship of faithfulness to the God who had chosen Israel. Indeed, it was not possible to seek or to tolerate an ambivalence in the statements for reasons of propaganda, so that the truth being set out would seem Greek to the one reader and Jewish to the other, or would seem Greek if considered from the one side and Jewish if considered from the other, or in such a way that this truth would make peripheral concessions to the Greek world while remaining Jewish at heart and in the essence of what was meant. Although we do find these formulae of ambivalence in Philo, who attempted to build a bridge between Moses and Plato, one should be careful not to make superficial criticisms of the synthesis which was his aim, on the grounds that this was, after all, completely impossible on the level of the old covenant and using the elements which it contained; the broadening-out was required, and its foundations were laid—yet at the same time it was reserved for a future time. It seemed to have contemporary relevance because the drama of the history of the people, played between God and Israel, had come to a standstill since the exile, and this seemed to permit a contemplative distance to the historical covenant relationship. But precisely this word 'seemed' indicates the ambiguity of the situation, an ambiguity that necessarily entered Philo's attempt at a synthesis too.

On the other hand, similar attempts had already existed in ancient Israel to mediate between one's own religion and foreign religions and 'philosophies': the assimilation of religious materials and concepts by means of careful demythologisation was not only a concern of the earliest period, but something that had also preoccupied the period of the kings in violent clashes—one may think, for example, of Yahweh's claim to the title 'Baal' as he struggles to woo the people in love (Hosea). Likewise, one may think even more of the assimilation of the international 'wisdom' at the court of the first kings; here, late Judaism found a fertile precedent which it could be meaningful to take up anew, though now it was not the Egyptian/Phoenician/Akkadian wisdom that was the basis of the dialogue, but the Sophia of the Hellenism that belonged to Greek and Roman antiquity while remaining still Egyptian. We have discussed the 'Solomonic' wisdom literature when we spoke of the 'covenant': here it is above all the expression of the religious dimension of what is human. The two great bodies of wisdom teaching in the Bible, Ben Sirach and the Book of Wisdom, go beyond this sphere to form a kind of concluding contemplation of the reality of Israel, naturally in the broadened perspective of the entire dispensation of the working of divine wisdom for the world. Writings like Proverbs and Qoheleth find their place in this perspective, raised to a higher level. In keeping with the intellectual situation, it is inevitable that the biblical 'glory' (both as kabod in the narrower sense and as doxa in the broadened, integrated sense) should come into contact here with the kalon in the myth-philosophy-religion of Antiquity. The newly interpreted Sophia of the later wisdom writings, a figure that refers at one and the same time to the entire revelation of God in creation and in salvation history, serves as the wished-for mediation here.

We may leave Philo out of consideration, since he is too far from the biblical theology; the same is true of the small sketches or fragments of Hellenisation of Jewish material.[1] But the two works which are to be discussed here stand for their part in a difficult and exposed situation within salvation history which makes it virtually impossible for them to speak of the entire glory of God otherwise than in a (formal) anticipation of what is to come, although the materials at their disposal cannot suffice to give an account of this: for how were they to sense anything of the cross of Christ? Their contemplation, therefore, brings to a close what is not in fact brought to a close: and in this, they inevitably practise a theologia gloriae in a manner that can be criticised on the basis of the new covenant. The authors of these writings lack the sharp messianic dynamics that aim at the 'glory ahead', and the mystical and sectarian fanaticism for the 'glory above'; they are pious men who try to find God in all things of creation and salvation history, and who see 'glory all around'. Their aim is to praise God in all his works, and here they are a continuation of the psalmists; but here too they are very 'post-exilic', since all that remains in them of judgment in God's speech and action is a few fragments that they have in common with the apocalyptists. This means that they too stand in the 'long twilight', and the glory that they praise remains ethereal and bloodless; as has often been remarked, they belong to a bourgeois age, not in the least to an age of heroes. They are amazed at the ever greater wisdom of God, just as the Greek philosopher is astounded at the marvels of being; but they do not know the depths of wisdom on which Job's Sibylline gaze was fixed (Job 28). They have a passion for universal praise, for lauding and glorifying, which is the alpha and omega of the Old Testament existence in God's covenant.

---

[1] E.g., the proverbs of Ps.-Menander (Riessler, pp. 1047f.), Eupolemos (p. 328), the Sibylline Oracles (pp. 1014ff.), the Letter of Aristeas (pp. 193ff.), Aristobulus (pp. 179ff.), Artapanus (186ff.), Ps.-Aeschylus (p. 192), Ps.-Sophocles (p. 1046), Ps.-Orpheus (p. 729), Ps.-Heraclitus (p. 474), 3 and 4 Maccabees, Ps.-Phocylides (pp. 862ff.)., Theodotus (p. 1263), etc.

b. Ben Sirach

Ben Sirach writes about fifteen years before Daniel, and the perspectives which the latter opens up so dramatically are still closed for him; for his flights of praise, the world on this side of death and earthly life,[2] on which the sun of God's grace shines, are sufficient motive. As we have already seen above,[3] man is created in the image of God and is given God's sight in his heart so that he may recognise the greatness of his works, may recount them and praise God's holy name. Immediately after this, Ben Sirach describes the making of the eternal covenant, which proclaims God's good decrees to men and permits them to see the 'glory (δόξα) of his majesty' and to hear the 'splendour (δόξα) of his voice', giving them the commandment to venerate the true God and to love their neighbour.[4] Ben Sirach feels no distance from that glory which appeared to the fathers at Sinai, for the bridge of tradition carries it to him: Moses was permitted to see something of it in the dark cloud and to hear God's voice face to face,[5] Ezekiel had the 'sight of glory (ὅρασις δόξης) anew,[6] and prayer is made that this may once again fill the temple.[7] When it is said of the wise man that he finds shelter in the shadow of wisdom and makes his dwelling 'in her glory',[8] then this (like 41.27 doubtless also) is an early attestation of the rabbinic shekinah, God's 'dwelling beside' man. The wise man, whose inner eye sees both what happened in past history and what is naturally present today, is the perfect contemplator. By 'looking (ἐμβλέπειν) to the generations past he sees' the gracious favours of the Lord,[9] he 'reflects (διανοεῖσθαι) on them in his heart' with a 'listening ear',[10] he is concerned and occupied (μελετᾶν) with the commandments and precepts of the Lord.[11] The statements are piled up in the spirit of the contemplative Psalms:

---

[2] In Sheol there is no longer any praise of God: 17.27–28.

[3] Above, p. 96.

[4] 17.1–17.

[5] 45.3–5.

[6] 49.8.

[7] 36.19.

> Blessed is the man who meditates on wisdom > and who reasons intelligently.
> He who reflects in his mind on her ways > will also ponder her secrets.
> Pursue wisdom like a hunter, > and lie in wait on her paths.
> He who peers through her windows > will also listen at her doors . . .'[12]

This man is the 'theoretician' of God, in that θεωρεῖσθαι[13] means to look on something in contemplation. This does not prevent Ben Sirach's book from being full of a colourful multitude of practical rules of life in which he develops the Solomonic proverbs and enriches them through observations and experiences of his own; this is because, for him, everything here belongs to wisdom, is read off from the Word of God, is perceived in God's Spirit or at any rate brought into harmony with him. This is already what Cusa will call the venatio sapientiae ('hunting for wisdom'), in a love for the lady Wisdom who is both virgin, mother and beloved wife,[14] who fills the whole world yet has put down her roots in the 'people of glory', so that she may 'grow' from there to put forth her 'branches of glory and graciousness' and to pour forth her fragrance, so that she may once again fill the whole world.[15] The principal duty of this people is to give praise (δόξαν διδόναι, 51.17; αἰνεῖν, 51.22;[16] δοξάζειν, 43.30[17]), and here the sublimity of God is glorified best by the lowly and humbled ones (3.20).

---

[8] 14.27.
[9] 2.10.
[10] 3.22; the word occurs eighteen times, and διανόημα seven times, in Ben Sirach.
[11] 6.37.
[12] 14.20–23; cf. 39.7.
[13] 42.22.
[14] 15.2.

It is characteristic of Ben Sirach that this act of glorifying God casts a broad glow of glory, a kind of halo, on man; the concluding section of the book goes through the ranks of Israel's ancestors to praise the great glorifiers of God and thereby to share itself in the glory which was bestowed on them by God. 'Let us now praise famous men! . . . The Lord created great glory and showed his majesty [through them] from the beginning . . . all these were honoured in their generations, and were the glory of their times' (44.1–2, 7). Here we must recall that there is no immortality for Ben Sirach: the reward of the great men is the praise of them that remains afterwards among the people. 'No one was like Abraham in δόξα' (44.19). 'God gave Moses a δόξα like that of the holy ones (i.e., the angels) . . . and he glorified him in the presence of kings' (45.2–3). 'They glorified David for his ten thousands' (cf. 1 Sam 18.7), he bore 'a crown of δόξα' (47.6) and sat on a throne of δόξα (v. 11), 'in all that he did he gave thanks to the Holy One, the Most High, with ascriptions of glory' (v. 8). Joshua was glorious in war (ἐνδοξάσθη, 46.2). Because of his courage, Phinehas is named 'the third in δόξα' after Moses and Aaron (45.23). But it is Aaron's priesthood, in its rites and its vestments, that appears as the perfect glory to the author, and he never tires of praising it (45.6–22), especially when he describes the high priest Simon in the splendour of his liturgical functions (50.1–21); unlike Qumran, where the earthly liturgy is wholly transcendent to the heavenly liturgy, here the glory of heaven seems to become incarnate on earth in the temple of Jerusalem. The author specifically notes that Solomon stained his δόξα (47.20), and the disobedient kings are punished by having to relinquish their δόξα to a foreign people (49.5). This passage and others show how strongly for Ben Sirach the glory that he gives to God casts a reflection back upon himself; it is, of course, not himself that the 'holy' man praises (only Wisdom can do this: 24.1–2), but it is only right that he should be praised by his contemporaries and by those who come afterwards, sunning themselves in his light as an element of the glory of revelation. Δόξα and καύχημα[18] (the word that becomes so important in Paul) are therefore frequently found together and can be used as interchangeable terms (1.11; 10.22; 44.7; 45.7–8): one can also say that the biblical meaning of the word (δόξα = kabod) and the profane Greek meaning (δόξα = τιμή, fame, honour) are wed to one another in Ben Sirach for reasons of his theology. But this theology likewise permits the union of δόξα and χάρις (which are found together at 4.21 and 24.16), for δόξα is nothing other than the making present of God's salvation in his world, and thus precisely grace. Once again, the profane Greek χάρις[19] with its double meaning of grace (showing favour) and charm is transfigured on the basis of the biblical δόξα.[20] Finally, there is an intimate link between χάρις and κάλλος (beauty; 40.22); a woman's[21] attractiveness is perfect when it is both sensual and moral (26.13, 15–18).

---

[15] 24.9–20.

[16] Eighteen times.

[17] Thirty-one times, mostly in the sense of giving honour, where it is a matter of parents, priests, etc.

The mutual compenetration of the meanings of words is at its clearest when the author speaks of the praise of God's glory in the cosmos: here the biblical form of experience and expression (as found above all in the Psalms) takes up the Greek form of experience and expression, without however being itself essentially altered. One fundamental expression is: 'The sun looks down on everything with its light, and the work of the Lord is full of his glory (δόξα)' (42.16); or even more clearly: '. . . the universe stands firm in his glory' (42.17).[22] The thought is strictly biblical: while the amazement (θαυμάζειν: 43.18, 24, 25) is directed to the marvels and beauties of the world, it looks at the same time through these to see the Creator as the source of all marvels and beauty: his δόξα is looked on in the beauty of the world as in a slide. But—and here is the Greek element—the beauty of things is truly contemplated and admired as such, and here δόξα and κάλλος become one: 'The δόξα of the stars is the κάλλος of Heaven' (43.9). The firmament is said to be a 'spectacle of glory', the sun is 'a marvellous instrument, the work of the Most High' (43.1–2), the rainbow is 'exceedingly beautiful in its brightness (αὔγασμα); it encircles the heavens with its glorious arc; the hands of the Most High have stretched it out' (43.11–12); Ben Sirach goes on to admire clouds, wind and storms, thunder and lightning, snow, hail, ice and thaw, and finally he listens to the experiences of those who journey by sea, who tell of things quite different from those already known, strange and wonderful things and creatures (παράδοξα θαυμάσια ἔργα), and concludes with one of the most astounding statements of the Bible: 'Though we speak much, we cannot reach the end, and the sum of our words is: "He is the all" (τὸ Πᾶν ἐστιν αὐτός). Where shall we find strength to praise him? For he is greater than all his works' (43.27–28). The Greek-pantheistic formulation expresses for the Jew precisely what the seraphim of Isaiah had sung to one another: 'The whole earth is completely full of his kabod' (Is 6.3). The only thing that is new is the insight that the world exists in God's kabod, or in other words that God is not only transcendent to the world as one who is 'other' (for then he would be subject to limits), but is also totally immanent to the world precisely because of his total transcendence.

---

[18] Seven times, the verb nine times.

[19] Forty-two times.

[20] At 21.16, χάρις is ethical graciousness (doubtless following Ps 45.3), and often it is magnanimity in attitude and deed (almsgiving, generous gifts), just as δόξα and πλοῦτος are found together at 24.17 as the blossoms of wisdom.

[21] As merely external beauty of a woman (κάλλος): 9.8; 25.21; 26.17; 42.12; as generally 'beautiful appearance', 11.2.

The most beautiful expression in Ben Sirach of God's total transcendence is not abstract, as in Greek philosophy and in the gnosis which is descended from this, but is biblical as the expression of the experience of the ever greater, ever more incomprehensible glory of the God of grace who reveals himself. 'When you praise the Lord, exalt him as much as you can; for he will surpass even that. When you exalt him, put forth all your strength, and do not grow weary, for you cannot praise him enough. Who has seen him and can describe him? Or who can extol him as he is? Many things greater than these lie hidden, for we have seen but few of his works. For the Lord has made all things, and to the godly he has granted wisdom' (43.30–33).

---

[22] Following the Greek: Hebrew has: 'before his glory'.

If God is the one who is ever greater, he is this for the world essentially as the one who is full of grace. Ben Sirach does not known the Essene doctrine of double predestination, which is diametrically opposed to the ancient understanding of the covenant. God's goodness is one with his righteousness (sedaka), and his judgment is one with his mercy (mishpat). Although God had to be angry with his people because of their sins, he 'will never give up his mercy, nor cause any of his works to perish' (47.22). This total goodness of God does indeed correspond to Hellenistic ideas, but these only confirm here what Ben Sirach knows on the basis of the ancient scriptures.

> The compassion of man is [only] for his neighbour, > but the compassion of the Lord is for all living things:
> he rebukes and trains and teaches them,
> and turns them back, as a shepherd his flock . . .
> The Lord is patient with them > and pours out his mercy upon them.[23]

Hosea and his school had known this patience of God the educator, his goodness present even in his severity: now this insight is developed in Greek knowledge of the divine paideia. Deuteronomy had emphasised (10.17) that God knows no respect for persons, and this statement had a lasting resonance.[24] When Ben Sirach takes it up (35.12–16), he does so in the perspective of the biblical transcendence of God: the 'poor', the 'oppressed', 'orphans' and 'weeping widows', the 'lowly' do not miss out at the hands of God (35.11–19); by establishing justice, God shows his mercy (35.23). And yet [23] 18.13, 11.

---

[24] Job 34.19; 2 Chr 19.7; Wis 6.7; Acts 10.34; Rom 2.11.

God is not bound in a one-sided way; even the covenant with Abraham is based for Ben Sirach in the universal covenant with Noah, in which ultimately all one-sidedness in God's election is evened out: 'Everlasting covenants[25] were made with him that all flesh should not be blotted out by a flood' (44.18). In terms of Greek thought, this means: God is higher than the innerworldly contradictions, and the contradictoriness of things—the sign that they are not God—is 'very good' (Gen 1.31) in the presence of the Absolute which encompasses them. The statements of Ben Sirach on this subject are decisively important for the linking of revelation and philosophy with one another and for the entire future history of metaphysics, quite apart from the consideration that they incorporate the tired relativism of Qoheleth into a greater context that gives justification:

> All men are from the ground, > and Adam was created for the dust.
> In the fullness of his knowledge the Lord distinguished > them > and appointed their different ways;
> some of them he blessed and exalted, > and some of them he made holy and brought near to > himself,
> but some of them he cursed and brought low,
> and he turned them out of their place.
> As clay in the hand of the potter—> for all his ways are as he pleases—> so men are in the hand of him who made them, > to give them as he decides.
> Good is the opposite of evil, > and life the opposite of death;
> so the sinner is the opposite of the godly.
> Look upon all the works of the Most High; > they likewise are in pairs, one the opposite of the > other (33.10–15).

> How greatly to be desired are all his works, > and how sparkling they are to see!
> All these things live and remain for ever,

---

[25] Greek, against Hebrew which has: 'sign'.

> everything obeys him in every situation.[26]
> All things are twofold, one opposite the other, > and he has made nothing incomplete.
> One confirms the good things of the other, > and who can have enough of beholding his > glory? (42.22–25)

Such considerations will allow Paul to transcend even the most inexorable consequences of the doctrine of election into an ultimate harmony (Rom 9–11). Ben Sirach deduces this conclusion from the 'very good' of the first origin:

> No one can say, 'What is this?' 'Why is that?'
> for in his time all things will be sought after.
> No one can say, 'What is this?' 'Why is that?'
> for everything has been created for its use (39.16, > 21).
>
> The works of the Lord are all good, and he will supply > every need in its hour.
> And no one can say, 'This is worse than that',
> for all things will prove good in their season.
> So now sing praise with all your heart and voice, > and bless the name of the Lord (39.33–35).

The interplay of opposites in the world is such that 'one cannot take anything away or add anything'; but this also means that one has no overview of the entire construction, since through the puzzling totality of the world there shimmers the much more inscrutable totality of God. Thus it holds true that:

> It is not possible to trace the wonders of the Lord.
> When a man has finished, he is just beginning, > and when he stops, he will be at a loss (18.6–7).

One should, however, note once again that Ben Sirach, unlike the apocalyptists, does not know of an eternal condemnation,[27] and does not include this in the marvellous play of opposites (as does Christian theology from Augustine to Bonaventure and Dante).

---

[26] Hebrew.

[27] The things of nature which were created to punish the sinners, such as 'fire, hail, famine and death' (39.29), are therefore equally at the service of the God who educates with patience.

When he rises up to God's place in order to contemplate the 'very good' of the world together with him, then he understands the creature, in the spirit of Israel of old, as something essentially oriented to obedience, making no resistance to God's word and the command of his eternal order (16.27): above all, it is the stars that 'are not disobedient to his word' (16.28), the host of heaven (43.10), the sun (43.5) and even the elements obey him (39.17–18; 43.13f.). The animals obey likewise (16.29). 'The entire creation obeys his will' (42.15) and becomes transparent to his glory thanks to this obedience, the space within which this glory unfolds itself (42.16). Man, however, is created free: God has set before him the choice between life and death, and he must decide (15.11–20). For Ben Sirach, the knowledge of good and evil belongs from the outset to this freedom (17.7),[28] as does the knowledge about the link between fear of God (or obedience) and wisdom (19.20). No one in the old covenant spoke with greater enthusiasm and eloquence than Ben Sirach about the fear of God as the 'origin', the 'root', and the 'perfection' of all wisdom (1.11–20). For him, the fear of the Lord is 'glory and praise', 'delight and joy', 'blessing in death': it is the free availability for God which the other creatures naturally possess, creating in man the space for the wisdom which pours itself forth from God into the world (1.1–10). For this, a certain poverty in spirit is necessary: 'Better is the God-fearing man who lacks intelligence, than the highly prudent man who transgresses the law. There is a cleverness which is scrupulous but unjust' (19.24f.).[29] If one has sinned, one must repent and abandon one's evil deeds (17.25): fear of God and repentance are one (21.6). Ben Sirach prizes worldly fame: when man is honoured, he receives a small reflection of the divine δόξα (10.26–31); but ultimately he knows well that, whether poor or rich, honoured or not, only the one who fears God has true value (10.19–25).[30] Indeed, the fear of God shelters the pious man more than the canopy of the shekinah (40.27; cf. Is 4.5–6).

---

[28] But 'the knowledge of wickedness is not wisdom, nor is there prudence where sinners take counsel' (19.22).

[29] This is a riposte (direct or indirect) to what sounded all too utilitarian, worldly and managerial in the ancient proverbs from the period of the kings.

Even though Ben Sirach includes many traditional perspectives on virtue and piety—self-control and patience,[31] keeping silent,[32] caution in dealings with others,[33] the avoidance of credulity,[34] of over-activity,[35] of lust of the flesh,[36] of enjoyment of wine,[37] etc.—his image of God brings those elements to prominence which draw him close to the New Testament: obedience and love of God seen in unity (2.15–16), spiritual poverty and humility (πραῦτης ταπείνωσις),[38] unlimited confidence in God (2.18), love of neighbour (7.20f.), forgiveness of sins (28.1–7), bending down to help one's neighbour in every kind of need (4.1–10; 7.32–36; 11.12; 34.21–22), and naturally almsgiving, with an immanent reward[39] that is often emphasised (7.32, 10; 29.8–13; 40.17). It is characteristic also that one is recommended to be good to oneself (14.5, 11–15); one should let oneself enjoy something of God's good gifts. In all this, the Old Testament boundaries are not crossed: one is not to do anything for the sinner or help him: 'refuse him your bread, do not give it to him, for he could become stronger than you'. And this is to be done in imitation of God: 'For the Most High also hates sinners and will inflict punishment on the ungodly. Give to the good man, but do not help the sinner' (12.1–7).

The last things are spoken of with reservation: the only thing certain is that each one will be rewarded in accordance with his deeds, and that the end of each one will disclose the value of his life (11.26–28). 'The fire of flame' and 'Sheol' are mentioned together as the end of the godless (21.9–10). The real emphasis lies on his assertion that life is a trial, πειρασμός: if one wishes to serve God, one must arm oneself with courage for 'the furnace of humilation', and one must bring faith, confidence, hope, and patience, a heart that is always ready (2.1–18); it is the divine Wisdom itself that puts man to the test to see if he trusts her, indeed 'she will torment him by her discipline until she trusts him' (4.11–17). Here Ben Sirach reaches his profoundest point: Wisdom, as she imparts her education, lies like a heavy stone on the ignorant and rebellious, and there will never be more than a few who can hold out under her weight. But 'put your shoulder under her and carry her, and do not fret under her bonds . . . when you get hold of her, do not let her go . . . her fetters will become for you a strong protection, and her collar a glorious robe' (6.18–31). Such exhortations to renunciation and discipline seem little different from the wisdom for the practical conduct of life in Egyptian, Oriental and Hellenistic religions, and they certainly throw a bridge across to these traditions; but behind them is Ben Sirach's love for the Wisdom—virgin, bride and mother—that flows forth from God and is the mode of God's presence and providence for man. A hidden tenderness makes all morality appear as something done out of thankfulness to God and in order to glorify him. Here there shines out something of the fire of the theology of obedience of the major prophets in the theologia gloriae of late Judaism, and we perceive something of what will be called glory in the new covenant. But the concealment of the new in the old (Novum in Vetere latet) remains tightly sealed: the scholar of Wisdom does not put his shoulders under the cross, but under something that puts him to the test because it 'educates' him in the Hellenistic and late Jewish sense.[40] But fortunately, he knows that the standard in accordance with which and for which he is being educated is no anthropological standard; all wisdom comes from God alone (1.1) and therefore remains unfathomable (1.2–3, 6) and hidden (11.4); and what man knows of Wisdom is even now too great for him: 'Do not meddle in what is beyond your tasks, for matters too great for human understanding have been shown you' (3.23). God's revelation is a flood that is directed into channels, 'but lo, my channel became a river, and my river became a sea' (24.31). The man who is nourished with what belongs to God will always hunger again as he eats, always thirst again as he drinks (24.21), for he has become a function of the one who surpasses him. He is born so that he may give praise, but God is yet greater than all praise (43.30); the infinity is not the infinity of vanity and emptiness (as Qoheleth thought), but the infinity of a fullness that cannot ever be measured (18.1–7).

---

[30] Cf. 6.17.

[31] 1.22–24.

[32] 5.10f. 19.6f.; 20.1f.; 27.16f.; 28.13f.

[33] 6.5f.; 7.26f; 9.1f; 9.10f.; 12.8–18; 13.1–3: 18. 19–27; 33.20f.

[34] 19.13f.

[35] 11.10–11.

[36] 22.27–23.6; 23.17f.

[37] 31.25–31.

[38] 1.27; 1.30; 3.17–18; 4.8; 7.17; 10.14, 28; 36.23; 45.4

[39] The doctrine of immanent retribution is unavoidable in Ben Sirach, since he knows of no retribution after death. Cf. 9.12; 21.27–28; 27.9, 25f.; 35.10; 41.7.

---

[40] On the musar as discipline, correction, rebuke, education, teaching, direction, moral formation, cf. the comprehsensive remarks of D. Hilaire Duesberg in: Les Scribes Inspirés, 2 vols., 1938.

c. The Book of Wisdom

Although written one hundred and thirty years after Ben Sirach, the Alexandrian Book of Wisdom (c. 50 B.C.) sounds essentially the same note. It too anticipates a synthesis that can exist materially only when Christianity comes, and in Wisdom too the world—as nature and as history—is the disclosure of God's glory; but once again two barriers are erected: first, the depths of the night that opened up in the major prophets and in the exile are deliberately kept closed (Israel is 'the blameless race': 10.15), and second, the eschatological division into black and white remains and is indeed sharpened (through influences from apocalyptic which has come into life since Sirach was written): the seven great antitheses between Egypt and Israel which bring the book to a close, in which existence in the light of the covenant stands over against existence in the Egyptian darkness, is a terrifying closure to the old covenant and shows that the decisive word from God has not yet been spoken. This will have to be a pure eschatological act, which no contemplative synthesis can anticipate; thus it is not possible for δόξα to unveil its ultimate countenance here. The whole book stands in the mild, diffused light of δόξα, which has become the 'effluence' and 'mirror' of God (7.26) but which is no longer God himself. Δόξα suffers from the same deprivation of power that has been its fate since Third Isaiah, although it is no longer 'glory ahead' and 'glory above', but is a radiance from God poured out over the whole cosmos in the present tense. Contact has now been made with the metaphysical concept of glory in Plato and Plotinus: the glory of what 'exists' in the world (11.24) is now the ultimate ground of all being (τὸν ὄντα, 13.1) which shines forth in the 'measure, number and weight' (11.20) of all things, and the analogical recognition of this glory through the beauty of the world is now portrayed explicitly as possible and necessary (13.5).

Like the earlier wisdom teachings, the Book of Wisdom emphasises that wisdom, which is hard to find, is with God and belongs to him, and that it is given only to the one who has the fear of God, who begs for it and receives it in an open and thankful heart. Wisdom's love for mankind was already given prominence in the latest part of the Book of Proverbs;[41] but the readiness of wisdom to let herself be found is something new. Here she is gratia praeveniens: 'she hastens to make herself known to those who desire her', indeed 'she goes about seeking those worthy of her, and she graciously appears to them in their paths, and meets them in every thought'.[42] She is 'radiant and unfading, and she is easily discerned by those who love her',[43] just as God himself 'lets himself be found by those who do not put him to the test, and manifests himself to those who do not distrust him' (1.2), for 'wickedness makes men blind' (2.21). This is therefore the encounter of the divine agape with the praying eros of the one who seeks wisdom—a thought that is in accordance both with the piety of the Psalms and with Platonist philosophy. The eros corresponds both to the duty and to the inclination of man: he loves wisdom because she is beautiful, but on a deeper level, because God himself loves her.

---

[41] Prov 8.31; Wis 1.6; 7.23,

[42] 6.13, 16.

[43] 6.12.

> 'I loved her and sought her from my youth, > and I desired to take her for my bride, > and I became enamoured (ἐραστής) of her > beauty.
> She glorifies her noble birth by living with God, > and the Lord of all loves her.
> For she is an initiate (μύστις) in the knowledge of > God, > and an associate in his works.'[44]

It would follow that mysticism is initiation into Wisdom, which is here called God's mystic: a sharing through prayer and love in the mystery of God which is disclosed in the world by God.

But who or what is this wisdom? The book maintains a deliberate reserve, speaking only in circumlocutions of the mystery and giving the impression through the images it employs of something oscillating and flowing that may not be pinned down on any one side rather than another. And although it employs images and concepts from the various schools of Greek philosophy without reserve, it does not commit itself in the slightest to one particular system; the words point to a mystery that cannot be captured in any system. Wisdom is a 'breath (ἀτμίς) of the power of God',[45] a 'breath' or 'spirit' (πνεῦμα, corresponding to ruach, always implies bodily breathing as well),[46] which as such is 'reasonable' and 'holy',[47] but the direct equation of wisdom and spirit[48] is not made;[49] likewise, wisdom is close to the word of God, without being identical to it.[50] She is the purest [45] 7.25.

---

[44] 8.2–4

[46] On this, cf. D. Barthèlemy, Gott mit seinem Ebenbild (1966), pp. 227–246.

[47] 7.22.

[48] At 1.6 one must translate: 'Wisdom is a spirit (breath) that loves men'.

[49] 1.7 speaks of 'the Spirit of the Lord' which 'fills the whole earth'.

[50] The word of God creates the world (9.1), but wisdom chooses what is to be created (8.4), is present at the creation and know what pleases God (9.9). The word proceeds from God as a judge (destroyer: 18.15) and saviour (healer: 16.12), wisdom is oscillating presence (7.22f.).

'emanation' (ἀπόρροια) of the 'glory (δόξα) of the Almighty': thus she both is and is not the glory of God: she is glory in the mode of not remaining alone by herself; she is the 'reflection (ἀπαύγασμα), of the eternal light', 'spotless mirror of the working (ἐνέργεια) of God', 'image (εἰκών) of his sovereign goodness' (7.26); thus always God in the act of going forth from himself, which is never an act of alienation from himself, for this is excluded by the adjectives 'pure' and 'spotless' and by the descriptions piled up at 7.22–24, which wish to have wisdom appear precisely as the immanence of God in his creation: 'in her there is a spirit that is intelligent, holy, unique, manifold, subtle, mobile, clear, unpolluted, distinct, invulnerable, loving the good, keen, irresistible, beneficent, humane, steadfast, sure, free from anxiety, all-powerful, overseeing all, and penetrating through all spirits . . . for wisdom is more mobile than any motion; because of her pureness she pervades and penetrates all things'. Let us repeat that one should not speak of an eclectic popular philosophy when one considers this stammering list: one should grasp that here the theological mystery of the presence and indwelling of God (which mocks every attempt at systematisation) wishes to be described in the distinction and non-distinction from itself. The new covenant will take up with care these great images that are set up here in their ranks and made ready for its use, but ancient philosophy too, in its concluding form in Plotinus, will be in harmony with this description when it makes its fundamental statement about unity and multiplicity and about God's remaining in himself and going forth from himself; wisdom is 'unique and manifold', 'though she is but one, she can do all things'; 'compared with the light she is found to be superior, for it is succeeded by the night, but against wisdom evil does not prevail' (7.22, 27, 29–30). Thus she shares God's property of being superior to all contradictions, non-aliud.

This removes from the God of the old covenant a suspicion which could not seriously be entertained about him but which was repeatedly laid to his charge—not least by Hegel![51]— namely, the suspicion that he is 'a' God who is powerful and demanding, but who is separated from the world by his emphatic personality (and perhaps separated also from other real or possible gods) and thus limited in himself. The 'one Yahweh' (Deut 6.4), who is the 'one' (Wis 7.27) and 'unique' (7.22), is also the one whose sovereignty extends through the universe, the one who remains in himself, 'without stepping outside himself', and yet at the same time can be his own emanation, reflection and image in the world. One cannot accuse the Book of Wisdom of having obscured or even betrayed the traits of the living God of Israel here; even if it does not mention all his traits, the new Testament will supply what has been left out here, and will re-establish the unity of early and late Judaism in the higher Christian unity.

---

[51] Vol. V, pp. 911f. (German text).

Since the wisdom of God multiplies itself in the world, it becomes the occasion for the development of the human sciences; Solomon, who is understood as the one who speaks and acts here, becomes the patron of 'true knowledge of the things that exist, (τῶν ὄντων): teaching about the cosmos and its elements, astronomy and zoology, psychology, botany, and pharmacology are mentioned specifically (7.17–20); in the same way, one can recognise on the basis of the biblical knowledge of the 'rightness' of God (sedaka) as 'fruits' the cardinal virtues of ethical philosophy: 'self-control and prudence, justice and courage' (8.7).[52] But since wisdom nevertheless remains one and the same even when she is multiplied in the world and in history, she must provide the basis of the philosophy of religion too, with its proofs of the existence of God: the κάλλος (goodness and beauty) of the works of God gives sufficient occasion to attain God through drawing analogies (13.4–5). Indeed, the beauty and goodness of the works of God is so great that those 'seekers of God' who do not go beyond the glorious heavenly bodies and deify these 'deserve a lighter rebuke' (13.6) than those who fashion idols and commit an unforgivable sin (13.10–15.19). All the other sins derive (14.27) from this religious perversion, whose psychological origin is vividly portrayed (14.12–21), for all sound ethics depends on a sound religious relationship to God.

---

[52] The fact that δικαιοσύνη means here both the general 'rightness' and the individual virtue of 'justice' shows the perplexity of the Greek translators when confronted with such fundamental Hebrew concepts as sedek or mishpat; but it also shows that a link has been made to Plato, who derives all of the cardinal virtues from universal rightness or appropriateness (δικαιοσύνη: Rep. IV 443f.); cf. vol. IV of this work, p. 173 (Eng. trans.).

But although God is the 'friend of the living' (11.26) who loves all that exists (11.24) and accompanies it with his providence (14.3) and permits it to share the benefits of his 'sparing' (11.26; 12.16), nevertheless it is only Israel whom he has made blessed with the light of his wisdom. It was wisdom who protected the people of Israel and went before them, giving light in the pillar of cloud and fire (10.17), and when Solomon asks for her, she too protects him 'in her glory' (9.11): instead of the darkness that covers the eyes and souls of the Egyptians, 'thou didst provide a flaming pillar of fire as a guide for thy people's unknown journey, and a harmless sun for their glorious wandering' (18.3).

For the Book of Wisdom, this kabod is very close to the 'imperishable light of the Torah which was to be given to the world' (18.4). It sits beside God's throne (9.4) and is also the 'archetype' of the sacred cult, as Moses saw this on the mountain (9.8). This especial closeness to the revealed wisdom gives Israel a mysterious share in eternal life, the share which the author describes in his eschatology, once again employing hues of Greek philosophy: while those who do not know God walk the path of death (1.13–15), of perishable enjoyment (2.1–9) and of scorn and oppression of the pious (2.10–20), a path that ends with the fall into Sheol (4.19), 'the righteous will live for ever' and will receive 'a glorious crown and a beautiful diadem' (5.15–16). For 'their hope was already full of immortality' (3.4: this is the first time that the word 'immortality' occurs in the Bible). No particular value is attached now to having descendants (4.1: this too for the first time in the Bible): the infertile woman and the eunuch can have their own greater fruitfulness in wisdom (3.13–14), and a young life in love of God can already be fulfilled (4.7–14); it is not the quantitative evil length of life with its useless fruits (4.3–6), which God did not desire (3.16f.), that counts in the judgement, but the only form of life that is worthy of man, the life that keeps to the original divine image. 'For God created man for incorruption ἀφθαρσία, and made him in the image of his own eternity' (ἀϊδιότης: the reading ἰδιότης, his own being, is scarcely to be accepted as original: 2.23). This is new, even when compared to Ben Sirach (Sir 17.1), and betrays a higher concept of the dignity of man, although we are not obliged to discern a Platonic element of flight from the world in this. Death (2.24) and the nullity and transitoriness of the world are secondary when compared to God's original plan; but wisdom permits man to live on the heights of the original plan of wisdom, even if this is a life under 'trials' (2.19; 3.5–7) and 'education' (11.9;12.21–22). The existence of the one who trusts in God is recognised as eschatological, as sharing in the 'new age', and thus the fruit of the apocalypses is brought home, while their extravagances are abandoned. The concluding sevenfold antithesis between Jews and Egyptians which was mentioned above is a double existential analysis of living with God and living without God; it is worth noting that the latter analysis is carried out as the analysis of the fear of those whose lives are rooted in nothing and are terrified by nothing (17.1–20). [53] Characteristic of the former is the 'turning' to the 'sign of salvation', the bronze serpent (16.6–7), eating the 'food of angels', the manna, with a taste that accommodated itself to the longing of each individual (16.20–21), walking in the light of instruction (18.3–4) and of the powerful word (18.15), indeed, life out of the word (16.26). Thus the author succeeds in uniting the philosophical and world-historical breadth of 'religion' with the decisiveness of the biblical eschatological either/or. Even if his dual image of judgment and his conceptual material remain just as characteristically Old Testament as those of Ben Sirach, he still goes beyond this to create a formal synthesis which the New Testament will fill with its own contents.

---

[53] I have set this out in greater detail in my Der Christ und die Angst (1951), pp. 16–22.

B. THE PRESENT DAY WITHOUT GLORY

1. THE EMPTY TIME

If one surveys the three developments of the theologia gloriae which have been sketched above—the reaching-out into the future, into the heaven above, and into the surrounding cosmos—then it immediately becomes terrifyingly clear that such an urgent need for glory can derive only from a great deficiency. As long as the people were still impressed by Yahweh's salvific activity in the present, they could not become aware of the full profundity of this deficiency, even if Yahweh's salvific activity also revealed its character as a judgment that embraced the most breathtaking experiences of the night and historical catastrophes. But this deficiency became ever more acutely perceptible when the exilic and post-exilic prophecy failed to be fulfilled: now God sends a true famine into the land, 'not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of Yahweh . . . but they shall not find it' (Amos 8.11–12). There is no longer any prophet (1 Macc 4.46; 9.27; 14.41) Since they are so few in number, the 'remnant' that returns home from the captivity does not feel itself to be the embodiment of the chosen people; rather, in order to give itself such a consciousness, it must first fashion an entire ideology for itself (Chronicles); it lives in a deep uncertainty that underlies its whole life, viz. whether it can validly represent the covenant relationship held by the confederation of the twelve tribes when as a people it is far from representing the whole confederation. This uncertainty is heightened by the silence of prophecy. In this long period, the remnant of Israel must experience something that is important and very difficult: the freedom which God has to speak or to be silent, to act or to be still. God no longer speaks and acts as he did in the epoch that goes from the exodus to the destruction of the holy city. Everything that was to be said and done has been completed, for the time being: Israel has sufficient material to meditate on in a sabbath that lasts for centuries. The pause which is imposed here cannot be described either by means of the presence of God or by means of the terrible absence experienced in Lamentations and Job—for them, the most intensive negative experience of his glory. It would be exaggerated now to speak of a genuine abandonment by God: it is only impossible to determine whether God is truly 'there'.

In this meditative pause, God's glory—the assurance of his lordship—is covered by a thick veil. This concealment is revealed by the passionate reachings-out in all directions for this glory. Once, during the period of salvation history, the decisive way to make the divine glory a present reality was to reach-out backwards into the origins in an especial manner: the Book of Deuteronomy sees the kabod of Sinai as the basis of everything. Several prophets point to the pure and spotless situation of the origins in the wilderness. The intention here was to establish a genuine system of relationship between the former and the present historical periods. But is the present day of the post-exilic period a historical period at all? In Deutero-Isaiah, the historical span between the foundational period (of the journey through the wilderness) and the present time in exile was contemplated from a distance that was the beginning of a detached standpoint outside events: God's new activity comes from far off (from the creation) and makes for further goals; only, the prophet lacked the categories in which to speak of this new thing that was to come. But now no one knew whether the growing stillness had something to do with this new thing—for it was in any case not a salvific act of God—or whether Israel had gone off the rails in some terrible way. But this meant that the effective appeal backwards, to the glories of the historical beginning, was fundamentally no longer possible. This was the reason for the three new ways of reaching-out.

Their hidden salvific meaning was hinted at above: the sign of the God of grace which was established in history, but was necessarily subject to the restrictions of the historical dimension, must first be transplanted into a much widened sphere in order to be appropriate as the basis for the universal salvific act of God that would embrace the whole world:

while the historical sign was permitted to show its innate truth through the relationship between promise and fulfilment, it must subsequently become as a whole a promise that transcends itself into a future that is the first true fulfilment.

The messianic dynamic of all Israel, oriented towards the future, was this first transcendence, which bore the weight of all the historical impatience of imminent expectation: first the impatience of the political imminent expectation of the Davidic prophecy and of the great instructions and proclamations of the literary prophets, and then (growing almost seamlessly out of this) the impatience of the apocalyptic imminent expectation of the Book of Daniel and of all the hopes for the end times that stem from this book.

The reaching-out for the 'glory above' opened the second dimension, which is closely linked to the first: the dimension between earth and Heaven, between first age and second age. This apocalypse of the world above arose from two basic experiences of Israel: first, that there was always a more than historical power at work in the great salvific acts of the origin—an experience clearly expressed in the poetical formulations in the hymns that sing of the theophanies—and second, that the present form of the covenant did not in any way match and correspond to those origins, and that this present, as the prophets proclaimed, must be exploded in order to make space for the form that absolutely must come because it is postulated by the historical origin and because God must remain true to himself by carrying through what he has begun. Not only the so-called apocalyptic 'pessimism', but also and even more the great self-reproaches and confessions of sin on the part of late Israel (from Ps 51 and Is 63–64 to Neh 1.5f.; 9; Ezr 9.6–15; Dan 9: Bar 1–2) testify to the awareness that everything must become completely different in the future, and that nothing on earth can change unless Heaven intervenes. This is the reason for the strange conspiracy between messianism and apocalyptic: the former draws the necessary force to look to the future from the latter: the messianic period claims that everything must be completely transformed, but this cannot be expected of the powers that are at work within history, and now mysticism must provide an experiential proof that the supra-historical heavenly powers are already on the way to make the decisive intervention.

The third reaching-out, that attempted in wisdom teaching, seems to be unrelated to the first two, but is nevertheless closely linked to them. Wisdom assures itself in advance of the glory of everything, seeing the totality of the creation as existing within the glory of God. But while the (deutero-) canonical wisdom books remain content with a familiar description of the ordering of human life, of visible nature and of the well-known history of the nations, the apocryphal writings make an encyclopaedic incursion into the history of the whole earth and soon after into the astronomy of the heavenly spheres, and from here it is but a step to a gnosis of the entire course of history; from God's standpoint, one can also investigate the ordering of all historical periods and therefore the future. Just as (late) messianism is concerned with the absolute future and apocalyptic with the break-through of eternity, so wisdom is concerned with the cosmos as a whole, which must be thoroughly inhabited by the glory of God. [1]

In considering this threefold demand made by Judaism that the glory of God should come, one cannot suppress the question whether Israel, taken as a whole, ever shared in this glory in any form other than that of a great deprivation. The mighty theophany in which the covenant was sealed lay in the dim past that was not to be brought back. Hymnody and the theological interpretation of history continued to give their poetic interpretation of this event, until it took on the variously dialectic form in which it has been canonised in the Pentateuch. And when Israel later cried to its God, who no longer worked such signs of salvation as in the exodus from Egypt, at Sinai and in the occupation of the promised land, did it not ask in such prayers that it might receive a glory in a splendid form that it had itself thought up and portrayed? The glory of the origin was no longer attainable: the

---

[1] On the connection between wisdom literature and apocalyptic, cf. G. von Rad, ThOT. I, pp. 446f., 451; Vol. II, pp. 306–308

'Enlightenment' of the period of the kings no longer reckoned with this as a possibility, Deuteronomy took it as a cipher for the burning relevance of love and of the covenant, and the priestly author set it as the seal of legitimation on the cultic forms. The only glory that remained now was that which the prophets saw in their call-visions, and occasionally in other visions: but the only testimony to this was that of the seers themselves, a testimony that was laid open to attack by the offence which their prophetic task as a whole gave; the same would be true later of the testimony of the twelve apostles and of Paul to the resurrection. Besides this, glory remained essentially a promise, unless it was the content of praise; but this praise was fundamentally based on Israel's faith, on the courage with which it held fast to its election, on its love for its God, and on its confidence in his present and future guidance. The proclamation of the divine glory in nature and in history which we find in the wisdom teachers is likewise related to the confessing hymns and to the courage which these display. It is, therefore, easy to understand the attraction of the apocalyptic literature, which sets the slender testimony of an Isaiah and an Ezekiel on a much broader base: now, all the great figures of Israel receive their mystical vision of glory in Heaven, while this literature possesses a presence which permits the readers in some closer or more distant form to share in the visions which are described, either by repeating the experiences or in hope. And yet most of these mystical protocols are mere literature—and often very bad literature—and the conscience of Israel, which is undertaking at this very period the selection of its sacred writings which will set the boundaries of the canon, is well aware of this.

Thus Israel's entire knowledge of the glory of God suddenly seems extremely threatened. The object of this knowledge withdraws continually, never becoming a present reality: it is at once past and future. Israel comes from some place to which it can no longer attain, and is en route to some place which it cannot yet reach. What it possesses is a faith—in its election, in the covenant, in the promises—and a hope that inviolably knows that, through all the experiences of night and through all judgments, the end which must necessarily comes lies in the gift of the beginning. And Israel possesses a love for the God who redeemed it from the house of slavery and has promised to remain true to his side of the covenant. The Psalms are a book of love.

But now the love of the covenant-God has put his partner to the hardest test by placing him in a period empty of history—although history was always the mode in which God revealed himself to the people. The fact that 'sacred history' ceases in the post-exilic period is one of the most terrible things in the biblical revelation. At first, the attempt is made to interpret the poor fare of the events after the return from exile as a continuation of sacred history: we find this in Nehemiah and Ezra. This is like a brook in the process of drying up. The Books of Chronicles merely adapt past sacred history to the ideology of Judaism and of the Levitical service in the temple. The Books of Maccabees do not succeed in portraying anything other than the secular history of a religious war carried out with pious enthusiasm and heroic idealism. Despite this, all of these books can certainly be inspired, and belong to the canon of the 'sacred books', just like the 'midrashim' of Esther, Judith and Tobit; but, at least from the perspective of salvation history, they lie a whole level lower down. Sacred history in the ancient sense begins again only with John the Baptist.

This is the difficulty that for Judaism cannot be resolved: how could the period which was empty of significance for salvation history be filled and shaped, if it was no longer given a structure by the salvific acts of God in history or dented by his eternity? If the solution of the timelessly even contemplative wisdom was rejected, then two attempts could be made to answer this almost lethal question. The contemplative distance which was permitted or imposed by the ceasing of salvation history could in no sense be understood as a valid substitute for Israel's unique consciousness of time, for that would have been the abandonment of the historical election and hence of the distinctive understanding of God held by the chosen people: it would have been an approximation of the timeless religious 'metaphysics' of international wisdom teaching, and later of Hellenism. It had, however, already been seen that the 'last dance' of this wisdom in Qoheleth has been partly attributable to the loss of qualitative time: the Preacher knows only empty time that turns in a circle with merely relative, innerwordly 'fortunate moments' for this and that, moments that balance and cancel each other. The whole sapiential understanding of time in Ben Sirach and the Book of Wisdom too threatened to go in the direction of a similar 'entropy' of time and thus of an understanding merely in terms of the 'history of religions', unless quite other motifs worked against this.

Priestly theology contributes such a motif, which is embodied in an extreme form by the Essene theology of the Qumran group, who of course saw themselves as the only true sons of Zadok. This consists in the through-going liturgical structuring of the year with a calendar of feasts, which is traced back (in P) to the very event of the making of the covenant, the event which legitimises it. To us, the historical improbability of the detailed derivation in P is troublesome: the sanctuary in the wilderness is 'revealed' in its every detail (Ex 35–40), and minute prescriptions are given for the sacrificial ritual (Lev 1–7, 17; Num 28f.), the installation of the priests in office (Lev 8–10), the functions of the Levites (Num 1.48ff., 3.5ff., 4), the yearly cycle of feasts (Lev 23; Num 28–29), and the holy years (Lev 25); but for the priestly way of thinking, this derivation was indispensable, if the 'empty time' was to be steadily a participation in the time of God—which for Qumran was the heavenly time of the new age. And the more massive and material were the rites, their contents and elaborations, the more 'incarnate' did Israel's covenant relationship seem—if it was possible to legitimise the entire cultic complex on the basis of the making of the covenant. We shall have the opportunity later to evaluate the priestly ritualism as an 'objective' form of existence caught up in rapture to the realm of God. Here it suffices to determine the inherent boundary of the whole conception: as a form, it is not essentially distinct from the ritual of other, ahistorical religions which think of time in a cyclic manner, and when Israel gave an historical significance to the cycle of Canaan's seasonal feasts, by understanding them as days commemorating the historical salvific acts of God, this opened up the possibility of the opposite danger: i.e., that the historical dimension would be dissolved once more in the cyclic. P's notion that Moses had seen the model of the tent of the covenant in all its details on the mountain and had then made a copy of it in the camp below, is not essentially different from Platonic thinking; it is therefore theologically irrelevant (no matter how much the question may be debated from an historical perspective) whether a genuine theology of P is pursued to its logical consequences in the liturgicism of Qumran, or whether there was an openness here to Hellenistic (Platonic—Pythagoraean) influences. If the whole of the temple activity and the thorough-going sacralisation of secular life (through the perpetual distinction between pure and impure:) (Lev 11–15) can be derived from immediate revelation, why not the whole of Qumran's calendar with its cosmic numerical speculations too? But then it is logical also to follow P in the Pentateuch by treating the kabod of Yahweh only as one arbitrarily applicable seal of the attestation of a king among the diverse cultic institutions—something that means that the true glory has passed from God to the institution. In this sense, the Chronicler customarily speaks of the 'glory of the temple', but he means, instead of the (vanished) splendour of Solomon's temple, the whole liturgical commotion of the feasts, pilgrimages, processions, sacrifices, vestments and inspired songs, which fill his heart with joy and seem to him to be the unsurpassable form of the presence on earth of God's salvation (2 Chron 5.11–14; 29.25ff.; Ezr 7.27 = 1 Esr 8.25; 1 Macc 1.40; 2.9,12; 14.15; 2 Macc 3.2; 5.16 ,20 etc.; Sir 50.1–21). But Jesus prophesies the total destruction of precisely this self-radiant, timeless, architectonic-liturgical glory (Mk 13.1–2 par.).

The other motif is imminent expectation. The empty time is always on the point of going over into fulfilled time. Qumran also employed its numerical speculations and astrological calculations to work out the date of the coming day of the Lord, and it does not seem utterly impossible that the three Magi ex Oriente came to Bethlehem from that region. In this looking to the future, Qumran stands on the shoulders of Daniel, for whom, as Martin Noth has shown,[2] 'the concept of history scarcely plays any noteworthy role'.[3] 'Daniel' is not interested in the succession of the four world-empires which are the prelude to the coming of the Messiah; he merely takes over at that point a pre-existing schema which originated outside Israel, and does so with an alteration that betrays no understanding of history whatever, since he inserts a non-existent Mede empire between those of Babylon and Persia;[4] his perspective does not even embrace the temporal succession of the empires, nor the idea, commonplace in Antiquity, that each successive empire is worse than its predecessor; all that interests him is the overall orientation of the whole historical period towards the eschatological point in time. This point in time is still left open in the king's vision of the falling colossus (Dan 2), but it is determined in the interpretation of the vision of the four beasts (ch. 7), and still more openly and idiosyncratically in the prophecy of the seventy weeks (ch. 9): here, a precise point, very close in time, is determined, by submitting the statement of Jeremiah to a new interpretation. It is significant that here precisely the destruction of the temple glory by Epiphanes plays such an important role, because this draws on the sacerdotal understanding of time to help in the prophetic interpretation of time: the obvious ending of the valid period of the temple must coincide with the beginning of the fulfilled prophetic time: 'O Lord, cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary, which is desolate' (Dan 9.17; cf. 9.19). If Judaism survived the point in time indicated by Daniel, and continued to set up the glory of the temple again and again afresh, this is only in the sense of something which has properly been declared dead but which outlives itself (and here Qumran had the correct instinct). Although the prophetic interpretation of time continually made predictions that failed to come true, it had won the victory. The fullness of time, which had already come upon the scene in principle in God's great historical acts of salvation, and had thereby disclosed something of God's glory, was nevertheless—as fullness—only en route. The scheme of promise and fulfilment, which had been taught on various levels by the Pentateuch and was then taken up by the prophets, and surpassed by Deutero-Isaiah in an especially radical way, had maintained its true formal dimensions because of the experience of the empty time, but these dimensions could be filled with content only through the new covenant. The third section below ('The Blood Event') will show that even the 'superseded' sacerdotal time was to contribute a positive word here.

---

[2] 'Das Geschichtsverständnis der alttestamentlichen Apokalyptik' (1954, now in: Ges. Stud. AT, pp. 248–273).

[3] Pp. 249, 273, quoted by L. Koehler, Der hebräische Mensch (1953), pp. 125f.

[4] Cf. also H. H. Rowley, Darius the Mede and the four World Empires in the Book of Daniel (1935).

2. THE SPEECH EVENT

But how was it possible for Israel to hold on to such a living awareness of its election, its uniqueness and its mission for the whole world even in the periods of its tragic decline and of its apparent abandonment by an active, saving God? There must have been more to this than merely reminiscences of far-off history; even in a present deprived of glory, there must have remained such strong impulses from the historical period, such strong witnesses of the kabod of Yahweh, that these could be experienced as fully valid substitutes for what was missing. And de facto, the event-character of two factors in Israel's religion retained their power even in the period when events were few; the event of the word of God and the event of the blood of man and beast.

As far as the word of God is concerned, the period of Judaism is said to be the period in which the verbal form of the Bible received its definitive fixed written shape (the contemplative distance from the word which had gone forth in history seemed the best presupposition for this process), while on the other hand the living word, which had always been spoken out of historical situations, became an absolutely posited 'law' which solidified ahistorically. But although this account of things does reflect aspects of what was a very ambiguous period, the whole phenomenon of the 'word of God' or even of the 'Torah' cannot in the least be so described, for God's word never ceased to be a speech event in Israel.

In order to assure ourself of the truth of this statement, one need only take the Bible in its final redaction as testimony and history of the covenant with God: it is clear that it has an increasing tendency to assimilate and incorporate everything that has to do with the law in the cultic, ethical and juridical sense into the original event of the covenant and thereby to give it a new relevance in a theological sense. The five great events of history which structure the life of the chosen people all stand in decisive fashion under the impression and influence of the word. In the act of the making of the covenant itself—between the sprinkling of the altar with the blood of the sacrificial beasts and the sprinkling of the people with this blood—Moses takes the 'book of the covenant' which was written on the previous day, in order to read it aloud to the people and to bind them to it (Ex 24.6–8). The event in Moab, which is presented to us in Deuteronomy as a repetition which makes the Sinai covenant present anew, is essentially the point where the fullness of the word of revelation, which has hitherto been unknown to the people becomes an event for them. The assembly at Sichem (Josh 24) is likewise a speech event, since the gathering of the twelve tribes sets the seal on their entry into the covenant by answering three times 'We will' to Joshua's threefold questioning, and then 'Joshua wrote these words in the book of the laws (toroth) of God' (24.26). After Deuteronomy had lain unread for about a hundred years in the temple at Jerusalem, its discovery and its reading under king Josiah become a mighty conversion event; the priest who finds it says, 'I have found the book of the Torah in the temple of Yahweh' (2 Kings 22.8), and the book itself presents itself as the document of the 'words of the covenant' (Deut 28.69; cf. 5.3). And even if we do not know precisely[1] what book the 'secretary of the law of the God of Heaven', the scribe Ezra (Ezra 7.12), read aloud in post-exilic Jerusalem—the book that made such a tremendous impression on the hearers—nevertheless it must have been a collection of texts that was closely related to our Pentateuch, and, if H. Cazelles is correct,[2] precisely a collection that had added P (the priestly document elaborated in the Babylonian exile) as a new element to the document combining J, E and Deuteronomy which already existed in Palestine. Naturally, Ezra read only 'excerpts' from the law, and he continued the first reading, which had caused such dismay and so many tears in the hearers, for a week (Neh 8.8f., 18); there is no evidence that this speech event, which was the beginning of Judaism, had an essentially different character from (for example) the reading of Deuteronomy under Josiah.

---

[1] M. Noth, The History of Israel (1958), pp. 300ff.

[2] 'La mission d'Esdras', in: Vet. Test. 1954, pp. 113–140.

Nevertheless, one must distinguish two trends which diverge sharply from each other from the time of Hosea and Isaiah at the latest. The first, which can be called 'subjectivist', understands the word of revelation above all as the act whereby God manifests his personal favour in turning towards man in unmerited election and love: the only possible response to this is the full, direct turning 'of the whole heart and the whole soul' of man to God. All the individual commandments and laws are interpreted and understood in the light of this one covenant event, above all, naturally, the negative formulations of the first commandment, that one may not tolerate any foreign gods alongside Yahweh, or set up any carved image of God before his face. This is the line of Deuteronomy and of all the historical and psalmic writing that depends on it; but it goes without saying that even this chief instance of subjective-personal piety contains extensive 'legal' parts which incarnate this piety in the sphere of politics and ethics. On the other side, there is the 'objectivist', and above all cultic, priestly piety which takes form in the southern kingdom as the 'holiness law' (Lev 17–26) at roughly the same time as Deuteronomy is written in the north. The fundamental concern of this piety is to give a covenantal shape to the objective, supernatural sphere which has been opened up by God. Here the concrete, bodily existence of the individual is being regulated in all its aspects in the perpetual act of distinguishing pure from impure—and while it is true that many ancient taboos are carried foward consciously here, the chief purpose is to remind the member of the holy people continuously that he lives on the boundary between the kingdom of the world and the kingdom of God—and this even more strongly in circumcision, in which God incises his sign bloodily on the one who belongs to him, in the many bloody and unbloody sacrifices (where human sacrifice always stands somewhere in the background—the idea that one owes oneself with body and soul to God), and in the sabbath commandment, where God makes yet another claim to man, who must yield up the seventh part of his time to God.

All of this is called 'covenant' in a very concrete fashion, repeating the one word silently a hundred times in order to impress it upon man's existence from all sides. This silent word is voiced when it is uttered as Torah: the original meaning of this word is the instruction given by the priests as they interpret the conduct customary in the objective sphere of God. It is an oral word that is given out of God's possession and in God's commission to the people, in order that it may shape its daily life in accordance with the will of God.[3] While genuine preaching does exist on the basis of Deuteronomy, as an introduction to the covenantal attitude 'with all one's heart and all one's soul' (and indeed, Deuteronomy itself in its first part is already the deposit of such preaching), the Torah is not a sermon, but the official, guaranteed expression in words of the divine will which is in force and established in the realm of the covenant. Each is in its way a theological speech event, viz. divine revelation in the human act of speaking. One could call the earliest Torah of all the scene in which Moses comes down from Sinai and proclaims to the people the 'words' (dᵉbarim) and 'ethical rules in force' (mishpatim) of Yahweh on the day before the liturgical sealing of the covenant, and the people declare that they accept the words that have gone forth from Yahweh; these words, which are in force for God, are then written down as words that are now in force for the people (Ex 24.3–4): we find the codification at the same point of the sequence of events here as at the assembly of Sichem.

We cannot and need not trace the complicated process whereby the earliest Torah of all, the expression in words by Moses of the conduct required by God (in the present Pentateuch, above all the decalogue at Ex 20, to which however the 'book of the covenant' is already joined), offers itself as the basis for further expressions in words which are assimilated in various phases to the complex of the covenant event and thus are considered as belonging to the original making of the covenant[4] and to the speech event which was united to this. But precisely this process was repeated until the post-exilic period—P is the last document of the Pentateuch to be completed—and this continuous enrichment of Torah material, adding ever new and more nuanced expression in words of the basic materials of the covenant, threatened with time to take on an excessive importance, acquiring a value in itself that concealed rather than disclosed the event which was originally to be given expression in words. It is to this point that Jesus' decisive criticism will direct its attack (Matt 15.1–20) with his clear exposition of the fundamental covenant words: sedek, rachamim, emeth (Matt 23.23).

---

[3] Joachim Begrich, 'Die priesterliche Tora' (1936, now in: Ges. Stud. AT, 1964, pp. 232–260). One need not agree with him in his excessively strong reduction of Torah to the sphere of what is cultically pure and impure.

It is incorrect to describe the development of the old covenant as a process of the gradual hardening of the living word of God into a dead law. All the five great speech events mentioned above are, each in its own way, the original and living expression in words of the covenant, in which the 'event' and the 'laws' always balanced one another. It is significant that the title which Ezra bears ('secretary of the law of the God of Heaven') is imposed on him from outside, by king Artaxerxes, and that the Chronicler interprets it as follows for Jewish ears: 'For Ezra had set his heart to study the law of the Lord (toroth Yhwh), and to do it, and to teach his statutes and ordinances in Israel' (Ezra 7.10); the ordinances can also be called 'toroth of Moses which the Lord, the God of Israel, has given' (7.6). Ezra is the man who seeks to understand, in order to live and to put into words for others, what is to count as established by God ('word') in the verbal expression of Moses' instruction.

---

[4] To the extent that it is possible to speak of such a making of the covenant in P at all, since in the form in which we know P today, it contents itself with the handing-over of the 'law' to Moses and with the interpretation of this (M. Noth, 'Die Gesetze im Pentateuch', 1940; now in: Ges. Stud. AT, p. 121). But it is impossible to know what the final redactor excluded from his source on the grounds that the equivalent was already present in another source. The authors of P, who gave a detailed account of the covenants with Noah and with Abraham, will doubtless for that reason have understood the event at Sinai as a covenant. On the other hand, Noth holds that P is a purely narrative work which does not itself contain laws, but only the description of the institutions and dispositions established at Sinai, with the pre-Sinai history (with its various covenants) as a general introduction to these; the laws in P would then be inserted at a secondary literary stage. Noth: Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (1948), pp. 7ff., 250.

Judaism is essentially the attempt, in the absence of original events of salvation history, to persevere in the abiding speech event of interpretation. As we have shown, this event was indeed already present in the double stream of tradition in sermon (Deuteronomy) and cultic prescription (holiness law), but there is no point at which these two streams can be cleanly divided from one another, since they continually flow into one another. Deuteronomy itself is Torah (2 Kings 22.8), and its homiletic parts count as instruction; the form of the Torah as instruction is taken up and imitated by the prophets, to say nothing of the case of Ezekiel, who is priest and prophet in one person. The work of the Chronicler is interwoven with many sermon sketches, which are frequently an interpretation of sayings from the 'law' or even from a prophet,[5], bringing such sayings up to date. This presupposes a very living relationship to the ancient 'words'.

The central speech event, however—in terms of chronology and in terms of its contents—remains Deuteronomy, inspired by a political spirit and reacting to the prophets. Deuteronomy dares to make present in the seventh century the word of Moses in Moab, just as Moses makes the earlier historical event at Sinai present in his word, in such a way that for Moses in Moab the divine act of salvation, which had taken place per se at that earlier point in history, but had not at all been genuinely made a reality by the people, now for the first time truly takes place for the people too. And this takes place through the speech event which comes about in the preaching and instruction of Moses: the revelatory power of this speech event is seen ultimately in the fact that Deuteronomy is taken into the canon. The extraordinary thing about this event is that it allows Moses also to reach out with his word from Moab into the distant future of the seventh century, so that the 'today' of which he continually speaks is both the 'today' of Moab—in which the 'today' of Sinai becomes actuality—and the 'today' of the Samaria which faces its destruction, and also the 'today' of king Josiah who reads it 'at the pillar' in the temple of Jerusalem. The author of the book did not intend in all these overlapping speech events to forget or devalue the historical event of Sinai, or to demythologise it into the speech event, but he knew that the history of interpretation is an essential aspect of the fullness of the historical event. And perhaps one can draw closer to an assessment of the Old Testament situation (as opposed to that of the New Testament), if one says that the real thrust of the salvific event lies in the continuing generative power of the divine word as it interprets itself, in the inextricable knot between the word of glory and the word of glorification, the knot which characterises the existence of Israel wholly as existence in the word of God—unlike the new covenant, in which the word has become flesh and what one previously could and must term a speech event is subject to an altered law. We shall discuss this in the next Volume of this work.

---

[5] G. von Rad, 'Die levitische Predigt in den Büchern der Chronik' (1934, now in: Ges. Stud. AT, pp. 248–261).

The greatest speech event of the old covenant has been consciously bracketed off from this whole consideration, viz. prophecy in which the actuality of the word of God attains its height: what in Deuteronomy is the fruit of much effort—making present the historical event of the origin—is in the major prophets sometimes bestowed seemingly without effort on their part. As Origen saw, this presence of the 'word of Yahweh' is a genuinely eucharistic mode of the active presence of God in the history of his people. We shall not discuss here how this miracle of the word, which took place ever afresh, was possible—no psychology suffices to explain it[6] nor how various was the manner in which the original divine word translated itself into human images and words in the experience of the seers, nor how far it imposed itself on them and how far they were free to make use of already existing poetical forms when they gave it expression. For now we are discussing the period in which it is precisely the miracle that no longer occurs, while the believer in Yahweh nevertheless dares to attempt to persevere in the tradition of the word event.

---

[6] Friedrich Haeussermann, Wortempfang und Symbol in der alttestamentlichen Prophetie. Eine Untersuchung zur Psychologie des prophetischen Erlebnisses (1932), totally fails to do justice to the theological phenomenon,

One must not overlook the immensely moving element in this attempt: the twilight dominates everything, for the prophets have declared the old covenant to be broken and dissolved—and who will assert with certainty that the new covenant prophesied by Jeremiah and Ezekiel has now come? At any rate, the mighty signs which are to accompany its coming have not yet taken place. And (as we have already pointed out) who can say whether the few thousand Judaeans who live in and around Jerusalem validly represent the former subject of the covenant, the twelve tribes, before God? With its wily naïveté, the Book of Chronicles has attempted to put David as the new founder-figure in the place of Moses, so that everything really began with Jerusalem and the temple, rather than with Sinai. But this clericalisation of theological history could not suppress even the Book of Kings, let alone the Pentateuch. In this situation it is moving to see how the decimated people, which is deprived of the historical presence of God, takes refuge in his naked word and makes the Torah its firm stronghold. This is, so to speak, a forcible renunciation of everything else—yet a renunciation ratified by the people themselves—in order to meet the absolute Subject directly in the word: like Moses on the mountain when he receives the tablets, like the hearer of Deuteronomy, like the one who speaks in Ps 119. What he speaks of is no congealed 'law', but existence in the pure and utterly vulnerable receiving of each word that goes forth from the mouth of God, even when this mouth remains invisible for him. Such existence means hanging on God's lips, trusting in his commandments, walking in the path of his instructions, and loving the word, when he says, following C. G. Jung, 'The religious interpretation' (through the prophet himself) 'is a fusion of the [image-]products of the unconscious with the conscious religious possession' (pp. 101–102). Better: J. Hänel, Das Erkennen Gottes bei den Schriftpropheten (BWAT, N.F. 4, 1923); O. Grether, Name und Wort Gottes (1934).

---

the directive and prescription, the decree and the command, the order and the promise unconditionally with the same love one has for God himself: and seeing in this pure grace, sheer goodness. 'How sweet are thy words to my taste!' (199.103).

The one who spoke in this way knew that the original covenant with God was the presupposition of every law. It holds true for the whole of the old covenant 'that the laws presuppose an order of things which is antecedent to them and does not require them for its justification. For the bond to the one God is not made the object of legal determinations; rather, all that is done is to forbid, negatively, the dissolving of the order of things which exists for this reason into innumerable individual legal precepts'.[7] M. Noth, who says this, insists that the laws in the Pentateuch are not laws of the state, but only express the sacral ordering to which the union of the twelve tribes committed itself, as to something held in common by all, by seeing in this ordering the expression of its loyalty to this God and to no other. This is the reason for the strict prohibition of falling away from him, for the strictness of the dispositions in the holy war, the strict prohibition of foreign cults (and the declaration of the impurity of those animals which were used in such cults), and the sober, strict ordering in the sexual sphere (which was so often misused in the foreign cults), etc. But this is also the reason, in positive terms, for the regulations governing interpersonal relationships among the people on the basis of the light of the covenant with God. If now, in the post-exilic period, a new tendency, often giving the appearance of anxiety, to separate oneself from the surrounding peoples and cultures gets the upper hand—so that any interference of Samaria in the restoration of the temple is rudely repelled (Hag 2.10ff.), while Ezra violently dissolves the many mixed marriages between Jews and the neighbouring peoples (Ezra 9–10) and requires a public confession of sin (Neh 9.2), and 'they separated from Israel all those of foreign descent' (Neh 13.3)—this is not primarily the expression of an arrogant consciousness of election (for precisely this consciousness had been secretly called into question during the long twilight), but is rather the attempt to continue faithfully the ancient forms (e.g., the ban in the holy war) so far as was at all possible. And when the Jews were confronted later with the requirement of professing their faith, but also the requirement of preaching to the Gentiles and making converts, it was not the fault of the Jews, but lay rather in the way in which their faith was structured, that the split between exclusiveness (to the point of refusing all contact with others) and intellectual expansion (to the point of apparently breaking with the faith of the people) was not resolved in an inner peace; the most that could be attained outside the inspired books was the attempt to think with the head and speak with the tongue as a Hellenist, while at the same time believing and confessing with the heart as a Jew (Philo).[8] [7] Martin Noth, 'Die Gesetze im Pentateuch', loc. cit., p. 71. For Noth, therefore, there is a fatal inconsistency in the fact that Deuteronomy took a kingly law into itself (Deut 17.14–20), for this later allowed Josiah to apply the sacral law as a law of the state, and even more, allowed the Deuteronomist historian to measure all the kings of Israel against the single standard of their relationship to the sacral law (reduced to the law of centralisation of the cult).

---

The effort made by Judaism to remain within the covenant relationship despite God's silence, by adopting the interpretative directives of the Lord of the covenant as its way of life, goes hand in hand with its effort to anchor in the origins the form of covenantal life which was possible in the present. Here we have not only the relocation of the post-exilic temple cult with all its individual details in the period of the wilderness, but also the assigning to Abraham of the circumcision rite which is mentioned in passing at Lev 12.3, in order to elevate this to the true sign of the covenant (Gen 17.9ff.), the assigning of the sabbath commandment to the very order of creation (Gen 2.2f.), and of the pouring-out of blood in non-cultic slaughter (Deut 12.23f.) to the covenant with Noah (Gen 9.1f.),[9] etc. What is possible and has been effected is in the present sanctioned as correct and decisively important by being styled the essential Torah and being elevated to this status. Jesus will have been conscious in some way of the historical conditioning of this disposition of the sources, when he raises himself above the sabbath praxis. This relocation in the origins of the covenant life in the present took place across the gulf of the great judgments and catastrophes; the twilight and ambiguity of the contemporary situation were bypassed in this process, in order to construct a tradition with a fully unequivocal character.[10] Although one could speak here of unconscious self-justification on the part of man, one must not overlook the possibility that this could take place in good faith, because of the will to remain in the covenant relationship to Yahweh at any price and to show him the harmony between word and answer by means of the Torah itself. If one adds the element of imminent messianic expectation, the problematic here is still further reduced, since the relationship between Torah and obedience does not appear as a closed and immobile relationship, but—in spite of everything!—as the attestation of a confidence in the promise of the Lord of the covenant, in whose word the holy community has put its trust.

---

[8] Cf. what has been said above about wisdom teaching. This division was overcome only where Christ could be proclaimed as the inner telos of all religions; this could not be affirmed of Moses, because the historical character of the old covenant could not be transcended. Only the resurrection of Christ and the sending of the Spirit permit the standpoint which is simultaneously historical and supra-historical.

The will to remain within in the word event has largely determined the form of the Bible, which is so strange in many places. The tradition was never given a fixed literary form simply in order to set something into the past as definitively closed-off, but rather in order to keep historical events in the present. We can go further: the continuous process of further work on the text seemed to be allowed and indeed required because the present demanded a new version that would bring out certain aspects that had hitherto remained hidden. This process becomes very clear in the bringing up to date of prophetical words which in each case were addressed to quite specific situations and thus apparently belonged to the past, but have nevertheless been either expanded or re-interpreted by later persons for their own present. Thus new strophes are composed and added to words of Isaiah (e.g., Is 18.7 or the two further compositions added to 22.15–18: vv. 19–23, 24–25); the entire message of Hosea, which was once addressed to the northern kingdom, is given 'a new address, to the southern kingdom'[11] by the mere insertion of the name 'Judah'; the prophecy of Deutero-Isaiah is taken up by Trito-Isaiah and adapted to new circumstances; Daniel takes up the prophecy of the seventy weeks and gives it a wholly different meaning, etc. 'The basic conviction underlying the process of tradition was that, once a prophet's word had been uttered, it could never in any circumstances become void. The time when, and the way by which, it reached fulfilment were Jahweh's concern; man's part was to see that the Word was handed on.'[12] More than this, indeed, they must always feel themselves addressed anew by the word that had gone forth from God. G. von Rad is right to conclude from this that the categories of authentic and inauthentic are inappropriate here,[13] since the fact that the divine word refers to an historic (geschichtlich) event cannot be limited by an historical (historisch) situation; hence one must bear in mind, when interpreting a text, that the 'self-understanding of the prophet is only one possible way among many of understanding an oracle'.[14] From this perspective, we need not dismiss the Chronicler's shy claim that something like prophetic inspiration exists even in his own period—although this is above all in the cultic sphere (1 Chron 25.1, 2, 3; 2 Chron 29.30; 35.3, 15). There is an indistinct transition to the [11] G. von Rad, ThOT Vol. II, p. 43; cf. Vol. I, pp. 70–71.

[9] Noth, 'Die Gesetze im Pentateuch', loc. cit., p. 89.

[10] As an example of this, Noth (pp. 107f.) analyses the prayer at Neh 9, in which the present-day community is equated as a matter of course with Israel of old and 'no break of continuity' is noticed 'in the essential question of the relationship between God and the people'. I cannot agree with the harsh formulation here of Noth's chief thesis, that from this time onwards the law has become an absolute entity of timeless and ahistorical validity (p. 114) and thus a reversal of the covenant understanding—instead of grace, achievement and reward! Despite Paul and despite Luther, the categories of grace and achievement are not appropriate to shed light on the difference between the old and the new covenants.

---

[12] Ibid., Vol. II, p. 45.

[13] Ibid., pp. 45–47.

[14] Ibid., p. 48f.

Levitical sermon, which presupposes that one is filled with the Spirit of God (2 Chron 20.14; 24.20) but also quotes words of the Torah and of the prophets and demands faith in God and in the prophets (20.20). The Chronicler has Ezra's reading from scripture continuously translated by the assisting Levities into the language of the country and made more understandable for the people in Targumim (Neh 8.7–8), and this soon became the rule when the synagogue service began. The sermon has been invented; the written word of God, which can no longer be developed in the framework of scripture, remains the speech event which it was from the outset, when it is proclaimed in the ever new interpretation.

3. THE BLOOD EVENT

By contrast with such tentative reachings-out for a theologia gloriae the central awareness of the people made this demand: we must remain with the word. Even in its unglorious form[1] as Torah, God's word of instruction demands to be followed: in pure obedience, or at least in an attempt at pure obedience, no matter how painstaking and embarrassing this in practice always is. The instruction is the one unambiguous thing in the midst of the twilight and of the uncertainty about whether God truly still stands by his covenant. Facienti quod est in se non negatur gratia (grace is not refused to the one who does what lies within his power): in the uncertainty, one's own persevering 'action' remains the foundation of hope.

A part of this 'action' is still the bloody sacrifices which continue to be slaughtered in the temple—in an almost stubborn faithfulness to the tradition which is untroubled by any spiritual development in its self-understanding. There is no doubt that these sacrifices have their origins in the distant past, in what they hold in common with all the other ancient religions; they had their golden age when Israel brought them into relationship with the covenant and with the historical salvific acts of Yahweh, and they had their crisis when the prophets indicated the limits of such cultic action and gave a drastic description of God's displeasure at mere external acts without the corresponding disposition of the heart (Hos 6.6; Amos 5.21f.; Is 1.10f.) and those who prayed the Psalms took the criticism to heart: 'Sacrifice and offering thou dost not desire; but thou hast given me an open ear. Burnt offering and sin offering thou hast not required. Then I said, "Lo, I come; in the roll of the book it is written of me"' (Ps 40.6–7; cf. 50.8–13; 51.7–19). But Israel also knew that the mere spiritualisation and interiorisation of the sacrifice was not permitted to it; Deuteronomy centralises the cult and thereby gives it a new official character, and Ezekiel holds fast to it, while the priestly document P develops its casuistry even in exile, where sacrifice had for the time being become impossible. Those who return from exile rebuild the altars and begin with the sacrifices at once, although 'the foundation of the temple of Yahweh was not yet laid' (Ezra 3.6). Then the blood flows down through the centuries with no change, until the time of Jesus; the Books of Chronicles delight in piling up the gigantic numbers of sacrificed beasts. It is as if, despite the reservations of the prophets, this act were a part of the obedience of the people. Characteristically, the idea of expiation almost totally suppresses every other earlier purpose of sacrifice in the post-exilic period. It is as if the flowing blood calmed the tormenting uncertainty: are we still in the covenant? It is as if the blood event took away the ambiguity from the twilight: it was thus in the beginnings, with Noah, Abraham and Moses, and the one who continues with this remains in the tradition. The priesthood of Jerusalem was not to be affected by any criticism, not even by the 'Protestant' criticism of Qumran. This unshakability permitted the carrying-out of the plan of providence that the bloody sacrifices—unchanged, unspiritualised and finally even uncomprehended too—should be delivered in their incarnate, crude realism at the door of the New Testament, that the ancient Passover of blood should be celebrated in the temple at the same afternoon hour as the new Passover of blood was celebrated outside the gates.

---

[1] There is of course no lack of attempts in late Judaism to transfigure the Torah with a kabod splendour of its own (texts in W. Bousset, Die Religion des Judentums im ntl. Zeitalter, 1903, pp. 89f.), but we do not need to investigate these speculations any more than those concerning the shekhinah.

Why was this so important? Because nothing expresses so clearly the provisional character of the old covenant as the bloody sacrifices. The old covenant was made between the 'living God'[2] and the people living on earth in time. The paradox of this covenant, which already characterises it when it is made and (as it were) lays an excessive weight upon it in the very act of constituting it—it is as if a mighty tree were to be planted in a flower-pot—is the fact that a covenant relationship in which the 'eternal' God is a partner must bear in itself traits of eternity which surpass the possibilities of man who lives in time. This paradox was experienced and endured by the piety of the Old Testament, although there was no way for human beings to overcome it. The one who is dead no longer stands in the covenant. He can no longer praise the living God.'For in death there is no remembrance of thee; in Sheol who can give thee praise?' (Ps 6.6). 'For Sheol cannot thank thee, death cannot praise thee, those who go down to the pit cannot hope for thy faithfulness' (Is 38.18). The belief in immortality and resurrection in late Judaism is less attributable to the certainty of faith and hope[3] than to the fact that the ethical paradox could not be borne: just as Israel had demanded a king in order to be an accepted and respected earthly people, so it ultimately demands a last judgment in order that it can survive alongside the other religious ethical systems of the peoples. It is true that this too may have been providential, but did not correspond to the chief interest of divine providence. Israel's covenant relationship was essentially a relationship in time and in history, and God's revelation to Israel itself had this temporal and historical dimension in its inner constitution and could therefore not be changed into any atemporal dogmatics. God's glory for Israel was a kabod that wandered with the people from stopping place to stopping place in the wilderness of this temporality, giving direction, shining out into the darkness ahead.

---

[2] Deut 5.23; 32.40; Josh 3.10; Hos 2.1; 1 Sam 17.26, 36; Jer 10.10; 23.36; Ps 42.3; 84.3.

Post-exilic theology showed that there was an awareness of the boundary that had been laid down precisely as a boundary that must be crossed at all costs and yet could not be crossed. The necessity of crossing over became evident in the threefold attempt of the theology of glory to advance into the future, into the heavenly world, and into the cosmos as a whole. But the dimensions of the Old Testament theology do not have sufficient substance to fill this sphere which has been formally opened up. In spite of this, post-exilic theology wished to undertake the expansion and therefore smoothed out the element of historical catastrophe in the divine judgment, and carried on after judgment as if nothing essential had happened.[4] There is indeed an awareness of the boundary of death, but this knowledge is suppressed. And yet, against their own will, they kept the knowledge of this boundary alive and present in the blood event of the cultic sacrifices. This blood event had been an accompaniment of every act of making a covenant from the beginning, as a universally acknowledged ritual sign that must always be present when matters are serious. True seriousness means commitment of one's entire bodily existence, and therefore includes the blood; here it is irrelevant whether one emphasises the identity of life and blood, as the Old Testament texts do (Lev 17.11; Deut 12.23), or whether it is only the de facto loss of blood that, naturally, brings about the loss of life.

---

[3] This is the case in the few texts from the Psalms discussed above.

Since man uses blood for the covenant with God, the covenant is always made on the boundary between life and death; but if God's glory in the old covenant shines over the realm of the living, the boundary area between light and night, life and Sheol is always trying to escape from the light of the divine glory. Man can indeed make the sacrificial blood poured out in the cult a form of his glorification of God and interpret it in this sense, by accepting in some fashion and seeking to achieve the total commitment of temporal existence to the grace which is offered; but God's directive that something living is to be sent into death (i.e., into what lies outside the sphere of the covenant) is not covered by the kabod of God. And thus the act of carrying out such an impenetrable directive belongs to a blind, wordless obedience.

In this perspective, the 'blood event', especially in the post-exilic period, has something in common with the 'speech event' of the Torah in which a naked word of instruction, stripped of its attributes of glory, demands an equally naked obedience that asks for no reasons—no matter how questionable this stripping of the word may be. Both events are phenomena of something that has survived beyond its time. It is as if these two pillars had remained standing from a period of theological history that is now past: the pure relationship, giving the impression of nakedness in its abstractness, between the directive word and obedience, and the pure relationship—once again abstract, dumb, lacking a meaning that can be fully seen, since it is deprived of the historical framework—between the absolute sovereignty of God over the creature and the pouring out of the blood of the creature without reserve before the Lord.

---

[4] So much is correct in M. Noth's radical thesis 'Die Gesetze im Pentateuch', loc. cit., pp. 1–141.

Since both phenomena fit together so naturally in Israel, the provenance of its sacrificial practices in terms of the history of religions is of little significance. This is true, not only of the sacrificial categories of Leviticus, but significantly also of the Passover and the rite of circumcision, out of which too Israel made a cultic 'blood event'. The multiplicity of pre-Israelite origins, as well as the multiplicity of possible relationships between the blood events of Israel's historical tradition—relationships worked out de facto in the later rabbinic speculation—create an almost infinite net of oscillating meanings, a perspective of endless vistas that cannot be deprived of its ambiguity in any one direction. Blood is both a sign of resistance and also, within the covenant, of union; it calls for vengeance and brings about reconciliation; in sacrifice it lends emphasis to praise, to request and to thanksgiving; it is sacrificial and sacramental in the rite; it is the seat of life and the sign of death—but whatever it may portray, recall and be, it represents absolute seriousness, the commitment of what is ultimate, whether this is demanded and imposed or freely decided and offered. And when blood and word stand together, then the blood certainly stands in the place of the last word, which perhaps can no longer be uttered, and can only be whispered or shouted: it continues to shout, when men can no longer shout, or on the contrary it summarises what the existence of the man ought to have wanted to say and was not able to say. The blood events of the old covenant, taken together, form a gallery of larger-than-life parables which together fail to produce a form that can be interpreted definitively, because their centre seems as if held in reserve; here, the theology of blood is very similar to the theology of image, for just as there is a prohibition of images at the centre, so there is a prohibition of blood: blood must be poured out, it must not be drunk. That which is the seat of life belongs to God and must be given back to God: man may not have it at his own disposal, he may not allow himself to benefit from it, he may not take it into his own body. The centre, which is the aim of all this, is released only in the new covenant.

Everything begins with the blood of Abel: the 'mortal sin' is the murder of one's brother, the pouring-out of his blood (Gen 4.1–16). Why did Cain kill him?, asks John (1 Jn 3.12), and he gives the same answer at the end of the Bible as the Yahwist at the beginning and Jesus in the centre: 'Whoever hates his brother is a murderer' (1 Jn 3.15; Mt 5.21f.).[5] But since man is the image of God and the bearer of his breath, he is also God's property, so that God himself reserves to himself the punishment for murder. He alone, as the Lord of life, disposes over the murderer: he can set his sign upon him, as with Cain, so that no one may lay hands on him and carry out vengeance for blood on him on his own initiative (Gen 4.15f.), but he can also hand his divine prerogative of judgment over to men: 'Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for God made man in his own image' (Gen 9.6). This establishes a limit to wild, exorbitant vengeance for blood, such as Lamech boasts of (Gen 4.23f.). Abel's blood cries out, not first of all to his fellow-man, but to the author of life, to God. And God ordains all the regulations governing blood for fallen humanity after the flood: the killing of animals is conceded, since 'fear and trembling' precede fallen man—the groaning of the creature begins. But the blood is to be poured out as a sign that the ultimate Lord of nature is not man, but God. A fortiori, man's blood belongs to God; if it is shed, he requires it (Gen 9.1–6): and just as he permits the killing of animals, so he can entrust the expiation of blood that has been shed to human authorities as his representative (Rom 13.4).

---

[5] When we have seen this point, the rules concerning involuntary killing and the right of asylum in this case remain secondary (Ex 21.13–14; Num 35.9f.; Deut 19.1f.). It is different in the case of the atonement for the country in the case of a murder where it cannot be determined who has committed the crime; for there can exist ethical guilt for which the community must pay (Deut 21.1–9); this concept must not be dismissed by being termed primitive-magical.

The fact that Abel, as a shepherd, already offers God 'some of the firstlings of his flock and of their fat portions' (just as Cain offers some of the fruits of the ground) is an anticipation of the Noachite regulation; for in the structure of Genesis as a whole both brothers are already in the post-paradisal, fallen world. And God, in his freedom, has preferred the bloody sacrifice of Abel to the unbloody sacrifice of Cain. Later on, God will explicitly require both: the first-born of animal and also human fertility in the pastoral culture and the first-fruits of the ground in the agricultural culture. The two sacrifices of Cain and Abel are united in the encounter between the Passover feast of the Hebrew nomads, who are to slaughter the year-old, spotless male lamb, and the agrarian feast of unleavened bread, an ancient New Year rite in which one 'casts out the old leaven' (1 Cor 5.7) in order to offer the festival bread from the new harvest,[6] to eat it, and in this connection to offer to God the 'sheaf of the first-fruits of the harvest' (Lev 23.11). And yet, of course, in such a union the two sacrifices are transcended by a new idea which is of momentous importance, an idea which God himself expresses in the event of the exodus from Egypt which is constitutive of salvation history: not only does every first-born and each first-fruit belong to God, the creator and giver of all life and all fertility, but they also belong to him, in an age which has fallen under sin's dominion, as the judge and the one who calls in the debt of expiation.

But when God utters this sentence of judgment, he does so only in connection with his redemptive act of salvation, in which he makes himself known as the one who freely chooses and saves, and, besides this, as the righteous one, i.e. as the [6] The probable origin of the unleavened bread of the feast too is as sacrificial bread; the late-Jewish tradition explicitly associates it with the unleavened loaves of the presence (Philo: De spec. leg. II 159, 161).

---

God of mercy who makes his own concern the injustice that is done to the oppressed, those without rights, and the poor, by fighting victoriously for them against the oppressors. All these aspects of the God of Israel can be seen proleptically in the theology of the Passover at the exodus from Egypt: the first-born both of the Egyptians and of the Hebrews belong to God and have been forfeited to him as judge; but since the Hebrews are in the situation of the oppressed, they are allowed to redeem their first-born through the blood of the Passover lamb, while the sword of the angel of God smites the first-born of the Egyptians who oppress them.[7] When the first-born are struck dead, this is to open the eyes of the persecutors and say to them: 'What you are doing to these helpless people whom you hate, falls back on the helpless ones whom you love; for every blow that strikes a helpless being strikes the almighty judge in the apple of his eye.' But why then does Israel need a substitute sacrifice of its own, in order to escape the punishment? 'In order to make it clear to it that it escapes this punishment, not because it is Israel, but because it is a victim.'[8] The sacrifice of the Passover lamb which Israel offers at God's command, when seen on a deeper level, is the act of substitution carried out by God himself, whereby he wins Israel for himself as his first-born: 'Israel is my first-born son' (Ex 4.22). 'Is he not your father, who created you, he who made you and established you?' (Deut 32.6).

This polyphony of the same motif, which resounds through the order of creation, judgment and redemption, explains the strictness of the Israelite lex talionis. It does not, according to Albrecht Alt, form part of the legal principles of the casuistically-formulated civil law common to Oriental civilisations, where laymen gave sentence, but of specifically Israelite sacral law which was formulated apodictically and set forth by priests. Here it is God's claim to give sentence that is the immediate question at issue, above all in the case of killing someone, which is an act that affects the special property of God.[9] Specifically, this is justice in connection with the 'first and fundamental covenant which Yahweh makes with Israel in the time of Moses at the mountain of God in the desert',[10] from the 'early period of Israel before they lived in cities', 'desert law' of completely untamed and aggressive power, 'which intends absolutely to subject every sphere of life to the unconditional claim to sovereignty made by Yahweh's will for his people, and which therefore cannot recognise the existence of any profane or neutral zone'.[11] Whoever harms a member of the chosen people harms a member of God's first-born: this is the reason for the extraordinary penalty. The theme which is sounded here continues to resound until the rejection of Israel in connection with the breaking of the covenant in the time of the prophets (Jer 16.10–13) and with its rejection of the Messiah (Mt 23.37–39). The formulation of the lex talionis is the reverse side of Yahweh's 'zeal' and 'jealousy' in his love for his people: the necessary consequence of the total commitment of his groundless love which has sought out and chosen his people. Thus even the destruction of the first-born of Egypt and the sparing of the first-born of Israel by passing them by (pesach, pascha) is not simply the expression of an event with two sides (on the one side pitiless justice—on the other side incomprehensible love); rather, the destruction of the first-born of the oppressor is a function of the sparing of the first-born of the oppressed; the truth of all this will be disclosed only in the course of salvation history, ultimately in Paul's theology of history (Rom 11).[12] [7] Cf. the masterly brief synthesis of the Old Testament theology of blood in D. Barthélemy, Gott mit seinem Ebenbild (1966), pp. 205–226.

---

[8] Ibid., pp. 210–211.

If the scene of the election and redemption of God's 'first-begotten son' is characterised by a blood event, so is the other focal point of the foundational history, the Sinai covenant. Just as the covenant with Noah is made with burnt offerings (Gen 8.20), and the covenant with Abraham is sealed by the passing of the smoking oven and the burning torch through the midst of the halves of the animals (Gen 15), so the covenant with Moses is sealed in the equal distribution of the 'covenant blood' between altar and people (Ex 24.6–8): this is the cultic expression for the total seriousness of the contracting parties and a first prelude to what Jesus will call the 'new covenant in my blood' (Mt 26.28 par.; cf. 1 Cor 11.25). We need not follow here the separating out of this blood event into the various temple sacrifices which actualise it ever anew (and the Passover too will belong to these from the time of Josiah onwards): everywhere we have a ritual vicarious representation of the one who sacrifices through the blood of the animal that flows, although it is not necessary that the idea that the death of the animal is the vicarious taking-on of punishment should be at the centre,[13] even if this idea cannot be excluded de facto in the case of certain expiatory sacrifices.[14] [9] A. Alt, 'Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts' (1934, included in: Kleine Schriften, Vol. I, 1953), p. 309.

---

[10] Ibid., p. 329.

[11] Pp. 330–331. In the essay 'Zur Talionsformel' (1934, Kleine Schriften, Vol. I, pp. 341–344), Alt suggests a Punic parallel which likewise seems to belong to the sacral sphere: the severe restitution for damage is justified because 'substitution is made to the deity' which 'is damaged . . . by the killing or bodily wounding of a man'.

[12] In this, the theology of the Book of Wisdom, which here holds on to the strict double-sidedness (ch. 18), shows its provisional character. Cf. above, p. 358.

But always in Israel there stands behind all the ritual the existential element, which has a (real) symbol in the vicarious shedding of blood. Here it is first the relationship between covenant blood and circumcision blood that is significant, in that circumcision is the covenant sign in the living flesh (Gen 17.13) and (according to the rabbis) at least a drop of blood must flow at every circumcision.[15] The obscure scene in which God wishes to kill Moses, but his wife Zipporah cuts off the foreskin of her son with a sharp stone and touches Moses' member with this as she says, 'Surely you are a bridegroom of blood to me!' (Ex 4.24–26), attributes the same apotropaic efficacy to the blood of circumcision as to the blood of the Passover; both blood events are repeatedly linked in the late tradition, for example in the interpretation of Ezek 16.6, where in his mercy God passes over Jerusalem which is writhing in its blood: 'it is a double blood: the blood of Passover and the blood of circumcision'.[16] The second relationship is even more important: the archetypical gesture of sacrifice is that of Abraham on Moriah; here too the rabbinic interpretation tells of blood that was supposed to have flowed when Isaac was bound,[17] but the decisive thing is Abraham's victory in faith, which proves itself in the sacrifice in blind obedience whereby he gives up his 'only, much loved' son who was promised him and given him; while the substitution of the ram (Gen 22.13) is related almost without any emphasis and is basically a reward for the superhuman exertion of faith,[18] it still shows incidentally what bloody existential seriousness had to exist behind the ritual sacrifices of Israel. Sacrifice is obedience and preferring Yahweh above all other things as the prophets will emphasise. And the Letter of James is not wrong to integrate this existential side into the Pauline concept of Abraham's faith (Jas 2.21–23), for what is at stake here is much more essential than in the case of the circumcision 'in the living flesh': it is a thrust into the living heart, which is pierced through by the sword of the fiat offered to God (Lk 2.35).

---

[13] A. Metzinger, 'Die Substitutionstheorie und das alttestamentliche Opfer mit besonderer Berücksichtigung von Lev 17, 11', Biblica 21 (1940), pp. 159–187, 247–272, 353–377.

[14] In the ceremonies of the feast of Atonement: Lev 16.3f.; 23.26f. Num 29.7f.

[15] N. Füglister, Die Heilsbedeutung des Pascha (1963), p. 84.

In this rich sense, Israel is bound to God in blood; a late prophet (Zech 9.11) has God redeem the captives because of this: 'As for you also, because of the blood of my covenant with you, I will set your captives free from the waterless pit'. We set out earlier the history of revelation as the 'ladder of obedience' on which God descends to man. Seen from the other side, the same obedience is the perfecting of man in his willingness to sacrifice everything, or (which comes to the same thing) to demand everything of himself and to let everything be imposed upon him. If Abraham is the prototype of this obedience, Joseph is in another way the other who carries it out: handed over and sold by his brothers, he lands in Egyptian prisons, while his blood-soaked garment is shown to his father at home; his generous forgiveness shows that he bore this willingly. The path from Joseph to the 'Servant of Yahweh' is not a long one; in the latter, we have the freely-accepted 'yes' to every word that comes from God, a 'yes' that is thought out to its uttermost consequences and that at the same time embraces every blow that comes from men (Is 50.4–6), since both are essentially one and the same thing: faith, as acceptance of every word from God, is the perfect disposition of sacrifice which allows God to make the one who believes the perfect sacrificial beast, the lamb that is led to the slaughter without opening its mouth. When it is a man who carries out the sacrifice, the attitude of the beast is irrelevant; but the meekness of the lamb, which accepts that this happens, becomes relevant when the man who sacrifices becomes the sacrificed, bleeding lamb (Is 53.7). For at this point, the subjective acceptance of the one who is bloodily done to death transcends the objective call for vengeance of Abel's blood shed before God. The Servant of Yahweh says 'yes' to the commission of bearing vicariously the trespasses of his human brothers: the oppressed, defenceless poor man bears the sins of his oppressors. The mystery of solidarity in guilt binds and overcomes the double-sided righteousness of God: the slain first-born of the Egyptians becomes identical with the Passover lamb which is slain vicariously for the first-born of the Hebrews—always assuming it to be possible for a human being to say a 'yes' so unreserved, 'to the end' (Jn 13), that he himself was in no sense an oppressor, so as to become the poor and oppressed in every sense. This is the mystery of Israel, like a boundary-concept in terms of which its great figures—Moses, Samuel, David, Jeremiah—are interpreted; but since they are all guilty and oppressors, none of them reached the boundary. The boundary opens out into the new covenant.

---

[16] Texts in Füglister, pp. 87, 94–96.

[17] Ibid., p. 92.

[18] It matters little in this connection whether there is an original aetiological reference to a replacement of human sacrifices by animal sacrifices, just as it matters little to the author of the narrative.

Until then, animals continue to be slaughtered in the temple, the feasts of Passover and the Day of Atonement are celebrated bloodily, and circumcision is carried out bloodily: and yet the one drink that contains life is still withheld. Only after the threshold is crossed can we hear the words: 'My blood is truly a drink' (Jn 6.55). Precisely this is the point towards which the bloody sacrifices of the Old Testament on the one hand and the Old Testament covenant and fraternising meals on the other hand converge, without being able to reach it. It remains decisively important that the life which is sacrificed belongs to God; it may not be consumed by human beings. This consumption becomes possible only where the two lines converge: where the perfect vicarious bearing of guilt (going to the point of bloody death) becomes identical with perfect faith or (the same thing) with the perfect acceptance of being poured out into death (Is 53.12) through every word of God, with the capacity of the one who is sacrificed to be shared perfectly among all the brothers who sacrifice him. The mystery of Jesus, which in itself is so excessively rich that it seems impossible to untie the knot that binds it, becomes clearer when we see the paths that converge upon it from the old covenant.

It is not as if this point of convergence were able to be constructed by means of reason alone. It remains an 'utterly strange work' (Is 28.21), 'offence' and 'trap' (Is 8.14), 'something unheard-of' (Is 52.15), a work from which all 'form and beauty', all 'glory' of God is initially absent, essentially a work of the night. 'For that night' (illa enim nox, Wis 18.6) in which at about midnight the work of redemption and the work of annihilation took place simultaneously, 'thy all-powerful word leaped from heaven, from the royal throne, into the midst of the land that was doomed, a stern warrior carrying the sharp sword of thy authentic command . . . and touched Heaven while standing on the earth' (Wis 18.14–18): this night remains impenetrable. It is absolute judgment, and—in the very heart of this—the incomprehensible superabundance of grace (Rom 5.15–21). It is the ever greater measure of humanity's failure, which increases the blood-guilt beyond comprehension, and—therein—the ever greater measure of the mercy of God, who, thanks to the 'yes' of the Lamb, has neutralised every 'no' by means of a stronger 'yes' (in the night of death). In this impenetrable night, God keeps watch for man, and man for God. 'It was a night of watching by the Lord, to bring them out of the land of Egypt; so this same night is a night of watching kept to Yahweh by all the people of Israel throughout their generations' (Ex 12.42).

C. ARGUMENTUM EX PROPHETIA

What has just been said opens the way for the question which every theology of the old covenant must ask itself by way of conclusion: the question of the meaning of this covenant history and of the sovereignty of God which appears and acts in it. Does this history, like every other history on earth, remain only a touching fragment of human struggle and failure, or does it amount to a form that is found nowhere else in the realm of history? And if this form exists, where does it lie, in Israel itself or beyond Israel? Is Christian theology's constant manner of reading and understanding the old covenant correct, viz. that Israel's formlessness can be understood only when it transcends itself in the son of Miriam: Jehoshuah?

The relationship between old and new covenants has already been discussed once under the theme of 'form' in the first Volume of this work (pp. 619–659); we do not need to change anything of what was said there. But now, at the end of our path through the old covenant, we may be permitted to set it out once again in another form, since we have now gathered impressions and experiences which give a much brighter light of assurance to the transition from the old to the new covenant and to the intimate union between them. What is to be set out here will have its usefulness, above all for the next Volume on the new covenant. If it is true that the historical-critical method has destroyed the old form of the argumentum ex prophetia, which understood sayings of the old covenant as having been spoken with direct reference to Christ (such as Isaiah's saying about the 'virgin' who conceives a son), the elimination of this all too naive concept left space for something much more important and splendid, viz. for the prophetical character of the whole history of Israel. This is the covenant history of the chosen people with God, a history with a greatness, a catastrophe and a self-transcendence that drives forward to a fulfilment that cannot be clearly seen or constructed: that which brings fulfilment can be understood only together with what it fulfils. It is essential today to insist as strongly as possible that Christianity cannot be understood without the old covenant; every attempt to interpret the form, message and subsequent impact of Christ in the world necessarily fails unless it is able to assess it all precisely in its closeness to and its distance from the old covenant. It has become impossible today simply to discard the innumerable references to the Old Testament in the New as time-conditioned proofs from scripture: 'Nowadays, such references are legitimated by a branch of Old Testament scholarship that cannot be overlooked, as fundamentally in harmony with the Old Testament, and this means that New Testament scholarship can no longer pass over the interpretation of the Christ event on the basis of the Old Testament, which is developed broadly and centrally in the New Testament, unless it wishes to fail to do justice to an essential aspect of the self-understanding of the New Testament'.[1] For us, this means that the particular mode of formlessness which is Israel's transcends itself objectively in such a way that it comes truly into its own in the particular mode in which the Christian Church knows that it is a form, and is also legitimated as such on the basis of Israel. In order for this argumentum ex prophetia to stand as valid in the face of the historical-critical method, it must essentially be developed not in two, but in three steps. It then runs as follows:

1. The individual forms which Israel established in the course of its history converge together upon a point that remains open and that cannot be calculated on the basis of the converging forms and of their mutual relationship, especially when they stand in opposition to one another.

2. The midpoint is occupied in the fullness of time by one who lives this midpoint, although his primary interest is not to construct and conceive of his existence as the fulfilment of the various (and hitherto irreconcilable) individual forms of Israel.

---

[1] L. Goppelt, Typos. Die typologische Deutung des Alten Testaments im Neuen, 1939; preface to 1966 reprinting.

3. When this midpoint is interpreted subsequently, it is seen at a secondary stage that the midpoint retains its place as midpoint through the crystallisation of the periphery around it, and that it is only through this crystallisation that the periphery acquires its point of reference which gives it form.

On the first step: the individual forms in Israel are subject to a reservation which is clearly expressed in the prohibition of making images and in the prohibition of drinking blood, i.e. in the prohibition of conceiving for oneself the true image of God, which the Son of God will be, and of receiving a share in what is reserved for God, which will be the κοινωνία τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος (2 Cor 13.13), the eucharistic participation in God through the Son in the Holy Spirit. While the images do amount to a vague 'outline',[2] they stand in an 'extremely odd theological vacuum'[3] which makes it impossible for them even to have contact with one another, so that no line drawn from one image to another is able to unite them into a form embracing them all. The messianic idea does not adjoin the idea of the Son of Man, nor the idea of the Son of Man that of the Servant of Yahweh, etc. Even when two partial images are diametrically opposed to one another, it is not possible to draw a line between them such that its half-way mark would establish the midpoint which one sought. This fact characterises the entire old covenant as figura, as an 'aesthetic reality' as opposed to an 'ethical' reality which is definitively incarnated.[4] For our theme, this means that a clear boundary which cannot be crossed is drawn in the old covenant for the appearing of the glory of God: the fact that death has not been overcome. 'The realm of the dead remained an undefinable third party between Yahweh and his creation. Apart from isolated questionings (e.g., Job 14.13–22), it was not a subject of real interest to faith'; this is undeniably 'one of the greatest theological enigmas in the

---

[2] Vol. I, p. 623 (Eng. trans.).

[3] G. von Rad, ThOT, Vol. II, p. 349.

[4] Vol. I, pp. 620–624 (Eng. trans.).

Old Testament'.[5] The terrifying proof of this is the distorted eschatology of the apocalypses, which want to tear down this boundary violently. The Triduum sacrum, with Holy Saturday in its midst, will be the only possible breach of this boundary; only when Adam in 'Hell' and all who wait with him (Heb 11.39f.) meet the descending Christ, will the boundary be removed and the veil removed from the glory (2 Cor 3.16).

It will be the task of our New Testament theology to give a commentary on the other two steps, and so we shall indicate only a few points here. The life of Jesus is a life in hiddenness and insignificance; 'he will not cry or lift up his voice, nor will any one hear his voice in the streets' (Is 42.2 = Mt 12.19); it is not his task to compete with the Old Testament images on their own level or even to pile them up and trump them. If his life is to be the breaching of the Old Testament boundary, then the event that is his life can only be obscure for the world, since it is an eschatological event.[6] Here the Word of God has become flesh, and therefore it is ultimately irrelevant how much this incarnate Word itself actually says. It is certainly not without interest to establish whether and to what extent Jesus himself laid claim to the Old Testament titles 'Messiah', 'Servant of Yahweh', 'Son of Man', 'king', 'bridegroom', etc., for himself, but this is not a decisive question for the character of the Christ event. It is true that Jesus preached, and preached as one who has authority, one whose proclamation was qualitatively different from that of the scribes (Mt 7.29), but the preaching as such remains on the same level on which the prophets worked by means of the word: but 'wisdom is justified' in the decisive manner 'by her deeds' (Mt 11.19). When Jesus does lay claim to the traditional word, he does so with an almost careless gesture, just as a lord disposes as a matter of course over what is his own property. We see this, for example, in the way in which Jesus disposes over the foal on which no one has ever yet sat: 'If any one asks you, "Why are you untying it?", you shall say this, "The Lord has need of it"' (Lk 19.30f.).

---

[5] G. von Rad, ThOT, Vol. II, p. 350.

[6] Vol. I, p. 645 (Eng. trans.).

After Easter, when the Church sets about expressing the incarnate word in human words, it falls back as if automatically on the Old Testament images which surround this word and have it as their midpoint. In this process, the essential question is not the particular way in which the lines are drawn between promise and fulfilment. The choice of Old Testament texts and images can be partly time-conditioned as regards the understanding of the words, and unsuitable as regards the selection made. This is unimportant, since the images only serve to illustrate a much more general correspondence between the Testaments of which the preachers and the New Testament writers are aware.[7] A statement such as the one that Christ was to rise from the dead 'in accordance with the scripture' (1 Cor 15.4) presupposes, beyond all individual quotations, a total vision of the relationship between old and new covenants. But the individual images occur to the one who contemplates the Christ event in such abundance and with such facility, and with such a clear appropriateness that exists objectively and has not been brought together, grouped and arranged at a subsequent stage, that the theology of promise and fulfilment, of type and antitype, which comes into use at once, arose as it were of its own accord as the expression of a great wonderment. The ancient scripture becomes the instrument with which the Church learns to understand the Christ event and expresses this in words, and it has Christ himself hand over this instrument into its hand (Lk 24.44f.). The necessity of what de facto happened ('Must not the Christ suffer this and thus enter into his glory?', Lk 24.26) is unfailingly deduced from the way the formless images take on form.[8] This necessity, which arises out of the fact of the event, and shows the fundamental difference and the qualitative leap between the old and the new covenants, is the kernel of the 'spiritual' understanding of scripture, which has nothing essential in common with the general literary concept of 'allegory'.[9] It is of course true that there is a continual process of transcendence and expansion within the Old Testament itself, new interpretations giving deeper insight into precisely the reality that is held in tension between promise and fulfilment: the promise to Abraham of land and progeny is surpassed and extended in the structure of the Pentateuch as a whole, and this structure too is later given new, eschatological dimensions; this is the 'dynamic' dimension in Israel's form of thought. But the fulfilment which is posited in the fact of Jesus is not simply one new stage added in this process of transcendence. It belongs to a wholly different order. Compared with it, everything that came earlier stands at the proper distance to what is in process of historical development, while it establishes itself on the far side of this boundary line as an eschatological event. The 'long twilight' was an intra-historical preparation for this qualitative otherness, which is also seen in the fact that it has the same relationship of immediacy to every individual form in the historical development of Israel. The type of 'Isaac's sacrifice', or 'Job's night of abandonment by God', or 'Elisha's multiplication of bread', or 'the Passover lamb', or 'the Servant of Yahweh', etc., is in each case in the same immediate relationship to the antitype as every other type. This naturally does not mean that the images can 'be abstracted from their context in salvation history and taken each as something existing in themselves';[10] for they bear their meaning in themselves only as history that has happened between God and Israel, and it is only thus that they form an analogy to the definitive event of Christ. But, precisely as types, they stand in a time of promise which is qualitatively different from the time of fulfilment.[11] Together, they form an organ console fitted out with innumerable registers, which is ready to be used by one who knows how to play.

---

[7] 'It has been overlooked, or at least evaluated only in a negative manner—e.g, with a view to criticising the historical character of biblical statements—that the use made of scripture in the New Testament goes far beyond the direct quotations of Old Testament passages . . . In many New Testament writings, the bulk of the employment of scripture and the central emphasis in the understanding of scripture is to be sought in the abundance of the allusions that scarcely touch the wording of the Old Testament': Goppelt, op. cit., p. 239. Cf. von Rad, ThOT, Vol. II, pp. 331–332.

[8] W. Grundmann, art. δεῖ, ThW, II, 21–25.

---

[9] Henri de Lubac has repeatedly and tirelessly emphasised this recently: 'A propos de l'allégorie chrétienne', Rech. Sc. Rel. 47 (1959), pp. 5–43, and already in: 'Typologie et allégorie', Rech. Sc. Rel. 35 (1947), pp. 180–226, in the concluding chapter of Histoire et Esprit (1950), and repeatedly in the four volumes of Exégèse médiévale (1959, 1960, 1964). See also: J. Coppens, Les harmonies des deux Testaments (1949); J. Daniélou, Sacramentum futuri, Etudes sur les origines de la typologie biblique (1950, with bibliography); idem, Etudes d'exégèse judéo-chrétienne (1966). Among Protestant scholars, apart from L. Goppelt: W. Zimmerli, 'Verheissung und Erfüllung', Ev. Theol. 12 (1952/53), pp. 34–59; Fr. Baumgärtel, Verheissung. Zur Frage des evangelischen Verständnisses des AT (1952); G. W. H. Lampe and K. J. Wollcombe, Essays on Typology (1957).

It is, of course, only on the theological level—i.e., with the eyes of faith—that it is possible to see this whole relationship in its objective correctness,[12] and not with the eyes of the historian or psychologist of religion who abstracts from faith. This vision of faith is already required if the particular quality of the Old Testament situations (which are all determined by the unique relationship to the living God of the covenant) is to be distinguished from other religious situations in humanity. Everything human breaks down at its boundaries, and Israel too breaks down. But Israel's failure is of another kind: the boundary at which it breaks down is not above all the finitude of existence, but God, who has made it choose between life and death, blessing and curse (Deut 30.19). But to break down at the boundary of God and his covenant does not mean simply to be finished and disqualified, since every two-sided covenant relationship is based on an antecedent unique election.[13] This failure has a theological quality which gives it continuing relevance throughout the time of the Church which Paul describes at Rom 9–11 and on which Karl Barth comments in his doctrine of election (Church Dogmatics II, 2).

---

[10] As von Rad correctly emphasises: ThOT, Vol. II, p. 371.

[11] On this, see my Theologie der Geschichte (5th edn. 1962).

[12] H. de Lubac, in final chapter of Histoire et Esprit (German trans.: Der geistliche Sinn der Schrift, 1952, p. 50); Vol. I of this present work, p. 175 (Eng. tr.).

[13] This is too little heeded by R. Bultmann, 'Ursprung und Sinn der Typologie als hermeneutischer Methode', ThLZ 75 (1950), pp. 205–212. One must bear in mind that the commission to harden hearts which Isaiah and Ezekiel receive is a primary missionary commission from God and thus cannot be anything other than a commission that brings salvation, and that precisely the text from Isaiah occurs often in the New Testament, and indeed is quoted by Jesus himself (Mt 13.14–15).

This relevance of the Israel which is always present in history makes it significant as a whole and in all its types for Christians too and for humanity as a whole. The Church would not have been right to make such wide employment of Israel's hymns of praise for its own prayer if it had not been ready to pray the psalms of penitence, judgment and confession with Israel too, and this means knowing and feeling that it is guilty and subject to failure along with Israel. 'In the Old Testament word, God encounters us along with Israel . . . God acts in the present towards us as he acted towards Israel . . . In this, the Old Testament is not at all outmoded for us. Here, we experience the significance in salvation history of the Old Testament testimony for our Christian faith.'[14] The images of the periphery have not been absorbed and dissolved in Christ as something that is superseded; the midpoint of the new covenant retains its full historical form together with the images that fill it; Moses and Elijah appear on Tabor to speak about the Passion, the twenty-four elders before the throne are made up in equal measure of the 'pillars' of the old and the new covenants. For there are forms in the old covenant which cannot be left behind by the new, even when they are filled here with new contents and with greater glory (2 Cor 3).

One of these elements which cannot be superseded is the knowledge of the absolute sovereignty and glory of God: the horizon of the absolute divinity of the living God, and thereby also of the absolute creatureliness of the world and of man, of his character as image of God, his commission in the world and his duty to glorify God the creator and lord of the covenant. Likewise, it is not possible to discard as outmoded the attitude of utter acceptance of everything that God wills and orders, irrespective of what one thinks and understands oneself, the attitude of Abraham, which Paul will portray as the archetypical faith and which makes Abraham the father of all believers, both Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians. To this we must add the mysterious fact, to which Gerhard von Rad has continually drawn attention,[15] that Old Testament forms, both in their commissions and in their self-utterances, interpret themselves as opening out into a 'form' which is to be understood on the basis of the covenant with God and which absolutely transcends their empirical subjectivity. For example, the 'form' of the one who suffers in the Psalms, in Lamentations, in the prophets and in Job, the 'form' of the kingship in Solomon, the 'form' of vicarious representation in Moses and in the Servant of Yahweh have a character of absoluteness which transcends the person, not only with a view to the literary typology, but also in the direction of something given form in the covenant relationship by the divine partner. They are like the moulds of a commission which is to be given to one who is both God and man. This becomes clearest in the portrayal of those prophetic missions which involved suffering in obedience to the commission: and this was meant to make present the divine suffering caused by Israel, more than the human suffering of the prophet in compassion with his fellow-men. Something similar is true in the case of the aged David who stands before the dead Absalom. He descends (e.g., in Ps 22) 'with his complaints to a depth that lies beyond the depths of his suffering'.[16] What is involved here is more than a hidden event that takes place between God and the human heart (as happens everywhere in humanity and is portrayed, for example, in Greek tragedy): more than this, there is a form modelled by the covenant God of Israel who gives it a shape that is destined to enter the definitive form of the revelation of the glory of God in Jesus Christ.—A further sign of belonging to this form moulded by God is to be seen in everything that remains earthly and bodily in Israel's religion, despite progressive spiritualisation: it is never possible in Israel to abstract from time and place, or to relativise the holy land and, later, the holy city, the temple as God's dwelling place, the sacrifices which are to be offered only there, and the whole world of the ceremonies. No matter how provisional it is in fact in God's plans, it must continue until God's word becomes flesh in space and time and history. When this one point is reached, then—strangely enough—all that was earthly and all too earthly in Israel is dismissed; all of this meant something that was absolutely earthly and fleshly (the temple is truly 'his body': Jn 2.21), and yet could not mean it as it was in reality.

---

[14] Fr. Baumgärtel, op. cit. (n. 9 above), pp. 48, 54.

---

[15] von Rad, ThOT, Vol. II, pp. 276f.; cf. Vol. I, p. 398; Vol. II, p. 63.

[16] Ibid., Vol. I, p. 400.

For God's becoming flesh was to be much more 'fleshly', was to penetrate the flesh much more deeply than Israel could ever dream of. All its historical images were more or less capable of being seen and interpreted in a spiritual sense. But the descent of the divine word into the flesh will leave all 'form and beauty' behind it and force its way down into an unconceivable formlessness—which for this reason is also incapable of being seen and interpreted, since it is hidden—in order to display the lordship and glory of God even in territory which hitherto had been out of bounds. In order to hint at this path which becomes invisible in the realm of the dead, the forms of the Old Testament, taken together, form something like an arrow pointing out the direction; its sharp, unambiguous head is the Servant of Yahweh. Israel ought to have concentrated its self-understanding by focusing on this arrow-head, but instead it had blunted this arrow-head in the evasions of the post-exilic theology of glory.[17] It is only the finger of the Baptist, pointing like an arrow to the Lamb that takes sins away, that once again assumes the role of Israel; with this gesture, the theological period of history begins to move once more; he is 'the greatest' of all who point and yet it is only as 'the least' that he penetrates the time of fulfilment (Mt 11.11). Whether it will or not, Israel must be a sign and a pointer. It is a sign together with that which it fulfils as well as with that in which it fails, for its failure is embraced within a form which is greater than Israel itself. And even if it cannot or will not fill out the form, the form remains standing nonetheless, as the requirement of the 'law' to love God above all things and one's neighbour as oneself, and as the requirement of the cult to pour out again and again before

---

[17] On Israel's refusal to recognise its own mission in Deutero-Isaiah's Servant of Yahweh, cf. D. Barthélemy, Gott mit seinem Ebenbild (1966), pp. 216–217.

God the blood that had been withheld. Towards the end of the old covenant, it is the discrepancy between the form and what fills it out that, necessarily, appears most clearly: when the form reveals itself in its true and expanding dimensions—Heaven and earth, history and end-time, chosen people and all of humanity—it becomes clear that it is inherently impossible for Israel to do justice to this claim that knows no bounds. And the images which were produced in the course of history show definitively their disparate character which means that they cannot complete one another to make a single form.[18]

How could it be otherwise, if the old covenant was truly to be God's history with the people? For such a history could not unfold in terms of the pattern of worldly evolution ('education of the human race'), where the earlier events are left behind by the later events and where thus God's activity and word are inferior to the law of development of the world; and it would not have been right for this history with God to be synthesised at some concluding point of time and history and to be gathered together into a form embracing the whole of it—to a 'dogmatics' of the truth of revelation in the Old Testament, for example—because this too would have subordinated the historical relevance of the concrete moment to something possessing atemporal validity. Thus the old covenant is inherently oriented towards a temporal ending which, however, cannot be thought of as timelessness but only as the mystery of the coincidence of genuine time and genuine eternity: the entry of genuine eternity into time (the incarnation of God), the entry of genuine time into eternity (the resurrection of Christ and of the creation in him).

This paradox of the new covenant, which makes the time of the Church something quite different from the time of Israel, is thus inherently demanded by the entire manner of Israel's existence. From this perspective too, the old covenant is 'in the logic of revelation' the indispensable access to understanding the mystery of Christ. The only way to draw close to the 'once and for all' (ἐφάπαξ) of the New Testament, in its power that lies above history and yet is the foundation of all history with God, is from the starting-point of the time of revelation to Israel, in which every deed and every word of God signifies both fulfilment (because it is God who is present) and promise (because God addresses and acts in the time which continues).

---

[18] Vol. I, p. 637; von Rad, ThOT, Vol. II, p. 301.

It is necessary to integrate the tension between fulfilment and promise which comes from the old covenant as fully as possible into the manner of existence of the new covenant, because Christ—since he lives in time and is therefore mortal—points ahead with his whole being to what is coming, to the kingdom of the Father, the integration of genuine time through the resurrection into eternity. Christianity and the individual Christian live on the basis of this tension, as Paul, Irenaeus, Origen, Augustine and modern theology with a new passion proclaim. But the structure of the time of the old covenant is qualitatively different from the structure of the time of the new, since the new time begins its promise with the fulfilment of the old time. In the death of Christ, all is accomplished, the eternal light has been carried into the uttermost darkness. 'Christ has offered only the one sacrifice for sins and then taken his place at the right hand of God, now waiting "until his enemies are laid as a footstool under his feet"' (Heb 10.12f.). If the history of Church and world is a Christ event that leads from promise to fulfilment, from spes to res, and if there can be no doubt that this event does not leave unaffected the Christ who leads his 'body' to fulfilment (as Origen and Augustine emphatically assert), still it is always the fulfilled Christ (Eph 1.23) who fills his unfulfilled members with his grace and his form (Gal 4.19). And since Christ as God and man is the fulfilled covenant in himself, bridegroom and bride are brought by him into the divine fulfilment: the total breach of faithfulness by the daughter of Zion and her rejection are no longer possible, since all the breaches of fidelity—even the most terrible—by the Church on earth are undergirded by an indefectible nuptial fidelity which—in the resurrection of the bridegroom and, as its necessary consequence, the bodily assumption into heaven of the ἀπαρχή, the firstfruits, of the bride—justifies the cry in the midnight of this age: 'Behold, the bridegroom comes!' (Mt 25.6).

CONCLUSION

It is superfluous to assure the reader that our intention in this book was not to present a 'theology of the old covenant', even if only in summary; a great number of important themes for such a project are entirely missing here, or are touched only in passing. The book contains no more than a monograph about the concept of 'the glory of God' in the old covenant, and this is seen essentially from the perspective of the work which has been undertaken here as a whole.

The contents of this book can be summarised as the answer to the question: what path must have been taken by the concept of the kabod of Yahweh in order for it to be able to appear in the new covenant, in Paul and in John, as doxa Christou and doxa Theou? This path was initially described as that of integration from an abstract-sensuous kabod to the concrete-personal kabod which was more and more understood as the total statement of those qualities of the covenant Lord which are revealed in the covenant event. This integration is not a dispersal, but a concentration of all that has been dispersed upon the unfathomably free and sovereign absolute 'I' that opens up its own sphere of life for its human image in the covenant of grace. This 'I' was as yet abstractly glorious (in power and holiness) in the dialectic, sensuous kabod, but it becomes concretely glorious through the fundamental concepts of the covenant reality: as grace, justice, fidelity, mercy and in Deuteronomy as the love that incomprehensibly chooses a people for itself.

But the history of the covenant showed that the chosen people was not capable of existing in the sphere of absolute love: it sent representatives ahead of it who became vicarious sufferers in keeping with the extent of the people's failure, but who nevertheless did not prevent the dissolution of the first covenant: all that they could do was to hold out the prospect of a coming second and eternal covenant on the basis of God's grace. Thus the theme remains unfinished and demands its continuation in a theology of the new covenant that transcends the inherent limitation of the glory of God in the old covenant, viz. death and judgment.

The connection between glory in the biblical sphere of revelation and glory in the sphere of metaphysics (Vols. IV and V) has become clear at many points: where the biblical revelation emerges from the sphere of the mythical religions, where (in the period of Solomon) philosophical wisdom for living penetrates the sphere of revelation as something formed by human thinking and living, and finally where the late wisdom teaching opens up the Semitic thinking of the Bible to Hellenistic thinking.

Finally, the line of thought which we have pursued led back by ever higher spiral paths to fundamental statements of the first Volume: the concept of form was able to be applied in the materially filled contemplation of the glory of God. But it is precisely here that our considerations require completion by a theology of the New Testament: only the entire biblical revelation mediates in a total form what God wanted to communicate to us of his glory.

INDEX OF NAMES

Abrahams, I. 32, 35, 53
Aeschylus 288
Aqiba, Rabbi 133
Alt, A. 42, 179, 194f., 396
Althaus, P. 189
Anselm 21, 171
Augustine 21, 26, 72, 171, 208, 355, 413

Baltzer, K. 151
Barth, Chr. 221
Barth, K. 11, 32, 55, 88, 92, 98f., 124, 132, 135f., 184, 219
Barthélemy, D. 89, 97, 156, 281, 360, 395, 411
Baudissin, W. 70, 318
Baumgärtel, Fr. 407, 409
Begrich, J. 150, 297, 378
Bengel, J. A. 63
Bentzen, A. 115
Berry, G. B. 33
Birkeland, H. 317
Biser, E. 67
v. Bissing, Fr. W. 124
de Boer, P. A. H. 189
Boman, Th. 136
Bonaventure 354
v.d. Born 270
Bousset, W. 386
Braun, H. 241
Brownlee, W. H. 121
Brunner, E. 96
Brunner, P. 94, 95, 99
Bruppacher, H. 316
Buber, M. 32, 55, 154, 155, 159, 179, 194, 226f., 230
Bultmann, R. 72, 408

Caspari, W. 32, 35, 91, 175
Castellio 133
Causse, A. 318
Cazelles, H. 163, 165, 376
Charlemagne 122
Cicero 26
Claudel, P. 109
Coppens, J. 407
Constantine 122
Cramer, K. 170
Cremer, H. 163

Dalman, G. 159
Daniélou, J. 407
Dante 21, 355
Deissler, A. 201
Deissmann, A. 52
Denys 21, 44
Descamps, A. 165
Dillmann 92
Duesberg, H. 124, 142, 357
Duhm, B. 74
Dürr, L. 312

Eichrodt, W. 32, 37, 40, 92, 264f., 312
Eissfeldt, O. 56
Elbogen, I. 159
Elliger, K. 306
Engnell, I. 115, 118, 246
Ephraem 40
Efros, I. 51
Erman, A. 124
Euler, F. K. 118
Euripides 288

Fahlgren, K. H. 163f.
Falkenstein, A. 120, 222, 278
Fascher, E. 33, 72
Fichtner, J. 117, 131
Fohrer, G. 269, 274
Forster, H. 52 de Foucauld, Ch. 25
Francis of Assisi 184
Frankfort, H. 118
Fuchs, H. 163

Füglister, N. 197f.

Gadd, C. J. 115
Gaillard, J. 49
v. Gall, A. 33, 35, 40, 51, 74
Galling, K. 119, 138
Gelin, A. 70, 316, 320
Gerleman, G. 131f., 136f.
Gilbert de la Porrée 55
Ginsberg, H. L. 78
Glasson, T. F. 330
Glueck, N. 159f.
Goppelt, L. 403
Gottfried of Strassburg 136
Gregory of Nyssa 44, 101
Gregory of Palamas 55
Gressmann, H. 42
Grether, O. 65, 382
Grzegorzewski, K. 119
Grill, S. 74
Grimme, H. 204
Grundmann, W. 56, 406
Guardini, R. 67, 68
Gunkel, H. 92, 220

Haag, H. 217
Hamman, A. 49
Hänel, J. 382
Haeussermann, F. 382
Hegel 361
Hehn, J. 91
Hempel, J. 75
Herder 134
Herntrich 63
Herrmann, S. 115
Hertzberg 32, 76, 170, 189, 229
Hesse, F. 32, 189
Hippolytus 67
Hoelemann, H. 173
Homer 323
Hooke 115
Horst, F. 91, 207, 237, 279, 281
Humbert, P. 89, 92

Ignatius 184
van Imschoot 32
Irenaeus 21

Jaspers, K. 104
Jenni, E. 138
Jeremias, Joach. 296
Jeremias, Jürg 32, 74f., 120
Johansson, N. 189, 190
John of the Cross 44, 67, 243
Johnson, A. R. 159
Jung, C. G. 382
Justinian 122

Kaiser, I. 220, 246
Karge, P. 150
Kautzsch, E. 159, 163, 325
Kierkegaard, S. 184
Kittel, G. 52
Kittel, H. 32, 52
Kittel, R. 318
Koch, K. 163, 164, 166, 168
Koehler, L. 32, 37, 89, 92, 170, 205, 373
Korosec, V. 151
Kramer, R. 32, 35
Kramer, S. N. 222, 278
Kraetzschmar, B. 150
Kraus, H. J. 40, 71, 78, 200f., 209, 279

Labat, R. 118
Lampe, G. W. H. 407
Leo, d.Gr. 10
Lerch, D. 196
Lofthouse, W. P. 153, 159f.
Lotz, W. 32
de Lubac H. 407f.
Luther 184, 385
Lyonnet, St 165

Maag, V. 56
Maier, J. 320
Mann, W. 163
Mendenhall, G. E. 151
Metzinger, A. 397
Michaeli, F. 97
Minder, R. 10
Mohrmann, Chr. 52
Moltmann, J. 168
Montgomery, J. A. 159

Morgenstern, J. 32, 35
Mosis, R. 67
Mowinckel, S. 77, 115, 150, 317

Neuhaus, K. 32, 35
Nicholas of Cusa 67, 348
North, R. C. 115
Noth, M. 80, 115, 150, 322, 373, 376f., 383, 385, 391
Nötscher, F. 70, 72, 163, 165

Origen 133, 381, 413
Oetinger 10, 63
Owen, E. C. E. 52

Parmenide 52
Pascal 21, 88
Pautrel 140
Pax, E. 53
Pedersen, J. 153
Philo 22, 67, 338, 344f., 384, 394
Pindar 33, 161
Plato 23, 53, 136, 164, 206, 320, 344, 359, 362, 372
v. der Ploeg, J. 317
Plotinus 23, 359, 361
Porteous, N. W. 75, 321
Pythagoras 320, 327, 372

Quell, G. 170, 173

v. Rad, G. 32, 38, 49, 59, 71, 82, 91f., 95, 98, 104f., 116f., 146, 155, 165f., 175, 178, 181f., 186, 192, 195, 196, 198, 210f., 234f., 253, 310, 313, 368, 380, 386, 404, 405, 410
Rahlfs, A. 318
Reitzenstein, R. 52
Renaud, B. 157
Rengstorf, K. H. 86
Rhodokanakis, N. 179
Riesenfeld, H. 159
Riessler, P. 325
Rilke 287
Ringgren, H. 166
Roeder, G. 134
Rohland, E. 311
Römer, W. H. Ph. 120
Rowley, H. H. 330, 373

Scheeben, M. 12, 68
Schierse, F. J. 22
Schlier, H. 25
Schmidt, K. L. 310
Schnackenburg, R. 32
Schneider, J. 53
Schneider, R. 109, 228
Scholem, G. 264
Schott, A. 120
Schott, S. 134
Schreiner, J. 203, 311
Schumann, F. K. 101
Sellin, E. 312
Simon, R. 134
Smend, R. 156
v. Soden, W. 120, 278
v. Speyr, A. 267
Spicq 22
Stamm, J. J. 90, 92
Stein, B. 32, 35, 85
Stoebe, H. J. 159f., 162

Theodor of Mopsuestia 133
Thielicke, H. 96
Thomas, Aquinas 26

de Vaux, R. 179, 238
Virgil 323
Volz, P. 330
Vriezen, Th.C. 90, 91

Weiser, A. 76, 80, 173
Wellhausen, J. 150
Wensinck, A. J. 220
Westermann, C. 76, 136, 146, 204, 306
Wichmann, W. 338
Wolff, H. W. 240, 241f., 313
Wollcombe, K. J. 407
Wright 77

Zimmerli, W. 92, 98, 139, 268, 407

INDEX OF BIBLICAL REFERENCES

OLD TESTAMENT

Genesis
1 93, 96, 101
1.26 89, 90
1.27 90, 98
1.31 98, 353
2.2f. 384
2.6 90
2.7–8 89
2.9 90
2.15 89
2.16–17 98
2.17 101
2.18 136
2.19 89
2.23–24 98
2.25 135
3.8 223
3.10 102
3.14–24 217
3.17f. 102
3.19 69
3.24 101
4.1–16 393
4.13 170
4.15f. 393
4.23f. 393
5.3 90
5.6 223
5.24 183
6.1–4 338
6.5 217
6.6 223
8.20 397
8.21 217
9.1f. 385
9.1–6 394
9.1–7 198
9.2 176
9.6 90, 393
9.9f. 176
9.9–17 198
9.11 150
9.13f. 85
9.15 150
10–11 198
11.5 223
11.5f. 45
11.7 223
12 196
12.1 178
12.3 198
12.7 178
13.2 33
14.18 193
14.19 200
14.22 260
15 150, 195, 196, 397
15.6 169
15.7–12 196
15.17–18 196
16 196
16.13 197
17.1 192, 194, 196
17.9ff. 384
17.13 157, 397
18 195
18.10f. 224
18.17 192
18.17–19 223
18.19 170
19.19 160
20 196
20.7 189
20.9 172
21 196
21.3 194
22 191, 196
22.2 225
22.12 225
22.13 398
22.14 197
24.16f. 136
26 196
26.8f. 136
26.23f. 196
28 223
28.10f. 196
28.12 45
28.12f. 194
28.16 44
31.1 33
31.42 187
31.44f. 151
31.53 187, 194
32.23f. 195, 196
32.27 197
32.29 64, 197
32.30 199
32.31 13
33 199
34.30 180
45.5–8 197
45.13 33
46.3–4 223
49.5–7 180
49.6 33
49.8f. 313

Exodus
3 37, 42, 44
3.14 56
3.15 193
3–4 226
4.10 224
4.16 226
4.22 395
4.24–25 197, 397
7.1 226
12.42 400

13.21 43
14.4 63
14.13b–30 253
14.17 63
14.19 43
14.24 43
15.1b–11 77
15.3 56
15.7–8 56, 77
15.11 63
15.13 159
16.4f. 56
18.5 44
19.4–6a 154
19.5 169
19.5–6 62
19.12 42
19.16 237
19.18 42, 45
19.20 45, 267
19.21 13
20 378
20.1–17 155
20.2 48
20.5–6 48
20.16 42
20.18–21 47, 188
20.19f. 192
20.24 64
20–23 152
21.13–14 393
22.20 155
23.9 155
24 38
24.1 39
24.1–2 46, 150
24.3–4 378
24.3–8 39, 46
24.6–8 376, 397
24.9f. 38, 46, 247
24.9–11 150
24.10–11 13
24.16f. 247
29.43 63
32 156, 217
32.6 216
32.9–14 189
32.10 216
32.11–14 190
32.19 216
32.31 216
32.32 216
32.32f. 189
33.1 46
33.2 46
33.3 46
33.9–11 45
33.11 38
33.13 46, 190
33.14 46, 71
33.15 46
33.16 46
33.18 38, 40
33.18–19 211
33.19 38, 41, 162
33.20 13, 38, 39, 266
33.23 41, 149
34.6 46, 149, 174
34.6f. 38, 207
34.8 12
34.9 189, 190, 191
34.11–14 191
34.29f. 19
34.29–35 39
35.31 27
35–40 45, 371
40.34–38 43, 46
40.36–38 50

Leviticus
1–7 371
7.18 168
8–10 371
9.23–24 43
10.2 44
10.3 63
11.44 63
11–15 372
12.3 384
12.4–6 179
16.2 13
16.3f. 397
17.4 168
17.11 391, 397
17–26 377
18.4 63
19.2 63, 180
19.35 238
20.2 180
20.26 154
22.32 63
23 371
23.11 394
25 371
25.23 178
26.6 175
26.27f. 278
26.14–16 218
26.36f. 278
26.41–42 278

Numbers
1.48ff. 371
1.53 180
3.5ff. 371
3.9 180
3.12 180
4 371
4.20 13
6.25 162
6.25–26 69
8.14 180
8.16 180
8.19 180
9.15–23 43
10.11f. 43
10.35 118
11.1 190
11.24f. 45
11.24–30 190, 226
12.4f. 45
12.6–8 190, 315
12.7 13, 226
12.8 38, 40, 68, 266
14.10 44
14.13–20 190
14.16 191
14.18 207
16.19 44
16.25–34 44

16.33 56
16.35 43
17.7–11 44
18.6 180
18.20 182
20.6 44
20.12 63, 188
21.4f. 190
21.13 190
23.19 61, 201
24.7 313
24.17 313
25.1–5 239
27.12f. 178
27.14 64
28f. 371
28–29 371
33.52 89
35.9f 393

Deuteronomy
1.37 188, 296
3.23f. 296
3.26 188
4.11f. 47, 185
4.12 15, 39, 40, 185
4.13 15
4.15 39, 40, 47
4.15f. 186
4.19–20 186
4.21 188, 296
4.24 47, 186
4.29 185
4.31 186
4.32–40 59
4.35 187
4.36 65
4.37 186
5.2–5 185
5.3 376
5.4 39, 47
5.4–5 47
5.5 39, 188, 192
5.6–10 48
5.6–21 185
5.9 186
5.22 15, 39
5.22–26 47
5.23 389
5.24 13, 39, 67, 185, 192
5.24f. 158
5.25f. 47, 59, 315
5.25–27 188
5.27 158, 192
5.31 188
6.4 187, 362
6.5 59, 155, 185
6.6–9 206
6.15 48
6.22 185
7.2 160
7.6 186
7.6f. 185
7.6–7 155
7.7 185
7.7–8 204
7.8f. 169
7.9 155, 187
7.12 187
8.2 224
8.3 155, 186
8.12 160
8.16 224
8.17 155
9.9 296
9.9f. 189
9.10 47
9.15 47
9.18f. 189
9.18–19 296
9.25 189
9.25–29 190
10.4 47
10.12 157, 184, 185, 186, 225
10.15 155
10.16 157, 186
10.17 162, 352
10.19 155
10.21 98
11.1 155
11.2 184
11.13 155, 186
12 45
12.1 187
12.5 65
12.8–12 187
12.11 65
12.13f. 187
12.21 65
12.23 391
12.23f. 384
13.1–5 232
13.2 187
13.4 185
14.2 186
14.21 186
14.23 65
15.7 155
15.15 156
16.1–6 187
16.2 65
16.6 65
16.11 65
17.3 186
17.8–10 187
17.14 187
17.14–20 383
18.9 187
18.13 63, 188
18.15 188, 190
18.15f. 315
18.16 188
19.1 187
19.1f. 393
21.1 187
21.1–9 393
22.2 307
25.13f. 238
26.1 187
26.2 65
26.15 65
26.16 186
26.19 98, 186
28.9 6
28.15–68 218
28.69 376
29.13f. 185
30.2 185
30.6 185, 186

30.10 186
30,11–14 58, 186
30.14 65
30.19 408
31.14 45
31.17–18 70
32.6 395
32.7 206
32.8 186, 254
32.8f. 185
32.10 48
32.16 48
32.20 70
32.21–23 48
32.22 220
32.23 286
32.26 48
32.39 221
32.40 589
32.51 64
33.2 76, 203
33.8 159
33.8–11 180
33.19 168
33.21 171
33.26–27 76
34.10 13, 38, 190

Joshua
2.12–14 160
3.10 389
7.6–9 190
7.19 204
9 150
15.63 178
22 179
22.19 179
24 151, 376
24.7 43
24.26 376

Judges
1.21 178
1.24f. 160
1.–3 305
2.18 223
2.20–21 178
2.22 178
3.2 178
3.15–30 107
4.7 75
4.17 175
4.21 107
5.4 56
5.4–5 75
5.10 56
5.22–23 75
6.15 224
6.22 13
7.16–22 107
8.23 152
8.27 108
9.54 108
10.13 107
10.16 223
11.1 224
11.24 108
11.36 113
13.2f. 224
13.18 64
13.22 121
14.14 108
16.1–3 108
18.7 170

1 Samuel
1 224
1.11 229
1.27 229
1.28 229
2.2 62
2.6 221
3.9 231
3.20 190, 227
3–6 118, 267
4.21 118
6.5 204
6.20 187
7.5f. 190
7.9f. 227
7.10 56
8 314
8.7 227
8.8 232
8.11–18 227
9.16–17 227, 230
9.21 224
9–20 105
10 227
10.6 228
10.7 228
10.27 224
11 227
11.1 150
12.12f. 190
12.12–14 227
12.13 229
12.18 227
13.7b–15 228
13.12 69, 229
13.14 109
14 110
14.17 121
14.20 121
14.24 229
14.27 121
14.39 229
14.44 229
15 158, 228
15.11 223
15.15 228
15.22 157, 229
15.23 229
15.24–29 105
15.29 109
15.35 223
16 106
16.1 229
16.6f. 112
16.7 110
16.11 224
16.14 229
16.18 110
17.12 315
17.26 389
17.32 110
17.36 389
17.42 110, 112
18.1–4 110
18.4 150
18.7 349

18.18 112
18.23 112
19.10b–17 111
19.18f. 227
20.8 110
21.2f. 111
21.10f. 112
22.6–19 111, 112
22.20 111
23.19f. 111
24 111
25 111
25.3 110
26 111
26.1f. 111
27 111
28.1–2 110
28.3 229
29.9 121
30.21f. 111

2 Samuel
1.19 109
1.23 110
1.26 110
2.12–32 111
3 111
3.22–27 111
4 111
6.7f. 118
7 313
7.5–16 112
7.13 112
7.18–19 112
8 112
9 111
11.2 110, 329
12 111, 329
12.7 112
12.11 112
12.22f. 181
13.1 110
14.25 110
14.27 110
15.32f. 111
16.7 111
16.11 113
16.20–23 113
17.17f. 111
18.31 171
19.3–7 113
19.16–24 111
19.25–31 111
19.29 165
19.32f. 111
20.3 109
21.1 70
22.31 148
22.36 232
23.1–2 114
23.2 60
23.5 150
24 45
24.17 190
24.23 169

1 Kings
1.3 110, 131
2.7 160
2.21–22 131
2.27 112
3.1 114
3.4f. 116
3.9 170
3.13 116
3.28 170
5.4 175
5.26 175
7.3 116
8 190
8.1 117
8.10–13 116
8.23 160
9.1–9 117
9.5 117
9.32 166
10.7 122
10.9 170
10.18–20 122
10.23 116
11.1–2 115
12.2–20 115
12.28 157
13.6 190
13.11–32 232
17.20 190
17.24 174
18.38 49
18.42 190
19.10 49
19.11 281
19.11–12 86
19.13 12
19.19–21 233
20.34 150
20.35f. 232
22 274
22.19 92

2 Kings
1.7 170
1.10f. 49
2.1 281
2.3 183
2.5 183
2.11 49, 281
4.33 190
5.10 233
6.17–20 190
9.30 147
11.18 89
17.33 170
19.2–7 190
19.25 89
19.27 203
20.2 190
20.16 235
21.13 238
22.8 376, 380

1 Chronicles
16.34 207
21–22.1 45
25.1 386
25.2 386
25.3 386
28.2 118
28.5 314
29.10–13 116
29.11 147
29.11f. 314

29.23 314

2 Chronicles
5.11–14 372
6.14 160
7.1 117
9.8 314
19.7 352
20.14 387
20.20 387
23.17 89
24.20 387
24.20–22 235
29.25ff. 372
29.30 386
30.9 69
30.18–19 190
35.3 386
35.15 386

Ezra
3.6 389
3.11 207
4.12 310
7.6 379
7.10 379
7.12 376
7.27 371
9.6–15 367
9–10 384

Nehemiah
1.5f. 367
1.9 160
3 310
8.7–8 387
8.8f. 376
8.18 376
9 385
9.2 384
9.17 207
9.20 60
9.32 160
13.3 384

Tobit
8.6–7 137
13.2 222
13.9–18 309

Judith
13.4 309
15.9 309
16.7 309
16.8–9 309

Esther
2.9 161
2.17 161

1 Maccabees
1.40 372
2.9 372
2.12 372
4.46 365
9.27 365
9.41 365

2 Maccabees
2.1–8 263
3.2 372
5.1–3 323
5.16 372
5.20 372
7.23 89
15.12–16 190

Job
1 92
1.1 281
1.3 281
1.8 281
1.9 281
1.21 282
2.3 281
2.10 282
2.12 283
3.8f. 285
3.23 284
4.6 284
4.8 282
4.14–17 40
5.27 282
6.2 288
6.4 286
6.29 288
7.12 285
7.16–20 284
7.17–20 203, 286
7.20 286
8.8 282
8.8–22 284
8.20 281
9.2 282
9.2–3 284
9.11 284
9.13 285
9.19 284
9.19f. 288
9.20–22 281
9.32–23 288
9.34 286
10.3 284
10.3–5 288
10.8 284
10.8–9 89
10.9–10 284
10.12 69
10.16 284
10.17 284
10.20 284
11.8–9 203
11.13 284
12.10 69
12.13–25 284
12.14 284
12.22 203
13.1–2 282
13.3 288
13.6 286, 288
13.11 286
13.14 288
13.16 288
13.18 288
13.21 286
13.24 70, 283, 284
14.3 284
14.3b 288
14.13–22 404
15.6 285
15.17–18 282

15.20 286
16.2 282
16.4 283
16.6 283
16.10–11 285
16.12f. 70, 284
16.12–13 286
16.18–20 287
16.19–22 190
17.3 287
17.6 283
18 287
18.11 286, 287
18.14 286
18.14–15 287
18.16 287
18.18 287
18.19 287
19 287
19.9 33, 283
19.10 287
19.11 284
19.12 284
19.13–19 283
19.23–24 287
19.25f. 288
19.25–27 190
20.25 286
21.7 288
21.19 288
22.26 170
22–24 289
23.2 288
23.3f. 288
23.8–9 203, 283
23.15 286
23.17 286
24.1–17 288
24.2–12 316
25.2–6 285
26.1–14 285
26.6 220
26.12 285
27.5 281
27.10 170
27.20 286
28.14 284
28.21–22 284
28.24 68
28.25 238
29.3 283
29.11f. 287
30 224
30.1 283
30.1–8 283
30.10 283
30.15 286
30.20–21 287
31.1–40 287
31.4 203
31.6 281
32.6f. 208
33.23 190
33–35 285
34.13–17 285
34.14f. 69
34.15 89
34.19 352
34.21 68
34.22 203
35.10 209
36.3 285
36.10 283
36.22–37 81, 285
36.25 286
37.13 286
37.22 286
37.24 286
38.1 289
38.2 289
38.3 289
38.4 290
39.13b–18 289
40.2 209
40.4–5 289
40.6–7 289
40.10 290
40.14 290
40.15–41.26 289
40.19 89
40.25 285
42.2 290
42.2–6 289
42.3 289
42.3b 290
42.5 290
42.6 290
42.7 290

Psalms
1.2 206
2 315
2.6 314
2.7 314
4.6 168
4.7 69
6.6 221, 390
7.6 33
8 15, 94, 98, 101, 283
8.4–10 93
9–10 318
11.1 71
11.4 68
11.7 68, 71
12.7 148, 202
13.2 70
16 182
16.9 33
17.3 206
17.8 73
17.15 40, 71
18.7–17 81
18.12 83
18.16 220
18.27 81
18.31 202
18.31a 148
18.36 232
18.50 81
19 206
19.1 19
19.2 147
19.2–5 82
19.9f. 82
19.12–14 206
19.15 206
19.9–19 148, 202
19.12–14 202
20.2 66

21.6 33
22 410
22.23 208
22.25 70
24.4 71
24.6 71
24.7–10 200
24.8 56
24.10 56, 200
25 318
25.1–2 205
25.8–9 172
25.18 166
26 170
26.2–3 206
26.12 208
27.1 283
27.4–5 206
27.8 72
27.9 70
27.14 72
29 82
29.4 56
29.1–10 78
29.9 200
30.4 221
30.6 207
30.8 70
30.10 221
30.13 33
31.17 69
31.21 206
32.1 166
32.5 166
33.5 172
33.9 201
33.11 205
33.13–15 203
33.15 89
33.18 68
34 318
34.5 207
34.6 207
35.18 208
35.26 147
36.8–10 182
36.9–10 69, 147
37 318
37.2 205
37.4 170
38.3 286
39 205
39.7 90, 142
39.9 166
40.6–7 388
40.10 208
40.18 318
42.3 389
44.4 69
44.6 66
44.22 203
44.25 70
45 119, 122
45.3 146, 161, 211, 350
45.7 314
46.5 147
46.7 203
47 209
48.3 203, 211
48.10–12 172
49.16 183
50 82, 85, 204
50.1–2 203
50.2 167, 210
50.3–4 85
50.6 147, 166
50.8–13 388
51 367
51.3 166
51.7 205
51.7–19 388
51.8–9 174
51.11 60, 70
51.15 209
51.17 208
51.18f. 168
51.21 168
52.11 208
54.1 66
57.2 73
57.6 203
57.9 33
57.10 203
57.12 203
60.9–19 207
63.2 205
63.3–6 182
63.5 204
63.6 208
63.7 206
63.8 73
63.9 205
64.10 208
65.5 182, 207
65.6b 168
65.8 202, 285
65.10 203
66.1 209
66.4 209
66.8 209
66.10 206
66.16 208
66.18f. 207
67.2 69
67.4–6 209
67.5 203
68.5 65
68.9 77
68.18 77
68.33–36 203
68.35 204
69 209
69.8 224
69.10 224
69.18 70
71.7 224
71.8 204
71.14f. 208
71.23 208
72 314
72.18 203
72.19 66
73 170, 182
73.16 183
73.18f. 221
73.20 90
73.23–28 183
73.24 183
73.25 206
74.12–17 202

74.13–14 285
74.17 89
75.2 208
76 203
76.9 187
77 202, 206
77.9–10 207
77.11f. 80
77.12–13 206
77.13 206
77.14 80
77.17 285
77.17–20 77, 80
78.5–7 206
78.11 206
78.61 267
79.8 162
80.4 69
80.8 69
80.17 70
82.8 203
84.3 389
85 176
85.3 166
85.9–14 176
86.4 205
86.9 66
86.11 174
86.12 65, 66
86.13 221
86.15 207
87.5 203
88.6 221
88.11–13 221
88.15 70
89 207
89.4f. 150
89.10–11 202, 285
89.16 66, 69, 283
90.2 89
90.5 205
91.15 223
92.2 65, 210
92.3 208
92.6 208
93 209
93.3–4 285
93.4 220
94.9 71, 891
94.9–11 203
95.5 89, 118
95–98 203
96.1 209
96.3 209
96.7 56
96–100 209
97 81, 166
97.1–6 166
97.3 79
97.6 147
97.7 79
97.9 79
97.10 79
97.11 166
97.11–12 79
98.2–4 147
99 167
99.1 167
99.4 203
99.5 203, 247
99.6 190
99.7 167
101.1 172
102.3 70
102.16–17 66
102.17–18 69, 203
102.23 203
103.3 166
103.6f. 172
103.8–10 207
103.12 166
103.15f. 205
104 82, 147, 202, 209, 210
104.1 202
104.1–2 82
104.6–7 285
104.26 89, 285
104.29 82
104.29–30 69, 205
104.31 147, 202
105 206
105.4 73
105.4–5 71
106 208
106.1 207
106.9 220
106.20 98, 145
106.47 66
107.20 166
107.29 285
108.2 33
109.29 147
110 315
110.3 314
110.4 315
110.5–7 310
111 207
111.9 66
112 207
113 147
113.2 207
113.4–7 69
114 206
114.3 77
114.3–7 77
114.5 77
115.12f. 207
115.16 45
115.17 221
115.18 207
119 170, 172, 201, 205, 208, 382
119.11 206
119.14 206
119.16 206
119.19a 206
119.20 205
119.24 206
119.30 205
119.31 205
119.33 206
119.47 206
119.54b 206
119.58 69
119.61 206
119.73 89
119.77 162
119.80 206
119.81–82 207
119.88 206

119.89 205
119.93 206
119.103 383
119.112 206
119.113 207
119.123 207
119.131 205, 206
119.135 69
119.141 206
119.145 206
119.153 206
119.160 174
119.162 206
119.176 206
123.2 205
124.8 66
125.1f. 203
130 209
130.3 205
132.7 118
132.11 175
134 207
135 201, 206
135.3–6 201
135.7 82, 201
135.7–9 201
135.8–11 201
135.12 201
135.15–17 201
135.18 201
135.19–21 201
136 202, 206
136.1 207
136.4–9 202
136.10–24 202
136.25 202
138.5–6 148
138.6 69
139 68, 203
139.7–10 283
139.8 220
139.12 220
139.23 206
142.6 182
143.2 205
143.5 206
143.6 205
143.7 70
143.8 205
144.5 82
145 148, 205
145.2 204
145.4–5 206
145.8 207
145.9 162
145.21 66
146 202
146.2 204
146.4 69
146.6 175, 202
146.7–9 202
147.1 210
147.15–18 202
147.19–20 172, 202
147.20 204
148.7 285
149 172, 202
149.4–5 148, 318
149.5 211

Proverbs
1.2–3 128
1.4 128
1.5 128
1.7 128, 162, 205, 286
1.9 146, 161
1.20–33 129
2.22 128
2.5 128
2.6 129
2.18f. 221
3.2–4 129
3.7 128
3.19–20 129
3.27–30 129
3.35 128
4.9 146, 161
4.19 221
4.24 128
5.5 221
5.19 146, 161
6.9–11 316
7.27 221
8.5 128
8.13 128
8.18 129
8.22f. 129
8.25 89
8.31 359
8.34 129
9.4 128
9.7–8 128
9.10 286
9.12 129
10.8 128
10.12 129
10.19 128
10.24 129
10.27 128
11.2 128
11.6 129
11.16 146
11.19 221
11.22 136
11.24–26 128
12.10 128
12.14 129
12.15 128
12.17 128
12.23 128
12.28 221
13.1 128
13.3 128
13.18 129
13.21 129
14.8 128
14.20 130
14.21 129, 130
14.23 128
14.26–27 128
14.29–30 128
14.34 165
15.3 128
15.5 128
15.11 128, 203, 220
15.12 128
15.16 128
15.18 128
15.28 128

15.33 128, 129, 231, 286 319
16.2 128
16.6 129
16.9 128
16.14f. 121
16.18 128
16.19 128
16.20 128
16.32 128
17.5 130
17.8 146, 161
17.10 128
17.17 129
17.28 128
18.3 128, 129
18.12 231, 319
18.13 128
18.14 128
18.23 130
19.1 129
19.3 129
19.4 130
19.8 129
19.11 128
19.13 128, 130
19.17 130
19.20 128
19.21 128
20.7 128
20.13 129
20.24 128
21.2 128
21.5 128
21.10 129
21.13 129, 130
21.16 221
21.17 129
21.21 165
21.24 128
21.26 128
21.30 128
22.1 128, 129, 169
22.2 130
22.4 129, 231, 319
22.11 146, 161
22.12 128
22.17–23 11
23.17 128
24.4 129
24.12 89
24.30–32 316
24.30–34 128
25.9–10 128
25.12 128
25.15 128
25.21–22 129
25.28 128
26.4–5 130
26.12 129
26.27 129
27.19 316
28.3 130
28.6 129
28.23 128
28.26 129
28.27 130
29.6 129
29.7 128, 130
29.11 128
29.20 128
29.23 128
29.25 128
30.1–31 9
30.5 148, 202
30.8–9 130
30.32 128
31.30 128, 136, 146

Ecclesiates
1.1 138
1.2 137
1.7–8 137, 141
2.13 139
2.14–15 139
2.17 142
2.18–23 139
2.20 142
2.24 140
3.1 138
3.9 138
3.10–11 139
3.12–13 140
3.18 139
3.19 141
3.19–21 139
3.21 141
3.22 140
4.1 140
4.2–3 142
4.4 139
4.6 140
4.7–12 139
4.17 141
5.1 141
5.4 141
5.5 141
5.6 141
5.7–8 140
5.17–19 140
6.4 139
6.6 139
6.12 140
7.1–4 142
7.8 142
7.12–13 139
7.13 141
7.16–17 141
7.24 142
8.7 140
8.9 140
8.12–13 139
8.14 140
8.15 140
9.1 140
9.7–9 140
9.11 161
10.4 140
10.6–7 140
10.12 161
11.9bʻ 141
12.1a 141
12.3–8 142
12.7 69, 141
12.12 139
12.13–14 141

Song of Solomon
1.1 131
1.5 132
1.9 134

2.7 132
2.8–14 132
4.6 133
4.8 132
4.11 132
4.16–5. 1 133
5.2–8 132
6.4 132
6.5 132
7.5 132
8.4 132
8.8–10 135
8.12 132
8.14 132

Wisdom of Solomon
1.2 359
1.6 360
1.7 360
1.13–15 363
1.16 222
2.1–9 363
2.10–20 363
2.19 364
2.21 359
2.23 92, 364
2.24 101, 364
3.4 363
3.5–7 364
3.13–14 363
3.16f. 363
4.1 363
4.3–6 363
4.7–14 363
4.19 363
5.15–16 363
6.7 352
6.12 359
6.13 359
6.16 359
7.17–20 362
7.22 360, 361
7.22f. 360
7.22–24 361
7.23 359
7.25 101, 209, 360
7.26 211, 359, 361
7.27 361, 362
7.29–30 361
8.2–4 360
8.4 360
8.7 362
9.1 360
9.4 363
9.8 363
9.9 360
9.11 363
10.15 358
10.17 363
11.9 364
11.20 359
11.21 238
11.24 359, 363
11.26 363
12.16 363
12.21–22 364
13.1 72, 359
13.2 186
13.4–5 362
13.5 130, 359
13.6 363
13.10–15 19 363
14.3 363
14.12–21 363
14.27 363
15.3 72
15.11 89
16.6–7 364
16.12 360
16.20–21 364
16.26 364
17.1–20 364
18.3 363
18.3–4 364
18.4 363
18.6 400
18.14–18 400
18.15 360, 364

Sirach
1.1 358
1.1–10 355
1.2–3 358, 359
1.6 358
1.11 350
1.11–20 162, 355
1.14 205
1.22–24 356
1.27 356
1.30 356
2.1–18 357
2.10 348
2.15–16 356
2.18 356
2.21 359
3.17–18 350
3.20 349
3.22 348
3.23 358
4.1–10 356
4.5 316
4.8 356
4.11–17 357
4.21 350
5.10f. 356
6.5 146
6.5f. 356
6.17 356
6.18–31 357
6.37 348
7.10 356
7.17 356
7.19 146
7.20f. 356
7.26f. 356
7.32 356
7.32–36 356
9.1f. 356
9.8 136, 146, 350
9.10f. 356
9.12 356
10.14 356
10.19–25 356
10.22 350
10.26 31, 355
10.28 356
11.2 350
11.4 358
11.10–11 356

11.12 356
11.26–28 357
12.1–7 356
12.8–18 356
13.1–3 356
14.5 356
14.11–15 356
14.20–23 348
14.27 348
15.2 348
15.11–12 355
16.27 355
16.28 355
16.29 355
17 101
17.1 364
17.1–2 97
17.1–3 96
17.1–17 347
17.3 97
17.6 68
17.6–10 96
17.7 355
17.8 97
17.11 68
17.11f. 99
17.13 68, 96
17.13–14 58
17.25 355
17.27 221
17.27–28 347
18.1–7 358
18.6–7 354
18.11 352
18.13 352
18.19–27 356
19.6f. 356
19.13f. 356
19.20 355
19.22 355
19.24f. 355
20.1f. 356
21.6 355
21.9–10 357
21.16 146, 350
21.27–28 356
22.27–23.6 356
23.17f. 356
24 209
24.1–2 350
24.9–20 349
24.16 250
24.17 350
24.21 358
24.31 358
25.21 350
26.13 350
26.13–15 136
26.15–18 350
26.17 350
27.9 356
27.16f. 356
27.25f. 356
28.1–7 356
28.13f. 356
29.8–13 356
31.25–31 350
32.10 146
33.10–15 353
33 20f.
34.21–22 356
35.10 356
35.11–19 352
35.12–16 352
35.23 352
36.19 347
36.23 356
39.7 348
39.12f. 208
39.16–21 354
39.16–21 72
39.17–18 355
39.19–20 68
39.29 354
39.33–35 354
40.17 356
40.22 350
40.27 356
41.7 356
42.12 350
42.15 355
42.16 350, 355
42.17 82, 351
42.22 348
42.22–25 354
43 82
43.1–2 351
43.5 355
43.9 351
43.10 355
43.11–12 86, 351
43.13f 355
43.18 351
43.24 351
43.25 351
43.27–28 351
43.30 349, 358
43.30–33 352
44.1–2 349
44.7 349, 350
44.18 353
44.19 349
45.2–3 349
45.3–5 347
45.4 356
45.6–22 349
45.7–8 350
45.23 349
46.2 349
47.6 349
47.8 349
47.11 349
47.22 349, 352
49.5 350
49.8 347
50.1–21 349, 372
50.7 86
51.2 221
51.5 221
51.17 349
51.22 349

Isaiah
1.4 247
1.5–6 251
1.10f. 388
1.11 168
1.16–17 171
1.18 254
1.19–20 254
1.23 171

1.25 254
1.25–27 252
1.26 312
1.30 251
2.1–5 255
2.2–4 311
2.2–5 311
2.3b 314
2.6–22 250
2.11 247
2.17 247
3.8 251
3.9 251
3.14 171, 252
3.24 147
4.4–6 247
4.5–6 256
5.5–6 251
5.8–10 252
5.12 252, 254
5.15 171
5.15–16 250
5.16 249, 250
5.19 247, 252, 254
5.20 171, 252
5.23 171
5.24 247
6 92, 235
6.3 62, 247, 351
6.4 247
6.5 12, 13, 14, 121, 247, 253
6.6 254
6.7 248
6.8 234
6.9–12 248
6.13 255
7.3f. 249
7.9 253
7.13f. 250
8.4 250
8.11–15 250
8.12–13 253
8.13 64
8.14 400
8.16–18 251
8.17 70
8.18 250
8.21–22 251
9.1 307
9.5 255, 314
9.6 171, 314
9.7–10.4 219
10.2 252
10.17 247
10.20 247
11.1 255, 312, 314
11.2 314
11.4 252
11.4–5 314
11.6–9 314
11.9 314
12.3 147
12.6 247
13 219
14 221
14.13f. 203
14.24–27 255
16.14 33
17.7 247, 252
18.4 248
18.7 386
19 219
19.6–7 251
21.1–10 219
21.16 33
22.4 248
22.11 89, 252
22.15–18 386
22.19–23 386
22.24–25 386
23 219
25.1 65
26.19 323
27.1 285
27.11 89
28.15 222
28.16 252, 255
28.17 171, 238
28.21 16, 224
28 249, 254, 400
29.6 281
29.13 251
29.14 249
29.15 251
29.15–16 252
29.16 89
29.19 247
29.23 64, 66, 247, 254
30.1 252
30.9 251
30.10 251
30.11–12 247
30.15 252
30.27 48
30.27–28 77
30.30 237
30.30–31 77
30.33 48
31.1 247, 252
31.3 75
32.1 171
32.1–4 255
32.8 252
32.16f. 171
33.9 251
34.11 238
34.13f. 219
37.13 247
37.26 89
38.18 221, 391
40.1–2 291
40.1–8 291, 297
40.2 172, 305
40.3–5 291
40.5 73
40.6 146
40.6–8 291
40.7–8 205
40.8 31
40.11 293
40.12 238
40.12f. 294
40.15 31
40.15–17 292
40.23 292
40.25 291
40.26 294
40.28–30 292
41.2 295

41.4 292
41.8 294
41.14 292
41.17–19 295
41.21–24a 293
41.25 295
42.1–4 172, 297
42.2 405
42.5 292, 294
42.8 291
42.9 201
42.10–13 295
42.16 295
42.18 295
42.20 67, 293
42.23 293
42.25 293
43.1 65, 89, 292
43.2 223
43.4 292
43.7 89, 291, 292
43.8 295
43.10 293
43.11–12 61, 177
43.12 292, 293
43.18 293
43.21 292
43.25 291
43.26 293
44.2 89, 292
44.6 292
44.7 291, 293
44.8 293
44.21 89, 292, 293
44.24 89, 292
44.25–6 293
45.1 295
45.4–5 295
45.5 89, 291
45.7 89
45.8 89, 169
45.9 89
45.9–11 292
45.11 89, 296
45.18 89, 292
45.19 297
46.5 291, 292
46.8–9 293
46.9 291
47.1–15 219
48.3f. 201
48.3–6 293
48.4 295
48.6 291
48.6–7 293
48.7 291
48.11 291
48.12 292
48.16 297
48.18 176, 294
48.21 293
49.1 297
49.2 73, 297
49.3 295
49.4 295
49.5 296
49.5b 295
49.7 296, 297
49.8 150, 292
49.10 293
49.10–11 298
49.15 292
50.2 220
50.4 294
50.4–5 155, 192, 294
50.4–6 296, 399
50.5 255, 292
50.5–6 296
50.7 296
51.3 172
51.6 292
51.8 172
51.9 285
51.9–12 77
51.16 73
51.17 305
52.8–10 295
52.12 292, 293, 298
52.13 295, 297
52.14 296
52.15 400
53.2 95, 211, 296
53.2a 296
53.2b 296
53.5 296
53.7 255, 296, 399
53.9 296
53.10 297
53.11 172
53.11–12 297
53.12 400
53.12c 190
54.5 292
54.7–8 207
54.8 70, 292
54.9–10 294
54.10 292
54.11f. 309
54.13 176
55.1 147
55.4 293
55.9 294
56.3f. 308
56–66 306
57.14–20 306
57.15 317
57.16 207
57.17 70
57.19 307
58 307
58.6–8 307
58.8 307
59 307
59.2 70
59.9 308
59.11 308
59.21 60, 308
60 199
60.1–3 306
60.13 306
60.16 306,308
60.17 176, 308
60.19 308
60.21 306
60–62 306
61.1 202, 307
61.10 306
62.2 307
62.4–5 306
63 307

63.9 71
63.10 308
63.11 308
63.14 308
63.15 162
63.16 308
63.19–643 85
63–64 367
64.1 308
64.6 70
64.6b 70
64.7 89
65.16b–25 306
65.17–25 306
66.1 203
66.2 317
66.6–16 306
66.12 176, 307
66.18 307
66.19 308
66.21 308

Jeremia
1.5 89, 258
1.6 258
1.9 258
1.17 258
1.19 258
2.1–4.4 261
2.2–3 160
2.11 98, 100, 145, 258
2.13 147
2.27 261
3.6–11 272
3.11 272
3.12 207
3.25 147
4.4 258
4.5–8 261
4.9–12 261
4.11–12 261
4.12 261
4.13–18 261
4.19 259
4.19–22 261
4.23–31 261
4.26 261
4.30 147
5.1 171
5.1–6 261
5.4f. 171
5.7–11 261
5.12–17 261
5.14 48, 259
5.26–31 261
5.28 171
6.1–8 261
6.4 258
6.8 261
6.9–19 261
6.11 256
6.14 176
6.16–21 261
6.22–26 261
6.26 261
7.5f 171
7.16 190, 259
7.20 258
7.27 259
7.28 261
7.29 262
7.34 261
8.2 262
8.7 171
8.6a 263
8.10 261
8.13 261
8.14 262
9.1 261
9.11 261
9.14 262
9.21 262
10.10 389
10.12–13 82
10.16 88
10.22 261
11.14 190, 259
11.16 259
11.19 259
12.1 262
12.3 203
12.5 260
12.7 219, 261
12.11 261
13.11 258
13.14 262
13.16 258
14.11 190, 259
14.12 169
14.21 258
15.1 190
15.4 259
15.6 261
15.11 190
15.16 259
15.17 256
15.18 260
15.19 260
16.2 256
16.4 262
16.5 256
16.8 256
16.10–13 396
16.13 261
16.17 262
17.9–10 262
17.11 171
17.12 258
17.17 262
17.27 259
18.4–6 262
18.6 89
18.11 89
18.13–16 258
18.16 261
18.17 261
18.20 190
19.8 261
19.11 262
20.2 259
20.3 317
20.6 48
20.7 260
20.9 48, 235, 257, 259
21.11 258
21.12 171
21.14 259
22.3 171

22.6 261
22.7 259
22.15f. 171
22.19 262
23.2 262
23.5 310, 315
23.15 262
23.18 68
23.19 281
23.23–24 203
23.28 174
23.29 48, 259
23.36 389
24.7 262
25.33 262
25.38 261
26.20–23 235
28.1–11 176, 260
29.11 176
29.12 73
30.21 48, 315
30.23 281
31.3 48, 258
31.20 224
31.31 263
31.33 262
31.34 263
32.19 68
32.39 262
32.40 258, 263
33.2 88
33.5 70
33.10 261
33.11 207, 258
33.12 261
34.18 150
35. 232
36.23 259
36.30 262
37.3 190
37.11–16 259
37.16 259
38.6 259
42.2 190
43.7 259
44.11 262
44.22 261
44.27 262
45.4–5 261
46. 219
46.19 261
48.45 259
49.27 259
49.33 261
50.3 261
50.5 258, 263
50.12 261
50.20 263
50.32 259
50.40 261
50.–51 219
51.15–16 82
51.19 88
51.26 261
51.29 261
51.30 259
51.43 261
51.58 259

Lamentations
1.6 277
1.9 277, 278
1.18 279
2.1 277
2.4f. 70
2.5–6 278
2.8 238
2.9 278
2.10 278
2.15 146, 277
2.17 278
3.2 277
3.9 284
3.12 286
3.18 146
3.19 278
3.21–33 279
3.45 277
4.1 219, 277
4.6 278
4.11 278
4.13 278
4.16 277
5.1 278
5.7 278
5.16 277
5.18 219
5.22 280

Baruch
1–2 367
2.17 221
2.18 319
3.22 204
3.37–38 204
4.5–9a 308
4.9b–16 308
4.17–29 308
4.30–37 308
5.1–4 308
5.5–9 308
5.9 309

Ezekiel
1 235
1.1 264
1.4 281
1.4–28 265
1.26 322
1.28 12, 86, 121,
2.2 13, 267
2.3–7 267
2.5 267
2.7 267
3.3 268
3.16f. 264
3.18 268
3.26 269
4.1–8 269
4.4 269
4.8 269
4.9–17 269
5.5 272
5.5–7 272
5.6–7 171
5.7 172
5.11 268
5.16 286
6.9 272
6.11 270

7.9 273
7.20 89
7.27 172
8.5–6 271
8.7–13 271
8.14–15 271
8.16–17 271
8–11 267
9.7 274
9.8 190
9.8f. 268
9.1–10.2, 7 267
10. 235, 265
10.2 274
10.6f. 83
10.7 274
10.19 267
11.12 171
11.13 190, 268
11.14f. 73
11.14–18 273
11.19–20 275
11.20 171
11.22–23 267
12.1–16 269
12.6b 269
12.11 269
12.17–18 269
13.3 68
14.9 274
14.12f. 273
14.14 273, 281
14.16 268
14.18 268
14.20 268, 281
14.22 273
15 272
15.7 70
16 100, 271
16.6 398
16.14 100
16.30–34 271
16.37 137
16.39 100
16.44–52 271
16.48 268
16.53–63 271
16.62–63 272
16.63 272
17.19 268
17.22 272, 311
17.22–24 275
18.3 268
18.5–9 168
18.8–9 174
18.9 171
18.17 171
20 275
20.3 268
20.9 268
20.11 171
20.13 171
20.14 169, 268
20.16 171
20.19 171
20.21 171
20.22 268
20.25 171
20.25f. 172
20.25–26 274
20.31 268
20.33 268
20.33f. 274
20.35 273
20.35–37 273
20.41 63
20.43 272
20.44 268
21.11 270
21.14–22 270
21.32 315
22.17–22 273
23 272
23.3 271
23.19 271
23.25 272
23.25–29 137
23.32–34 271
23.40 147
24.3f. 273
24.14 273
24.15–24 270
24.24 269
24.26–27 269
24.26–28 219
32 273
28.2 75
28.9 75
28.11–18 274
28.12 94, 95
28.16 101
28.16–17 94
28.18 100
28.22 63, 222
28.25 63, 222
29–32. 219
32 221
33.1–9 264
33.11 268
33.22 269
33.27 268
33.32 270
34.8 268
34.16 275
34.17 273
34.25f. 176
35.6 268
35.11 268, 274
36.22–23 268
36.23 63
36.25 275
36.26–28 275
36.27 171
36.31 272
36.36 201
37 275
37.24 171
37.26 176
38.12 272
38.16 63
38.23 63
38.–39 275
39.7 268, 275
39.13 275
39.21 63, 222, 268, 275
39.23 70
39.25 268
39.27 63, 268
40.2 311
43.1–9 276

43.2 146
43.27 169
44.3 315
44.4–46 276
44.24 172
45.16f. 315
46.2f. 315
47.1ff. 147
48 179, 276

Daniel
1.17 323
1.20 323
1–6 323
2 373
2.22 203
2.44 324
2.48f. 323
3 49
3.19f. 323
3.65–73 202
4.14 324
5.22–30 324
6.17f. 323
7 321, 373
7.9f. 14
7.9–14 321
7.15 12
7.22 322
7.25 322
7.27 322
8 322
8.9 146
8.17f. 121
9 322, 323, 367, 373
9.7 323
9.8 323
9.17 69, 373
9.19 373
10.9 12
10.11 324
10.13 322
10.13f. 186
10.16 324
10.18 324
10.–12 322
11.16 146
11.41 146
12.2 322, 339
14.31f. 323

Hosea
1.2 241
1.9 241
2.1 389
2.3 242
2.5 243
2.10 239
2.11 242
2.12 137, 243
2.15 241
2.16 245
2.16–17 243
2.21 160
2.21f. 177
2.21–22 244
3.1 241
3.1–3 240
3.2 345
3.5 73, 243
4.1 73, 160
4.2 174
4.6 241
4.7 98, 100, 145, 258
4.10 241
4.12 239, 243
5.4 243
5.6 242, 243
5.14 237, 239
5.15 73
6.3 243
6.4 160, 234, 244
6.5 171
6.6 73, 157, 160, 244, 388
7.2 164, 243
7.13 241
8.1 241
8.3 242
8.13 169, 242
8.14 241
9.1 239, 243
9.3 242
9.6 242
9.7 239, 245
9.10 241, 243
9.11 241, 242
9.12 242
9.14 242
9.16 242
10.1 243
10.1–4 243, 244
10.5 241
10.12 160, 169
11.5 242
11.8 243
11.8–9 224, 245
11.9 75
11.11 243
12.3–5 244
12.8 238
12.10–11 244
12.13 244
13.4–6 241
13.7–8 239
13.15 242
14.8 73
14.9 244

Joel
2.13 207
2.14 223
2.17 190
2.23 169
3.1f. 233
3.1–2 254

Amos
1.2 237
1.3ff. 237
2.6–7 238
2.12 237
3.4 237
3.8 237
3.12 237
4.1 237
4.2 62

4.12 239
4.13 89, 237, 238
5.7 170
5.8 239
5.8–9 237
5.12 170
5.14–15 170
5.18–20 239
5.19 238
5.20 239
5.21f. 157, 388
5.21–25 239
5.22 169
5.24 170
5.26 89
6.12 170
7.2 190
7.3 223
7.5 190
7.6 223
7.7–8 238
7.8 238
7.14f. 237
8.2 239
8.5 238
8.6 238
8.11f. 102
8.11–12 239, 356
9.2–3 203
9.3 238
9.4 70
9.5–6 237
9.9 238
9.11 314

Jonah
2.3–11 209
3.9 223
4.2 207

Micah
3.4 70
4.1–5 311
5.1 314
5.3 315
5.4–5 315
6.8 177
6.10–11 238
7.10 147

Nahum
1.3–6 85
1.4 220
1.6 187
1.8 219
2.9 33
2–3 219
3.4 146

Habakkuk
1.12 89
2.14 314
3.1–19 83
3.3 76, 147
3.3–7 83
3.7 83
3.8–11 84
3.12–15 84

Zephaniah
1.18 186
2.3 231, 317
3.5 171
3.11b–13a 317

Haggai
2.3 209
2.5 308
2.6–9 209
2.10ff. 383
2.14 210
2.15 209
2.18 209
2.19 209
2.23 310

Zechariah
1.16 162
2.5–9 310
2.14 310
3.7 187, 190
3.8 310
4.6b 308, 310
6.12 310
7.9 172
8.3 310
8.8b 310
8.16 176
9.9 315
9–14 310
12.1 89
12.10 261, 308, 315
14.6–11 311
14.20 62
18.8 121

Malachia
1.10 168
1.11 204
3.23 315

APOCRYPHA

Prayer of Eighteen Benedictions
12 340

Apocalypse of Abraham
1–8 333
15 326
16.3 327
19.5 327
21 327
23 338
23.5–6 339
30.5 327
30.3f. 339

Greek Apocalypse of Baruch
2–17 326
4 327
6.12–13 327
7.2 327
11.2 327

Syrian Apocalypse of Baruch
4.2–6 324
13.9f. 338
14 337
17 335
20.1–2 325
21.5 341
21.15f. 326
21.25 326
23.3 341
44.9 325
44.11f. 325
44.12 340
44.15 339
48.16 335
48.27 337
48.42f. 329
48.43 339
48.48 341
51.5 340
52.5–7 338
54.19 329
56.3 326
56.6 338
56.12 338
74.2–3 325
76.5 326
78.3 338
82.2–9 326
83.9 326
85.10 325
85.12 341

Apocalypse of Elijah
19.3 326

Apocalypse of Esdras
1.10–11 337
2 337
2.21 340
4.34 337
5.9 337
5.16 337
5.28 340
6.18–26 336

Apocalypse of Moses 11 335
15 338
20 335
24
28 335
31 331

Apocalypse of Shadrach
3.5 336
4.2 337
5.7 336
6.5–7 337
8.12 336
9.3 336
11 336

Apocalypse of Zephaniah pass. 326

Aristobulus
2.79 328

Artapanus
1 333
3.5–6 333

2 Esdras
2.20–21 332
3.19 36
3.21–22 329
4.12 337
4.21 331
4.26 325
4.30–32 329
4.40–42 326
5.33 337
5.50 325
7.25 337
7.30 325
7.33–34 340
7.38 339
7.48 339
7.58–60 340
7.62–66 337
7.76 341
7.103 341
7.106–111 190, 341
7.116 337
7.118–122 329
7.131 340
8.5 335
8.36 340
8.46ff. 338
8.47 340

8.50–51 340
9.15 339
13 330
13.26 329
13.32 329
13.37 329
13.52 329
14.10 325
14.46 326
16 325

3 Esdras
8.25 372

Eupolemus
1 333

Enoch (Greek)
14.8–25 327
40 327
43.4 328
48.6 329
62.7 329
80.2 325
93.16 325

Enoch (Ethiopic)
6–16 338
17–36 326
22 327
39.11 341
41 326
42.2 330
45.3 330
55.7 330
61–62 330
67 338
69.27 330
69.29 330
71
72–82 326
102.5 340
103 327
108.5 327
108.14–15 343

Enoch (Slavonic)
10 327
10.5 332
22.8 327
22.9 327
39.8 121
42 327
52 340
56.2 327
63.1–2
65 325

Assumption Mosis
7.1 325
11.7–8 332

Joseph and Asenath
23.9 333
28.12 333
28.14 333
29.3 333

Jubilees
2.17–33 328
2.18 328
6.32 328
11.16–17 328, 333
11.20–31 328
21.5–20 328
21.21–23 342
22.16 342
22.22 342
22–23 331
23.9 325
24.28–33 340
25 338
33.20 338
35.14 338
35.20 333
50.6–13 328

The Life of Adam and Eve
13–16 331
16 335
46 331

Pseudo-Philo
3.10 325

Psalms of Solomon
2.37–38 339
3.12–16 339
11.27 308
17.29 330

Testament of Adam 3 331

Testament of Abraham
8.16 339

Testament of Job
2–6 334
13.6 334
27.2 334
33 334
36.3 325
36.5 325

Testament of Isaac
2 335
5.9 328
7 327

Testament of Asher
1.4–5 329

Testament of Gad
4 333
6.1 333

Testament of Joseph
1 3331–10.4 332
17.2 333

Testament of Judah
20 329

Testament of Levi
2.10 328
3 326
3.9–10 331
5 328
8 328
8.11–14 328
18 1–5 330
18.6 330

Testament of Zebulun
4.8 333
10.3–4 339

QUMRAN WRITINGS

Thanksgiving Hymns
I.25–26 319
II.9–13 319
II.32, 34 319
IV.8 319
IV.29–30 319
IV.37 319
V.14.20–21 319
VII.28 319
VIII.26f. 319
VIII.34 320
IX.3f. 319

Community Rule
XI.2 319
XI9–15 319

Damascus Document
II.15–16 320
III.19 320
IV.15 320
VII.5 320

NEW TESTAMENT

Matthew
3.11 49
3.21f. 393
5.38f. 126
6.9 66
7.2 172
7.29 405
11.11 411
11.19 405
12.19 405
13.14–15 408
15.1–20 379
17.6 12, 121
19.27 173
23.23 379
23.34ff. 192
23.37–39 396
23.38 219
24.30 56
24.35 205
25 273, 307
25.6 414
26.28 397
26.54 236

Mark
9.6 12
13.1–2 372

Luke
1.7 224
1.49 66
2.35 398
4.18f. 202
5.8 13
7.32 270
9.32 12
9.62 233
12.50 49
13.33b 235
16.1–9 126
19.30f. 405
24.26 406
24.44f. 406

John
1.1f. 205
1.14 19
1.51 45, 196
2.21 411
4.14 147
5.37–38 41
6.55 400
7.37 147
12.28 66
13 399
17.4 66
17.26 66

Acts of the Apostles
2 199
2.17–21 233
7.2 19
7.55 19
7.56 264
9.4 12
9.9 12
10.34 352
14.15–17 202
17 19
26.14 14

Romans
1.18–21 19

1.19–20 85
1.20 57
1.23 57, 98, 100, 145, 258
2.11 352
5.12 101
5.15–21 400
8.20 143
9.20 89
9–11 354, 408
10.6–8 58
11 396
13.4 394

1 Corinthians
1 245
1.18–31 130
1.30 16
5.7 394
8.3 73
11.7–12 100
11.25 397
13.12 73
15.4 406
15.28 176

2 Corinthians
3 19, 25, 409
3.7 39
3.10 44
3.16 405
4.4 103
4.6 39
5.11 73
8.9 16
11.2 186
13.13 404

Galatians
2.20 181
4.9 73

Ephesians
1.14 25
1.23 413
3.18–19 21
3.19 10
4.24 102

Philippians
2.9 64
2.11 103
3.12 73

Colossians
1.11 57
1.15–16 103
2.9 15
3.10 102

1 Timothy
2.13 89

Hebrews
1.1–3 10
1.3 102
2.6–10 98
9.14–15 16
10.12f. 413
11.39f. 405
12.29 47

1 John
1.5 66
3.12 393
3.15 393

James
2.21–23 205, 398

Revelations
1.13–16 14
1.17 12, 121
2.17 64
4.1 264
4.3 86
4.4 208
7.17 147
10.1 86
15.4 62
17.16 137
17–18 219
18 147
21.10–11 311
22.17 147

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
3 9015 02080 0556

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN · LIBRARIES ·
1817

THE GLORY OF THE LORD

Hans Urs von Balthasar

THE GLORY OF THE LORD:
A THEOLOGICAL AESTHETICS

By Hans Urs von Balthasar

VOLUMES OF THE COMPLETE WORK

Edited by Joseph Fessio, S.J., and John Riches

1. SEEING THE FORM
2. STUDIES IN THEOLOGICAL STYLE: CLERICAL STYLES
3. STUDIES IN THEOLOGICAL STYLE: LAY STYLES
4. THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN ANTIQUITY
5. THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN THE MODERN AGE
6. THEOLOGY: THE OLD COVENANT
7. THEOLOGY: THE NEW COVENANT

The publishers gratefully acknowledge the support of the Pro Helvetia Foundation in the preparation of the English translation.

THE GLORY OF THE LORD

A THEOLOGICAL AESTHETICS

BY

HANS URS VON BALTHASAR

VOLUME VII: THEOLOGY: THE NEW COVENANT

Translated by Brian McNeil C.R.V.
Edited by John Riches

T & T CLARK, 59 GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH

GKHD
BT
78
.B193
1982
V.7

Copyright © T & T Clark Ltd, 1989
T & T Clark Ltd, 59 George Street, Edinburgh EH2 2LQ, Scotland

Authorised English Translation of Herrlichkeit: Eine theologische Ästhetik, Band III, 2:
Theologie, Teil 2: Neuer Bund
Copyright © Johannes Verlag, Einsiedeln, 1969

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of T & T Clark Ltd.

First Published 1989

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Balthasar, Hans Urs von, 1905
The glory of the Lord.
Vol. 7: Theology: The New Covenant.
1. Christian theology
I. Title
230

ISBN 0 567 09525 8

Typeset by C. R. Barber & Partners (Highlands) Ltd, Fort William Printed and Bound in Great Britain by Billing & Sons Ltd, Worcester

GL.
175-015X
CREL/
4-5-90
PREV. VOL

CONTENTS

VOLUME VII
THEOLOGY: THE NEW COVENANT

Preface 9
Introduction 11

I. VERBUM CARO FACTUM

1. Prelude 33
  a. The fragments of the old covenant 33
  b. Drawing together and handing over: the Baptist 40
  c. Jesus makes his appearance: recapitulation 54
2. Orientation 77
  a. Centre of the Word in what is not a word 77
  b. The subject who receives 89
  c. On the form of theology 103
3. Word-Flesh 115
  a. The claim 115
  b. Poverty 129
  c. Self-abandonment 142
4. Momentum of Time 162
  a. The time of Jesus 162
  b. The time of the Church 175
  c. The time of discipleship 188
5. Momentum of the Cross 202
  a. The collision 202
  b. Kenosis 211
  c. Hell 228

II. VIDIMUS GLORIAM EIUS

1. The Request for Glorification 239
  a. Father, glorify me 244
  b. The Spirit will glorify me 250

c. I am glorified in them 255
2. The Substance of Glory 264
a. Essence and word 264
b. Appearing and image 273
c. Correspondence 296
3. Hiddenness 318
a. Hidden life 318
b. Hidden Easter 354
c. Hidden love 374

III. IN LAUDEM GLORIAE

1. Glorification as Assimilation and Return of the Gift 389
a. Trinitarian self-giving 391
b. Appropriation as Expropriation 399
c. Giving back the fruit to God 415
2. The Brother for whom Christ died 432
a. Encountering God in one's brother 434
b. Solidarity 458
c. Nuptiality 470
3. Setting out towards God 485
a. The transition 486
b. The hope of glory 507
c. The possible impossibility 526

Index of Names 544
Index of Biblical References 550

In a sense which is proper to him alone, God in his relation with the world truly experiences 'fate'. And he is indeed of such a kind that he can experience it. And the fact of this his ability to experience fate is his ultimate glory. It is identical with that glory which consists in his being 'love'. For this reason the Cross is the symbol above all symbols. Whoever impugns it, condemns the world to unintelligibility.

GUARDINI

PREFACE

The previous volume did not seek to offer an approximately complete theology of the Old Testament, but rather to shed light on the essence of this covenant from the viewpoint of 'glory'; in the same way, and a fortiori, this volume cannot be rounded theology of the new covenant. Like the previous volume, it opens up only an approach-road to such a theology, passing through the gateway of 'glory'; and because of the disposition of the material here, this volume must accept the necessity of opening up an approach-road to the approach-road in a lengthy first part, for otherwise 'glory' might be understood only to cover what is explicitly so termed in the texts of the New Testament. Nothing complete can be offered on the level of the individual theologies of the biblical authors, nor on the level of a synthesis of biblical theology, nor on any level of what in the post-biblical period is called ecclesiastical or dogmatic theology. One may also fear that the present volume will appear methodologically imprecise to the reader who is a professional theologian—indeed, that it will strike him as hopelessly amateurish, for many dividing-lines that have become customary are not observed (they are frequently a hindrance, when one wishes to have an overview of the whole phenomenon which is being treated), and yet no final synthesis can be constructed. We clear the path for ourselves through the undergrowth, as well as we can; for us, it is more important to get at all costs a point from which we can see the essential matter, than to lay down orderly roads that lead to that point. For this reason, even less of the scholarly literature that abounds on all sides will be quoted in this volume than in the preceding volumes: we shall restrict ourselves to indicating a few useful works, as these present themselves to our notice.

It is considerably harder to clear a path in the new covenant to the prospect we seek, than in the old covenant; the latter unfolds in a history that can be followed clearly through centuries, but the new covenant bunches everything together into the shortest space of time, in the midpoint of which stands the breakdown-point which can be delimited in external chronology as the 'Triduum Mortis', but which internally means that time has come to an end and that there is a new beginning such that all temporal categories of 'end', 'midpoint', and 'beginning' are shattered; and this means that not only the main subject (the theological content of the fate of Jesus), but also the position of the existentially involved observer (the Christian who seeks to understand his faith, in order to live it), slip away at the very point where they ought to be made secure. But it is not our concern to get a secure place to stand, but rather to get sight of what cannot be securely grasped, and this must remain the event of Jesus Christ; woe to the Christian who would not stand daily speechless before this event! If this event truly is what the church believes, then it can be mastered through no methodology; the manner in which this book speaks can be excused only by this axiom.

We shall not 'analyse' a 'concept'—the concept of glory—but rather we shall integrate a cipher for the whole into this totality. Our concern is to make a synthesis; therefore the last theology of the New Testament, the Johannine theology, will always be the vanishing-point, the point towards which we are travelling—though all the theologies of the New Testament remain open both forwards (into the meditation of the church, which can never be brought to its end) and upwards (to God). The future and the final opening-out are important for us, and not the categories which are to be integrated in the phase of development (for in this phase these were as yet only source, material, and presupposition for what comes at the end). There is one single thing that aims through all to express itself: we pursue it, without fancying to ourselves that we have grasped it wholly (Phil 3.12f).

INTRODUCTION

1. We make ready with nervousness to scale the final slope, the ascent which was the goal of all the earlier advances forward. For now everything which could be considered and expressed in isolation hitherto, collapses into a single whole with such decisiveness that in the presence of this unity, all are robbed of breath and speech. As long as God 'spoke in fragmentary and varied fashion' (Heb 1.1), and the 'form' of his revelation stretched out 'in temporal fashion'[1] through the extension of our history, and thus led us forward in a pedagogy by stages (Gal 3.24; 4.2), it was possible to believe that one could follow this; but at the end, all distinctions, aspects, concepts, signs, images, words, and periods subside into one another in a transcending 'fullness', in the One 'in whom the whole fullness of the deity dwells bodily' (Col 1.19), who receives 'the entire inheritance' (Heb 1.2), and in whom accordingly the previous distinction between the archetype of divine glory and its reflection on the human image, and finally the reciprocity between archetype and image in the glory of the covenant of grace,[2] is bypassed and dissolved, so that the One of whom we must now speak becomes in an unheard-of manner the joint founder of all periods, and indeed the 'effulgence of the glory' and 'imprint of the substance' of God himself (Heb 1.3). Nevertheless, God does not destroy the work which he has begun, like a Shiva who destroys the world in his dance: rather, he perfects in the identity of the 'person' of the One the 'distinction without mingling of natures'. It is far more difficult to hold on to this in thought, than to maintain a final commingling of everything or even only a Hegelian progressive 'resolution' of the differences into the synthesis. But the man, who represents God and is God, just as he represents the world and is the world, has his time and then dies; but he rises too, with his history, his time, his death, and his world, into the eternal life of God—everything depends on this, otherwise 'your faith is in vain' (1 Cor 15.14)—and thus what is not identical coincides, and yet is thereby preserved in its particularity. We recognise that in this, the basic laws of that which we have presented as 'transcendental aesthetics' in its history and its substance, fulfil and transcend themselves:[3] we recognise that a 'form' is the more valuable in the degree that it becomes more transparent for the light of absolute being.[4] But this general 'metaphysical' law is so superabundantly fulfilled through the unique event, the initiative of which lies in God's absolute freedom, that it is totally subjected to criticism: the One, whose name is Jesus Christ, must go down into the absolute contradiction of the glory of the Lord, into the night of abandonment by God and the formless chaos of Hell, so that, beyond everything that man can see as form, he may be and establish the imperishable and indivisible form which joins God and the world in the new and eternal covenant.

---

[1] On the temporal character of forms, cf. Vol IV, p. 33.

[2] Cf. the principal chapter headings of Vol. VI and Vol. IV pp. 23f.

Here we must describe the ineffable final matter of the definitive meeting which unites God and man (the world), and here least of all can we forgo the concept of 'form',[5] although we are well aware of the fact of its excessive employment. We are confirmed in this by the language of the New Testament.[6] But here most of all do we need the 'vision of the form'[7] with the 'eyes of faith' (Augustine), the oculata fides ('faith that has eyes', Thomas Aquinas), the 'enlightened eyes of the heart' (Eph 1.18), because only a 'simple eye' (Mt 6.22 par.) is able to perceive something of the simplicity achieved by all multiplicity in the final form of revelation. It is for this reason that those 'poor in spirit' and the 'pure', emptied 'hearts' are blessed most of all in the new covenant, for only they will see God in this form and possess his kingdom.[8] Such a simplicity of the eye, allowing the decisive perception, presupposes the unity of the act of seeing and the act of living, which Adolf Schlatter lays down as the fundamental postulate of the act of theological recognition, in that the act of living (the obedience to the revelation which is brought about in man through the revelation) is the basis of the act of seeing.[9] This seeing, which by God's grace brings no blinding of the human spirit through an immoderate light, but gives it the capacity to stand firm in the presence of the infinite simplicity, has as its first effect on man a sinking down in adoration before the glory; but at the same time, it is the strongest impulse for the subsequent thinking that converts what is seen into action, for the unity of the form offers a fullness of approaches, doors and possibilities for entry. For the Word has become flesh, and calls men and women to discipleship. The theology of the New Testament develops, without any possibility of being brought to a close, from the final form, and is so determined and held together by this form that it cannot degenerate into what is vague, relative, or contradictory. The subject of theology is not to be 'mastered' gradually by the understanding through a series of approximations that circle round the subject: rather, every approach in thought is continually 'judged' anew by the absolute superiority of the subject. For this subject is the absolute trinitarian love of God, which discloses itself and offers itself in Jesus Christ, which disarms by its humility and simplicity every 'stronghold' of would-be mastering thought that 'rises up' (2 Cor 10.5). Jesus opposes the despised child to that which thought attempts to devise as the 'greatest' (Mk 9.34), and the way that leads to Jesus and to the God who sends him is the acceptance of this 'least one' 'in my name'. Thus the simplicity of God 'judges' all human thoughts that strive upward above themselves to attain the utmost, and requires of them something that they can accomplish only in self-denial: 'to know the love of Christ which surpasses all knowledge' (Eph 3.19). 'This knowledge knows something that is finally unknowable, because it is beyond the scope of knowledge in its boundlessness.'[10]

---

[3] Cf. Vol. IV, pp. 000.

[4] Ibid., p. 000.

[5] One may compare the analogous use which Gerhard Koch makes of the same concept in his work Die Auferstehung Jesu Christi (2nd edn. 1965), and my discussion of him in Mysterium Fidei Vol. III (1969; separately printed as Theologie der drei Tage, 1969).

[6] Cf. the second section in this Volume.

[7] Vol. I of this work.

[8] Cf. my 'Der Glaube der Einfältigen', in: Spiritus Creator, Skizzen zur Theologie III (1967), pp. 51–75; Einfaltungen (Kosel-Verlag, 1969).

---

[9] Die Entstehung der Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie (1920, BFChTh 25, 1), p. 58. Cf. W. Lütgert, Adolf Schlatter als Theologe (BFChTh 37, 1, 1932); U. Luck, Kerygma und Tradition der Hermeneutik Adolf Schlatters (1955, AFLNW 45).

2. If this were not so, then the form that offers itself would certainly not be the self-revelation of God. Si comprehendis, non est Deus: 'If you understand, it is not God. If, in accordance with Anselm's formula, God is id quo maius cogitari nequit, 'that than which nothing greater can be thought', and thus is the horizon of the absolute freedom of love that is a vault rising above every insight into the necessitates of the revelation, then this same formula and structure apply also to his final revelation in Christ. This allows us to employ, in what follows, here and there a certain methodological argumentation a priori, which is not the same as Anselm's, but analogous to this. This consists in bracketing off provisionally at the start the historical revelation in Christ in its historicity, and taking this as a phenomenological eidos, in order to go on to establish whether and how this surpasses and judges every possible human sketch of thought in philosophy and religion; not that the eidos wins a narrow, fortuitous victory in this, but that it soars up every time in absolute superiority. To give a decisive example: every endeavour of thought to explain the existence of a contingent world 'alongside' the (by definition) self-sufficient Absolute fails, unless the cosmos is the product of a fundamental goodness that pours itself out without jealousy (Plato, Plotinus), yet the cosmos cannot depend on a determination of God to choose the best possible model of a world (Leibniz), but can depend only on the unfathomable freedom of his love; but it is never truly clear in the Old Testament how this God can be free love, not needing his worldly partner (Israel)—hence man's repeated rebellions against this apparent contradiction in his image of God. The final obscurity disappears only when God discloses his inmost heart, his trinitarian love, in Jesus Christ, his love that raises him above all bracketing-together with the world, but gives the world its right to existence by taking it up into the eternally flowing dialogue of love. Just as it is an aprioristic insight that outside of being only nothing can exist, so it is an aprioristic 'insight' that it is impossible to think of a deeper justification of being than this, which leaves untouched the essence of God and that of the world (the analogia entis), and possesses no capacity to make deductions, but permits everything to open out into the unfathomable freedom of love. The arguments of New Testament theology all have this structure: they point to an unsurpassable rightness, without giving reasons for the articulations of the form of revelation in accordance with the style of human logic through 'necessities', for the whole form has its being, fresh in every single one of its articulations, in the element of free love.

---

[10] H. Schlier, Epheser (1957), p. 175.

The philosophical analogy of the difference between being and what is, between the transcendental and the categorical, can for this reason not be applied to the relationship between the God who reveals himself and the form of his revelation, for it is in the unique form, and only in it, that the mystery of the 'super-form' within the Godhead, of the Trinity as absolute love and thereby as the 'essence' of God, is made known. Although God does not need the form of Jesus Christ in order to be the perfect triune God in himself, and thus does not achieve his own full reality through the world, there is nothing accidental attached to his act of making himself known in Jesus Christ: what seems to us to be 'the accidental truth of history' is the revelation of his absolute freedom, as this is in God himself, the freedom of eternal self-giving out of unfathomable love. This absolute love is not determined in advance by any 'nature' in the eternal Father which would 'make it necessary' for him to beget the eternal Son; and in both there is no natural compulsion to make their love known to one another in the procession of the Spirit. This absolute freedom of the love within the Godhead is poured out over the entire form of revelation, gives it its being and structure, and is present in it. From this point, we may sense anew—indeed, in reality we may sense for the first time, after all our preliminary labours, what ultimately the divine glory is, what 'the light of knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ' is (2 Cor 4.6). From this, it becomes clear in advance that theological methodology—always presupposing the 'eyes of faith', in which this act of enlightenment takes place—can never be genuinely deductive (for otherwise it subjects the freedom of the form to the laws of human thought), but inductive, in the sense intended by Newman: it shows the 'convergence' of the lines and paths of discernment (what we termed above 'rightnesses') on the single focal point of surpassing brightness, where the glory flares out. This is the methodology which folds inwards in simplicity towards the divine simplicity. It may be that one chiefly sees the unutterable simplicity of the divine glory poured out over the whole form, as Greek theology above all can see this, remaining therefore predominantly, a 'symbolic' theology that looks on every detail in its transparency to the glowing centre-point of the epiphany of God; or it may be that one continually strikes out by the diligence of reasoning along the paths that lead from the separate articulations to the midpoint, as Western theology loves to do, that it itself may understand better and open up more paths of insight to others. The methodologies can and must complement each other. Without the look that carries one off to the midpoint, and away from the midpoint again, nothing on the peripheries will be comprehensible.

Illustre quiddam cernimus,
Quod nesciat finem pati,
Sublime, celsum, interminum,
Antiquius caelo et chao.[11]

3. Accordingly, what we have called in this work 'theological aesthetics',[12] taken by us both to be the criticism and the surpassing fulfilment of the 'philosophical' transcendent

---

[11] 'We behold something illustrious that cannot undergo an end—lofty, heavenly, infinite, older than heaven, older than primordial chaos.'
Vespers hymn on the Feast of the Transfiguration of Christ (6 August).

[12] Vol. IV, pp. 000.

aesthetics, must be fulfilled likewise in the final self-disclosure of the glory of God in the New Testament. If for a moment we take the word 'beauty' in a naive ambiguity that leaves open all the possibilities of its employment, then we may say that a ray of beauty has been poured out over the whole New Testament, with all its austerity, sobriety and terrribleness. One will see this beauty only when the core of everything is recognised to be the free love of God that justifies man. It is the beauty of God, in opposition to corruptible and human beauty (Jas 1.10 = 1 Pet 1.24), and so any mythologisation of the beauty of Christ or of the children of God is strictly avoided.[13] But as there is already always an element of joy in ἀγαπᾶν,[14] so a fortiori in the frequent verb ἀγαλλιᾶν, 'to exult in joy' in the presence of the hope that lies wide open in the present fulfilment and looks to the 'imperishable, undefiled and unfading inheritance in heaven' (1 Pet 1.4), which is promised and of which indeed the 'first instalment' has already been paid; the phrase of 1 Peter 'suggère une merveilleuse beauté'.[15] 'Peter' ventures therefore to use two expressions of an unheard-of force, when he says that the believers already now 'rejoice with unutterable and exalted joy' (1 Pet 1.8)[16] in the presence of their hope, and when he says precisely to those who suffer for the name of Christ that 'the Spirit of glory, the Spirit of God rests upon' them (1 Pet 4.14),[17] here again in a proleptic eschatological sense, as 4.13 shows. This presence of what belongs to the future is the true source of beauty in the New Testament; only in a secondary manner, deriving from this, is the contemplation of the harmonious correspondence between 'promise and fulfilment', old covenant and new, a source of beauty. If what is new were not new in itself, then what is old would not be capable of being brought into relation with it.[18] [13] Cf. RSR 55 (1967), pp. 483, 485, 493f., 503, 506.

---

[14] C. Spicq, Les Epîtres de Saint Pierre (1966); 'Grâce et Beauté', in: Théologie morale du N.T. Vol. I (1965), pp. 146–153.

[15] Ibid., p. 46.

[16] The verse is not to be referred to the future heavenly joy, but to the present which lives in a tension that looks towards this future and is illuminated by it. The light of the heavenly glorification falls from the very beginning into temporal existence.

[17] The text is not wholly secure, but even in this form it corresponds to other New Testament statements. K. H. Schelkle, Die Petrusbriefe, der Judasbrief (1961), p. 124.

Let us leave to one side the innumerable passages from Catholic tradition which praise the beauty of the New Testament revelation; an excessive criticism delights in accusing these statements of aestheticism and of falling away from the inexorable quality of the words and deeds of Jesus.[19] Let us leave to one side likewise Romantic theology,[20] which may on occasion fall prey to the judgment of Kierkegaard. There is, however, a path leading back from Kierkegaard, along which even Protestant theology may be able to recognise anew the dimension of beauty in the New Testament. E. W. Gulin[21] holds that for John, the grace that we receive from Jesus has left behind an impression comparable to 'the sights in the world of beauty which, once seen, can never again disappear from the soul'. Johannes Weiss[22] describes the deeply moved and persuasive form in which the Gospels were able to mirror the figure of Jesus, as something 'artistic', which presupposes in those who execute the portrait the same receptivity that belongs 'only to a selfless and pure heart, whose sight is obscured by no vanity nor greed' in the presence of the beautiful. And if the church is formed and wholly determined by the free love of God in Christ, then how significant appears the observation of Dietrich Bonhoeffer in his letters from prison: 'Perhaps—it almost seems so, today—it is only the concept of the church that will be the source of the rediscovery of the free space for the freedom of art, education, friendship, and play—so that one should not banish the 'aesthetic existence' (Kierkegaard) from the realm of the church, but precisely give it new foundation in the church?'[23] [18] H. de Lubac, Histoire et Espirit (1950), p. 284.

---

[19] A characteristic example of the filling-out of the concept 'aesthetic' with negative values (or values appraised as negative) is H. Weinel, 'Jesus und die ästhetische Religion' (in: Bibl. Theol. d. N.T, 2nd edn. 1913, §8), who equates 'aesthetic' with 1. apocalyptic, 2. organisational, 3. ascetic, 4. sacramental, and 5. mystical.

[20] One can take an example W. M. L. de Wette, for whom belief in the divinity of Christ 'is of ideally aesthetic quality and belongs to pious feeling' (Dogmatik der ev.-luth. Kirche, 2nd edn. 1821, p. 129); cf. Bibl. Dogmatik Alten und Neuen Testaments (2nd edn. 1818), pp. 18f.

[21] Die Freude im Neuen Testament, II (Helsinki 1936), p. 29.

[22] Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments (3rd edn. 1917), p. 67.

Such initial steps find their full form in Karl Barth's isolated treatise on God's glory and (therein) his beauty, as the appropriate conclusion to the doctrine of God's freedom and love.[24] Speaking generally, God's glory is, first, 'the dignity and justification proper to God, not only to assert that he is who he is, but to demonstrate this and to make it known . . ., in a certain measure, to make it obvious and not to be overlooked'; second, to 'obtain acknowledgment' for himself; and this, third, with divine power. Glory is therefore 'God himself in the truth, in the capacity, in the act in which he makes himself known as God', and he does this by loving. This commences indeed in the various manners of the Old Testament kabod, but comes to fulfilment first in Christ, who represents the 'glory of God' because on the one hand he is the perfect image of the glory of the Father (therefore, trinitarian glory), and on the other hand represents 'the archetype of all creaturely participation in the glory of God': 'The kabod has received this midpoint, this concrete form, this name.' This is 'what is new in the New Testament', and it stands obviously in the context of the doctrine of the love of God. If one goes on to ask what the essence of God's glory is, then a first correct answer (in the old dogmatic theologians) can run: 'It is the embodiment, become visible, of all divine perfection': 'Gloria Dei est essentialis eius maiestas' ('The glory of God is the majesty that belongs to his essence', Polanus). It is possible, however, to define this majesty more closely? Should one describe the brilliance of the δόξα indirectly, starting from its reflection, the δοξάζειν that responds to it, the exultant praise of the creatures, as the angels perpetually offer this, and as we too ought to offer it? Barth attempts a more direct reply, by posing the question of the 'form and figure' of the revelation.[25] Thereby, he comes up against the concept of beauty, which he situates theologically against aestheticism, after carefully marking the boundary lines: 'We speak of the beauty of God only to help in the explanation of his glory', which 'in any case also includes, and brings to expression, that which we term beauty'. Taking his starting point from the Augustinian and scholastic concept of the fruitio Dei, which is drawn from scripture,[26] he establishes, with Augustine: 'Things are not beautiful because they give delight; they give delight, because they are beautiful' (Ver. Rel. 32, 59). Transposed to speak of God, this implies: 'God is not God because he is beautiful; he is beautiful because he is God'. A biblical-theological aesthetics, therefore, cannot orient itself upon any general ('metaphysical') concept of beauty, but must obtain its idea of beauty from God's unique self-disclosure in Christ, whereby this unique event which 'breaks through every system', simultaneously transcends, criticises, and brings to fulfilment general aesthetic concepts.[27] Instead of offering an aesthetics that runs through the entire Dogmatics, Barth offers three central examples, which receive their evidential power from the third. First, God's essence is beautiful and perfect in its 'form', because in him, in a unique and superabundant manner, 'the wonderful unity—now puzzling, now clear in itself—of identity and not-identity, of simplicity and multiplicity, of inner and outer, of God himself and the fullness of that which he is as God', of 'movement and peace', makes itself known; because, unlike any worldly essence, he is identical in his whole being with this form of his. Second, this becomes more visible at a deeper level, in the Trinity of God, the 'making concrete' of his freedom and love, and thereby also of his 'unity of identity and not-identity'. In God, there are 'sequence and order', there is 'relationship' and 'therefore form', but this form is once again one with his freedom, love and beatitude: 'to this extent, the Trinity of God is the mystery of his beauty'. Third, however, the Trinity first comes into view for us with the Incarnation as the 'centre and goal, and thus also the hidden beginning of all God's ways'; and this is Incarnation

---

[23] Widerstand und Ergebung (1951), p. 136 (letter of 23.1.1944).

[24] Kirchliche Dogmatic II/1 (1940), pp. 722–762.

[25] Ibid., p. 733.

[26] Texts on pp. 737–738.
[27] Ibid., pp. 739, 742.

in the man who bears the sins, who has 'neither form nor beauty', in whom God seemingly enters what is the opposite of himself, and yet: 'precisely thus does he set in action and confirm his unity with himself. Along this path he reveals his glory. So deeply does God distinguish himself from himself.' He is 'one, and not imprisoned and bound to be only one; identical with himself, and yet free to be another . . ., not in tension, dialectic, paradox and contradiction', but in 'this beautiful form that awakens joy'. 'The beauty of God' in the 'beauty of Jesus Christ' appears therefore precisely in the crucified, but the crucified, precisely as such, is the one risen: 'in this self-disclosure, God's beauty embraces death as well as life, fear as well as joy, that which we would call ugly, as well as that which we would call beautiful'. And precisely in this highest self-disclosure is seen the truth of the first description of glory: to be the self-demonstration of his love in truth and power in all the works of God, which is then able, in the gift of the Holy Spirit, to bring about the response of glorificatio from the creation, in 'looking away from oneself' and looking to Christ, in whom glory and glorification become absolutely one. The place in which such glorification is permitted to give its thanks is 'the form of the church, of the proclamation, the faith, the confession, the theology, the prayer', a genuine and therefore beautiful form, the fullness of which remains in this age as yet hidden from the Church itself: 'That is the limit of this form'. We have sketched here the outline of Karl Barth in our introduction, not only because it agrees with our own overall plan, especially as regards the relationship between glory and beauty, but also because it offers at the beginning an overview that we ourselves can approach only slowly. We must take the path of those rudes and incipientes who 'at the start are not able to see the light of beauty', as Origen says, and rise up to become 'lovers of his beauty' only when they are 'perfect'.[28] This path can be described by means of a mysteriously obscure utterance of Jesus in the Gospel of Thomas: 'The images are revealed to man, but the light that is in them is concealed in the image of the light of the Father. This light will reveal itself, and then will his image be concealed in his light'.[29] The final turn of phrase may be gnostic; the general trend of the logion remains correct. It confirms once again that there is no seeing without being caught up: as Christ (the 'image') is 'caught up' to the Father (in the Resurrection, and proleptically in the Transfiguration), in order to reveal fully the radiance of God through the form of the image, so we must look away from ourselves, in order to be able to 'reflect with unveiled face the glory of the Lord, being changed into his likeness' (2 Cor 3.18).

---

[28] In Matthaeum ser. 32 (GCS XI, 58).

4. We have already said that no complete theology of the new covenant will be presented here. Everything is ordered around the guiding concept of glory, and has been selected with a view to this; it is only here, as Karl Barth showed, that this concept attains its fullness. No concept ready to hand, whether drawn from metaphysics or from the Old Testament, is, therefore, capable of determining the path of the enquiry. At most, themes broached in the old covenant can point in a certain direction, but in each case a total transposition into the tonality of the new covenant will be required. In the Bible, fulfilment is never attainable through a plurality of promises: it is new creation. This is doubly relevant for our theme, when one recalls the inner gradient that the concept must travel in the old covenant: starting from the experience of the momentum of a presence forcing itself upon the attention both of the spirit and of the senses, the experience of an immense subject making itself known in an immediately physical and elemental manner, with a freedom and vitality in its address and in the claim it makes that obtain for itself a right hearing from the very beginning—then through the many images that branch out to portray such a presence of God, in original prophetic experiences, but also in the adoption of mythological forms of expression in the composition of the poetry of the Psalms, going as far as a certain cultic formalism which, in the historical narratives of the priestly writers, takes what may not be tidily controlled and domesticates it to the very boundary of controllability; until finally, after the exile, the accumulated use of the concept reveals a loss of experience of the reality, but at the same time an increased longing and a need for it. At this point, there is almost an anticipation of Paul's insight: 'All have sinned, and must do without the glory of God' (Rom 3.23). This was the intermediate period between the departure of God's glory from the temple (Ezek 9.3; 10.18; 11.22f.) and its return, awaited for the messianic period (Ezek 43.2ff.; Ps 85.10: 'Surely our salvation is at hand . . . and God's glory will dwell in our land'; cf. Is 40.3–5). And thus, those who must do without the glory do indeed grope in all directions like blind men, seeking to have a share once again in the glory that has vanished—they look to the temporal future, which always means, for the Jew, the imminent expectation of the End, but the promises of the Second and Third Isaiah, for all their urgency, are not fulfilled; they look to the heights of Heaven, torn open by apocalyptic, first in the vision of the Son of Man in Dan 7 and then in an obscure pious literature which promises mystical insights into the glory of Heaven and of the world to come, and thereby underlines yet again the deprivation in the present world. Finally, they look to the breadth of the cosmos, where the teachers of wisdom see God's word and wisdom 'gloriously' at work; but it is characteristic enough that Jesus Sirach modulates from his praise of the glory of God in the Creation into a melancholy look backwards from a period without history to the epoch of the great heroes of God's dealings with Israel, and the final note is sounded in the lost splendour of the high priest Simon, the distinctively Old Testament splendour of figurative sacredness.

---

[29] 'Apokryphe Evangelien', in: Schneemelcher, Apokr. N.T., Vol. I, p. 220; Jean Doresse, L'Evangile selon Thomas (1959) Logion 87, p. 107.

Thus the kabod of the Old Testament, its doxa, displays a downward slope accompanied by a decrease in power, the force and evidentness of its presence decline with the frequency with which it is named and the urgency with which it is demanded. It is true that the broadening of horizons which occurs in the post-exilic period—messianically, into the future; apocalyptically, into Heaven; sapientially, into the entire cosmos and thereby into the history of the peoples of the world—became a foundation, indispensable in the history of salvation, for the fulfilment in the New Testament;[30] but so far are they from leading over without a break in continuity into the fulfilment, that they themselves tear open the gulf between old and new covenants through their inner exhaustion which brought them to their end. Thus Paul sees more deeply than the usual philological history of concepts, when he puts an adversative πολλῷ μᾶλλον, 'how much the more', a qualitative advance upwards ὑπερβάλλουσα δόξα, as a dividing-line between the glory of the 'dispensation of death, carved in letters on stone' that is indeed a 'dispensation of condemnation', and the glory of the 'dispensation of the Spirit' and 'dispensation of justification' (2 Cor 3.7–11). This radical caesura between the sphere of the promise and the sphere of the fulfilment makes it questionable whether we should simply follow the guiding-line of philology; is it not rather our task first of all to consider the matter itself, which may then subsequently draw the old expression to itself, though filled now with new content? Even in the old covenant, there is no doubt that the matter existed before the word was coined. This was a matter that could not be sufficiently contained in any word—for who can ever say what the kabod of God is?—but was continually devalued, the more the word became a coin in daily use. On the level of fulfilment, then, we must indeed expect that God's act, in which his aim is to present himself definitively and establish his definitive covenant, will not join on to the end of the old covenant, but will have a new beginning from the origins, and will thereby reveal what he truly intended in his first initiative, while everything else remains as if bracketed off ('the law came in addition', Rom 5.20), and must remain in brackets for the sake of true comprehension. This is the theological rationale which makes Paul leap over Moses to unite faith in Christ with the faith of Abraham. More importantly for us, this is the reason why the Synoptic Gospels begin by portraying the event of Jesus without using the concept of 'glory' (in a present sense), by setting the beginning wholly afresh at the point where God's act of making himself present had begun: with the momentum of the presence, of the subject that forces its way forward and makes its own impression and expression; they begin with his force and authority, which especially in Mark calls forth anew the elementary terror before God at the foot of Sinai (ἐκπλήσσειν, a stupefied being beside oneself through terror: Mk 1.22; 6.2; 11.18; intensified through περισσῶς at 10.26, through ὑπερπερισσῶς at 7.37). Only after the pause that the Synoptists have thus inserted, can John consider the transposition as fully achieved, and lay claim once more to the word doxa wholly for the New Testament glory (Jn 1.14): so much so, that he explains the vision of Isaiah in the Temple (and thus the doxa of the old covenant) as a proleptic seeing of the glory of Christ (12.41). Analogously, Luke too has the two great seers of the divine glory in the Old Testament themselves appear 'in glory' on Tabor (Lk 9.31), but then he has them wrapped together with Christ in the cloud of the kabod, which identifies him as the Son. With this return to the beginning, however, we are not taken back to Sinai, to the dialectic of fire and smoke, lightning and cloud, light and darkness, but to an origin that lies much further back (ἀρχή, Jn 1.1), to that which was the true purpose of God's disclosure in all the previous revelation of glory: his trinitarian love. The dialectic of the Old Testament signs, accessible to the senses, was not simply a 'concession' by God to man's sensible nature, when considered in this light, but rather a path that led to the Incarnation, where the eternal love will press forward in yet another way, quite differently—by bringing all the fear of God, indeed all the rejecting judgment of God into accomplishment, in order to demonstrate his truest glory in 'having mercy on all' (Rom 11.32).

---

[30] III/2,1, pp. 337-345.

The structure of this volume is determined by this insight, that a pause for contemplation is inserted in order to mark out the distance between the glory of the Old Testament and the glory of the New, a pause that requires the return to the original signification. First we must speak of the matter itself, which bears the name not of 'glory', but of Jesus Christ; then we must follow on to speak of the application of the affirmation of glory to him and to all that concerns him; and third, we must speak of the response of the world, as this is changed in the New Testament—the glorification of the glory. In the first part, therefore, where the explicit assertion remains bracketed off, we are nevertheless also centrally in the presence of the theme (philologically speaking, of the original significance of kabod as imposing momentum), of the body, so to speak, which will then be clothed in the garments of light (Mk 9.3).

In conclusion, something else will become clear. In the 'teaching on seeing' of the first volume ('seeing the form'), the term 'aesthetics' was taken in the Kantian sense as teaching about perception; whereas we must understand it now, at the conclusion of the 'teaching on rapture', as the self-disclosure of the glory of God (his theological beauty). In this way we see definitively what the first volume stressed in many ways in the teaching on subjective and objective evidence, that the form established by God bears its evidential force in itself and is able of itself to show this to the eyes of faith: but it is precisely this power to assert oneself, to demonstrate oneself, and to achieve acceptance for oneself, that belongs to the most original meaning of the biblical glory of God (as Karl Barth has shown above). Thus, 'seeing' and 'being caught up out of oneself' are not wholly separate, but are most closely involved in each other;[31] fundamentally theology and dogmatics are not separable. If we have truly seen Christ, then we have also, in whatever manner, seen 'his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father' (Jn 1.14).[32]

---

[31] Vol. I, pp. 125f.

[32] The first part is based to a large extent on previous works by the author which have prepared the ground: Theologie der Geschichte (4th edn. 1959 ET A Theology of History, 1963), 'Gott redet als Mensch', in Verbum Caro (1960), pp. 73–99 (ET Essays in Theology I. Word and Revelation, 1964, pp. 87–119), Glaubhaft ist nur Liebe (1963 ET Love Alone: The Way of Revelation, 1968), Zuerst Gottes Reich (1966), 'Sammlung im Wort', in: Das Ganze im Fragment (1963), pp. 245–350 (ET A Theological Anthropology, 1967). 'Triduum Mortis et Resurrectionis', in: Mysterium Salutis III (1969).

But 'being caught up' must be understood in the sense of the New Testament, as man's being given a home through God's glory—through his love—so that he is no more a looker-on, but a cooperator of glory. Man is brought back from the alienation of sin, and comes in this rapture at once to God and to himself: at once into his own depths (which he alone could never reach) and into the true fellowship of men (which can be endured only in Christ). The third part of this volume, which deals with the existential glorification, will therefore also demonstrate that theology and anthropology are involved in one another. Where man is so 'dispossessed' through God's transcendent love that he himself is empowered to genuine transcendence, he wins access to his own true being, which was intended for him always.

The second and third parts are above all the bringing to a conclusion of what was begun in Vols. I and VI of The Glory of the Lord, but they also develop further the ethic which was sketched in the collections entitled Sponsa Verbi (1960) and Spiritus Creator (1967).

I. VERBUM CARO FACTUM

1. PRELUDE

a. The fragments of the old covenant

Theologically, and therefore also epistemologically, it is and remains the case that it is the old covenant that prepares the way for the understanding of the new. However much the Apostle of the Gentiles may exempt his hearers from the old observances, he nevertheless cannot spare them a panorama of the whole event of salvation. How much Old Testament material Paul imposes on his readers in Rome, who were mostly Gentiles, when he must fight at one and the same time on a Jewish front and on an antinomian front![1] This great rift, right through the centre of Scripture reflects its single and indivisible content: salvation through judgment. At its endpoint, the old covenant is one single cry for its fulfilment—and yet it is unable in the slightest to outline the form of this fulfilment which it postulates through its entire arrangement. Looking backwards from the fulfilment in Christ, it is possible to show that it was precisely this form alone that corresponded to the postulates, but likewise, that this form could never have been rounded out to fullness from the fragments which were available to the old covenant. The fullness was not present in the fragments in the way that the fullness of a jigsaw is present in the pieces, too hard for a child who needs the help of an adult to fit them together; the fullness here came about only through a synthesis possible for God alone, yet absolutely undiscoverable for man. In spite of which the fullness was present in the parts in such a way that man could recognise it subsequently, though in this act of recognition he had to acknowledge it as the sole work of God in history.

At the end of the preceding volume (III/2, 1, pp. 371-382), we offered a new formulation of the argumentum ex prophetia: the numerous images of the Old Testament surround and converge upon a midpoint which remains open and not constructible; through the existence of Christ, this midpoint is occupied, without visible struggling to attain the synthesis; as Christians reflect on this after Easter, it is seen that all fragmentary images order themselves as if automatically towards this midpoint, and contribute a clarification to the unity. Since this argument has far-reaching consequences for the theological understanding of the New Testament event, it will be presented here once again in a high degree of formalisation, and with direct reference to our subject. Put in this way, we can say that the arch of the covenant set up by God rests upon two pillars: first on the dabar of God, his active Word of Wisdom that carries out what he wills, that seeks to establish his righteousness upon earth in the chosen people and to 'take root' (Sir 24.12) on earth, because though man merely as a creature does possess a certain reflected brilliance of God's glory, he yet remains incapable, by his own strength, of contributing a righteousness other than his own—and in the presence of God's requirements, this righteousness is insufficient, indeed in its depths a righteousness that fails. Accordingly, the other pillar supporting the covenant is not simply man, nor even the chosen people as such, but that form which stands security for the covenant, never fully realised but broken again and again; and it does this in such a way that it mediates between God and the people, bearing the people's guilt and God's punishment. We have seen how this form became clearer and more visible from Hosea, through the Moses of Deuteronomy and the major prophets, up to the 'Servant of Yahweh'. In this purest expression, the form integrates three functions, that of the personal go-between (a function to which Moses, in Ex 3, and many judges, kings and prophets are appointed), that of the priest (which in fact is first separated from the function of Moses through his refusal, in Ex 4.13ff.) who is charged with the cultic sacrifices that bring reconciliation, and the function of the sacrificed animal, whose blood flows in atonement and which is consumed in the whole burnt offering to the glory of God. The way is paved in the Servant

---

[1] H. Preisker, 'Das historische Problem des Römerbriefes', in: Wiss. Zft. der Schiller-Univ. Jena, B. Gesellsch.- und Sprachwiss. Reihe 2 (1952–1953) pp. 25–30; G. Harder, 'Der konkrete Anlass des Römerbriefes', in: Theologia Viatorum 6 (1954), pp. 13–24.

Songs for the integration of the three functions, which becomes a reality only in the new covenant and becomes the dominant theme worked out in the Letter to the Hebrews; only in the new covenant is this possible, because beforehand the impossibility of combining the necessity of dying (as 'beast of sacrifice') and the necessity of living (as reconciling priest, prophet and go-between) stood in the way. The midpoint of the event of the go-between is to be found in his death (in Is 53, his true role is recognised only afterwards by the 'many peoples'), but it was absolutely impossible, from the standpoint of the old covenant, to recognise that the one who died could fulfil his role as an individual rising from death. Further, the covenant which was repeatedly violated by the people was one day accounted by the active Word of God to have been definitively broken off, dissolved, as unable to be restored; sin was too great for the atonement that was possible through men (this is seen in God's dismissal of Jeremiah's intercession); the great harlot Jerusalem was set ablaze and destroyed by fire from the glory of God. Certainly, God had to remain true to himself, and therefore he must reach out over all disasters and promise a new and eternal covenant; but the event of the judgment through the wounded love of God, affected in his inmost heart by sin, was not something that could be made good again. In the presence of this dilemma there emerges (in a directly aprioristic manner, from the standpoint of the old covenant) the postulate of such a mediator (first sketched as a concept, then described by the Letter to the Hebrews), who vicariously endures the destroying fire of God's glory—dying, but on account of his proving true under trial (by this, we must understand his obedience), surviving the death he experiences. In order that this may be conceivable, there is a third requirement, the thing that genuinely could not have been thought of: the coming-together of God's dabar with the human form of the atoning mediator. (Thereby we have also the coming-together of the two events which we have isolated as the events that close the old covenant, the 'speech event' and the 'blood event', which were hindered hitherto from coming together by the two reserved areas indicated by the command against images and the command against eating blood.) It was impossible for man alone in his intercession and his suffering for others to establish God's own and entire righteousness upon earth: but it was likewise impossible for God's dabar alone to take this upon itself, for he cannot bypass or overtrump the God-given freedom of man (the freedom which ennobles him to the image of God): but this could be achieved by a form which was the absolute identity of God's Word and a man who in free obedience took on himself the sin, now not merely of the people, but of the world. In his atoning death, judgment and mercy came together, so that the final judgment that should bring doom became a function of the final mercy that wished to establish God's new and eternal covenant with the world. From the standpoint of the old covenant, this identification of the two pillars remains unthinkable, for it appears to take away the fundamental principle on which everything is built, namely the infinite qualitative difference between God and creature. Even when this identification has taken place, it remains a mystery that is never to be fully laid bare, yet that by the force of its existence casts a wholly new light on God himself and on his relationship to the world: on God, because the mystery of the God-man necessarily discloses the mystery of the Trinity within the Godhead. The light falls on God's relationship to the world, for now, without encroachment upon the difference between God and creature, the world can find in the life of the Trinity its own allotted space.[2]

It is only by looking backwards from the new covenant that any of these considerations became possible. The lines from the old covenant do not converge on a single point. And everything that the Jew might have undertaken in order to force something like a convergence, in his longing for fulfilment, showed itself subsequently to be the opposite of convergence: he was an obstacle in the path of God's plans, merely taking up the place that God wanted empty, in order to fill it himself. So terrible was God's judgment in the destruction of the holy city and the abandonment of the holy land, so decisively had his fist smitten what remained into fragments, that man, for all the energy that he devoted to sacrifices and observance of the law, to looking out for the return of God's glory by examining the future, the heaven, and the creation, was not able to mend the broken pieces, but could only make what was dreadful yet more obvious. The 'kingdom' was no longer, in any real sense, an option—it was only something that had 'come on the scene between-times' and had left behind it a great wasteland when it disappeared: 'Where now is your king, to save you? . . . those of whom you said, "Give me a king and princes"? I gave you a king in my anger, and I have taken him away again in my wrath' (Hos 13.9ff.). A Judaistic kingdom had lost its theological significance. It is for this reason that Jesus, in his speeches of judgment against the Pharisees and legalists, and Paul, showing the tragic dialectic of the law, must begin by opening again the obscured horizon, which permits the view of God's original intention (the faith of Abraham and the prophets) and of his final great act of judgment in the ruining of Jerusalem. This disclosure does not at all signify the wholesale rejection of Judaism; for Jesus knows how to take hold of what is genuine among the debris (cf. Mk 12.34), indeed what is perfect (cf. Lk 21.1–4), and how to purify it and give new wholeness to the fragments in his person, just as Paul knows of the holiness, righteousness and goodness of the law (Rom 7.12), and, when he deals with the error of his Jewish brothers, speaks with all consideration and caution (Rom 10.2ff.). It is only the human self-righteousness that is rejected, which sets itself in the place of the righteousness that comes through God (in open faith, in the spirit of poverty); it is for this self-righteousness that the judgment passed on Israel half a millennium previously becomes present reality. In the threats uttered against the religious hypocrites (Mt

---

[2] On the development of dogmatics from christology, and of christology from the original christological synthesis of the statements 'Jesus Christ is the Lord' (1 Cor 12.3) and 'Jesus is the Son of God' (Acts 8.37; Heb 4.15; 1 Jn 4.14), cf. O. Cullmann, 'Die ersten christlichen Glaubensbekenntnisse', in: Theol. Stud. 15 (4th edn. 1949). In both formulae, we may note that the christological dualism of both of the 'pillars' which we have identified is reflected: 'Lord' is the divine name itself, 'Son of God' is the fulfilment of the Davidic promise, and thus the designation of God's partner.

23.13–33) and the following lamentation over Jerusalem that murders the prophets, and whose time has now come, it is only the situation of Isaiah and Jeremiah that is rendered present—for it is obvious enough, from the fact that Jesus like all the prophets must die in Jerusalem (Lk 13.33), that he looks on 'Jerusalem' as the midpoint of God's work of salvation and as the midpoint of every adulterous rebellion against God; thus, in the prophecy about the destruction of the Temple, which follows immediately in the text, a prophecy containing eschatological traits, we should not so much look forward to the events in the year A.D. 70, as backward to the events of 587 B.C. What then happened in the course of history, and thus as a type, will be repristinated in God's definitive act and will become truly an event of the end-times.[3] But precisely for this reason, it is not to be separated from the inmost content of the period of exile, the suffering of the Servant of Yahweh, which, likewise across a period of five hundred years' silence, acquires its conclusive truth and efficacy in the eschatological suffering under judgment of Jesus Christ. We may express this in other words: the logia of judgment, expressed still in the language of the Old Testament prophets and partly in the language of apocalyptic, which bring the Synoptic Gospels to a close (however composite these may be, from a literary point of view, in their various aspects), make present the concluding historical act of salvation of God in the old covenant, and make it ready for integration in the synthesis of his eschatological act of salvation in the New Testament in the Cross and Resurrection of Christ. While Jesus exposes more the personal sin and contrariety of legalism, which he will take on himself as the personal bearer of sin, Paul brings to light more the provisional character of the whole order of law, which is the occasion of the temptation to self-righteousness for the sinner, which thereby exposes his concealed lack of redemption, and so can be understood only as an intermediate moment in the history of the covenant-faith (between Abraham and Christ). The theologies of Matthew and James do not contradict this, because even they—in their more positive estimation of the law—see its wholeness only from the New Testament's viewpoint of radical transcendence of the time and the level of its ruins (Mt 5.19f.; Jas 2.10f.).

---

[3] Here is the solution to the puzzlement of G. E. Wright, God Who Acts. Biblical Theology as Recital, in: Studies in Bibl. Theology 8 (3rd edn. 1958): 'It is curious that the New Testament does not make use of the destruction of Jerusalem, the exile and the restoration, for those events would have completed the typological comparison of God's acts in Israelite history with his work in Christ', p. 69.

Thus, Judaism's three forms of reaching out for the missing glory of God can find a home in the unity of the new covenant only by way of their total dismantling. The image of the coming Messiah must be broken through the image of the suffering Servant of Yahweh (which, for the Jews, could not be united to it); apocalyptic must undergo a complete transformation of signification, and be humbled to the role of a function of the dying and rising of the man Jesus; the sapiential teaching can be utilised only when it lets itself be measured against, and brought into alignment with, the scandal of the Cross and of the 'foolishness of God' that appears therein—for the 'lord of glory' must be crucified (1 Cor 2.8). This threefold failure (and salvation 'as through fire', 1 Cor 3.15) is all part of the process of making present again the great failure of Israel and its loss of God's glory in the past. But, to summarise once again what was said at the beginning, this failure was only the proclamation that God in the covenant foresaw a higher building than was visible in the Old Testament foundations. The Adam created as God's image (the 'first' Adam) could not bear sufficient weight to permit him to be the second pillar that would bear the whole vault of the eternal covenant that God wanted to establish with the world. This was for the simple reason that he was mortal; but the content of the covenant of which he was the partner was divine and therefore immortal. Ruin, death and Hades must be taken up into the act of covenant: this was possible only if God's Word became flesh, if the eternal life took death (as judgment, ruin, Hell) upon himself as man, and made it past in himself: 'I was dead, but behold, I am alive for evermore, and I have the keys of death and Hades' (Rev 1.18). Only then is 'the righteousness of God' established on earth as it is in heaven (Mt 6.10); only then does God's Word, sent forth into the world, return to him with its whole harvest and equal resonance (Is 55.10f.); and in this full resonance, the whole fragmented clatter of the broken covenant and of the enacted judgment must sound forth too, must indeed bring into being the highest harmony (as this reigns eternally between Father and Son). In the absolute suffering of judgment and its overcoming in the rising of man to God, the imperfect Old Testament glory of God must display itself in the New Testament as the perfect glory of his love that overcomes all things. And if in the period of the great prophecy the insufficiency of men appeared as a whole—so much so, that even the strongest intercessory prayer of the individual could no longer balance the sinking scales (Jer 7.16; 11.14; 14.11f.)—if that solidarity in insufficiency, from which a doctrine of 'original sin' could develop, became visible, then the atonement of the 'new Adam' will be obliged to effect a deeper solidarity in opposition to this, in accordance with the Pauline principle of superabundance in the establishment of God's universal righteousness (Rom 5.15,17,20). This solidarity, whereby God's righteousness passes from the one to 'all', corresponds on earth to the trinitarian solidarity of love in heaven.

b. Drawing together and handing over: the Baptist

The 'heir of all things' (Heb 1.2) ought not to inherit a lordship over ruins; something unheard-of took place, namely that the original meaning and content of the first covenant rose again intact in a form that brought it to a close so that, restored to its original brightness, it might dispossess itself in favour of the new form: midpoint to midpoint, and above all, person to person. We are not dealing with a 'movement'—the group of John the Baptist's disciples remains shadowy and irrelevant, like the groups of prophets who surrounded the solitary and unique figure of Elijah, and the frictions between this party and the disciples of Jesus remain irrelevant[1]—but rather with an encounter seen in ever new variations of light and shade. Each makes a decision about the other and takes up a position in relation to him with an emphasis, with an amount of detail that is so astonishing when we consider the brevity of the Gospels, that we grasp that the two persons who measure themselves against one another, like all the great persons of salvation history, are not only 'sent on a mission', but are personified missions, embodiments, bodily ideas, who as such bear epochs of salvation history in themselves and dismiss epochs from themselves (cf. Heb 7.9f.): it is thus that Moses portrays 'the law' and Elijah 'prophecy' in the scene of transfiguration. Looking ahead from this point, we can recognise immediately that when he is asked who he is, the Baptist, who is to embody in concentrated form the glowing kernel of the first covenant, can identify himself neither with the 'prophet' ('like Moses', Deut 18.15), nor with Elijah (Mal 3.23), nor with the Messiah, in view of whom he is to 'clear the path' (Mal 3.1, following Is 40.3). He, like all those 'sent', does not know who he is—all the more is this true, since his mission is the greatest that anyone born of woman has received (Mt 11.11), and therefore the least surveyable. He knows only his commission, to be a voice that calls (in reality a voice that is called)[2] in the wilderness: 'Clear the path of the Lord', and to effect this clearing of hearts with all the might of his existence: through a word which is given him directly from God with an unprecedented immediacy (Jesus testifies of him, 'Yes, I tell you, he is more than a prophet', Mt 11.9), and through an act that is inspired in him just as directly, and without connecting to anything already existing[3] (Jesus testifies to this too: the baptism of John is 'from heaven', Mt 21.25).

---

[1] Jn 3.25: dispute about purification (probably about the respective value of the two baptisms); Mk 2.18ff.: dispute about fasting (in which the disciples of John are said to maintain the same position as the Pharisees—indeed, at Mt 9.14 they themselves spontaneously make this claim, which is difficult to combine with the position of the Baptist in relation to the Pharisees, Mt 3.7).

[2] Is 40.3 in Hebrew: 'A voice cries: make ready in the wilderness a path for Yahweh'; the Synoptists follow the LXX, 'the voice of one crying in the wilderness'.

[3] It is an 'original deed' of the Baptist, which has no connection with the ritual washings of Qumran which were repeated several times in the course of the day: John's baptism cannot be repeated, for it is a once-for-all eschatological sacrament; it is not restricted to a group of initiates or those

The seemingly disparate characteristics of the Baptist in the Gospels come together to form an impressive figure only when they are considered together in the unity of his mission that goes beyond all boundaries. This mission exceeds not only the comprehension of his disciples, but also the self-understanding possible to the one sent himself. Since his mission on the one hand goes back into the kernel of the old covenant, and on the other hand makes the leap of transcendence in anticipation into the kernel of the new covenant, it can be understood as a form only if it is allowed to remain in this unique and unrepeatable suspension.

The event of the Baptist is above all the fact that salvation history, which had in effect (apart from a meagre postlude) come to an end with the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile,[4] in order to make room for the 'empty period' of five hundred years, suddenly jerks into motion again. Passing over all apocalyptic, it goes back to the centre of the great prophecy, which was always intimately related to the imminent expectation of the Day of the Lord;[5] John's proclamation of judgment and call to repentance have the same quality as those of Amos or Micah, Jeremiah or Ezekiel. They have likewise the same indissoluble two-sidedness: flaming declaration of wrath, and good news (Lk 3.17f.) of forgiveness of sins on the ground of penitent conversion (Mk 1.4), to be initiated, but is for the people as a whole; it is not merely ritual, but is the expression of total conversion of the heart and an act of sealing that looks to the approaching Day of God's wrath. Taking up a universal human symbol, this baptism is spiritually a new creation; the early Christians took up John's baptism in order to grasp the idea of new birth at a yet deeper level. E. Lohmeyer, Das Urchristentum I: Johannes der Täufer (1932), pp. 67–82; cf. Roland Schütz, 'Johannes der Täufer', Abh. ThANT 50 (1967), pp. 44ff., opposing all who look for the origin of baptism in Qumran (E. Wilson, Brownlee, Stauffer, O. Betz, et al.).

---

[4] Cf. the preceding volume Old Covenant, pp. 000.

[5] Of course, late apocalyptic inherited this near expectation from prophecy (P. Volz, Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde, 1934, pp. 135ff.), but unlike prophecy, apocalyptic tends towards the calculation of the exact date, which according to circumstances can be advanced or retared, and which is subordinate to a cosmic law of time ('the fullness of time', 'maturing of time', etc.). In the prophets, and once again in John, 'the one to come' is directly God.

addressed to the present, without looking forward like apocalyptic to the separation of two classes in the coming judgment. By contrast with all contemporary messianic movements, the call of the Baptist is wholly apolitical, purely religious. His ethical requirement—of which Luke seeks to give a sketch[6]—is as simple and to the point as the altruistic requirement of the original law and prophecy: namely, to share with the poor and to practise righteousness in self-denial and the placing of limitations on oneself; this teaching prepares the way and slips over into the ethical requirement of Jesus, who at first seems to do nothing more than repeat what is already known (Mt 7.12; 23.23). John requires faithfulness to God, to the original sense of fidelity to truth, which shows the genuineness of its repentant turning to God in 'bearing fruit' (Mt 3.8), and in renouncing all attempts to find 'security' with God by appealing to the law[7] or to the covenant ('We have Abraham as our father', 3.9). With the weight and authority of the earliest prophecy, John pointed to the stones on the bank of the river: 'But I tell you, God is able from these stones to raise up children to Abraham'. And when he continues, 'Even now the axe is laid to the root of the tree', this refers not only to the present rottenness, which will fall and tumble into the fire, but extends even to the living root of the covenant, which is thereby exposed: Abraham does not lie still, but he too is caught up into the movement forwards. In the same way, Jesus will reject the Jews' boasting of being Abraham's children (without his works), and will place himself before Abraham (Jn 8.39f., 56f.). If the Baptist works to prepare for the 'stronger one' who comes after him (Mt 3.11 par.), who 'will clear his threshing floor with his winnowing fork in his hand', then he has 'cleared the way' for him not only as far back as Elijah and Moses, but back to the origins in Abraham. Precisely for this reason, the Fourth Gospel interprets rightly when it has John say, 'He who comes after me ranks before me, for he was before me' (Jn 1.15, 30). Thus in principle a place has already been opened out beyond Israel—non-Jews too come to the Baptist and are taught by him—just as in the old covenant, God always reserved to himself his own ways with the other peoples. But Israel itself must set out afresh, for since the Exile it has existed no more. The messenger, sent out by God before his face in Malachi (3.1) has also the commission to 'turn again' the hearts of the fathers to the sons, and of the sons to the fathers (4.6); this is taken over by the grandson of Ben Sirach and receives explanation and expansion in the 'restoration of the (twelve) tribes of Jacob' (Sir 48.10). The word 'restoration' (apokatastasis) is applied to the Baptist by Jesus himself (Mk 9.12 par.; cf. Lk 1.17) before it is applied to Jesus (as his own forerunner for the day of the Parousia) in Peter's sermon (Acts 3.21).

---

[6] As 3.18 shows.

[7] The simple requirement of works—the fruit which the tree must bear, so that it may avoid being cut down—joined to interior repentance was nothing other than the expression of the double-sidedness of the covenant (which finds its continuance in the new covenant). However, this could easily be misunderstood by a Pharisee such as Josephus (Ant. 18, 5.2) as the requirement of the school of holiness by works (dikaiosyne/zedaka towards men, eusebeia towards God as the interior purity of the disposition of the mind); this was sufficient; thus Josephus could under-evaluate the baptism, which one did not accomplish but received from the baptist, as mere physical (ritual) purification. Cf. Roland Schütz, op. cit. pp. 20–26, against A. Schlatter, Johannes der Täufer (ed. W. Michaelis, 1936), pp. 56–65. If the Baptist had preached a degenerate form of the religion of law, his hostility to the insurance-religion of the Pharisees would be incomprehensible. It is here (not in Qumran) that this religion of the Pharisees is first criticised by going back to the original understanding of the covenant, and is thereby put an end to, for the Baptist sets himself like Jesus on the side of the truly penitent 'publicans and harlots' (Mt 21.32). The 'disregarding of God's plan of salvation' by the Pharisees and scribes, who did not wish to be baptised (Lk 7.30), would be just as incomprehensible if John had preached a religion of law; so indeed would be their taxing of the Baptist with being a 'demonic ascetic' (Lk 7.33). The 'penance' or 'conversion' to which the Baptist summons, and to which Jesus likewise is to issue the summons (Mt 3.2 = Mt 4.17b), is the 'work' of the abandoning of all righteousness on the basis of works.

God's word comes upon John in the wilderness. He was of priestly descent, but the name which the angel ordered to be given him indicated that he had been chosen out of all the priesthood of the Old Testament.[8] His dwelling in the wilderness was not like that of the men of Qumran, but was in solitude, ascetical clothing and extreme frugality; nor was his message like that of the political messianic movements which mostly started out from the wilderness, for his message was one of pure salvation history. This permits the origins of Israel in the concept of the wilderness to awaken once more. The wilderness is the place to which God wishes to woo back the apostate Israel, as a bridegroom his beloved, so that he may speak to her heart there (Hos 2.16); but not without 'stripping her naked and making her like a wilderness' (Hos 2.5). The wilderness is the dreadful and glorious state of being handed over to God: the greatest temptation (among demons and wild beasts) and the greatest nuptial intimacy (Jer 2.2). The 'journey through the wilderness'[9] is unavoidable for Jesus, but also for Christians (1 Cor 10.6; Heb 3.8–11), for whom it is the place where God's Word like a two-edged sword pierces to the inmost division of joints and marrow, thoughts and intentions, and lays all open before him (Heb 4.12f.). It is the place where one learns to pray and where one can then teach others to pray (Lk 11.1). It is the place where there are no fixed points, but where only a nomadic existence is permitted upon earth (Lk 3.3), such as the existence which Israel once led under God's guidance, and which Jesus too, driven by the Spirit, will lead once more ('nowhere to lay his head', Mt 8.20).

---

[8] From Lk 1.76, it is also possible to hear the echo of a commission that is more than prophetic, viz. a high-priestly commission, 'for the high priest reconciles the people with God' (Grundmann, Lukas, p. 51).

What John does, humanly considered, is foolhardiness: he exposes himself without reserves to the Word of God. In no sense does he establish a 'monastery in the desert', or 'withdraw from the world'; rather he offers himself as the last step at the bottom of the prophetic 'staircase of obedience',[10] before God's descending foot definitively touches the ground. His appearing under the sign of the 'fasting' that weakens him (Mt 11.18), and of a Nazarite life made specially for him is his contribution that permits him to be filled by the 'Holy Spirit', so that he may bring back the later generation to the way of thinking of the earlier, as 'prophet of the Most High' 'in spirit and might', and 'thus make ready for the Lord a willing people' (Lk 1.16f., 76). He is to be only the 'voice' of the true summoner, but a voice that effects what it declares, and thereby makes those addressed vomit out their sins, so that he may then seize them and lay hands on them and dip them under into the cleansing waters (Mt 3.6), and make them once for all proof against the 'inextinguishable fire' (Mt 3.12) that is drawing near. The symbol of his baptism stands already between the Flood[11] or the Red Sea in which men drowned,[12] and the Christian eschatological sacrament of salvation (1 Pet 3.20f.).

---

[9] J. Guillet, 'La marche à travers le désert', in: Thèmes Bibliques, études sur l'expression et le développement de la Révélation (Théologie 18), 1951, pp. 9–25. On the theology and spirituality of the wilderness: J. Steinmann, St. Jean-Baptiste et la spiritualité du désert (Maîtres spirituels 3, 1955), although he brings John into too close relationship to Qumran.

[10] Cf. Vol. III/2,1, pp. 209–275.

But this whole 'restoration' of the original context of the covenant is a step forwards for the one who dares to obey,[13] not only in the act of proclaiming the axe that is laid to the roots and the threatening imminence of the destructive wrath, but more specifically in the 'fore-running' of the proclaimer himself. For this sets the whole structure of the covenant in motion, as he is simultaneously propelled by the one who is forcing and pushing behind him (ὀπίσω μου ἐρχουμενος) into an open emptiness that is like a mirror-image of the later 'following' (ὀπίσω μου ἐλθεῖν, Mk 8.34 par.); for he presses on towards the one who is pushing behind him, and in consequence 'does not know' him (Jn 1.30, 33). Is it God, with his 'refiner's fire' and 'fuller's soap' (Mal 3.1f.)? Or the 'angel of the covenant' (ibid.)? Or the 'coming one like a son of man' (Dan 7.13a Theodotion)? Or the one announced in Gen 49.10, a text taken to refer to the Messiah in pre-Christian tradition? Or really a man, to whom one can pose the question, 'Are you "he who is to come", or are we to wait for another?' (Mt 11.3)? The form of the eschatological appearing of God has many undefined outlines, and cannot be pinned down;[14] only the coming, which presses forward from behind, is certain, as is the fact that the one who comes will be 'stronger' (Mt 3.11), which in John's gospel will be clarified theologically: stronger, because earlier in his being, and thereby establishing the preliminary stage of the Baptist (Jn 1.30). God comes 'with might' (Is 40.10), and it is to this driving pressure, which suddenly with the coming of the Baptist makes itself known like the pangs of birth, that the no longer explicable logion of Jesus must in some way refer: we may translate, 'Since the days of John the Baptist the kingdom of God pushes its way through with force' (Mt 11.12). But no one, not even the Baptist, could unite the many faces of the God to come, found in the Old Testament, into one single face: wrath and absolute division are coming, the corn and the chaff will be separated in the wind of God—and yet the commission to make a way for God in the wilderness is a call of salvation, the return home from exile with the God who goes ahead through the wilderness to reach the homeland.

---

[11] Cf. the fresco of the baptism at Mystra (14th century), where Jesus stands naked in the water between drowned men. 'At the basis of the image of the baptism with which Jesus must be baptised, there lies certainly the Old Testament image of suffering as a flood which buries man in itself'. W. Thüsing, Die Erhöhung und Verherrlichung Jesu im Johannesevangelium, 1959, p. 84.

[12] It seems that the baptism of proselytes took this episode as its starting point (cf. J. Jeremias, 'Der Ursprung der Johannestaufe', ZNW 28, 1929, pp. 312–320). But here we must collect all the texts about sea and abysses (such as Ps 18.5; 69.3, 15; 124.4f.; Jon 2.6) and go back to the original cosmic (mythic)/historical event (cf. Vol III/2,1, pp. 69–79), in order to see the full dimension in salvation history. Cf. Oepke, TDNT, I, p. 538, and on the meaning of baptizein (to sink, drown, perish), ibid. pp. 529f. Objections to this interpretation in W. G. Kümmel, Verheissung und Erfüllung, 2nd edn. 1953, p. 62 (ET Promise and Fulfilment, 1957, p. 69).

[13] Impressively grasped by Auguste Rodin in his statue of the Baptist.

The step with which the old covenant goes out beyond itself to what is to come, was clearly bound to lead to total puzzlement: 'Are you he?' The cleanser of the Temple might perhaps have fitted the Baptist's idea, but what of the one who replied to the questions of John's disciples with the image of the Saviour (ἔργα, Mt 11.2: the conduct of Jesus) from Is 35.5f. and 61.1, the same image which Luke uses programmatically for the Saviour right at the beginning (Lk

---

[14] Cf. J. Dupont, 'L'ambassade de Jean-Baptiste', NRT (1961), pp. 805.821, 943–959; on ὁ ἐρχόμενος, pp. 814ff.

4.18f.)? Nevertheless, John's question, as he wrestles with his doubts, presupposes a hidden, infinitely mysterious recognition that cannot be clothed in words, an illumination of certainty that the one pressing on from behind has now reached a position in front of the Baptist, that the step of transcendence of the 'restored' old covenant has attained to the transcendent, that the discharge and the handing-over of the keys have objectively taken place. And it is impossible to doubt that this turning-point of the ages happened when Jesus was baptised by John, in the event that again shattered all the Baptist's expectations (even the most open, the most obedient), as the later re-writing in Matthew partly hints: 'I need to be baptised by you, and do you come to me?' (3.14). The Baptist prepares the people for the Lord, clears the path, and Jesus appears on the scene in the midst of this activity—not as its goal, not even in order to relieve John in the work, but in order to let himself be worked upon. Matthew gives this a place in his scheme of fulfilment ('It is fitting for us to fulfil all righteousness'), but in reality, Jesus accepts baptism in solidarity with the repentant sinners, the 'stronger' one who is to come becomes the 'weaker' in his coming, and he who is 'the greatest among those born of women', by being obliged to baptise the obedient God in the abyss of the waters, loses the power of his greatness to him who is the smallest: 'Yet he who is the smallest in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt 11.11b)—this 'smallest' one is doubtless Jesus himself.[15]

This event 'at the origins of history' can be described only inadequately in the words and images of history, and only in approximations, but it is attested by the words of the Baptist about the increasing of Jesus and his own decreasing, about his joy as 'the friend of the bridegroom' (Jn 3.27–30), which is perhaps the most original description in John's Gospel of the relationship between the Baptist and Jesus.[16] Then too we have the taking over of a popular legend[17] which said that the Messiah could live unknown to others and to himself among the people, and must be anointed by a prophet (Elijah) and revealed to all: it is in this image that John has clothed the encounter in his first chapter. The one who is unknown to the Baptist and to all others, but present in their midst, is to be revealed to the Baptist personally through the descent of the Spirit—so that he may reveal him to others and bear witness to him. In the Synoptic Gospels, this happens at the baptism of Jesus.[18] Nevertheless, this 'recognition' of the 'one who is to come' leaves room for doubts and questions: and since these are not withheld from the Baptist, but are bestowed on him, we see that he is not left static in his encounter with the one who bears the new covenant, but is caught up into the newness. Jesus' words in Lk 16.16, 'The law and the prophets were until John; since then the good news of the kingdom of God is preached', could leave it uncertain whether John stands before or after the boundary that is drawn: it is improbable that he represents the 'boundary line', as has been said, for it would be better to speak of a 'sliding transition'.[19] But even that is inexact. John is himself the old covenant which transcends itself, and in this act of transcendence discovers the new covenant which already lay hidden in it (Novum in Vetere latet), and precisely in the act of giving itself up and disappearing and making room is taken over and given an interpretation by the new covenant (Vetus in Novo patet). And all this derives from the fact that the imprisoned and beheaded Baptist is finally (together with all the prophets, Lk 13.33; Mt 23.37) one who 'is handed over' like Jesus: παραδοθῆναι (Mk 1.14; cf. Mt 4.12) is the word specially reserved for the passion of Jesus. When Jesus does not rescue the Baptist, but (in the Synoptics) takes his handing-over precisely as the prelude and release for his

---

[15] Chrysostom, Hilary, Tertullian, cited in Michel, art. μικρός, TDNT IV, p. 656, A27.

[16] Thus M.-E. Boismard, 'Les traditions johanniques concernant le Baptiste', RB 70 (1963), pp. 5–42, esp. 30ff.

[17] Attested by Justin, Dial. 8.4; 49.1. On the whole theme: Erik Sjöberg, Der verborgene Menschensohn in den Evangelien (Lund 1955); on Justin, pp. 80ff., 247ff.

[18] Jn 1.31, 'with water', 1.33, 'with water', 1.33, 'he who baptises with the Holy Spirit'. Bultmann takes these for redactional assimilations to the Synoptic Gospels; Wellhausen, following Blass, takes them for glosses of a copyist, and Boismard, art. cit. p. 10, thinks this more probable.

[19] R. Schütz, op. cit. p. 71.

own mission, he orientates himself one final time on him and indeed finds solidarity with him precisely in this fate. When he identifies the Baptist with the Elijah who is awaited for the end time, he does this precisely by pointing to the old prophet's destiny of suffering: 'Elijah does come and he is to restore all things; but I tell you that Elijah has already come, and they did not know him, but did to him whatever they pleased' (Mark adds, with reference to Jezebel in 1 Kings 19.2–10, 'as it is written of him'). 'So also the Son of man will suffer at their hands' (Mt 17.11f.). The mediator and prophet who suffers in obedience belongs to the 'restoration' (apokatastasis) of the central reality of the covenant from Moses to the exile, and it is precisely in this that the inmost solidarity between the old covenant and the new lies: when Jesus gives himself a place in the series of prophetic destinies, he assumes them all at once, in order to give them a fulfilment that lies beyond them (cf. Heb 11 and 12.1–3).

Here one can ask whether Jesus, in coming to John, accepts from him nothing further than the act of baptism (since the 'crying voice' in John is one with his sacramental act), or whether it is not rather the case that he really is affected by this voice and awakened to his own mission. Literally, and as is appropriate to his own nature, he puts into practice a following-after (ὀπίσω ἔρχεσθαι) in relation to the Baptist and to the covenant which he embodies, which is analogous to that which he will later claim for himself from his disciples. If that is so, it would be the Fourth Gospel, which does not know of a direct succession of the two missions, but rather of a time of contemporaneity in a loose relationship, that is nearer to the actual historical occurrence: acceptance by Jesus of baptism and the call to repentance, and acknowledgment by the Baptist of the true newness of the one who bears the Spirit as him who is absolutely devoted, the 'Lamb of God, who bears the sin of the world' (Jn 1.29, 36). And his 'disappearing' (3.30), his bearing witness by pointing away from himself (1.7f., 19f.), recognises precisely the limit of the old covenant, but crosses over this limit, because Jesus too in an abundant manner 'does not bear witness to himself' (5.31) and, as the word that cries out (7.37) is the word that is given up (3.16). In accordance with this, the Baptist directs the disciples who follow him that they should follow the one who comes after him (1.36f.).

It is in this dialectic that results from the succession of the testaments that the subordinate motif of the 'return of Elijah', that appears (in Mark and Matthew) and disappears again (in Luke and John), belongs[20] for this dialectic is concentrated on the perspective of the interplay of two persons. It was a short step from the identification of the forerunner of God in the end times in Mal 3.1 with the (returning) Elijah in the appendix to Malachi (3.23) and the further development of this expectation in Sir 48.10f., to the popular spinning-out of the eschatological return of Elijah[21] and to the attempt to apply this to every messianic figure (cf. Mk 9.11),[22] to the Baptist (implicit in the identification of Is 40.3 with Mal 3.1 in the synoptics, clear in Lk 1.17), and to Jesus himself (Mk 8.28). It is not external similarities like that of clothing that bring the name of Elijah into play,[23] but his function as forerunner. When Jesus responds to the hesitating questions by identifying the Baptist and Elijah (Mk 9.12f.; Mt 17.11f.), he does this only in the context of the current expectation of the returning Elijah as the 'restorer' before the in-breaking of the final one. The provocative character of this declaration is expressed in the introductory phrase, 'If you are willing to accept it, he is Elijah who is to come' (Mt 11.14), whereby he identifies himself, in a hidden manner but unambiguously, as the one who is to come last of all, with whom the Day of God breaks in. But the challenging statement is harsh and pointed, precisely in the unexpected characterising of this Elijah who has already come as the one who has been given up ('They did to him whatever they pleased'), and in Jesus' setting himself thereby in solidarity with him. The nub lies in these two thoughts; the popular expectation as such has no interest for Jesus, for otherwise he could not have elevated the Baptist over the generality of the prophets to be the universal representative of the old dispensation. Just so, the Baptist himself can have no interest in this identification—he is a voice in the wilderness, nothing else. Thus Luke can omit the motif almost entirely, and indeed quietly corrects it in one place: in Mark and Matthew, the disciples of John are sent to Jesus ask him, 'Are you he?', and he replies with an allusion to the text from Isaiah about the wonders of the end time, but in Luke, the text from Isaiah moves back to become the theme of Jesus' first sermon, in which he refers precisely to the wonders of the period of Elijah and Elisha (Lk 4.25ff.); several of the narratives of Jesus' miracles are related as repetitions and fulfilments that surpass those wonders of old. Here, therefore, the old covenant shows a surplus that is not possessed by the Baptist, who works no wonders, but is laid up for the one who is God's wonder become man. The Baptist accomplishes his role in surrendering himself; over him, Elijah and Moses come to the transfigured Jesus as real symbols, so that for their part too they may be absorbed into the fulfilment.[24] [20] J. A. T. Robinson, 'Elijah, John and Jesus: an essay in detection', NTS 4 (1957/58), pp. 263–281 (too artificial); G. Richter, 'Bist du Elias?' (Jn 1, 21), in: BZ NF 6 (1962), pp. 79–92, 238–256; 7 (1963), pp. 63–80.

---

[21] Cf. the testimony of Justin, n. 17 above.

[22] The Elijah-question to the Baptist is probably introduced redactionally from Synoptic material: Mk 8.28f. has the three eschatological figures, Elijah, the Prophet and the Messiah, while Jn 7.40f. has only two, the Messiah and the Prophet. Thus it is not possible to draw any far-reaching conclusions from the fact that the Baptist denies that he is Elijah.

[23] P. Joüon, 'Le costume d'Elie et celui de Jean-Baptiste', Biblica 16 (1935), pp. 74–81; P. Vielhauer, 'Tracht und Speise Johannes des Täufers', in Aufsätze zum NT (1965), pp. 47–54.

The drama between John and Jesus is the drama between two persons, who are genuinely free to make decisions, and as such contain each a world in himself, and have responsibility for it. It is not only that they signify (perhaps indeed signify something manifold), but first of all, that they are indivisibly themselves, and it is as such that they have significance; precisely in their unique personality, they both transcend themselves—John is the voice, Jesus the word.[25]

---

[24] 'After the Logos had touched them, the disciples lifted up their eyes and saw Jesus—him alone, and no one with him any longer. Moses (the law) and Elijah (the prophecy) had become One only. They are One only with Jesus, who is the gospel.' Origen, In Matthaeum 12.43 (ed. Klostermann, 155).

[25] Origen, In Johannem II, 32 (ed. Preuschen, 89–90), and expanding and deepening him, Augustine, Sermo 288.4 (PL 38, 1306–1307), 293.3 (ibid. 1328–1329), and frequently.

The field is dominated, first materially and finally in a quite formal manner, by the question about the person—not about What, but about Who. 'Are you he?' the Baptist asks Jesus (Mt 11.3). And in the further development in John's Gospel the Baptist is promised, 'He on whom you see the Spirit descend and remain, this is he!' (Jn 1.33). Jesus replies by defining himself indirectly on the basis of the Baptist, whom he describes under the cipher of Elijah, i.e. the embodiment of prophecy. Jesus himself must repeatedly face the question, 'Who are you?' (Jn 8.25), and indeed he himself provokes the question (Mk 8.27ff. par.), and it is only he who is covered by the definition of the Baptist, when the 'authorities' seek in vain to entice from him a definition ('Who are you?', Jn 1.19, 22) so that they may tie him down to something limited—he himself escapes from them by referring to the voice which originally (in Isaiah) is only a call from God. Augustine grasps the content of this 'Who' in the double-sidedness of his concept of persona: 'someone' and (precisely therein) 'one who plays a role': Collige tanquam in unum omnes voces quae praecesserunt Verbum et eas omnes constitue in persona Joannis. Harum omnium sacramentum ille gestabat, harum omnium persona sacrata et mystica ille unus erat . . . Ergo omnium vocum persona Joannes, Verbi persona Christus.[26] Thus he is interiectus limes, as persona vetustatis, praeconium novitatis,[27] but—consecrated and commissioned in his mother's womb by the incarnate Word—simultaneously a boundary that has been crossed, for he does not foretell what is to come, but 'points to it with his finger'.[28] Luke understood how to include the whole interplay of the encounter of the dispensations in the images of his infancy narratives: the marvellous proceeding of the 'voice' from the priestly father who had become dumb (deprived of prophecy) in his unbelief, the commissioning and imparting of the Spirit for the 'voice' from the 'Word' borne in the womb of Mary, so that he who is to be 'the prophet of the Most High' appears as one personally characterised in a unique way: 'What then will this child be?' (Lk 1.66). Here is symbolic theology in a compression that is almost without analogy.

---

[26] [Gather as into one all the voices which went before the Word, and constitute them all in the person of John. He bore the sacramental mystery of them all, he as one man was the sacred and mystical person of all these . . . Therefore, John is the person of all the voices, Christ the person of the Word], Augustine, Sermo 288.4–5 (PL 38, 1306–1307).

[27] [A line drawn between a boundary, personifying what is old and announcing what is new], ibid. Sermo 293, 2 (col. 1328).

[28] Augustine, Contra duas ep. Pel. lib., 3.11 (PL 44, 595). This central piece of scriptural theology, thought through by Augustine with nothing short of passion, is distorted by gnosis into the doctrine of a syzygy, the joining-together of a good principle and an evil principle, in the Pseudo-Clementines H II (Irmscher, in Schneemelcher, Ntl. Apokryphen II, 1964, pp. 381ff.; ET, NT Apocrypha II, 1965, pp. 545ff.).

c. Jesus makes his appearance: recapitulation

To the 'appearing' (παραγίνεσθαι) of the Baptist corresponds the 'appearing' of Jesus when he draws near to him; in Mark, Jesus' baptism at the hands of John stands without any preceding history as the event in which the prophecy which has been drawn together and the fulfilment of prophecy paradoxically dovetail into one another. This is immediately followed by the brief narrative of the temptation, in which the abyss of the physical water changes into the spiritual abyss that interprets it, the abyss in which the one who brings fulfilment must be submerged. Matthew and Luke construct each an infancy narrative before this diptych, so that the baptism moves into the central position, as the decisive act of the Creator's designation of the one who fulfils, while the preceding narratives remain in the half-shadow of this act to which they point forward, and the temptation is the first general deduction from the act of designation, with which it stands in close relationship still, before the beginning of Jesus' individual activity (which has its own significant prelude in Lk 4.14–21 and Mt 4.12–16).[1] The whole triptych of the appearing of Jesus is governed by an imperious propulsion of necessity, in which (both in Matthew and in Luke) the direct divine will acting efficaciously, the driving 'Spirit', and human obedience that is driven on, are everywhere to be felt. But this force that propels and drives on is such that it can be understood in all three panels of the triptych as the recapitulation of the salvation history that has come anew in the river Jordan: accordingly, it does not merely assume and effortlessly dismiss what had been carried down to the time of the fulfiller, but rather pushes in the opposite direction, back into what is to be fulfilled, and takes on itself the whole of the 'promise' as far back as the origins, so that it may bring it from beneath and from within (not merely from above, as the Baptist surely expected) to 'fulfilment'.[2] Had Jesus not truly come from beneath (from the depths, from the interior of the filia Sion), then he would not truly have come from above. Had he not borne the whole history of Israel (and therein of the world) with God in himself, then he could not have been the final word of the history of God with Israel (and therein with the world). We shall consider this from the starting-point of the event of baptism, and then look first back at the infancy narrative, then forward to the temptation narrative.

---

[1] At Mt 3.1; 3.13; hitherto only in the magi (2.2) as the official witnesses of the fact that the principal character has appeared.

1. Baptism. When Jesus goes to meet the prophetic kairos represented by the Baptist—away from his homeland of Galilee into the homeland of the Baptist in wilderness and Jordan—this is a first act of obedience, not yet properly speaking to his Spirit, which he receives first at the baptism, but certainly to the prophetic 'voice of God' which reaches him from John, the voice which had 'come upon John' and to which he submitted himself (in blind obedience): 'a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins' (Lk 3.3). In accordance with this, 'the whole of Judaea and Jerusalem' confess 'their sins' on the occasion of this baptism. Both, the penitent confession in conversion and the baptism of the forgiveness of sins, are two sides of one coin: the 'path of righteousness' (Mt 21.32) on which one may be set through the Baptist in order to go to meet 'the coming one' who is 'greater', and 'to see God's salvation' (Lk 3.6). The incomprehensible thing, which Matthew throws into relief in his portrayal, the thing that turns upside-down the whole temporal and material order of preparation of the path and coming of the Lord, is the baptism of Jesus: the Baptist himself parries Jesus' request,[3] in consciousness of his own repentance—'I need to be baptised by you, and do you come to me?' The reply explains—in genuinely Matthaean colouring (cf. 5.17f.)—that fulfilment signifies not a rupture, but the fulfilment of all God's ways ('Let it be so, for so it is fitting for us (both) to fulfil all righteousness'). When the Baptist responds by 'letting it happen' (ἀφίησιν αὐτόν), the obedience is converted and becomes directly 'Marian' (Lk 1.38), and the new obedience expresses its form in the old: the 'increasing' of the redeemer to the point of his becoming one with all who confess their sins forces the one who declares the promise to 'decrease' (Jn 3.30) into this inimitable vanishing. Jesus' descent into the river is at one and the same time solidarity with all who confess their guilt and dive into the waters of judgment and salvation, and—as solidarity—obedience to the voice of God which sounds forth from the prophet's voice, and thus obedience incarnated in history. Jesus' initiative attains immediately to its fulfilment, for he 'rises up' out of the waters, and his act of 'coming up from beneath' is answered by the 'coming down from above' of the 'Spirit (of God)': here we see that incarnation is the encounter, to the point of identification, of the Israel who has been made ready and the God of the covenant who descends to Israel. But this event is contained in the interpretation given at the close by the 'voice from heaven': 'You are' (Mark), or as the Baptist too hears it then, 'This is my beloved Son' (Matthew and Luke). This is not to be given an adoptionist explanation,[4] nor a trinitarian explanation in the sense of dogmatic theology, but rather a soteriological explanation, for it is an allusion to the 'beloved', [3] Euthus, Mk 1.10; Mt 3.16.

---

[2] Lohmeyer(-Schmauch), Matthäus (2nd edn. 1958), p. 49 n. 2. Cf. A. Nisin, Histoire de Jésus (1960), pp. 129–138.

[4] As the variant at Lk 3.22, 'You are my Son, today I have begotten you' (= Ps 2.7), could suggest. If this text refers at Heb 1.5 and 5.5 to the messianic high priest, yet it is precisely he who is essentially one who suffers, so that the psalm text too embraces the text from Isaiah cited by Mk and Mt. O. Cullmann, Christologie (1957), p. 65f.; criticism in A. Vögtle, 'Exeg. Erwägungen über das Wissen und Selbstbewußtsein Jesu', in: Gott in Welt (Rahner Festschrift) I, 1964, pp. 630f.

'my chosen servant' (Is 42.1), specifically to the Servant of Yahweh who was the concluding image of the old salvation history, and was to become the ransomer of the people as the obedient one, humbled vicariously and therefore raised on high.[5] The dove and the abyss that is to be given life (Gen 1.2), and the dove and the Flood (with the branch of hope, Gen 8.11), are designedly related to each other:[6] in its descent the Spirit makes for Jesus, for whom it is intended in a unique way (Mark: εἰς, without being identical with him (Luke and Matthew: ἐπ' αὐτόν; John adds the clarification of a 'remaining over him' in suspension). From the heavenly voice, we learn that the relationship that comes to be is the designation and installation of the chosen one, as well as his abiding inspiration:[7] the fullness of the Spirit, without limits, distinct from the partial measure of the Spirit given to the prophets,[8] 'for he whom God has sent utters the ῥήματα (deeds-words) of God, for it is not by measure that (God) gives (him) the Spirit' (Jn 3.34). It is precisely as the one who is subjected to the baptism of John that he becomes in his actions the one who baptises in the Holy Spirit (Mk 1.8 par.), and the one who dispenses 'spirit and life' when he speaks (Jn 6.63). He has no need in this himself to baptise (Jn 4.2); if his disciples carry the baptism of John further by baptising too, then this is his name (Jn 3.22, 26; 4.1),[9] i.e. they baptise into the new reality of Jesus that subsumes the prophetic reality of the Old Testament. When the 'baptism in fire' is added to its characterisation by Matthew and Luke as 'baptism in the Spirit', then this may well have referred on John's lips to the Old Testament Day of wrath (Lk 3.16–17, Mt 3.11–12); but for Jesus himself, baptised in the Spirit, it points forward to the end of his own mission: he will be the baptiser in fire, as the one who is baptised in the eschatological fire of God (Lk 12.49–50). Here the mission constituted at the baptism by John is proclaimed: to be burnt as a holocaust in the fire of God's wrath, as the 'Lamb of God' (Jn 1.29, 36: an allusion to the Servant of Yahweh, Is 53.7), coming from the judgment by water and striding towards the judgment by fire (2 Pet 3.6f.). The Baptist's urgent expectation—'Behold, the Day comes, burning like an oven!' (Mal 3.19)—is overtaken by the yet greater urgency which has taken this Day up into the existence of the one delegated. But in our context, the accent lies on the designation at the baptism as an overtaking and recapitulation of the whole proclamation of judgment by the prophets and by the 'law' earlier (Lev 26; Deut 27–28), and thus of the whole situation of God as partner in the covenant.

---

[5] On the question whether the divine voice originally said pais (Is 42, 1 LXX: servant, but also son) rather than huios, cf. J. Jeremias, art. pais Theou, TDNT V, pp. 698ff., bibliography ibid. p. 654.—Undoubtedly, the Danielic image of the son of man followed in the steps of the image of the servant of Yahweh; by himself, this Messiah who purely descended from above, judged and conquered could represent (with the theology of hypostases) still but one side of the synthesis that had to be attained.

[6] On other forms of the symbolism: W. Bauer, WNT (5th edn. 1958), pp. 1292f. Arndt-Gingrich, p. 657; Greeven, TDNT VI, pp. 63–72.

[7] Cf. the (Horus) sparrow-hawk behind the heads of the Pharaohs to give inspiration.

[8] Billerbeck on Jn 3.34 (II p. 431).

[9] The baptism of John, as parabolic synthesis of the whole reality of the old covenant, finds its goal so unequivocally in Jesus that when his disciples continue the old sign, they can intend as its content objectively only Jesus. In himself he is 'sacrament' enough, the unity of 'water and Spirit' (Jn 3.5)

2. Infancy. Reflexion shows the addition of the infancy narrative was necessary if the event of the baptism was to have nothing of chance about it, nothing of the character of a late addition (and thus of adoptionism). If what the later formulation in John calls the incarnation of the Word is to take place, then it must have taken place in the event of conception and birth. Things now converge that formerly seemed to exclude each other: birth through God and birth from the people, which is summarised and represented in the real symbol of the virgo filia Sion; the encounter of Baptist and Son must be moved forward to the encounter of her who is mother (through God the Spirit) and the child. This with his gaze directed on 'blood' (Jn 19.34) with an unwavering directness that is based in his mission, so that for the future the three form inseparably 'one witness' (1 Jn 5.8). In the last analysis it is he, and he alone, who administers baptism in the New Testament (Eph 5.26), it is he who in the church's baptism introduces those purified into his event of the end times (Rom 6.3ff.).

genuinely human ('physical') moving forward in time must contain spiritually the whole paradoxical recapitulation in itself; it can also draw into this prelude the later encounter of the Baptist and Jesus, and this is what the subtle composition of Luke has achieved, with complete mastery.

Whatever the problems in points of detail may be, the two genealogical tables have the clear intention of establishing Jesus as a true man in his descent from David and Abraham and the promises made to them. Both paths lead, not to Mary (who as a kinswoman of Elizabeth belongs in some way to the descent of Aaron), but first to Joseph, who is of Davidic descent and in accordance with the Biblical perspective counts as the legal father on grounds of the law, not on grounds of physical generation. The family tree is essential as an expression of the recapitulation of Israel, but it gives us only an external connection, however strongly the stylised play of the numbers points to Jesus as the end-point. The inner links are demonstrated by Luke and Matthew, each in his own way.

Luke writes his description of the infancy, which in its kernel doubtless goes back to historical reminiscences long meditated upon (1.66; 2.19, 51) with the stylistic device of allusions which transpose and thereby actualise decisive scenes and utterances in the Old Testament;[10] in this, the old text wholly becomes native soil on which the new event grows, and in which it sends down deep roots. But the soil shows its significance in what grows upon it: this fruit was intended from the outset to grow in this soil, to draw its strength and sweetness from it, and yet to owe the strength and sweetness to itself, not to the soil. Thus the entire manner of presentation takes on the character of being fully in suspense between promise and fulfilment, like a bud which will display its form only when it opens (in the commissioning at the baptism), something that pre-exists almost like a dream, which as a whole is in motion, in which 'already' and 'not yet' are bound into one another and cannot be distinguished. The later relationship of the Baptist and Jesus is anticipated first of all in the two narratives of miraculous annunciations, in which the one that comes later in time surpasses the earlier (which is orientated towards it): first the barren woman bears the child of an aged husband, through the mighty act of God (the situation of Abraham and Sarah, and of the parents of Samson and Samuel), and then the virgin gives birth, not to the child of any man, but directly through the power of God's Spirit. Before the two births are narrated, Luke weaves the events together in the scene of the visitation: through Mary, Elizabeth and her child are filled with the spirit of prophecy, and this picture anticipates the declaration, 'After me comes the one who was before me' (Jn 1.15, 30).

[10] On what follows, cf. above all René Laurentin, Structure et Théologie de Luc I–II (1957).

The identity of Mary is clear, if the angel's address to her is composed on the basis of Zeph 3.15ff. (and the texts related to this: Joel 2.21ff., Zech 2.14, 9.9f.): the daughter of Zion is to rejoice, the daughter of Jerusalem is not to fear; Yahweh will be 'in her womb' as 'king', as 'redeemer', whereby doubtless the new realisation of God's presence in the Temple of Zion was intended. 'The daughter of Zion, an abstract personification of Israel, is actualised in the person of Mary, who receives the messianic promise in the name of the people. The dwelling of Yahweh in the daughter of Zion is actualised in the mystery of the virginal conception.'[11] Is 7–11 helps to describe the giving of the child's name, his messianic commissioning, and the descent of the Spirit; Ex 40.35 provides the important word 'overshadowing', there used of the cloud of glory (kabod), which makes Mary as the embodied daughter of Zion also the living ark of the covenant, in which the eschatological glory of God definitively comes to dwell. The fact that it is Gabriel who undertakes both acts of annunciation points our thoughts directly back to Daniel (8.16; 9.21f.) and to his great prophecy of the seventy weeks: and as it turns out, the number of the days from the annunciation to Zechariah until the day of the entry of the 'glory of Israel' into the Temple (Lk 2.32) is indeed exactly four hundred and ninety days, or seventy weeks of seven days.[12] The scene of the visitation is formed on the basis of 2 Sam 6.2–11: the leaping of the child corresponds to the leaping dance of King David, the three months' dwelling of the 'Ark' in the house of Obededom corresponds to the three months' dwelling of Mary in the house of her cousin; Elizabeth's cry of wonder is composed in imitation of David's cry of wonder, and her greeting of Mary echoes the greeting of Judith after her victory (Lk 1.42=Judith 13.18f.). The birth is narrated using the material of the two prophecies of Micah, woven into each other (chs. 4 and 5): Bethlehem in Juda, the time of birth for the daughter of Zion, the place of birth outside the city in the fields (4.10), the motif of the shepherds, of the heavenly glory and of peace.[13] For the scene of the presentation in the Temple, apart from the motif of kabod and of the redeemer, Is 8.14 and Ez 14.17 are used: the stone of stumbling and the piercing sword that makes Mary, pierced through and divided, once again the real symbol of Israel. Her Magnificat shows how much she stands as the embodiment of the entire people in its believing and hoping 'remnant', for in its vocabulary and concepts it does not go beyond the late spirituality of the 'poor of Yahweh',[14] while in its first, more personal part (Lk 1.46–50) it lets the voice of the personified Israel be heard (the 'humble handmaid', on whose 'lowliness' God has 'looked with favour', is in accordance with tradition the daughter of Zion in her most genuine position), and characterises Israel's God through the unity of power, holiness and reliable mercy towards those who reverently venerate him.[15] The second part of the Magnificat four times describes the basic principle of the working of God's power: the 'overturning of the relationships of power' and the 'relationships of possession',[16] to which the (renewed) acceptance of the servant (Is 41.8ff.) Israel belongs. Finally, the Magnificat gathers all together into the original prophecy to Abraham, in whose person the whole

---

[11] Ibid. p. 67.

[12] E. Burrows, The Gospel of the Infancy (1940), pp. 41ff., taken over and expanded by Laurentin, pp. 48ff.: 'Une réalisation en miniature', p. 53.

---

[13] Established for each individual case in Laurentin, pp. 86ff.

[14] III, 2, 1, pp. 293–97.

[15] Ibid. pp. 133–37.

[16] E. Klostermann, Das Lukas-Evangelium (2nd edn. 1929), ad loc.

of society was united at the beginning, as in the end times it is united once again in Mary. Thus the Magnificat is the expression of the summary of Israel's history (in the purest speech of the piety of the Anawim), as its fulfilment breaks in, in the impulse of the transcendence which God alone can introduce to elevate its whole meaning. In Mary, the faith of the covenant partner finds its embodiment (Lk 1.45; 8.15; 11.27ff.), with its pure hope set on God, for therein is only 'poverty' and 'lowliness', so that this faith is also pure obedience to God's word of instruction: all of this means that the ideal position of Israel can become through God the presupposition for the coming of the Messiah. This is a satisfactory theological explanation for the motif of Mary's virginity: there is no need to refer back to the Hellenistic milieu in which motifs of divine mythology were current, for the virginity of Mary is explicable as the 'eschatological surpassing' of the Old Testament motif of the 'barren woman' who gives birth through God;[17] Israel's hopeful faith and obedience must entirely (in physical form) become concrete and personal, when it is a matter of the realisation of the promise of God, his dwelling with soul and body in the daughter of Zion. Dibelius and those who have repeated his words argue that the unity of Old Testament 'marriage' (with Joseph) and the virginity which is theologically required is historically impossible, and that this must be separated into the narrative of the 'son of the virgin' (without reference to Joseph, 1.27) and the narrative of the 'child in the manger' (born of a normal marriage): but this argument misses the point, that the son of the virgin can inherit the 'throne of his father David' only if he 'is reckoned as the son of Joseph' from a legal point of view (Lk 3.23). Besides, this argument does not recognise the remarkable suspension of the whole of Luke's infancy narrative, for which the disinterested openness of Mary to let herself be used as a handmaiden (either for the old covenant, or for the new) is characteristic. In this twilight, she can be simultaneously the one who considers prudently (1.29), the one who investigates the events and checks them (συμβάλλειν) in her heart (2.19, 51), and the one who is tried too far and does not understand (2.50); later too, she must play this double role, as the one who is sometimes paired with the unbelieving relations and is not received by her son, and sometimes praised as the believer, the one who stands by him at the cross. But the final mystery goes yet deeper than this. As the real symbol of the daughter of Zion, summarising and surpassing the daughter of Zion in the old covenant, she stands beside the Baptist who is the real symbol that surpasses the prophecy of the old covenant, and indeed the whole of salvation history—and, as mother of the one who comes definitively, it is she who must give the Spirit to the mother of the forerunner, and thus to John himself.

---

[17] Thus H. v. Campenhausen, 'Die Jungfrauengeburt in der Theologie der alten Kirche,' Heid. Ak. Wiss. (1962), certainly correctly. We may leave here undecided the question whether the LXX was moved to render the 'alma of Isaiah by parthenos through a mythical (Egyptian-hellenistic) schema, or whether this came about through the theological consideration that only an Israel that was untouched and utterly placed at the disposal of God (as the husband of the covenant)—unlike the Israel of Is 1.21, etc.—would be worthy and capable of bearing the Messiah. In the final point, Mary, it is not the allusion to Is 7.14 that is decisive, but the total 'incarnation of faith' in the presence of the Incarnation of the divine Word.

But how does she stand in relation to her son, who as Messiah is the fruit bestowed on her, while she as Zion has significance only for him and through him? The theology of Luke's chapters, full of hints and symbols, with its midrashic character, and its suggestiveness for later typology,[18] is supple enough to leave room for that 'circle' which later dogmatic theology has sought to master by means of the unavoidable concept of the 'prior redemption of Mary': the not merely approximate, but absolutely adequate correspondence of the faith of Mary/Zion, as this was required for the adequate incarnation of the Word of God (since this word stands in relationship to Zion as the physically and spiritually conceived child in relationship to the mother who gives to him likewise physically and spiritually), is thinkable only on the basis of a purity bestowed on Mary, a purity which owes its origin to the source of all purification, which is to flow down from the Cross. If this is correct, then Zion/Mary is already in anticipation the pure essence of the Church that is to come, which is produced from Christ's body and Spirit and is one body and one spirit with him, in the fulfilment of the posture of the faith of the Old Testament, of its hope and its perseverance in poverty, obedience and joy—just as she characterises the people of God that is centred upon Christ, the people of the entire Civitas Dei (of Old and New Testaments). The visionary of the Apocalypse saw this threefold nature of Zion/Mary/Church in the oneness of a single form,[19] and expressed besides this the unity between the woman and the ark of the covenant (Rev 11.19–12.1) and between the woman and the holy city (21.9ff.). He saw also in the twenty-four elders the diptych of 2 × 12.

---

[18] 'Nous sommes ici aux sources de la typologie' [We are here at the sources of the typology], Laurentin, op. cit. p. 53. 'Un des cas, où la réflexion midrashique . . . donne naissance à la typologie' [one of the cases where the midrashic reflection . . . gives birth to typology], p. 151; cf. pp. 93–94.

This whole theology in the transition from the old covenant of promise to the new covenant of fulfilment is written as a midrash, in the sense of mashal, 'in the double sense of comparison (bringing different prophetic texts into relationship with each other) and puzzle (a concealed thought presented to the wise for discovery and meditation)',[20] and this in such a way that 'the theology contained in it' remains 'inseparable from the form in which it is embedded'.[21] For it is one of its special charms that it portrays in the language of images, in a gentle suspension between the Old Testament 'spirituality of the poor' and the later New Testament spirituality of the carrying of the cross behind Jesus, the most tender, childlike way of thinking of the Son; we see the gentleness here, where the meekness (πραΰτης of the gospel is poured out over the whole, even over the punishment of Zechariah and over the words of the twelve-year-old Jesus to his parents, in a manner that is without parallel; it is this way of thinking that the Church will synthesise in the 'evangelical counsels'. Here it is 'incarnated' and lived before our eyes; [19] A. Kassing, Das Verhältnis von Kirche und Maria im 12. Kapitel der Apokalypse, Dissertation, Louvain 1957 (typewritten).

---

[20] Laurentin, op. cit. p. 117.

[21] Ibid. p. 119.

before the child is able to speak and act, this way of thinking has come with him to the world. The pericope of the annunciation lies under the sign of virginity, the pericope of the birth—whatever objections one may bring—under the sign of poverty, and the pericope of the circumcision and presentation in the Temple lies under the sign of obedience (for 'the law of Moses' and 'the law of God' continuously shade over into each other). Naturally, the three aspects together permeate the whole: Mary's obedience (in sharp contrast to the disobedience of Zechariah, which it surpasses) begins with her fiat, echoes through the Magnificat, and characterises the journey of Mary and Joseph to Bethlehem; her poverty is declared in the offering of the poor, the 'two doves', but is already present in the lowliness of the handmaiden and in the undistinguished town of Nazareth—Luke further develops the theme of poverty (5.11, 28; 6.20; 7.22; 9.3; 16.20ff.; 18.22; 21.3). Above all, it is the obedience which is emphasised: it bows to the edict of the all-powerful Soter and prince of peace Augustus, whose kingdom, excessively highly praised and destined never to be surpassed by any later kingdom,[22] signified the beginning of a new life.[23] Luke has placed the names of the emperor and his representative Quirinius in his history with a deliberate intention: over against the kingdom of power which collects the tax, stands the kingdom of powerlessness which obeys and pays the tax.[24] In the appendix to the infancy narrative,[25] which breaks its symmetry and makes the transition to the adult life of Jesus, in the episode of the twelve-year-old, the obedience is already explicitly christological: 'my Father' (God) is set in hard contrast to 'your father and I', so roughly that the earthly parents 'do not understand' that the once dreamlike light of the kabod that shone over the infancy narrative (from the angels who appeared to the shepherds surrounded in glory, to the Gloria of the heavenly hosts, to the 'glory of your people Israel' in the song of Simeon) is suddenly quenched, so that it may make room for the wholly real presence of the kabod, of the 'weight' of God. Already the sword of the Word cuts through the soul of Zion/Mary; already, through Jesus' own obedience, it divides in two, just as later, through his summons to follow him, it divides the Ekklesia into two 'classes' that are incomprehensible for themselves (the worldly class in the family, 2.39–40, 51–52; and the class of God in the Temple, 2.45–49), without any previous explanation, as a fait accompli that makes visible the cruciform structure of his Church.

---

[22] 'The epiphany of the emperor has fulfilled the hopes and prayers of the preceding time, and surpassed them. For not only has he put into the shadow all bringers of blessings who preceded him, but he has also taken away from those yet to come all prospect of doing more than he has done' (from the senatorial resolution to transfer the autumn equinox to the birthday of the emperor, moved by the governor Paulus Fabius Maximus, quoted following E. Stauffer, Jerusalem und Rom, 1957, p. 29).

[23] Proposition of the governor (ibid. p. 30), with which should be compared the 4th Eclogue of Vergil and Aeneid VI 791f.

[24] E. Stauffer, 'Die Geschichte vom Zinsgroschen', in Christus und die Caesaren (1952), pp. 121–149.

[25] Here the influence of the haggadic description of Samuel's childhood on Luke becomes visible: according to Josephus (Ant. V 10.3), Samuel begins to prophesy at the age of twelve, and according to a rabbinic tradition of the third century he is threatened with death because of a

Even more strongly than the Lucan infancy narrative, the infancy narrative of Matthew clothes itself[26] in the images of the haggadic narratives of the childhood and persecution of Old Testament heroes. This means, theologically speaking, the Matthew seeks more deliberately to portray the fate of Jesus as the recapitulation of the preceding salvation history in the persons of its great representatives. An historical kernel disputation over questions of the law with his teacher. On the other hand, there are numerous parallels in the narrative of Zechariah especially with the haggadic infancy narratives of Isaac (annunciation of the son, of his name, of his mission, of the visitation by God) and of Samson (voluntary silence of the mother, because she has not believed the angel who announced it), to name only the most important. On questions of detail, P. Winter, 'The Proto-source of Luke', Nov. T. 1 (1956), pp. 186–199. On Lk 2.48–50, cf. the large monograph of R. Laurentin, Jésus au Temple, Et. Bibl. 1966.

---

[26] On the accusation on the part of Judaism that the Gospels have changed the original logia of the Lord into a narrative of the childhood and life of Jesus, cf. Shlomo Pines, The Jewish-Christians in the Early Centuries of Christianity according to a new source (Jerusalem 1966); review by Daniélou in RSR 55 (1967), pp. 96–99.

(as this is presupposed for every haggadic amplification) can be discerned on the basis of the things held in common with Luke—Davidic descent, birth in Bethlehem, virginal birth, the giving of the name in advance by the angel, his youth spent in Nazareth, allusions to Mic 5 and (this is to be supposed in Luke) to Is 7.14. For the rest, Matthew goes his own way, a way that is above all characterised by the manner in which the four last episodes of his five form an indivisible whole: the star sets in motion the king's will to destroy, and this will sets in motion the flight to Egypt, the murder of the children, and the return to the Holy Land.

The narrative, which is offered as an explanatory appendix to the genealogy,[27] of Joseph's suspicion, his enlightenment, and his consequent taking of his betrothed Mary into his house stands by itself. The motif of suspicion may also be a haggadix interpretation,[28] but the principal concern of the narrator is to establish the Davidic descent through Joseph's taking to his home his wife who has conceived through the Holy Spirit. In the midpoint of the second chapter, we have the narratives concerning the child Moses and concerning the flight to Egypt of Jacob-Israel when he was pursued by

---

[27] As has been clearly demonstrated by A. Vögtle, 'Die Genealogie Mt 1, 2–16 und die matthäische Kindheitsgeschichte', BZ NF 8 (1964), pp. 45–58, 239–262, 9 (1965), pp. 32–48.

[28] In Slavonic Enoch 23 (ed. Vaillant, 1952), there is the suspicion of the priest Nir (brother of Noah and second son of Lamech), who finds his wife pregnant and wishes to send her away; she dies, but the child is born miraculously, and in a dream the priest is told that the child will be 'my priest of all priests, for ever: Melchizedek'. Nir praises the Lord, 'because your word has created a high priest in . . . my wife'. A new discovery in Qumran suggests that the legend could be pre-Christian: A. S. van der Woude, 'Melchisedek als himmlische Erlösungsgestalt in den neugefundenen eschatologischen Midrashim in der Qumran-Höhle XI', Oudtest. Studien 14 (1965), pp. 354–373. It is possible that the idea that God is not only active together with human beings in the conception (through a man) of the great figures of salvation, but also 'models' the child in the mother's womb (e.g., Ps.-Philo, Lib. Ant. Bib. 23.7, plasmavi eum in matre eius [I have moulded him in his mother]), and indeed in some circumstances makes the child through his word (quite apart from the frequent theme of the conception through good or evil angels), can have been at home on Palestinian soil. Cf. C. Perrot, 'Les récits d'enfance dans la Haggada', RSR 55 (1967), pp. 481–518, esp. 491f.

Laban.[29] The starting-point of all this is, of course, the mysterious star, which is attested only very scantily in the haggada,[30] but in the Gospel sets at the beginning the strong universalist accent with which it will close, an accent that includes adoration (2.11 = 28.9,17). From now on, Jesus in the fate he lives is first of all the new Moses, as the lively preaching in the synagogue of that period portrayed him. The characteristics overlap: the annunciation of the one who sets free, the announcing of his birth to Pharaoh/Herod, the assembling of all the astrologers to interpret the dream, as a result of which Pharaoh orders that all male children be drowned; Moses' father receives in a dream the annunciation of the son who is to be born without birth-pangs, and he lays the child in the basket among the reeds, entrusting him to providence—Pharaoh's childless daughter goes to bathe because of a dream, finds the child, and has it 'instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians' (as Stephen's speech puts it, Acts 7.22). But Jesus is not only the new Moses: pushing further back into the origins of the covenant, he is to be the new Israel too. As so many of those who have been given great missions received an image of their later experiences in childhood persecution, so Jesus is persecuted, and he is led by providence to Egypt, with the promise that this same providence will lead him back from there into the land of the fathers.[31] 'In the fate of the messianic child, the saving flight of the "Israel" that included in itself the people of God to Egypt, and the Exodus experience of Israel, are repeated.'[32] It is indeed important that Matthew sets on all five episodes the seal of a quotation from the written Bible, but taken together, the quotations stand for the entirety of salvation history, which for Matthew is no less embodied in the oral tradition (interpreted in preaching and haggada).[33] Many traits of the Matthaean infancy narrative point foward to the special destiny of the one who is to be sent later—e.g., it is characteristic that 'all Jerusalem' is confused (instead of rejoicing) at the announcement of the birth of the Messiah, so that his rejection by the people is already portrayed; but only a small quantity of material points to the absolute transcendence of Jesus over against the salvation history that is recapitulated by him.[34] In Matthew, this becomes clear only in the last panel of the preparatory triptych.

---

[29] D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism (1956), pp. 190f. The midrashic text reads, 'What did Laban want to do to our father Jacob? Pharaoh ordered only the killing of the males, but Laban sought to destroy the whole race, as it is written, "The Aramaean sought to destroy my father, and he went down to Egypt . . . driven by the Word of God"' (Deut 26.5: the text quoted here arises from a slight alteration of the text, and gives a substantially more plausible meaning than the usual beginning of the famous 'creed', 'A wandering Aramaean was my father . . .').

[30] In late infancy narratives of Abraham, where the 'wise men and magi of King Nimrod' (who will persecute the child) see the great star on the night of his birth, and at once interpret it as a sign of the birth of the one who 'is to kill all the kings of the earth and inherit their kingdom'. Perrot, art. cit. p. 486; M. Bourke, 'The literary genus of Matthew 1–2', CBQ 22 (1960), pp. 160–175.

[31] It is characteristic that Matthew needs two signs in dreams for the return home: the first, as fulfilment of the explicit instruction to Moses at

3. Temptation. The profound immersion at the Baptism into salvation history, which was itself actually moving towards this point, is, with the narrative of the childhood of Jesus, an

---

Ex 4.19–20, leads (like Israel's wilderness journey) only as far as the 'land of Israel' (Mt 2.20), and a second explicit instruction is necessary, to lead the holy family to the designated place Nazareth (2.22) which henceforth is to be the historical dwelling place of Jesus.

[32] Vögtle, art. cit. (n. 27 above), p. 255.

[33] On the theological understanding of the Midrash, cf. especially the fundamental works of Renée Bloch, 'Moïse dans la tradition rabbinique', in Moïse, l'homme de l'alliance (1954); idem, art. Midrash in DBS 5 (1955), 1263–1283, with bibliography, and articles in the Cahiers Sioniens (1954, 1955). A. G. Wright, 'The literary genus Midrash', CBQ 28 (1966), pp. 105–138, 417–457. The fact that the narrative of Cyrus' youth as related by Herodotus (I 104ff.) has so many points of comparison with the Midrashim, makes its influence probable, all the more so as Cyrus was the 'anointed of the Lord' for Deutero-Isaiah (ch. 45).

[34] Considering the clear haggadic parallels, we should avoid bringing the murder of the children at Bethlehem too closely into relationship with the vicarious suffering of the Messiah—as itself the vicarious anticipation of the Cross, and simultaneously making the Cross necessary. Only from the theological reflection on the uniqueness of the suffering of the Cross, does such a relationship receive a meaning and an ecclesiological significance.

allusive[35] recapitulation of the chief stages of this salvation history. Thus the episode of the temptation, which immediately follows the baptism, becomes an interior act of assuming the situation of Israel in the covenant with God; for at the baptism, Jesus is both endowed with the Spirit that commissions him, and designated as the chosen one of the eschatological age (the tempter too addresses him as 'the Son of God', at Mt 4.3). Accordingly, it is fitting, in the deepest sense of the word (πρέπον ἐστίν, Mt 3.15), that the symbolic-sacramental immersion is 'immediately' (Mk 1.12) followed by the spiritual-existential immersion; it is the Spirit who has just been received, who 'drives' Jesus 'out into the wilderness', 'and he was in the wilderness forty days, tempted by Satan; and he was with the wild beasts; and the angels ministered to him' (Mk 1.13). His being in the wilderness[36] corresponds above all to the original situation of Israel, alone with God (a place and situation, in which John has previously lived): this is a nearness to God in prayer, but equally a perilousness, an easiness of temptation that lies in this terrible proximity—an inescapable exposure to the absoluteness of grace, and thus to the requirement of God. It is here above all that the gospel relates πράγματα πεπληροφορήμενα (Lk 1.1), events that were attempted, bungled, abandoned when half-accomplished by Israel, but now are endured, experienced to the finish, and thereby brought to their accomplishment, in a unique act of assuming them and recapitulating them. The scene still belongs to the prelude: it is not an isolated act of Jesus, but the shouldering of a concrete situation.[37] The forty days are a repetition of the forty years of Israel in the wilderness, the forty 'days and nights' (this is made explicit at Mt 4.2) that Moses spends fasting before God (Ex 34.28), and the forty days that Elijah spends alone, nourished only by God, as he makes his way to Mount Horeb (1 Kings 19.8).[38] Jesus too fasts; he does not wish to live from bread, but from the Word of God alone;[39] according to Mark and Luke, the temptation lasts existentially throughout the whole period of fasting, while according to Matthew, the temptation is set at the close, that is to say, at the point of Jesus' greatest weakness. In early texts, but occasionally even in quite late texts,[40] it is God himself who appears as the tempter, i.e. as the one who puts all the righteous most seriously to the test, for he can come to know their hearts only through this experience of being exposed.[41] Pious men who are sure of their purity wish and yearn for such a putting to the proof by God (Ps 139.23), but [35] The hint suffices; there is nowhere a systematisation in the modern sense, and hence a typology as mechanical as that of H. Sahlin (Zur Typologie des Johannes-Evangeliums, Uppsala and Leipzig 1950) can be constructed only by forcing the texts. It is equally difficult to demonstrate that the three temptations of Jesus in the wilderness are reflected in John's gospel, without being mechanical in the handling of the text (H. Preisker, 'Zum Charakter des Johannesevangeliums', in Festschrift G. Wobbermin, pp. 379–384).

---

[36] On the theology of the wilderness: S. Nyström, Beduinentum und Jahwismus (1946); A. Haldar, The Notion of the Desert in Sumero-Accadian and West-Semitic Religions (1950); R. W. Funk, 'The Wilderness', JBL 78 (1959), pp. 205–214; W. Schmauch, 'In der Wüste', In memoriam E. Lohmeyer (1951), pp. 202–223.

---

[37] On the history of the individual interpretations, cf. especially E. Fascher, Jesus und der Satan, Hallische Monographien 11 (1940); R. Schnackenburg, 'Der Sinn der Versuchung Jesu bei den Synoptikern', ThQ 132 (1952), pp. 297–326. On baptism and temptation as the recapitulation of Israel, cf. N. A. Dahl, Das Volk Gottes (1941), p. 166.

[38] The number occurs in the apocrypha also: Vita Adae 6; Apoc. Abr. 12.1.

[39] The temptation narrative functions 'in Lk like a detailed illustration of a struggle of Jesus with his foe, a struggle that for the rest is hidden, but constant. This is first underlined in the closing statement that now the devil had finished every temptation—not only the three that have been related in detail, then, but also the preceding temptations that were only briefly mentioned. But this is not the end of the persecutions by this persistent enemy: he leaves Jesus only for a period', Schnackenburg, art. cit. p. 323.

[40] 'God left him (Hezekiah) to himself, in order to try him and to know all that was in his heart', 2 Chr 32.31. Jas 1.13 is an explicit rejection of a possible misuse of this idea, but still in such a way that James (1.2f., like 1 Pet 1.6) understands the temptation to come as an occasion for joy (since the temptation is God's act of taking us seriously). This idea should not disturb Christians, precisely because of Christ himself (1 Pet 4.12f.).

[41] Perhaps also originally in the Book of Job, where Satan appears for the first time as a mediating figure who assumes the role of tempter: G. Fohrer, 'Überlieferung und Wandlung der Hiobslegende', in Festschrift F. Baumgärtel (1959), pp. 41–62. On the whole question: art. πεῖρα etc., ThW VI (Seesemann), art. examinatio, Dict. Spir. IV (1961), 1849–1866 (Hasso Jaeger).

Jesus, who knows the depths of this experience, bids his disciples pray, 'Lead us not into temptation'.[42]

With J. Dupont,[43] one may attempt to understand the three temptations of Jesus as the formal recapitulation of Israel's three trials in the wilderness, to which allusion is made by the quotations from Deuteronomy. The first (stones to bread) would be a reference to the episode of the manna (Ex 16, Num 11), the second (to challenge God by means of a miracle) a reference to the episode of Massah (Ex 17.1–7), and the third (adoration of the devil) a reference to the situation that lay ahead in Canaan, an anticipation of which appears in the scene with the golden calf; the very high mountain could be a surpassing of Nebo, from which Moses looks out over the whole of the holy land. 'The three temptations of Israel can therefore be considered as a kind of summary of the history of its path through the wilderness',[44] and Jesus endures them as a new Moses who does not falter. But these references have at most a background role, in the sense of an 'allusive theology'; they do not determine the precise form of the temptations of Jesus. On the other hand, one must not so generalise and moralise them that they are nothing more than the peirasmos that awaits every righteous man.[45] H. Riesenfeld is right when he, following many others, labels the temptation narrative as specifically messianic, in opposition to this generalising view.[46] It is that particular putting to the proof which is required, according to the Letter to the Hebrews, in order to make the chosen Son the high priest who 'can help those who are tempted' (2.18): that means, in order to 'teach him obedience through suffering' (5.8). This is the obedience that Israel as servant and son ought to have rendered before the naked immensity of the glory of God, even when 'all the kingdoms of the world with their glory' (δόξα, Mt 4.8) lie in the other pan of the scales. This obedience can become actualised only in the experience of proof which submerges the only one who believes in God and depends on him, in the medium of the spirit that opposes God; he must enter the night of faith, in which no other glory from God remains but the weight of his Self and the nakedness of his Word. Such a night is a shadow cast in advance by the passion.[47] It is the essence of the covenant, stripped of all accretions: on the one side is only God, the 'highest good' with no earthly reward, God to whom one must adhere only because of God himself—on the other side, the pure obedience in faith of the partner, who wagers absolutely everything on the God whose covenant he enters, because God has laid himself bare to him, even to the depths of his heart, and has made known to him, in his loving election of him, the incomprehensible weakness of his condition as one bound to men. For this reason, it is possible for the partner to be tempted to make trial of the extent of his power over this loving weakness of God. The real and final temptation is the temptation to put God to the proof: ἐκπειράζειν τὸν θεόν. This must be the essential temptation of the one who is essentially the chosen servant and son, who de jure has all power over the Father's heart. And this is precisely what Israel did in the wilderness, 'at the day of peirasmos in the wilderness, when your fathers made trial of me and put me to the test' (Heb 3.8f. = Ps 95.9).

---

[42] Thus all MSS. for Mt 6.13 = Lk 11.4; the weakening form, 'Do not allow that we be brought into temptation' is found first in Marcion and Tertullian, Or. 8.

[43] J. Dupont, 'L'Arrière-fond biblique de récit des tentations de Jésus', NTS 3 (1957), pp. 287–314; idem, 'L'origine du récit des tentations de Jésus au désert', RB 73 (1966), pp. 30–76. Similarly, Schniewind, Matthäus (NTD) ad loc.

[44] Op. cit. p. 292.

[45] J. H. Korn, Peirasmos. Die Versuchung der Gläubigen in der griechischen Bibel, BWANT 4F, 20H (1937).

[46] H. Riesenfeld, 'Le caractère messianique de la tentation au désert', in: La venue du Messie, Recherches Bibliques 6 (1962), pp. 51–63. Riesenfeld's comment on the second temptation in Matthew is important, the temptation to throw himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple. According to a Jewish speculation on Deut 1.31, the divine glory (shekinah) had carried the people as in a cloud, so that there arises a parallel between

We have here not three distinct temptations, but 'only one gradual intensification'[48] of the same temptation: it is a

---

this act of being carried and Jesus' act of being caught up by the shekinah that dwells in the Temple.

[47] E. Best, The Temptation and the Passion: the Markan Soteriology (1965).

[48] R. Schnackenburg, art. cit. p. 318.

question of the absolute obedience of the chosen servant of God, with whom the staircase of the prophetic obedience definitively touches the ground of this earth. For by identifying himself absolutely in his posture of response with the Word of God, the obedient Son destroys any distance that remains between the 'mediator' and the 'Word'. The three scriptural quotations are the intensification of one and the same thing: to live from the Word of God, not to put God to the test, to adore God alone and serve him alone. And thus the one who is chosen makes response to the one who chose him at the baptism.[49] In the existential experience that lasts forty days, ὑπομονή—that which endures through all things—is now taken into the concrete experience of Jesus, and this will guarantee that all that he will do and suffer in the future is the secure expression and continually renewed accomplishment to the full of the covenant.

Accordingly, the unique messianic temptation, in which all the peirasmoi of the old people come together and are transcended, can become the basis for the peirasmoi of the new people, the Church. It was the Church herself that gave the temptation narratives a formulation that would serve for catechesis.[50] Therefore the fathers were not altogether wrong when they provisionally bracketed off the temptations of Israel and interpreted the narratives in the light of the human situation, presenting Jesus as the figure that contrasts with Adam who was tempted in paradise.[51] And since peirasmos belongs to the being of man as such, E. Fascher is not wrong when he lays so much emphasis on the scenes of temptation which continually repeat themselves in the life of Jesus: his struggle with the demons persists through the whole of his life, as he conquers Satan's territory step by step and pushes his forces back, and in this struggle he has begun in the wilderness temptation scene by 'binding first the strong man, so that he may plunder his house' (Mk 3.27). The first act of standing firm in a situation that is opposed to God is the conditio sine qua non of the path to which he is sent on earth, a path that has its goal in the decisive struggle in the Garden of Olives and the abandonment on the cross, without anticipating this struggle. Jesus is unceasingly 'put to the test' by his opponents—'stumbling blocks are laid' before him, signs are demanded from him, seemingly impossible interpretations of Scripture are required of him ('Why do you put me to the test?', Mk 12.15), as far even as the great temptation through Peter, who wishes to avert the Passion and who is sent packing with the same words, 'Get behind me, Satan!' (Mt 16.23 = 4.10); and so his life is an abiding act of dividing, of discernment of the spirits.

---

[49] G. H. P. Thompson, 'Called-Proved-Obedient. A Study in the Baptism and Temptation Narratives of Matthew and Luke', JTS (1960), pp. 1–12.

[50] J. Dupont, art. cit. p. 298.

[51] K. P. Köppen, Die Auslegung der Versuchungsgeschichte unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der alten Kirche, Beitr.z.Gesch.d.bibl.Exeg. 4 (1961). Besides the anthropological orientation of the patristic exegesis, their consideration of the nexus of temptation and Passion is also important (especially on the basis of Lk 4.13): Köppen, op. cit. pp. 66–71. Further, cf. M. Steiner, La tentation de Jésus dans l'interpretation patristique de S. Justin à Origène (1962). H.-G. Leder, 'Sündenfallserzählung und Versuchungsgeschichte. Zur Interpretation von Mk 1, 12f.', ZNW 54 (1963), pp. 188–216.

This division of spirit and contrary spirit passes with constant precision and subtlety through the Word of God itself. Since the devil is above all a shrewd scripture-scholar, it is already necessary in the threefold combat of the first temptation to distinguish between true and false faith and confidence in God, between true and false use of the power of the commission, just as it will be necessary in the question of the denarius of tribute-money to distinguish between the emperor's requirement as it affects political power and the emperor's requirement as it affects worship;[52] in the question of the Temple tax, it will be necessary to distinguish between compulsion and appropriateness (Mt 17.25ff.), in the question of the offering, between the command of God and the tradition (Mt 15.3), in the permission for divorce, between a legal concession and the original will of God (Mt 19.7f.), and so on. The scriptural quotations on the lips of Satan and the enemies of Jesus show that the struggle is often enough to be fought out sub contrario. Where God's Word appears in the world, such a confusion between God and Satan, Holy Spirit and spirit that opposes God, becomes possible, and so it is absolutely necessary to learn to distinguish between the spirits (Heb 5.14). The debate about Beelzebub, in which Jesus is accused of expelling the devil through the devil's own spirit, and thus of having 'an impure spirit', ends with the discernment of spirits in the form of a sentence of absolute judgment: 'Whoever blasphemes against the Holy Spirit will never be forgiven' (Mk 3.29). Anyone 'reading and understanding this should be able to see that this man's life has to end in a violent death'.[53] [52] E. Stauffer, Christus und die Caesaren (1952), pp. 121–149.

---

This discernment of spirits continues prominently in the same sense, with the same profound dimensions, in the early Church and indeed in all the history of the Church, for it is always necessary to make the distinction about the meaning of the law—Paul stands on one side, Matthew and James make the discernment on the other side; the meaning of discontinuance must be discerned, as must the meaning of fulfilment to the last iota. What does the summarising of all the commandments in the one commandment of love mean? Does it mean that this act of love (for so we must call it, with John) leaves the law behind it (although the law had already included this commandment of love), or does it take up the law and integrate it with itself, and bring it over into the new wholeness? Who discerns the spirits in that situation, and decides whether they are a blasphemy of God or a worship of him? Who decides what counts against the works, or for them?

---

[53] E. Fascher, op. cit. p. 37.

2. ORIENTATION

a. Centre of the Word in what is not a word

Here we must pause and go back a step. The handing-over of the keys by the baptist, who prepares the way, to the one who brings fulfilment, the recapitulation of the way through Jesus, the proclamation of Simeon that he has seen the kabod of Israel, long missed, not only in an apocalyptic vision (Ez 43.4f) but really entering the Temple (Lk 2.30–32), and indeed the entire introduction of the form of Jesus into his public ministry, might give the impression that the fulfilment he brings is nothing more than the purified synthesis, and thereby the surpassing, of the rudiments that lay to hand. According to Luke, the same spirit that drove him into the wilderness drives him thereafter into Galilee, to preach in the synagogues, and the first programmatic sermon which he gives in Nazareth—visiting the synagogue on the sabbath, as was his custom—is an interpretation of Is 61.1f.: the messianic age, when the good news of the year of God's salvation will be preached to the poor, has 'today' (Lk 4.21) 'been fulfilled' (πεπλήρωται, for the 'Spirit of the Lord' (4.18) rests on the interpreter himself. But this smooth passage on, as it were, level ground from promise to fulfilment in the 'today' is at once thrown into confusion by a rift in the stratification: the final sentence of the text from Isaiah, 'to proclaim the day of vengeance of our God', is left out by the preacher, but reappears immediately afterwards in the interpretation—Jesus refuses to perform the deeds of the prophets (which he had performed in Capernaum) in his home-town, and he refuses to work as a physician among those who know him.[1] This is the reply to the refusal of his own people to acknowledge him in his prophetic mission; indeed, he causes 'offence' (cf. Mk 6.1–5). He sets himself against them in solidarity with the prophetic fates of Elijah and Elisha, and now suddenly the 'day of vengeance' which had been left out of the reading is accomplished by the hearers: they become furious, rise up and drive him out of the town, so that they may hurl him down from the clifftop on which their town was built. It is as if Jerusalem suddenly stood, geographically and theologically, in the place of Nazareth: from the very beginning of the sermon, the vista opens up through the fate of the prophets on to the final drama.

---

[1] P. Oxy.I,1 attests that the two logia belong together: 'A prophet is not welcome in his fatherland, and no doctor works healings on his neighbour.' Similarly in the Coptic Gospel of Thomas: 'Jesus said, "No prophet is welcome in his city. No doctor heals those who know him."' (Quoted from Grundmann, Lukas, p. 122)

In Mark too, the preaching of the kingdom has scarcely begun, when they begin to take counsel about the death of Jesus (Mk 3.6). Matthew introduces the life of proclamation with the prophecy of salvation (Is 9.1f.), the prophecy of the great light for the land by the sea-coast (Mt 4.12–16), and the programmatic speech appears likewise to pass smoothly from promise to fulfilment—all the more so, since no iota of the law is to pass away, and it seems that nothing more is involved than an 'exceeding' of the existing righteousness (Mt 5.17–20). The beatitudes and the Lord's prayer are the purified quintessence of the piety of the 'poor of Yahweh'. But once again, a foreign element is woven into the great structure: from the very start, the hearers and followers are taken up into the prophetic fate—persecution and disgrace—'for my sake', so that Jesus silently reckons a fortiori with this fate for himself (5.11–12). Then—with special explicitness in Matthew—he opposes his 'I say to you' to the traditional word of the law, i.e. the word of Moses. Finally, he appoints this 'I' of his as judge of the end-times: the eternal salvation and damnation of the hearers will be decided, not only on the basis of their putting his teaching into practice, but on their judgment of his person (7.22f.).

This means that for the evangelists, the understanding of promise-fulfilment which we have here cannot be grasped on the level of the 'prophetic'. It is an aspect of the essential character of Jesus that this level is not passed over: it belongs to the recapitulation, without which there would be no 'fulfilment' of what was promised. But the evangelists do not characterise Jesus as a prophet (they express thereby only the opinion of the crowd about the words and deeds of Jesus),[2]

[2] The people hold him to be a prophet: Mt 21.11, 46; as a rumour or nor does Jesus characterise himself as a prophet, but rather places himself with his particular fate in the succession of the martyred prophets: this is true both as regards his failures (Mt 13.57 par.; Jn 4.44) and his murder at the hands of the Jerusalem that kills the prophets (Lk 13.33).[3] His way and his person stand on a different level from that of 'Jonah' (the prophet) or 'Solomon' (the wisdom) (Mt 12.41f. par.), or even David (the kingdom) (Mt 22.41ff.) or the Temple ordering (Mt 12.6).[4] Even if his speech corresponds to the sayings of the prophets,[5] especially when he interprets Scripture by referring to what is to come (and distinguishes between what is to come through him, and what is to come with him);[6] even if his miracles resemble the miracles of the supposition: Mt 16.14 (Lk 9.19: Mk 8.28), Mk 6.15; Lk 9.8; the people acclaim Jesus as a great prophet who guarantees the visitation of God: Lk 7.16. The disciples on the road to Emmaus describe him as 'a prophet mighty in word and deed before God and all the people' (Lk 24.19; cf. what is said about Moses at Acts 7.22); similarly, the Samaritan woman and the man born blind address him as prophet (Jn 4.19; 9.17).—Distinct from this is the identification of Jesus by the people with 'the' prophet, the one prophesied by Moses in Deut 18; this only in Jn (with reference to the baptist, 1.21, 25; to Jesus, 6.14; 7.40, 52). At Acts 3.22f. there is an allusion to the text from Deut 18, in order to raise it immediately into its higher messianic significance.

---

[3] Indirectly, Mk 13.22 and Mt 24.24 could be added to the list. In the sequence of logia at Mt 10.40–42, the prophet is the intermediary stage between Jesus and the 'righteous man'. The assuming of the 'sign of Jonas' only allows a comparison to be made: Mt 12.39.

[4] On the whole theme: F. Gils, Jésus Prophète d'après les évangiles synoptiques (1967), with bibliography.

[5] Of course, liberal theology liked to interpret Jesus on the level of a prophet. J. Weiss (Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, 3rd edn. 1964) describes him as 'the greatest prophet' (p. 155); even if Jesus 'held himself to be the one specifically chosen, who was more than a prophet' (p. 64), 'still the fundamental character of the preaching of Jesus is precisely prophecy' (p. 71), at least in his 'rare moments of prophetic enthusiasm', 'of pneumatic ecstasy' (p. 90), etc. Cf. also Weinel, Neutestamentliche Theologie (2nd edn. 1913), who emphasises the non-apocalyptic (because simple and uncalculating) character of Jesus' statements about the future: 'All this sets Jesus in the line of the prophets, and not in the line of the apocalypticists' (p. 61).

[6] His relationship to the Old Testament 'can be deduced only from a special consciousness of his mission in Jesus, more precisely from the prophets in many ways;[7] even if the harshness of the words of his summons itself picks up the callings to the prophets;[8] yet the evangelists have no central interest in showing that Jesus is a prophet,[9] even if they depict him as one who consciously fulfils the Scripture[10] that is 'his natural element'.[11]

Although prophets committed their lives to the service of God's Word in such a way that they threw life with him into the balance and—as Jesus understood it—normally had to pay for their ministry with their life, yet no prophet prophesied his own death. But this, at least in the understanding of the first community, is what the One who is more than a prophet did. The one who appointed himself as the standard gauge of the law by raising himself above the law and above Moses—as Jesus indubitably repeatedly did, directly and indirectly—brought the claim which was made thereby directly into relation with his own death. He paid for such effrontery in advance, by consciously taking death upon himself, and if he did this in no foolhardy gamble, but in a mission justified precisely on the basis of Scripture, then he expressly displaced the emphasis of his acts and words on to this death, the baptism which he yearns to endure once and for all (Lk 12.50). And if miracles are described as being linked to 'loss of power' (Mk 5.30), then this is no primitive magical understanding, but an indicator of the readiness to pay with the total loss of power for the true miracle that is to be certainty of possessing the power of the divine Spirit which makes prophetic activity possible . . . The Gospels relate the consciousness of being sent, but they speak exceedingly seldom of the inspiration of Jesus, although the historian, knowing himself to be on safe ground here, ought to be truly astonished at this': E. Käsemann, Der Ruf der Freiheit (1968), p. 39.

---

[7] E.g. in the multiplication of loaves (2 Kg 5.42ff.) or the raising of the young man from Nain (1 Kg 17.8–24).

[8] 1 Kg 19.19ff.

[9] Thus correctly H. Riesenfeld, 'Jesus als Prophet', in: Spiritus et Veritas (Eutin, 1953), pp. 135–148. Bibliography on the whole question in ThW VI, 781–783.

[10] J. Haenel, 'Der Schriftbegriff Jesus', in: BFChTH 1, 24, 5–6 (1919), pp. 197ff.

[11] P. Feine, Theologie des NT (8th edn. 1950), p. 21.

worked. Only so is it possible to explain how bodily healing and the forgiveness of sins can be unabashedly set beside each other as 'equally easy' (Mk 2.9), where of course the visible is but the indicator of the essential thing that is invisible. In Israel, payment must be made for the forgiveness of sins: who is ready to pay here?

Now for the first time we catch sight of the decisive matter that makes it so hard to speak of what is Christian, so hard to get a view of it at all. Inasmuch as the dimension of promise and fulfilment promises us a relationship that may be surveyed, it is absolutely secondary. Both are 'words'—even if God's words are always aimed at deeds and result from deeds—but the death of Christ is no longer a word; it is silence, the silence and death of God as the fulfilment of the speaking, promising, living God. What we call Resurrection is not at all the continuation (after three days) of what was spoken or done beforehand. Death is death, with a definitive quality; the life that came to an end in time is finished, and does not return again. No matter how calmly a dying man comes to his end, no matter how deeply he is reconciled to it, his death writes the final word. This is what it is to be human, even if the God with whom these mortal men had made their covenant was 'not a God of the dead, but of the living' in the Old Testament (and Jesus supposes that this is known, Mt 22.32), and even if the promise that came from this God incomprehensibly broke through the boundaries of earthly existence, as 'the promise, that they should be heirs of the world' (Rom 4.13). Here we can see at once the inner impossibility of the entire old covenant: how can a covenant of the immortal with mortals have any meaning? Man rebels at the barrier that cannot be broken down, he accuses God of unrighteousness and takes up a stronger position over against him.[12] And with the unfinished problem of death, the unfinished problem of judgment over man's life projects itself back in distorted form into the image of God, so that the phantom of double predestination—congealing and absolutising the harrowing question about God's justice (Ps

---

[12] III/2,1, pp. 306–313.

88)—is the only answer that late Judaism has to offer.[13] 'With regard to our subject, this means that in the old covenant a clear, impassable boundary-line is drawn before the appearing of God's glory: the fact that death has not been overcome.'[14] But, formulated more radically, this means the fact that man's radical problem has not been overcome, even in the presence of God. Abraham's hope is hope 'against all hope' in a far deeper sense than he himself could realise: for him it was a question of descendants who should fill the world, but in itself the hope required the bursting of the boundaries of death which as such belong constitutively to man.[15] This means not-death in death, word in what is not word, fulfilment in failure. In the old covenant, God's power and the abyss of chaos stood mythologically over against each other,[16] and although the abyss endured in its state of opposition to God, God had power over it and could lead down into it and bring up out of it again; there existed a 'mobility of God' in relationship to the chaos, a puzzling 'conniving with what was lower',[17] that could scarcely be expressed while remaining within the categories of the Old Testament. There were indeed yet further possibilities, even though this was to be expressed only in image and parable: Jonah had the possibility in the belly of the sea-monster of striking up a psalm of praise (Jon 2.3–11), and Daniel's three companions had the possibility of walking about in the raging fire, praising God (Dan 3.24–90). And yet these are submerged in the death of water and fire only as living men: death itself is a problem that remains unsolved. We should find a full seriousness only when the unthinkable happened: when the dead lived as one dead, truly dead and buried, and more yet—

---

[13] Ibid, pp. 313-316 On the problematic developed there, cf. Bousset-Gressmann, Religion des Judentums (3rd edn. 1927), pp. 257f., 275f.; P. Volz, Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde im ntl. Zeitalter (1934), pp. 272–419; on double predestination at Qumran: K. G. Kuhn, in ZkTh 47 (1950), pp. 162f; 49 (1952), pp. 296f.

[14] III/2,1, p. 373.

[15] The consequence is drawn, albeit mysteriously enough, in John at 8.53.

[16] III/2,1, pp. 69-79.

[17] Ibid., p. 208.

as one judged. For this, Jonah had to become identical with the monster, and the three companions identical with the fire. This is not something to be resolved philosophically by means of a universal law of a dialectic of transferral, whereby God ought to turn into his opposite so that through this he may become himself, and life should become death so that resurrection may come forth thence. That which is specifically Christian is neither a philosophy, nor an isolated historical event at a determined point of the world's history such that a universal dialectical law of history could be read out of the event subsequently. That which is Christian on the one hand presupposes the positive character of the old covenant with its 'God, not of the dead, but of the living' and with its (humanly speaking, absurd) promise for man in this covenant; on the other hand, it presupposes what is universally human—Israel necessarily makes the act of self-transcendence into this sphere of the universally human. That which is Christian is anthropologically significant (in relation, that is to what is already given in Israel), or it is nothing at all. It solves the unbearable contradiction that runs right through the very form of man: that he, knowing and touching what is immortal, yet dies; if it does not solve this then it solves nothing at all.[18] Therefore its truth does not lie primarily on the level of what may be looked at, the comparison between the form of the promise and the form of the fulfilment, but on the level of an invisible collision of the absolute weight of God with what is other, with that which has nothing in common with God. Only when this unconceivable event takes place, is the world of images liberated—what the old covenant still owed us, is possible only on the basis of what is unimaginable, so that the images (what Pascal calls figures) which surrounded the unconstructible midpoint, and which could not bring themselves together to make a credible whole form, suddenly crystallise and become thereby comprehensible both in themselves (as images of the Old Testament) and in their transcendence to the New Testament unity that gives them meaning.[19] But the paradox remains, and is indeed insoluble: if the images of the old covenant have form as images, then the point on which they converge, the death of Jesus Christ, is what is formless; for how could a corpse bestow on the living forms their inner definitive meaning? But if the images of the old covenant are formless as a whole (since they cannot complement themselves mutually), then their act of becoming form in the presence of the triduum mortis shows the incomprehensible power of the triduum mortis to bestow form, a power which precisely on the philosophical level cannot be grasped. Thereby in advance we have passed beyond the whole historical-critical problematic concerning the application to Christ of Old Testament parables and titles of sovereignty in the post-Easter reflection of the community, though without dismissing the problematic thereby as insignificant. It is only from what is permanently incomprehensible that so much light can spread forth, and that so much can take on form in crystallisation and in this form be adduced precisely as 'proof'.

[18] See my Das Ganze im Fragment (1963), pp. 61–123.

[19] III/2,1, p. 372.

No one will be able to overlook the central difficulty that opens up here, in giving man his centre-point by locating him beyond himself, in his death. It might be possible to avoid the difficulty by insisting on the idea of vicariousness: one man surrenders himself to death, so that all the rest may at last have true life. One is chosen (says Karl Barth) in order to be rejected, so that all the rejected may be chosen. But in this case the fate of this one remains the paradoxical and disturbing exception, and one no longer sees how it can be anthropologically significant, or how indeed 'imitation' can be possible. If such an imitation is taken seriously, is that not something inhuman? And if the real thing has been accomplished by the one (who alone is God-man), is not imitation in any case superfluous and essentially defective? In the old covenant, within the conditions of mortal life, there was always something like a response (always defective) that correponded to the prescription of God's covenant, a prescription of the immortal one for mortals ('I am holy, and therefore you also shall be holy'), and thus having always a provisional character; what is to happen when this inexact word is replaced by the exact Word, which is uttered precisely where the word passes over into silence, where nothing more is audible and the living one who listens for instruction is placed before the absolute breakdown in communication?

At the outer edge, the cry, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' rang out, then the mighty scream, then the death and the tearing of the temple curtain from top to bottom (Mk 15.34ff.). John describes another tearing, solemnly and in detail: 'One of the soldiers pierced his side with a spear, and at once there came out blood and water. He who saw it has borne witness—his testimony is true, and he knows that he tells the truth—that you also may believe' (Jn 19.34ff.). And he reminds us of the passage in Zechariah, which he will cite once more in Revelation: 'They look on him whom they have pierced'. The spoken word is 'compressed together and shortened'[20] as it moves towards death, for God's voice throughout the old covenant and up to the baptist 'had become continuously louder, until the great voice finally took on human form, and at the end of a long succession of intonations, consisting of instructions and wonders that were to show us that the most horrible of all horrible things, the death of man, must be chosen by love, gave a loud cry and passed away'.[21] But the word that has reached its highest point in the cry, and so is no longer articulated, breaks through and demolishes the last wall of separation, the heart of Jesus himself, and—as in a parable—externally, the curtain between God and man: blood and water flow outwards, God himself pours himself out, pours outwards the covenant that presupposes a two-sidedness. The mediator is superseded when it is a question of only one (Gal 3.20; Jn 16.26). Where the word falls silent, the true message is proclaimed loudly: the message of the heart of God, broken open. And if the real 'place' of the Christian event at first lets man hear no word, since the place lies in man's death, yet it more importantly makes visible an event of God (in the most literal sense of the word: 'they look on him whom they have pierced'). In this death, the σπλάγχνα θεοῦ[22] break open, the last realities in God's heart, beyond which there is nothing more, so that in death, and only in death, that which remains unutterable in life becomes speech—for in life, the heart must preserve itself intact, in order that speech may be possible. For the present, it is not asked what man becomes in the presence of this event: we see only that the heart of God, pierced open, flows out towards him. This is attested with utter solemnity as something seen, something that truly happened.

---

[20] Quoted at Rom 9.28, following LXX Is 10.23: λόγον γάρ συντελῶν καί συντέμνων ποιήσει κύριος ἐπι τῆς γῆς; Vulgate Verbum consummans et abbrevians (in aequitate) faciet Dominus super terram. In context, this translation which gets the original text wrong can mean only the 'short shrift' which God's word of judgment will make, in that it will save only the 'remnant'; but the fathers of the Church will speak of the 'abbreviated Logos' of God, 'shortened' to fit Incarnation and death (Origen, Peri Archon 1, 2, 8), the 'condensed Logos' (Gregory Nazianzen, Or. in Epiph., PG 36, 313B; commented upon by Maximus the Confessor, Ambigua, PG 91, 1285C–1288A, and Cent. Gnost. 2, 37, PG 90, 1141C).

[21] Nicholas of Cusa, Excitationum lib. 3 (Paris 1514), fol. 412.

It should be noted that, if God is essentially invisible (Jn 1.18; 1 Tim 6.16), yet it is no transcendental interpretation of what is specifically Christian that is undertaken here; such an interpretation ends in Hegelian gnosticism. Here, on the contrary, in the categorial experience and contemplation of the pierced heart pouring forth, one should see 'as one involved' that in the death of this man God's heart was immediately 'affected' The time will come when this no longer utterable word will once again be set out in utterable words of proclamation, words indeed that must be uttered, in the commissioning at Easter. But everything would be misplaced and masked, if the breakdown of communication in the silence that is no word, that is greater than all words, did not remain through all words present and dominant as the only thing that is essentially to be kept in mind: 'knowledge of the love that surpasses all knowledge' (Eph 3.19).

---

[22] On the expression in the Old Testament (rachamim, normally rendered by the LXX as οἰκτιρμοί), cf. III/2,1, pp. 149f. In Test. Zabulun 8.2, a revelation of this kind is expected as messianic: 'In the last days, God will send τά σπλάγχνα αὐτοῦ upon the earth'. Cf. Test. Nephtali 4.5; Test. Levi 4.4. In accordance with this, the Benedictus speaks of the opening of the σπλάγχνα ἐλέους of our God, in the radiant visit among us of the 'dayspring from on high', which can refer equally to the promised 'scion' and to the rising 'light', or to both at once (Schlier, art. ἀνατολή, TDNT I, 352; cf. Köster, art. σπλάγχνα, ibid. VII, 548ff.).

There are passages in the gospel where Jesus' word seems to be nothing else than the purified synthesis of the old covenant, as for example where he expresses its embodiment in the three words 'justice' (mishpat, which derives from God and is to have its effect in men's deeds; Amos 5.24; cf. Mt 5.6; 6.33), 'mercy' (chesed, rachamim, δχεος, Mic 6.8; as embodiment of justice, Mt 12.7), and 'loyalty and faith' (emeth, πίστις, the fundamental attitude of the covenant God, which should pass over to man in his relationship to God and to his neighbour: Mt 23.23). This can be simplified yet again in the practical rule of thumb: Whatever you wish that men would do to you, do so to them; for this is the law and the prophets' (Mt 7.12). Such abbreviations of the 'old word' are materially identical to the explicit synthesis of all commandments in love that Paul makes (Rom 13.8; Gal 5.14; 1 Tim 1.5). But the synthesis placed on the lips of Jesus is true only in him: he is the synthesis, in that he brings the whole multiplicity of the laws and the moments of life regulated by the laws into the unifying impetus of his death, which is their 'goal' and 'end' (τέλος, Jn 13.1); and only thus is he the primordial Word, from which the 'multiple, knowable contents' of the Scriptures are each only 'a part', and often indeed 'divided parts that fight against each other', declining in the loss of their unity into 'numberless numbers'.[23]

Here we are confronted anew with the central difficulty of the New Testament. At the time of Jesus, there is not only a full complement of motifs that transcend themselves and make for a convergence, seeming indeed to wish to be brought into congruence with one another; there is also something like an eschatological kairos that hangs in the air, both for a time of salvation in this world ('become flesh') and in an apocalyptic salvation beyond this world, as though a dividing-point of the ages were drawing near, which could count as the end and the 'fulfilment of the times',[24] and which will be seized upon by Paul (Gal 4.4) and by the Markan Jesus (Mk 1.15). It seems that all is so far formed in advance, that the synthesis that must make Jesus the 'subject and object of the gospel'[25] follows almost automatically: and then suddenly, this synthesis seems so foolhardy, so mistaken in its displacing of the midpoint away from everything that could be awaited and hoped for, that it seems a synthesis that could never be found, a synthesis that makes nonsense of its component elements (the great promises of the old covenant) in an extremely provocative and irritating manner. It can be recognised and maintained as a synthesis only if the midpoint, which integrates and disturbs everything, becomes a wholly unhoped-for light for those who make the synthesis (first of all, the post-Easter community), a direct hit that is attained not through calculation but with the effect of pure luck; one begins only gradually to grasp that its depth and fullness are reality, and no dream.

---

[23] Origen, In Johannem V, 4–5 (ed. Preuschen, 102–103).

Hereby, the difficulty becomes twofold. First, as was said in the introduction, in New Testament theology everything is interlinked. The time which gave order to the Old Testament is in effect ended: from the first word of the first Gospel onwards, 'Jesus is Messiah, the Son of God' (Mk 1.1), or he is nothing at all; either one understands him thus, or one understands nothing at all. It is indeed possible to distinguish a few stages in the progress of the early community's unfolding of the content of that which it had discovered in a first primordial intuition: the fact that 'Jesus', 'Messiah', and 'Son of God' had become identical. But this discovery was no 'finding' that was to be justified and proved later through reflection; rather, just as in a game of chance there is an element of incalculable luck, so here there is unaccountable grace. The synthesis was not 'discovered', but was wholly given, and this character of the love given gratis becomes even clearer in the Church's reflection, the more the central point, round which everything crystallises, proves itself to be the right point. A theological truth that did not show itself ever more clearly to be the incomprehensible breaking-in and breaking-through of the eternal (trinitarian) love would be no truth; such a truth would be a worthy victim of the rational deductions of Hegel, or (as the case might be) of the reconstructions of historical-critical exegesis. The latter maintains its theological justification as long as it lets itself be understood, and understands itself, as a moment in the process whereby the intuition of faith comes to itself. Historical-critical exegesis is substantially incapable of explaining the absolute newness that comes into being through the synthesis, and casts its rays back from it upon all the elements of the synthesis; it is incapable with its own methods of seeing the synthesis at all, for this act of seeing presupposes the eye of faith. This newness is something more than can be explained, something that Jesus the Christ (as the crucified and risen one) in his oneness is: 'He brought all newness, by bringing himself, for he was foretold' (Irenaeus).[26] But who could have had an inkling that, by bringing himself as newness, he would make a breakthrough to a wholly new image of God—to its true glory, of which the kabod of old was only a shadowy prefiguring—and to a wholly new image of man—and the gleam of glory of old (Ps 8) was likewise only a 'reflection of the coming' image of man? But this always-greater element in the first gift of the synthesis could not yet be seen in its entirety, since in all later reflections it showed itself to be the correct midpoint only because it remained always-greater than what could be discovered and imagined: therefore there arises the second difficulty of New Testament theology, alongside the first—a difficulty which lies in the question about the subject on which the eschatological kabod of God breaks in because the revelation of the ultimate love is intended for it.

---

[24] Cf. the late Jewish formulae for this fullness of the times in P. Volz, op. cit., p.139.

[25] W. Marxsen, Der Evangelist Markus (2nd edn. 1959), p. 88 (ET Mark the Evangelist, 1969, p. 131)

b. The subject who receives

In the midpoint of all God's words to men stands the one

---

[26] Adv. Haer. 4, 34 (PG 8, 1083).

Son, in whom 'at the end of days' all words become one (Heb 1.2); but in the midpoint of this one word stands death, in which his word becomes a cry and falls silent. Thus it seems that the fullness of the approximating words finds its goal in this 'not-word' which is above words, and that the renewed fullness of the approximating words which derives from this is irremediably delivered over to the chance of the epochs of history, to the various presuppositions of human understanding, to the difficulties of comprehension, and to the systems of logic which exist at different times. Time and again, new attempts to find words circle about this unutterable density and fullness that hold within themselves God's final and most mysterious turning to man, but which will never be exhausted 'by all the books of the world, that would be written' (Jn 21.25).

In the old covenant, since the Word was not yet flesh, but rather instruction and promise, the receiving subject was a historical people, which in the course of its history and of ever deeper reflection on this history understood itself as chosen, addressed, and led by God: and in this understanding, it offered itself as the living vessels in which God's Word should pour itself out and find expression, so that as far as possible Israel might respond to this Word in the same process. In the preceding volume, it was shown how Israel at its highest moments opened up into a praise and thanksgiving that were a 'giving back of the Word' to God, into a perpetual meditation of the Word with the understanding, a full humble transparence to the Word, a holding ready of the heart, in order to find the pure harmony between word and response in the act of praise—and this in openness to the world, in the presence of all peoples, representing the entire cosmos: this was the 'aesthetic of the Old Testament'.[1] This then led to the introduction of the international Wisdom literature of the ancient orient, then of the hellenistic Koine (in thinking and in speech), into the biblical semitic sphere. Without being profaned, the intimacy of the dialogue of love between God as husband and Israel as chosen bride was continually and increasingly made use of to speak of the world: the 'pilgrimage of the peoples' to Jerusalem in the end-times was awaited as the making visible of the principle that the meaning of world and history should be disclosed in the act of crystallisation round the magnetic core (Is 2.2–5).[2] But for all its historicity, this remained an event of the Word: in the purity of an obedient 'giving back of the Word', Israel reached its highest point. But nothing was further from Israel than the thought that the lordly Word spoken to him could become identical with one of the 'servants' and 'mediators' who tried to recall Israel into obedience to the Word—no scheme of thought, neither that of the 'servant of God', nor that of the 'Messiah', nor even the Danielic 'Son of man', would have seriously dared to think of the uniting of the Lord with the servant. The breakthrough into this identity is the new covenant. In the power of this identity, the Lord sides with the servants, and 'is not ashamed to call them his brethren': 'since the children share in flesh and blood, he himself likewise partook of the same nature, that through death he might destroy him who has the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver all those who through fear of death were subject to lifelong bondage' (Heb 2.11, 14f.). Through this crossing-over, the higher dignity of Jesus as the 'one set (by God) and high priest' above the highest representative of the old covenant becomes visible: 'He has been counted worthy of as much more glory δόξα than Moses as the builder of a house has more honour than the house. (For every house is built by some one, but the builder of all things is God.) Moses was faithful in all God's house (assigned to him) as a servant, to testify to the things that were to spoken later (in the 'tent of testimony', Num 12.5, as a word from God), but Christ was faithful as Son over his own house. And we are his house' (Heb 3.3–6). If God is the builder of the whole, so that the old and the new house belong to him and form in him a planned unity, yet this house has a different interior structure; if first the servant is in charge of it, then the Son—and this, for the paradoxical reason that the servant has charge inside the house, and transmits and interprets the words that come from above, while the Son who is sent from above (who, according to Heb 1.1–3, is the synthesis of all God's words, the heir of all the house, and shares the burden of all things as 'all-powerful Word') has charge over the house, precisely because he entered into the fellowship of flesh and blood with the children of God (something that Moses could not do), that so he might conquer death and lay low the barrier formed by the fear of death. Because Christ, as the Word of God (and simultaneously high priest), has become immanent in the people of God, this people receives a transcendent head that stands above it: this it did not possess in the old covenant. This very close analysis of the Letter to the Hebrews brings us next by an interior logic to Paul's image of the body, which defines the altered structure of the receiving subject in the new covenant, over against the receiving subject in the old: it is from the exalted head that the body exists at all (derived from him, given its form and recapitulated by him). In the identity of the one organism (ἐξ ἑνός πάντες, Heb 2.11; κεκοινώνηκεν, 2.14), Christ is distinct from the brethren (as the 'holy one' over against 'those made holy', as the 'redeemer' over against 'those redeemed', ibid.), and is thereby the one exalted above them, the one who gives them existence in their identification as his partner. Paul draws as close as possible to this mystery when he illuminates it by means of the 'being one flesh' of man and woman, the mystery that sets husband and wife in a distinct personal relationship to each other.[3] What was predominantly understood in the Old Testament as 'people' and 'house', needs a substantial corrective after the breakthrough into the [1] III/2,1, pp. 189-195.

---

---

[2] Ibid., pp. 317-336.

---

[3] In order to encompass the mystery of Christ and the Church, he needs both biblical aspects of the sexual relationship: 1. that the woman (Eve) comes bodily from the bodily Adam (1 Cor 11.8; presupposed in the background at Eph 5.28, 32), so that two persons proceed from one flesh, and 2. that 'the man leaves father and mother and is joined to his wife, and the two become one flesh' (Gen 2.24 = Eph 5.31), so that out of two persons there is one flesh. If one drops the first aspect as 'mythological', then one no longer understands the theological signficance of the expressions of Paul in the new covenant.

New Testament, through the two inseparable concepts of 'body (bodily unity)' and 'bride'. Only with this new qualification is it possible to continue using the image of 'people' and 'house' analogically, after the dividing-line drawn by the Incarnation.[4] The characterisation in the Old Testament of Israel as 'bride' remained principally an ethical and juridical image, determined by the personal relationship of the partners and the faithfulness (promised or awaited) of the covenant-parties, but in the New Testament this characterisation is radically altered by the Incarnation of the Word: the character of 'bride' is now based wholly in the 'being one flesh', drawing its origin from this and oriented towards this, and thus the nuptial character of the subject that receives the revelation must necessarily accomplish an incarnation that is analogous to the Incarnation of God's Word.

If this is thought through logically to the end, it leads to the requirement of a 'glorious bride without spot or wrinkle', 'made holy' by Christ the 'sanctifier' (Eph 5.27). It is indeed true that in his becoming man, Christ accomplished the full 'righteousness of God' on both sides of the covenant. But on the human side, he appears as the 'sanctifier' (and thus as the representative of the divine husband) who creates out of himself the unity of 'those sanctified' (his brethren, who are to form the 'bride'). But Jesus as Word and Son of the Father is one, and so this unity must likewise be personal in its centre: it cannot be the mere 'physical' unity of a collective,[5] as in the old covenant, all the more so because the delimitation to one people (as 'collective individual') has in any case been broken through by the Incarnation of God to make way for the whole of mankind, and is thereby rendered obsolete. Further, this unity cannot be (as in the old covenant) a receiving subject that is able existentially to give God a response that always remains only approximate, and is mostly very defective: for now that the righteousness of God has become man in Christ, the exact response (justesse) that corresponds to the incarnate righteousness of God (justice) is required also, from the bride that is his body. These two postulates converge unhesitatingly on the solution that became visible in its outlines first of all in the infancy narrative: in Mary, Israel must both become personalised and transcend itself in this synthesis, in order to utter the perfect fiat of the handmaid to the Incarnation. This fiat, made possible by the Incarnation and cross of the Son (in the 'anticipated redemption'),[6] is at one and the same time one of the presuppositions of the Incarnation, accomplishing the 'being one flesh' and yet establishing, precisely here, the radical opposition between head and body, lord and handmaid, bridegroom and bride. Without this centre (almost invisible and undiscoverable from 'outside'), the subject which was destined for the final revelation would remain substantially approximate and collective, corresponding only to the 'many and various words of God to the prophets and fathers' (Heb 1.1). Somewhere, in the name of all mankind, a fiat with no internal boundaries must exist in response to the final word of God that continually transcends all understanding, a fiat that goes all the way to the end with God's Word in unreserved agreement, in the meditative attempt to understand (Lk 2.19, 51) and to keep company with God's Word: and this sets in motion an endless historical process.

---

[4] This analogy is insufficiently clearly expressed in the Constitution Lumen Gentium, inasmuch as the expressions 'body' and 'bride' are given a place among the 'images' (Nn 6–7, necessarily separated from each other at the end of N 7), whereas from the 2nd chapter onwards, the characterisation of the Church as 'people of God' no longer appears as an image, but as a literally real expression (Nn 9f.).

[5] This is called a 'collective personality' (unless this meaning should be mythological) only in a metaphorical sense, and this certainly does not call into question the solidarity in guilt and salvation which is based on this. Cf. J. de Fraine, Adam und seine Nachkommen (German 1962) and the discussion of the concept in H. Mühlen, Una Mystica Persona (2nd edn. 1967).

Round the core of the 'bride without spot and wrinkle' is formed, layer upon layer, the structure that must serve as the subject that receives the revelation. This can be described statically, as the 'Church of Christ', but it can exist only in a dynamic crossing-over from the nationhood of the Israel of old to the entirety of mankind (and therein of the cosmos); God's address in Jesus Christ is of course directed finally to this entirety. The personal core prevents us from understanding the subject simply as an 'objective spirit' that is subjective only in part; on the contrary, we must speak rather of a universalisation of the subject, for if in the old covenant 'the holy city' and 'the holy land' could be described symbolically as 'daughter Zion' and 'bride', now it is 'the bride, the wife of the Lamb' that can show herself eschatologically universalised as the 'holy city' descending from Heaven (Rev 21.9f.). It is this city that shows on its twelve foundation stones 'the twelve names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb' (21.14), in an equality of form in the end time: the hierarchy of service, the primacy, levels itself to form this unity. This visible Church is constituted in its kernel by the summons to follow Jesus, and thereby is both a training by Jesus in the perfection of the faith of the Old Testament, and a training which is so much by Jesus that he is the one who has authority as custodian and mediator of this faith: and thus obedience to God modulates unnoticed into obedience to him, and the proclaimer Jesus modulates unnoticed[7] into the proclaimed Christ. The semper magis of God, to faith in whom Jesus directs his followers or likewise those healed miraculously or those reached by the preaching, appears to them to be made present in the one who 'teaches as one with authority' (Mk 1.22) and only in this respect proclaims 'a teaching that is new' (1.27). The transition which has been mentioned does not, however, lead to an alienation—there one who commands, and here those who obey—but gradually reveals the parodox that lies deeper: that Jesus possesses the Word because the Spirit possesses him, that he can command in such a unique way because he obeys uniquely, all-sufficiently. And when they join him, leaving everything in order to follow him alone, men learn to satisfy the intolerable multiplicity of the commandments (Acts 15.10) through the single act of the obedient love that says yes; they learn to have no longer any other place than Jesus (Jn 6.68), who himself has no place and no food other than the will of the Father (Mt 8.20; 4.4; Jn 4.34). In order to arrive truly at this point, the hiatus of Cross and Resurrection will be necessary, the hiatus that fulfils everything so completely only because it radically calls everything into question. We shall consider this in detail later.

---

[6] Thus, in accordance with the circle of thought indicated in n. 3, which repeats on a higher level the circle of thought contained in the Pauline image of Adam and Eve. Cf. F. Mussner, 'Der Glaube Mariens im Lichte des Römerbriefs', in: Praesentia Salutis (1967), pp. 284ff.

---

[7] Of course there exists the seemingly rough transition from the pre-Easter faith to the post-Easter faith; but, as Heinz Schürmann has demonstrated, this would have been quite impossible without 'the pre-Easter beginnings of the logia-tradition' ('Die vorösterlichen Anfänge der Logientradition', now in: Traditionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen zu den synoptischen Evangelien, 1968, pp. 39–65). 'Without a confessing foreknowledge, the encounter with the risen one could not have led to any kind of formulated "messianic" confession . . . Before Easter, there must at least have been a messianic "supposition", so that the event of Easter could be understood as "fulfilment"' (ibid., p. 49).

But whatever we make of the deadly paradox of the Cross—which puts an end to the following of Jesus and the fellowship in faith and obedience—in any case, the fellowship of followers which is called together by Jesus has an internal structure that is designed to go out beyond itself to mankind as a whole. The principle of its life is a growing mission (Mt 10) that finally embraces the whole world (Mt 28), and it can be a city on the hill and a light on the lampstand only if at the same time it disappears into the flour as yeast, and falls into the ground and dies like a grain of wheat. For them at least, the Cross was the demonstration of a law that was already established in the Incarnation as such: not only because the promises to Israel were universalist, but more yet—because the Incarnation of God affected every man in his very being, and because (here we make leaps in thought that are guaranteed by the slow, marvelling reflection on such implications) God was now approachable and lovable for us in a man; for this God, dying for our guilt, loved us all, and therefore now the reflection of this God shines in all men.

If the Church found itself after Easter, at Pentecost, filled with the Holy Spirit of God and of Christ, this means that it grasped precisely the spirit of the universal mission of Christ based on his universal love to all (and therein to me), that it felt that this had been given to it and said yes to the gift. Paul calls this no longer 'following', but 'being in Christ', and this is quite explicitly a being grasped by his love to me (Gal 2.20) and a being surrounded by his love (2 Cor 5.14). 'Grace be with all who love our Lord Jesus Christ with love undying' (Eph 6.24). 'If anyone has no love for the Lord, let him be accursed' (1 Cor 16.22). The Church loved the one of whom she had learned to understand that, in his death, he had taken on himself the whole of the Father's will as this stood in the law, and the whole of the Father's judgment on the unfulfilled commandment. The Church loved him as the one who fulfilled God's will, but loved him—as John repeatedly instructs—precisely by fulfilling his will, his command of love. Thereby, in the daily living-out of love to him and to the neighbour, the Church after Easter brings to its goal the logic which had begun before Easter in the act of 'leaving all things (for his sake)'. This, and nothing else, is the Church, whether considered statically or dynamically.

If one realises this, and follows the guiding line of the logic, one can see how this logic had necessarily to lead the Church after Easter, as it began to think out its faith, into a veritable labyrinth of connections—on the one hand, of the relationships of the history and scriptural texts of Israel to the key-figure of Jesus, and on the other hand, of the relationships between the logia, parables, deeds and perhaps puzzling behaviour of the man Jesus and the light into which all of this came through the experience of Easter. Thousands of rivulets of meaning followed their separated course, until they flowed into one another, thousands of paths crossed one another and seemed to part from each other again, until they united definitively to form one highway; the historical-critical method, with its patient unravelling of the material backwards to the origins, gives us some glimpses of strata where material that was later to be united lies as yet without any coordinating unity. Nevertheless, these glimpses are not decisively important, because the thread of Ariadne—love as the solution of all intellectual questions—leads unambiguously forwards to the unifying of the different points of view.

It is from this point that everything must be considered and classified, when it is a question of the transition from the apostolic period to the post-apostolic period, of the formation of Scripture and canon, of the translation of biblical material into hellenistic thought, of the formulation of a regula fidei, of a creed, and finally of the dogmatic definitions of councils with the drawing of boundaries between orthodoxy and heresy. The apostolic period becomes the model of the relationship between the Lord and his immediate successors: it is a model of the love between Christ (as the one who makes visible the divine love for the world) and the core of the Church which defines itself through believing and obedient self-surrender to this love that has appeared in Jesus. Paul places the accent on a succession of 'behaviour': the archetype of this cast of mind is the self-denying love of the Lord (Phil 2.2–8), to which Paul seeks to respond in his loving self-offering 'for your faith' (2.17), since he regards everything as refuse, in order to win Christ and be formed in the pattern of his dying and rising (3.4ff.). Then he writes, 'Brethren, join in imitating me, and mark those who so live as you have an example (τύπος) in us' (3.17). 'The apostle is not only a representative, but also the mediator of the norm,' and thereby stands as one raised above those who imitate him, but those who imitate him receive 'a characteristic position in the middle between the "apostle" and the "brethren"'.[8] This model is handed on in the Deutero-Pauline writings as in the testamentary speech at Miletus,[9] as the decisive contents of tradition.

On the part of the Church, the exemplary person is the reminder that makes present the force of God's love, the love that discloses itself to us in the death and Resurrection of Christ and dispossesses itself for us. 'Authority' in the Church has its roots in the driving force of this new kabod: the force of love itself is, and can be, nothing else than the presence of the semper magis of love over all knowledge that would tidily dispose of things—and so, knowledge may have no other activity than the making present of the central mystery of love: only so can it be recognised for what it is. On the other hand, this authority transmits itself into every Christian life that is a testimony to the impact of the force of God's love, and thus itself becomes a binding and demanding pointer, a tupos to this authority.[10] [8] E. Lohmeyer, Der Brief an die Philipper (9th edn. 1953), pp. 151–152.

---

[9] J. Dupont, Paulus an die Seelsorger. Das vermächtnis von Milet (Apg 20, 18 bis 36) (1966).

Thus, in the New Testament, the dogmatic truth never appears in abstraction from its ecclesiological wrapping and reflection; in the letters of Paul, the 'dogmatic' part and the 'paraenetic' part challenge each other so much that the 'dogmatic' teaching about the 'justification' through faith in Christ discloses the deepest core of its meaning only when the paraenetic part about the mutual love of the members of the body begins to speak—for that faith is the radical 'catching-up' of the existence of man into the state of being snatched away out of its lostness, which has already been accomplished through the love of Christ on the Cross. It is faith only as an obedient handing over of oneself, an act of making oneself dependent on the 'incredible' force of the love of God in Christ: and this obedience in faith to love directly obliges the existence of man to become itself a tupos of others, a sign that points to the absolute love.[11] In their own way, the Gospels reflect the fundamental figure: their subject, more exclusively than in the Epistles, is the force of the love that presses forward in the person of Christ, in his work and in his dying—and indeed this is so much so, that at the beginning (in Mark) the burden of the pressure is felt to be so heavy that its verbalisation as love (in the way that John will later definitively undertake this verbalisation) seems almost secondary—but nevertheless, the Gospels show Jesus always only in the circle of the disciples, of enemies and adherents, and they hint, in a hidden manner or more openly, that this situation is an anticipation of the situation of the Christian community. In the Gospels too, 'christology' occurs only in the framework of 'ecclesiology', however much it is true that this variegated 'Church' of men around Jesus is gathered, held together, and determined in its behaviour only through his person and presence.

---

[10] On the question of the grounding of authority and of its expression, cf. N. A. Dahl, 'Formgeschichtliche Beobachtungen zur Christusverkündigung in der Gemeindepredigt', in: Ntl. Studien für R. Bultmann, BZNW 2nd edn. 1957. pp. 3ff.

[11] 1 John and 1 Peter weave dogma and paraenesis even more closely together: thereby they bolt the door against a (Lutheran) setting of tension between the acts of faith (towards God) and love (towards the neighbour), but they could lend support to the opposite evil of no longer seeing these acts in their hierarchic order, so that—at least in 1 Peter—the archetype of the suffering love of Christ rather too quickly changes into a model for the suffering Christian (1 Pet 2.18–24; 4.12–19).

The Church, which allows the Christ-event to govern it in faith, love and (because this is its goal) hope, produced the scriptures of the new covenant within itself as if unintentionally, as the spontaneous expression of its experience of the in-breaking of absolute love. In the following generations, the Church will try to live up to this model which was given by the Holy Spirit who bestows the first correct understanding; the Church will do this by opening up for itself the riches of the treasures of wisdom and knowledge (Col 2.2–3) hidden in Christ who is the mystery of God, to make these the subject of the prayer of praise and thanksgiving, and of preaching, and by protecting these riches at the same time from the mistaken interpretations which lurk everywhere (as the Apostles had done already). At this point, theology develops; we shall speak of this in the next section. To close this section, we must only show how the historical structure of the Church perseveres through the fluctuations of the epochs as the subject that receives revelation. This the Church does only by building up and maintaining its visible unity (which is strictly required as the form of expression by the mystery of the love in its midst) around the incomprehensible presence of the event of the Cross and Resurrection of Christ as the self-attestation of the trinitarian love of God. This is a unity which permits the unity of the bride, which is hidden but really incarnated through the Spirit, to appear outwardly in the Church's act of celebrating the Eucharist, which as the presence and the proclamation of God's loving death institutes the midpoint which gives form to the Church, and at the same time demands that love be made effective. Thereby community is gathered around the Apostle or his follower and representative, and in this the force of the 'authority' of Christ makes itself present; the centring of the episcopal 'authorities' in the Petrine summit is a consequence of the realisation of the inner principle of unity in each of the particular churches, but on the other hand, it finds its confirmation in the indubitable designation in the Gospels of Peter as the primus inter pares among the Apostles. As we said above when speaking of the relationship between 'the woman' and 'the city', the Petrine principle is the transparence outwardly of the inner character of the Church as bride, wife and mother, and this in its turn is a testimony to the incarnated, eucharistic presence in her womb of the love of God in Christ which creates the Church. In this paradoxical visibility and invisibility, the Church lives only from love for the love which creates her as the body and the bride of love: that is her consistence, her identity through the ages, her credibility.

As she ponders her own mystery, a mystery that can never be at her own disposal, the Church can never come to an end of her meditation on the mystery of love. In 'Scripture' she has a model of the mystery of love and of her relationship to it, but nothing more; in the theological tradition which finds its embodiment down through the ages, the Church has a continuous enrichment of this meditation. But this meditation must always adjust itself and correct itself afresh by means of the first model, and must maintain itself in an oscillating balance over against displacements of emphasis, disturbances of equilibrium, and damaging exaggerations of one aspect; yet it always holds on to the infallible guiding-line through the labyrinth of the epochs, of the changes in formulation, of the accommodations to various situations—this guiding-line, this Ariadne's thread, is the undiminished pressure of the ever-greater love of God in the Church, and the requirement to respond through visible unity to this principle which wholly determines and gives form to the Church. Naturally, the mystery of love finds countless, ever new expressions in the Church, which shade off into one another down through the ages; at one time, the love of the Father stands in the foreground, and the whole work of Christ remains transparently open to this love as its instruments; another time, this eternal love will be adored in a reverent tenderness towards the incarnate love that suffers in the heart of Jesus; another time again, the eternal love is adored predominantly as the Spirit of Father and Son, in the encounter between redeemed brethren. But each aspect always requires the others, and none will ever be dispensable. It is in the continuity of her looking to the mystery of the trinitarian, incarnate love of God that the Church has her ontic, historic, theological and existential unity: this is instituted in her depths as 'immaculate' and 'infallible', but in the empirical form of the Church it can experience threats and distortions which disfigure it so that it is unrecognisable. Every reform that strives to recover the unity of the subject that receives revelation must hold fast to what has been instituted in the Church (once for all in Cross and Resurrection, and ever new in the event of the Eucharist), which belongs immediately to the event 'than which nothing greater can be thought'. The Church in her being has a future, for the reason that what is instituted in her can neither be intellectually exhausted nor existentially used up by any age of the Church. The more it is thought about and lived (especially by those whom one calls 'saints'), the more inexhaustible—and hence the more belonging to the future—does it rise before the eyes of the faithful.[12]

---

[12] Henri de Lubac has discussed in an incomparable manner the way in which ecclesiastical tradition distinguishes itself from secular tradition, because in the former, beyond all the strangenesses and barriers caused by forms of thought and views of the world that have since disappeared, an immediate communication is brought about by the fresh love, always remaining the same, for the unique mystery: 'To give one example, how far away from us lie . . . the Alexandrians of the third century, or the Africans of the fifth century. What a change in our thinking we must make, when we cross over from our world into theirs! . . . How unreal and disappointing most of their questions seem to us! . . . But as we turn over the pages, a NAME suddenly appears, and like a flash of lightning it parts the clouds that hang overhead . . . Life penetrates the limbs . . . In his love for Jesus, an Origen, an Augustine, is truly a contemporary. They are Thereby is it clear that the subject who receives the Word can never be the isolated individual as he reads or studies or prays. The 'key of knowledge' (Lk 11.52) is handed over by the key-bearer (Rev 1.18) and seal-opener (Rev 5.5) to the one who symbolises the Church (Mt 16.19). The individual as individual has his significance too, when he is inserted into her in the Spirit, for we have seen that the Church in her hidden core is an individual person—anima mea, spiritus meus, beatam me dicent omnes (Lk 1.47f.) (my soul, my spirit, all will call me blessed)—and thereby universally justifies the individual (but never in isolation) in his decision of faith and love.

c. On the form of theology

It has already become clear that theology in the Bible can have no fundamentally different form from later theology in the Church: each is an interpretative act of standing and circling around a midpoint that can indeed be interpreted, but is always in need of interpretation and has never been exhaustively interpreted. Having established this, we first of all leave the theology of the New Testament by itself, and will come back to it at the end of this section. It would be senseless to object to its multiple character both in its growth by stages in time and in its end-product of theologies that remain standing beside each other; it is precisely this form that is the sign of its genuineness. If it were possible to produce a 'harmony of the Gospels' and, correspondingly, a harmony of all the New Testament theologies in the sense of our fathers, our brothers. And however far our researches reach, in whatever direction they stretch out, the experience which is made becomes broader. The single fundamental intention pulls everything in order around itself like a magnet' (L'Eglise, cited in 2nd German edn. 1968, pp. 47–48). Through the millennia, therefore, all theological understanding is one in that it is an understanding, in ever new and different ways, of the same love of God in Christ, arising out of the same subject, the loving Church which seeks to comprehend what has been bestowed on it. There is no theology otherwise than this.

a system, then gnosis would have won the victory over agape, and anthropology would have swallowed up theology into itself. On the other hand, the incomprehensibility of love is always interpreted in speech, and thus points to theology (God-speech), whether the word 'prophetically' gives an interpretation that looks to the coming act of God, or 'kerygmatically' contains the act within itself, or, highest of all, the act itself breaks forth as 'the hermeneutic of God' (Jn 1.18). And so, anyone wishing to look for acts and events 'behind' the interpretative Word would necessarily push forward into emptiness. In all this, the new covenant only brings the structure of the old covenant to a conclusion. Naturally, we must reserve for a later section the consideration of the not-word of Jesus' death, which is the midpoint, never exhaustively interpreted, of the New Testament; the unfathomable character of the Christian paradox is left in the meantime to one side, in its utter questionableness.

Nevertheless, with this continuing reservation, we shall begin by looking ahead into history. From the second century onwards, two factors dominate the coming-to-be of Christian theology. First, there is the offer made within the Bible, to interpret the fullness of Christ as fulfilment of the promise in the Old Testament (this is only to continue the New Testament writers' method of understanding), in order to find ever new and different ways, in the 'leap' from old to new covenant, of measuring the distance of the fulfilment from everything promised, while yet upholding the unity of the work. Second, there is the necessity to take the definitive step from the thinking of the Bible out into the (hellenistic) thinking of mankind, because it is necessary to preach to the Gentiles and to reveal to them 'apologetically'—but also, on a deeper level, in a genuinely 'theological' way—the relationship between philosophy (human speech about God) and theology (as a word from God). Fortunately, both factors were bound together by the deepest internal logic. On the one hand, the Bible already contained within itself the supranational and ecumenical horizon, through its third sector (beside the law and the prophets), the Wisdom literature. The translations which Paul, the Gospels, Clement of Rome, and the apologists undertook were no μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος; this all the less, because (unlike the case of Philo, for example) they were authorised to do this through the event of the Incarnation itself; as the Alexandrians above all, following the apologists, recognised, the Incarnation of the Logos is an event which affects mankind as a whole, and therefore can legitimately be proclaimed to all peoples in the language of their thought, and made internally understandable. This was what Luke intended, when he expressly brought the oikumene of Augustus and that of Christ into direct confrontation with one another (Lk 2.1f.). On the other hand, the religious philosophies of late Antiquity were ready, waiting to get to work on the new 'mystery', which apparently was merely another of many contemporary 'mysteries', to transform it into a gnosis and understand it at a glance as a cosmic 'drama of salvation'. The means whereby to assimilate the Christ event into pagan categories was the changing of the transcendence within the Bible (promise—fulfilment) into a dividing dialectic: the element of Jewish particularity appeared as that which was set in hostile contradiction to the universal insight of man. But this dialectic was merely the polemically sharpened original contradiction between God and the world in extra-biblical thought, a contradiction which could be solved there only by a negative interpretation of the reality of the world and by its absorption into the fullness of God. Thus, in Irenaeus and in part in Tertullian, the intra-biblical gnosis, viz. the understanding of the transcendence of the fulfilment over all promise, becomes the saving counter-argument against the extra-biblical gnosis that corrodes the mystery. Christian theology was kindled within the New Testament by this scheme and began to develop, but it was with the same weapons that it won the decisive first victory over Hellenism: it was precisely when the continuity between old covenant (and thereby world of creation, and Father-God) and new covenant (as mystery of the love of the triune God in Christ) was guaranteed, that the importance for all men of the specifically Christian was demonstrated. The 'jolt' from the old covenant to the new became the normative step, by which it became possible to see (not arbitrarily, but as in an archetype) how God deals with mankind as its teacher, 'by evolution'.

This first passage of arms was somewhat external: true gnosis (as recognition of the mystery of love, that is not to be mastered by philosophical thought) was matched against false gnosis. A second passage was necessary, in order not merely to defeat philosophical thinking on its own ground, but rather to bring it into service of the mystery itself. This was the achievement of the ecumenical councils, which in their own way and their own period extended the sketches established in the New Testament into the concepts of Greek thought. Their success lay in using precisely the means of metaphysics to ward off the danger of the absorption of what was decisively biblical and Christian into a universal metaphysical schema. With the concept of οὐσία, Nicaea smashes the Neoplatonic subordinationist schema, seemingly the only acceptable one for Greek thinkers, with which they sought to think of the production of the multiplicity ('world') from the unity ('God'); moreover with the ὁμο(ούσιον) concept, it carries the quality of relationship ('God from God, light from light') into the absolute being, as this is uniquely but necessarily required by the implications of the theology of the New Testament, when these are thought through to the end; and there Nicaea revolutionises the concept of God: in his 'personal relationships', God is eternal, absolute love, something that could never have been thought of metaphysically. And it is precisely this revelation of God that alone explains the possibility of the world, viz. as a 'creation out of love': no system of emanations could ever have explained the world thus. Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon complete the work, making additions, protecting against dangers on different sides, so that the distance (recognised only with help of the Bible) between the living God and his creature can be decisively (ἀσυγχύτως) ensured, and can be recognised in the final christological unifying (ἕνωσις ἀδιαιρέτως) in the reason for its existence—as the indispensable presupposition for the unifying work of absolute love, which can share itself and mark its name on what is other, what is not love, only on this basis: the 'immanent' Trinity is recognised in the 'economic' Trinity. No matter how defective philosophical concepts may always remain in the attempt to come close to this mystery and describe it—φύσις, ὑπόστασις, etc., the limited expressive potential of which is clearly demonstrated by the alternating statements of the councils—still the translation of the conceptuality of the (predominantly semitic) Bible which serves predominantly to speak of events in history, into a conceptuality of the fully open horizon of being, behind which our questioning cannot penetrate, was a valid expression of the fact that, with Christ's death and Resurrection and with the outpouring over Church and world of the Spirit who is within the Godhead, the highest self-disclosure of absolute being (inaccessible to philosophy) has taken place. This by no means excludes the possibility that other metaphysical thought-forms, in other periods or cultures, may offer themselves afresh as vehicles of the translation of the mystery; indeed, this is suggested by the flexibility of the terminology from council to council.[1] These acts of formulation brought an undeniable gain, but there was an equivalent loss which threatened and which derived from a certain kind of thoughtlessness that could no longer distinguish between the level of the living revelation of the old and the new covenants, and the level of the theological expression of this revelation, as though any theology, even a conciliar theology or (above all) a theology of 'definition', could ever be anything other than a pointer to the reality which, by definition, will always elude every conceptual formulation. This loss, which is to be reckoned to the account of human sluggishness in thought, early on gave the impression that Christianity is above all a doctrine, nothing short of a system of 'propositions to be held as true'. This is a defective way of expressing the fact that Christianity is faith in an act of God's trinitarian love, an act which he has taken the initiative in accomplishing, in a manner unattainable to all yearning and expectation of man; one can and should reflect subsequently on this act, and give it stammering expression in propositions, but it will be recognised (in the self-giving of faith) for what it is, only when it remains, in all its articulations (or individual dogmas), the act—behind which our thinking cannot penetrate—by which absolute love takes on the character of an event pro nobis.

---

[1] With the interpretation of the chief utterances of the biblical revelation, the teaching on Incarnation and Trinity, within an ecclesiology that is implied in the thinking but is not yet dogmatically explicit, we find in the great councils of the patristic age—still in the framework of undivided Christianity—a second model for all subsequent theology (after the model of Holy Scripture) set up. To this we must appropriately add the great utterances of patristic theology, which lead to these definitions and subsequently think out their consequences. Here is the great model of every 'accommodation' of biblical thought forms to a world horizon broadened to take in the oikumene. As Christians of today, we are substantially bound to the biblical revelation-event also through the historical continuity of the Church's faith, and therefore cannot do without looking towards that first model (which remains normative, in all its relativity), when we undertake the accommodations and translations required of us. Cf. J. Ratzinger, 'Die Bedeutung der Väter für die gegenwärtige Theologie', TQ 148 (1968), pp. 257–282.

Parallel to the dogmatic theology of the councils, making additions and corrections to it, runs the theology of Holy Scripture, its foundations spaciously laid down by Origen above all,[2] then taken over by the entirety of the fathers[3] and by scholasticism, with ever new elaborations of the structures. Externally, the basic form of the hellenistic exegesis of the ancient myths of poetry, which gave them concrete application by means of cosmological and anthropological actualisation (an exegesis begun by the Stoic and Platonic philosophers, and modified by Philo), is taken over, in order to fill it internally with a wholly different content which is directly opposite: the relationship between the 'literal' and the 'spiritual' (allegorical) senses becomes a means of expressing the relationship between the old covenant and the new, between the whole 'historical' salvation history of Israel and the new, personal and 'pneumatic' sense towards which this history aims, but which transcends it and rests wholly in the objective Christ event. But this event opens itself further into two interpretative dimensions: the 'tropological' sense, which we today would call the existential sense which affects me in my existence in faith, and the 'anagogical' (leading upwards) sense, which we today would term the eschatological and futurist sense—since the Christ event is indeed proleptically the Omega of the world, but the total content of this event will be disclosed only through the historical bringing of the fullness of the world into the heavenly Jerusalem, the whole of Scripture, both old and new covenants, remains (though in a differentiated manner) a promise that looks to the unveiling of its entire meaning in the future. The threefold transcendence which opens out from the biblical-historical event—opening out upon Christ as the presence of the triune God in the world, upon the receiving subject Israel-Church-myself(-cosmos), and upon the consummation of Christ in his total body or kingdom—indicates quite different paths of development for Christian theology than was possible for conciliar dogmatic theology; and it remains the lasting corrective of the conciliar dogmatic theology, even in the transformations and not infrequent narrownesses of modern biblical thinking.

---

[2] H. de Lubac, Geist aus der Geschichte. Das Schriftverständnis des Origenes (German trans. 1968).

[3] H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale, 4 vols. (1959–1963).

This biblical theology has at its heart the leap first from promise to fulfilment, but more deeply, from death to resurrection, and draws its life from the constantly renewed accomplishing of this leap; this theology can and must dare to offer itself to dogmatic systematics as its inner form. Besides this, the biblical theology (in the 'tropology') does not forget that all historical theology, like dogmatic theology, has to serve the Christian proclamation and the Christian life of witness; as 'anagogy', it does not forget that the Christ event, which has taken place once for all, is never left behind us, but always in the highest pitch of reality stands before us as our future and the future of the world, as the grace which is never graspable, but, precisely in this, makes a challenge that presses ever anew onwards, determining the history of the Church and the world. Once again, we come up against the facts of the matter, which were sketched at the end of the preceding section: namely, that the Christ event exists only in correlation to the event of the Church and can be thought and expressed only so, and that it is only within this situation of reciprocity that the individual can appropriately situate himself in his believing and in his theologising. Outside the circulation of love between bridegroom and bride, between head and body, no one will ever know what theology signifies, and still less, what is the momentum of the glory of the divine love.

We must look back again from this abiding double form of theology through the centuries, to its foundation in Scripture itself. To speak aprioristically, if the history of Jesus of Nazareth was correctly understood and interpreted by the post-Easter community as the superabundant fulfilment of the covenantal love and fidelity established by God in the old covenant, then it was absolutely impossible to comprehend this history, to meditate on it and put it into words, otherwise than as actually happened, otherwise than as the sacred writers in their naive openness set it out and, indeed, practically force it upon us. For them, the following of Jesus before Easter was at best a dawning understanding (corresponding to the condition of the Word of God itself in its 'lowliness' which affects both the form and the content of the Word).[4] But the disclosure by the brilliant light of Easter of the sense of Jesus' past life (and especially of his Passion, of the meaning of the old covenant as a whole, of the reality of the Church under the Holy Spirit) must of necessity take place by stages; it was not necessary that they should turn to Is 53 on the very first day—although this has happened by the time the pre-Pauline texts (1 Cor 15.3; Rom 4.24f) were compressed. As a whole, the theology of the New Testament is in a process of coming-to-be; it is a 'period of discovery' that has not come to an end. Thus, the method of type and antitype is tested out by Paul on only a few examples, as if fortuitously, and these are certainly not intended as an exhaustive treatment, but rather as models to be followed (cf. 1 Cor 10.6–10). A [4] On the analogy between the kenosis of Jesus and the kenosis of the word of Scripture, cf. the Constitution Dei Verbum 3, ch.13, and what we shall say below about the parables of Jesus. Similarly, the chapter on Hamann in Vol. III of this work, above, pp. 239ff., and W. Leibrecht, 'Philologia Crucis', KuD 1 (1955), pp. 226–242.

---

priori, we should expect nothing else than the transpositions of pre-Easter words and events into the Church's sphere of understanding (opened up through the Spirit), and corresponding transpositions of the narrow historical situation of Jesus into the widened situation of the Church, which itself can be emphasised in very diverse ways—as the situation of the end-times in a new sense (later to be determined), as the situation in contemporary history (e.g., determined by the first persecutions), or finally as the situation of church history as such (first of all in the Lucan sense). This already shows that as the understanding widens out illimitably, it contains not only a succession of degrees of understanding which are separated from each other as they go more deeply, but also from the beginning a coexistence of theologies with different centres of understanding, which bring the same fundamental elements into different crystallisation around themselves. But these diverging theologies, which contain indeed quite contradictory emphases—as with the Pauline theology of justification by faith and the theology in Matthew and James of the superabundant fulfilment of the law—are all related to each other, and form in their roots a mesh that cannot be unravelled; it can be demonstrated (though seldom in a manner that can be taken in at a glance) that there are also literary influences from the one to the other, and that they acknowledge one another even when they seek to balance one-sided accents, that apparently were open to misunderstanding, by setting opposite accents (Jas 2.20ff. with Rom 4; 2 Pet 3.15ff., Mt 5.17ff. etc.). With all the personal and material tension between the tendencies represented by the 'pillars' (Peter, James, John, Paul), there reigns unity—not primarily on the level of 'brotherliness', but in their common looking upwards to the one personal centre of all theologies, to Jesus the Christ of God, the appearing and exposition of the love of the Father. Only so can one understand the fact that Paul, when the unity of the Church is put to the decisive test (Acts 21.17ff.), is ready to relativise his own point of view, which he has very emphatically stated (Letters to the Galatians and to the Romans), by obeying the counsel of James and submitting himself to the Jewish observances. This is an act of well-nigh blind obedience, but one that is carried out by a man who knows and sees that the entire theology of the Church transcends every individual aspect, however necessary and profound it may be; and that this theology is no gnosis that makes progress towards a system by means of inevitable dialectical steps, but the agape of God in Christ, displayed in his body as a body composed of the loving unity of many serving members. The New Testament, inspired by the same Holy Spirit who inspires the Church, could therefore have no other structure than the Church: in the multiplicity, a unity; and the living principle of this unity dwells in it only because it first of all (as head) transcends it.[5]

The true act of birth of the new Scripture is found in the first spontaneous generations of dogma, and in the first syntheses which were made by faith under the impression of the risen Jesus and of the Spirit who was experienced: 'Jesus is the Christ', 'he is the Son of God', 'he is the Lord', etc. Everything that follows is only a making explicit of these syntheses; the whole of the Old Testament is drawn upon and laid claim to, and incorporated into the synthesis as the property of the Church. And even if it is an ineffable marvel that is expressed in these syntheses, yet they are, as such, quite adequate, just as the fiat by which Mary gave permission was adequate. It is around this verbalisation of the mystery—no stammering or approximate formulation, but an exact verbalisation—that the theologies of the New Testament crystallise, and likewise the entire biblical and dogmatic theology of the Church, which is their continuation. Everything that remains to be said subsequently, is the justification of the first dogmatic act of generation, or theological 'a priori synthesis'. The term 'a priori' bears here a particular, unique meaning: it refers to the inner logic of love in the covenant which achieves its fulfilment between the God who discloses himself as love and the man who receives him (through God's grace in faith). This logic of love will not be grasped by any observer who stands outside, any more than an act between husband and wife will be experienced by anyone other than the two who accomplish it. Only, the logic of the divine intimacy has become so open and universal in the synthesis 'Jesus is the Christ', that anyone who wills can enter its heart and, by participating in faith, can experience and understand its urgency.

---

[5] Therefore there can be substantially more in a text of Scripture than the sacred writer consciously willed to express in the text. The research into first the literary form, second the situations in which the text was produced, and third the pre-existing forms of thinking, speech and narration influenced by the contemporary world, is undoubtedly an indispensable means to acquire the correct understanding, and achieves the 'scientific preparatory work, on the basis of which the judgment of the Church matures'. Nevertheless, this judgment is influenced also by taking into consideration first the content and unity of the whole of Scripture, second the living tradition of the universal Church, and third the analogy of faith (which in the last analysis is the one faith of the Church in its articulations). Cf. Dei Verbum 3, ch. 12.

If the momentum of the glory of the divine love is experienced in the reciprocity of Christ and the Church, and if this experience is reflected upon as theology, then the kabod (in its definitive New Testament understanding) moves methodologically also into the midpoint of theology. The momentum of God's act in the existence of Jesus, an existence which on the basis of its unique claim offers an interpretation of itself that points ever more unambiguously to the momentum of the Cross, and which on the basis of the resurrection of Jesus is experienced and explained in the Church definitively as the kabod of the eternal love that is present and radiant in the Christ event, brings the theology of the Old Testament to its accomplishment; for now the synthesis between the pressing Word of God and the mediator who bears it (prophet, high priest, lamb of sacrifice, servant of God, and Messiah) has been brought about and transcended in the New Testament in the paradox of the righteous one who is 'made to be sin' and is 'condemned', and who 'justifies' the condemned sinners—the paradox which is the unsurpassable momentum of divine love, that can never be constrained into any system of human reasoning. A theology that understands itself on the basis of this centre distinguishes itself from a mere 'fundamentalism' of facts of salvation, strung together 'to be believed', inasmuch as in advance of any stringing together, the immediate encounter of the self-giving love of God in Christ with the (bride-) Church, who receives and therein gives herself again, takes place—an encounter in which the 'facts of salvation' have importance only as moments that light up, and at once are reintegrated into the whole. On the other hand, this theology distinguishes itself also from a liberal existentialism, for which the objective kabod of the love of God that presses forwards is watered down to an 'impulse' that encounters the individual from the historical Jesus and his example and model, or (if this is unattainable) from the kerygma that is proclaimed. Nevertheless, the Church's continually actual meeting with the glory of God remains bound to the historical meeting of Jesus with his first disciples, or with his first community; this encounter is not to be interpreted in its momentum through all time as timeless nor as exclusively futuristic—it is futuristic because in the present it is never wholly graspable, never to be finished off, and therefore contains within itself the promise of an 'exceedingly great measure of the weight of the momentum of glory' (2 Cor 4.17). Theology takes place, therefore, centrally in the making-over of this momentum of God's love to the Church, as this gives itself expression and the Church tries to respond to God in her existence and in the reply of her understanding. The encounter itself is a presence that is empirically never fully comprehensible—for example, in the existential or liturgical situation of an individual such as a theologian, or of a community: all that is empirical must transcend itself anew and transfer itself into the greater, 'transcendent', but absolutely concrete reality of the universal church. That is the true meaning of the adage, per Mariam ad Jesum, per Jesum ad Patrem, 'through Mary to Jesus, through Jesus to the Father'. For this reason, empirical theology can never be completed and self-contained.

3. WORD—FLESH

a. The claim

The beginning of the history of Jesus appeared as a concentrated, transcending summary of the history of Israel. After the methodological consideration which has now been introduced, one would expect that the entire unfolding of his history would be depicted, in its details, in the hues of the 'promise' (for his history is the fulfilment of the promise),[1] and likewise that his history would be given its place within the indissoluble nexus between event (Christ) and interpretation (Church). The second nexus assumes the first into itself, and determines it, but thereby acknowledges that it itself is determined by the first nexus. This circularity has an internal necessity, if the truth of the event of Jesus, in order to be known in its authentic character, presupposes faith as the vessel which alone is capable of accommodating its interpretation. The decision of faith is the presupposition, not only for the act of seeing the event of Jesus correctly, but also for the act whereby the event lets itself be seen correctly.[2] Thus, it is not a matter of excavating the 'supposed historical bruta facta' that lie behind the Church's faith, but of encountering the truth that conceals and discloses itself here, in its ever-new transition between the act of self-disclosure and the act of believing comprehension, understanding and interpretation of what is revealed; and in this, it is necessary to note how precisely the interpretation stands in continuity with what is interpreted, even when for the sake of this continuity it must make use of other concepts and thought-forms. What for Jesus was most urgent, can be so for the interpreting Church only if she lets it assume this character of supreme urgency for herself: and this is possible only when the Jesus who proclaims becomes the Jesus who is proclaimed.[3] The following chapters will demonstrate that this transposition is not only legitimate, but absolutely necessary. The right approach does not consist in asking what Jesus said and did, and what he did not say and do, or which 'titles of sovereignty' he applied to himself and which not; it consists in asking what was the necessary presupposition of the act whereby his community formed his words, deeds and titles in the way it did. Naturally, this requires a continuity, which we can leave formulated in as formal, as seemingly empty a way as we like: it is precisely this formal matter, viz. Jesus' claim to authority, that is the foundation that maintains itself through all the formulations that give it content, the foundation that generates the formulations from itself. And this foundation is not concealed in the interpretations, but rather shines through along with them; for this, there is no more apt name than that of the original kabod, the unique momentum here of the one who is present, whether he utters the ἐγώ εἰμι explicitly or not.

---

[1] Cf. not so much the quotations which offer a reflection, as some miracle narratives, and especially the Passion narrative. On this, cf. E. Hoskyns and N. Davey, The Riddle of the New Testament (1931).

[2] For this reason, theology is the unique science across the methods of which the decision of faith cuts, and divides it into two halves that cannot be united to each other: a genuine theology, which presupposes faith and does its thinking within the nexus of Christ and the Church; and a false theology, which rejects faith as methodologically dubious and irresponsible, and subsumes the truth of the phenomenon which discloses itself, under an anthropological truth (however this may be understood).

The first question, therefore, will not at all be, 'What was the chief concern of Jesus in his preaching?',[4] but, 'What was the chief impression that remained from his earthly existence?' It is historically certain that he was crucified because of a presumptuous claim that could be given a political interpretation, and brought him the inscription on the cross, 'The king of the Jews'. But this 'presumption' is the formal thread that runs consistently through all the Gospels and marks off his activity so strongly from that of the Baptist. It is not, therefore, the prophetic-apocalyptic message of the nearness of the kingdom of heaven that distinguishes the appearing of the two—Matthew can clothe the call to repentance of both John and Jesus in exactly the same words, 'Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is near!' (3.2 = 4.17). One could free both calls from the historical clothing of apocalyptic imminent expectation, and one would then have an identical appeal to men to repent in the face of the eschatological situation. But the evangelists have elaborated very precisely the difference between the two calls: the Baptist points to the one who is coming after him (whether this is God, or his 'messenger' or 'angel', Mal 3.1, but Jesus points to no one who should come after him. After him comes no one else,[5] and he is identical with the content of his call. It is not correct to say that he summons man to make man's own decision: he himself in every case makes the decision about the man.

---

[3] 'The problematic of our problem consists in the fact that the exalted Lord has almost completely absorbed the image of the earthly Lord, and yet the community asserts the identity of the exalted one with the earthly one. There is however no hope of solving this problematic . . . by taking hold of supposed historical bruta facta, but only by taking hold of the unity and tension between the preaching of Jesus and that of his community. The question about the historical Jesus is legitimately the question about the continuity of the gospel in the discontinuity of the periods of time and in the variation of the kerygma': E. Käsemann, Das Problem des historischen Jesus (1954), in: Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, Vol. I (4th edn. 1969), p. 213 (ET 'The Problem of the historical Jesus', in Essays on New Testament Themes, 1964, pp. 15–47).

[4] 'Is it the proclamation of the Father-God and of love to all brother-men? Is it an apocalyptic message, explainable on the basis of the contemporary situation and inner disposition of Judaism, with a glowing-hot near expectation, which became a lasting and definitive religion only

The fourth evangelist, on the basis of the old covenant, summarises this in the theological abbreviation: 'the Word became flesh'. What 'Word'? The word in Jeremiah: 'Is not my Word like fire, and like a hammer which breaks the rock in pieces?' (23.29); the word in the Book of Wisdom: 'Thy all-powerful Word leaped from heaven, a stern warrior carrying the sharp sword of thy authentic command . . . and touched heaven while standing on the earth' (18.15f.);[6] the word of the Letter to the Hebrews, which in itself describes through the early Church? Is it a prophetic-eschatological summons to each man to make the existential decision?': R. Schnackenburg, Neutestamentliche Theologie (1963), pp. 59f.

---

[5] In the meantime, we leave to one side the problem of Lk 12.8 par.

[6] The context is an Old Testament context, the slaughter of the Egyptians. Lest they should die in sleep, with no understanding of the well-earned judgment that is to come upon them, they are put in the picture not Jesus,[7] but the Word of God: 'For the Word of God is living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing to the division of soul and spirit, of joints and marrow, and discerning (κριτικός) the thoughts and intentions of the heart' (4.12). Such texts give us the perspective from which to look at Pauline theology, which was indeed first on the scene ('We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ', 2 Cor 5.10), at the Synoptic Gospels and then at John (Jesus as judge, Jn 5.19–47; 7.15–24; 8.13–20), and at Revelation ('From his mouth issued a sharp two-edged sword', 1.16; 'I will war against them with the sword of my mouth', 2.16; 'He who sat upon the cloud swung his sickle on the earth, and the earth was reaped', 14.16).

Jesus' claim to decide about men is certain, on the ground of his death; it is the formal Leitmotiv of all the Gospels. It is only for this reason that Jesus is very quickly denounced as crazy or possessed (Mk 3.22ff. par., emphatically underlined by John at 8.48f.). Whatever his position on the law of Moses may have been in points of detail and as a whole—rejecting it, agreeing with it, or discriminating within it[8]—it is certain that he took it upon himself to make a judgment about the whole law, and thereby set his own authority alongside (and thus above) that of Moses.[9] We must not overlook the fact that the antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount—'You have through 'dreams which disturbed them and forewarned them of this, so that they might not perish without knowing why they suffered' (18.19).

---

[7] C. Spicq, commentary on Hebrews, ad loc. (Vol. II, p. 87).

[8] Cf. the summary of the question by W. Trilling, Fragen zur Geschichtlichkeit Jesu (2nd edn. 1967), pp. 82–96.

[9] 'All exegetes agree that it is not possible to doubt the authenticity of the first, second and fourth antitheses of the Sermon on the Mount. It is a fact that these words belong to what is most astonishing in the Gospels. They go beyond the literal wording of the Torah in the same way that any rabbi could do when interpreting the sense of the Scripture; yet it is decisive that with the phrase ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω an authority is claimed alongside and opposed to the authority of Moses. But anyone who claims authority alongside and opposed to Moses has as a matter of fact set himself above Moses, and has ceased to be a rabbi, for a rabbi's authority is only one derived from Moses . . . There exist, and can exist, no parallels to this within Judaism . . . The unheard-of character of the logion attests its genuineness': E. Käsemann, op. cit., p. 206 (ET pp. 37f.).

heard . . . but I say to you'—are spoken by the man who comes fresh from the great temptation in the wilderness, in which he has engaged in scriptural disputation with the devil and has strained out the Word of God until he has obtained its most interior, most formal significance, and has done this in the power of the Holy Spirit who was bestowed on him at the baptism. There is no doubt that 'he understood himself to be inspired'.[10] By virtue of his discernment of the whole law, he can distinguish its details too, and can on occasion appeal back from 'your traditions' to the original intention of the law (Mt 15.3–9), but can also, as in the case of divorce, appeal back from the concessions of Moses to the original intention of God (Mt 19.3–9). He can justify this original intention, in its superior position to the holiest commandment, that of the sabbath, with a logion so bold that only Mark dares quote it: 'The sabbath was made for man, not man for the sabbath' (2.27).[11] He seems to have repeatedly shown openly this superiority of his to the sabbath, or, better, the greater urgency of his commission when compared with that of the sabbath.[12] The urgent demands of the Pharisees for a 'sign' that will give confirmation are a sufficient indication that Jesus' claim far exceeded the normal authority of an interpreter of the law who spoke in the name of God.

Just as his gaze pierces through in judgment and decision right to the very heart of the law,[13] so he sees with 'eyes like a flame of fire' (Rev 1.14; 2.18) into the hearts of men, which lie uncovered before him. The motif is constant: Jesus knows the hidden thoughts of the hearts of the disciples (Lk 9.47), of those who put him to the test (Lk 11.17), of the Pharisees

---

[10] Ibid., p. 209 (ET p. 41).

[11] Mt and Lk have only the theological consequence appended by Mk: 'So the Son of Man is lord even of the sabbath', Mt 12.8; Lk 6.5.

[12] Mk 2.23ff. par.; 3.2ff. par; Mt 12.11ff.; Lk 13.10–16; 14.3–5; Jn 5.10, 16; 9.14, 16.

[13] One cannot, therefore, apply to him what the Letter of James says: 'If you judge the law, you are not a doer of the law but its judge' (4.11). Now Jesus is both, one who keeps the law (Mt 5.17), and judge: thus what follows in James can be applied to him, 'There is one lawgiver and judge, he who is able to save and to destroy' (Jas 4.12).

(Mt 12.25), of the man who invites him to a meal (Lk 7.39ff.); he 'at once' sees through the thoughts of the scribes (Mk 2.8), he 'sees through their hypocrisy' (Mk 12.15); but he also sees at once the faith of those who stand before him (Mt 9.2; Mk 2.5; Lk 5.20), or their lack of faith (Lk 8.25), and he knows his betrayer (Mt 26.20ff.; Jn 13.21f.).[14] In John, he measures with his glance Simon who appears before him, and tells him who he really is (1.40ff.); not only does he see through Nathanael when he is presented to him, but he has already seen the one who looks at him now ('Come and see', 1.46)[15] when he was hidden (1.48); he knows all about the Samaritan woman's past and present, and discloses this to her, judging her, but bringing her salvation (4.16ff.). He hears her confession, just as he indeed hears the confessions of all who come before him in their reality which is revealed only to his gaze. 'The people to whom he speaks, and with whom he has anything to do, are there in undisguised reality. They all bring something with them into their encounter with him: the righteous bring their righteousness, the scribes the weight of their learning and arguments, the tax-collectors and sinners their guilt, those who seek help their sickness, the demoniacs the fetters of their possession, and the poor the burden of their poverty. All this is not wiped out and a matter of indifference: but in this encounter, it no longer counts. For in this encounter, each one is required to leave what he was before. In all the narratives about Jesus, the moment occurs when people have to stand forth as the people they really are.'[16] This takes place in virtue of the light that falls on them from Jesus. The isolated logion, which fits in nowhere, is a self-utterance of Jesus for this state of affairs which is brought about through his presence: 'Nothing is covered up that will not be revealed, or hidden that will not be known' (Lk 12.2; 8.17; Mk 4.22). Since his seeing into men's hearts is one with his seeing into the heart of the law, it would be quite inadequate to speak of a 'charism of cardiognosis': the act of seeing through contains decision and judgment about what is laid bare. And this is definitive judgment, 'final' judgment—the claim made here makes no distinction between this and the judgment of God.

---

[14] Mk 14.18f. is less clear.

[15] 'One ought to bring together once the passages in the Gospels which speak about this seeing, looking, seeing through by Jesus, without immediately being anxious that this is a sentimental request. In reality, we are dealing here with a very characteristic trait of the historical Jesus, one that is confirmed as exactly as possible by the type of his preaching': G. Bornkamm, Jesus von Nazareth (1956), p. 54 (ET Jesus of Nazareth, 1960, p. 60). In order to satisfy this request, it would be necessary to gather yet further individual aspects, e.g. Jesus' looking and acting at a distance (Lk 7.10; Jn 4.50), his looking into the future (to his coming suffering, Lk 9.51), his seeing Satan fall from heaven (Lk 10.18), and much else.

[16] G. Bornkamm, op. cit., p. 55 (ET p. 61).

It is decisively important to see here how the theological development of these notions in Paul, John, and the rest of the New Testament follows with no break in continuity from the 'confessional situation' of the narratives about Jesus. Even supposing that christology must let itself be voided of content till it is reduced to this formal point,[17] even supposing that the eschatological Son of Man who is coming to judge (at Lk 12.8) was distinguished by Jesus himself from the 'I' of whom men are ashamed on earth, or whom they confess—even so, the relationship between the two remains, because 'the coming Son of Man will judge and plead according to the present attitude of men to Jesus'.[18] 'Man is anxious to stand firm in the judgment and to enter the kingdom of God, and now he is told that this decision about his future is anticipated; it is made ... according to man's attitude to Jesus.' W. Marxsen can say at this point, with a certain right, 'that this (implicit) christology always expresses more than any so-called explicit christology',[19] and this because the momentum of this claim can never be equalled by any formulation of it in words.

At the same time, however, one must grant that the theological formulation exactly meets the 'confessional situation' of the narratives about Jesus and interprets this without deviation. We can continue to bracket off the question of the subjective 'messianic self-consciousness of Jesus', and still maintain that the transposition which Matthew effects on the logion we have quoted from Luke must be objectively correct: 'Whoever denies me before men, I also will deny before my Father who is in heaven' (10.33). Then the fundamental idea of the fourth evangelist, that the judgment of God is present in Jesus, has its immediate correctness, in all its contradictory aspects. As the presence of the Word, he is God's judgment: that is, he is 'true light, that (in judgment) gives light to (or illuminates, makes visible) every man' (1.9), and draws the 'works' of every man to the light (3.19–21); here, it depends on the individual man whether he 'hates' this act of becoming disclosed in the light and then comes into judgment, or in faith willingly lets himself be 'led over' and enters the salvation of the light. It is therefore wholly exact when the Johannine Jesus says both: he has come into this world for judgment (9.39), but the judgment which takes place through his presence is not the aim (but only the consequence) of his coming and of his being the Word (3.17f.; 5.24–30); it is equally exact when he says that the whole of God's judgment has been 'committed' to himself (5.22ff.), but without saying thereby that God (the Father) had given up his function as judge, for 'God accomplishes his function as judge precisely through the Son' (as can be seen from 5.23).[20] But the penetrating Word, 'living, active, piercing, judging' (Heb 4.12), is something so definitively final that it is correctly described as the hour now present, 'when the dead (will) hear the voice of the Son of God' (Jn 5.25). Paul says the same when he directs his own existence and that of every Christian towards the moment when 'we must all be laid bare before the judgment seat of Christ' (2 Cor 5.10); for him too, this judgment of God (2 Tim 4.1, 8) is identical with the judgment of God (Rom 14.10ff.). And because the original situation of being seen through by Jesus (in a gaze that penetrates to faith or hypocrisy) is wholly integrated with Jesus' commission to salvation (about which we shall later speak thematically), the theological explication of the eschatological (or last, 'final') judgment of Christ as a sovereign act of decision and division is unavoidable and sets a limit to all questioning. Whatever the literary prehistory of the Matthaean parable of world judgment may be—the frame which has been built out round the kernel of logia about the criterion of judgment points back to the thinking within late Judaism about judgment—it is the conclusion of the whole preaching life of Jesus before the Passion, just as the final logion about the fullness of authority of the risen one (28.18–20) is the conclusion of the Gospel of Matthew as a whole. As this parable replaces the expression 'Son of Man' (25.31) subsequently by the title 'king' (25.34, 40), so Matthew replaces the 'man' who invites to his banquet in Luke (Lk 14.16ff.) by a 'king' (Mt 22.2) and closes the parable with this king's inspection of the guests as judge (22.11–13). And if to begin with, the parables are Jesus' hidden presentation of himself, in that they describe the attitude to the kingdom as, in the final analysis, an attitude to him or to his message,[21] then it is precisely Matthew who tends to carry over the immanent judgment in the parables into a judgment at the end of time.[22] Out of a parable about the big fish, for the sake of which the just fisherman throws all the little fish into the water (Gospel of Thomas 8),[23] Matthew constructs, in the material peculiar to his Gospel, a parable of judgment, in which the fish which at the end of time are good and rotten are sorted out (13.47ff.). Matthew projects into the definitive and final judgment the trajectory that comes from the judging attitude of the earthly Jesus, before which belief and unbelief do not merely part company, but are themselves judged by this very attitude of Jesus. The transition between the deciding Jesus and the judging Christ (or lord or king) is formed by the sermons of the Acts of the [17] As, for example, Willi Marxsen attempts to do in his Anfangsprobleme der Christologie (1960).

---

[18] Op. cit., p. 26.

[19] Ibid., p. 28.

---

[20] R. Bultmann, commentary on John, p. 192 (ET The Gospel of John, 1971, p. 256).

[21] E. Fuchs, 'Bemerkungen zur Gleichnisauslegung', ThLZ 79 (1954), pp. 345–348, also printed in: Zur Frage nach dem historischen Jesus (1960), pp. 136–142; J. J. Vincent, 'The Parables of Jesus as Self-Revelation', in: Studia Evangelica 1957 (Berlin 1959), pp. 79–99.

[22] Mt 13.30; 13.40f.; 18.32f.; 21.40ff.; 22.11ff.; 25.12; 25.26ff.; 25.31ff.

[23] Translation in K. Aland, Synopsis quattuor Evangeliorum (4th edn. 1967), p. 518.

Apostles, where the 'holy and righteous' 'servant' (3.13f.) is glorified and made 'Lord and Messiah' (2.36), 'exalted' by God 'to his right hand as Leader and Saviour' (5.31). This is not simply a reversal, so that the one crushed becomes 'the corner-stone that crushes' (Lk 20.18), but is equally a continuity: what happened within the time of Jesus, in every encounter with him, is so definitive that it remains before every human existence as the final situation. According to Heb 6.2, the doctrine of the final judgment belongs to the elementary teachings of Christianity, and it goes without saying that it is present in all the writings of the New Testament.

This, however, is not the theme with which we are concerned here: we are concerned rather with its postulates in the life of Jesus. The 'authority' (ἐξουσία) which is peculiar to him makes it possible for him to be the present Word of God. This authority appears in his sovereign acts, such as the cleansing of the Temple, in connection with which he is naturally questioned about his warrant for doing such a thing (Mk 11.28 par.). The authority appears in yet higher degree, when he makes his reply dependent on the answering of his own question, but receives no reply to this (Mk 11.29–33). This belongs to his entire preaching as a special quality: 'What is this? A new teaching with authority!' (Mk 1.27); here, it is not the content of what is said that is new, but precisely the quality of power, as the people frequently observe, when they compare him with their other teachers, in amazement, wonder, and shock (Mt 7.28f., and frequently). More decisively than in his words, the authority expresses itself in his pushing back the domain of the demons: 'With authority and power (δύναμις) he commands the unclean spirits' (Lk 4.36). This authority finds its expression in the same way in the healing of sicknesses and in the forgiving of sins (Mk 2.10 par.). Jesus possesses and exercises this authority 'in the Spirit of God' (Mt 12.28), or, as Luke more archaically puts it, 'in the finger of God' (11.20), and thus shows himself—in all the weakness of the Incarnation—to be fundamentally stronger than the 'strength' that opposes God, for he overpowers this strength in its own house and takes away its weapons. His deeds and words, his whole giving of himself and his being, would be impossible without the presence and indwelling of the entire power of God in him.

We may make one further point: in order that everything in man, the external and the internal, and indeed the demonic, may lie before him fully transparent, it is necessary that Jesus, who is the bearer of authority, be himself fully transparent before God. Here it is John who develops all the lines: the perpetual accomplishing of the Father's will by the Son (4.34; 8.29), his perpetual looking to the Father, who shows him all things (5.19f.), his proclaiming of the truth which he has heard from God (8.40). It is only on these grounds that he himself can be for John 'the truth' (14.16; cf. 1.14). But this concept is already presupposed at Mk 12.14 in the words of the Pharisees and Herodians, as a well-known characteristic of Jesus: 'Master, we know that you are true'; in the Old Testament, this is a property of God ('emeth), very close in meaning to the reliability, the proven dependability of Yahweh and of his pledge in his covenant.[24] John explains Jesus' truth on the grounds of his sinlessness (8.46f.), of his selflessness that seeks only the Father's glory (5.41), of his transparence to the Father, which makes his testimony to the Father and the Father's testimony to him inseparably two-in-one (8.14ff.). One may wish to see in this already a theology of the risen Christ: in the same way, Paul links the dogmatic truth about Christ with what Jesus was in reality, by means of the concept of truth: 'You did not so learn Christ!' (i.e., in such a way that you could continue to lead a pagan life), 'assuming that you have heard about him and were taught in him, as the truth is in Jesus' (Eph 4.20ff.), which means, 'as this Christ in truth appears in Jesus, and makes his claim in Jesus'.[25] Here too there reigns continuity.

The truth of Jesus as transparence to God passes over in an unbroken continuity, when considered in Old Testament categories of thought, into concepts such as holiness and righteousness, which are likewise applied to him (Mk 1.24 par.; Mt 27.19; Lk 23.47; Acts 3.14; 4.27, 30; 1 Pet 3.18, etc.).

---

[24] III/2,1, pp. 160–162. Cf. Rom 3.4.

[25] H. Schlier, commentary on Ephesians, pp. 216f.

From here, there is but a single step to Paul's idea that in Jesus the righteousness of God is present and accessible to us. The titles 'the faithful one', 'the true one', 'the one who judges in righteousness' (cf. Rev 19.11), when applied to Christ, overlap one another in the same way as the attributes of God in the old covenant.

On the basis of this fundamental characteristic of Jesus, who is the one who has authority, who 'sees through', and who judges, there follows the double requirement, seemingly contradictory, that Christians imitate Jesus—whose Holy Spirit they have received—in the ability to discern and in the de facto active work of discerning the spirits (1 Cor 12.10; 14.29; Heb 5.14), and indeed in the basic ability to make a decisive judgment (Mt 16.3; Lk 12.57; 1 Cor 2.14f.), but, on the other hand, that Christians leave the final judgment and final sentence to the competent Judge (Mt 7.1 par.; Jn 8.11; 1 Cor 4.5; Rom 2.1–3). But this dialectic is only an echo of the dialectic of Jesus, who both judges and does not judge, because he judges only as he hears (Jn 5.30). In the same way, he gives his own a share in his authority (Mk 3.15 etc.), without thereby giving up his 'authority over all flesh' (Jn 17.2). Only in the end-time will the believers be capable of being included in the final act of judgment of the exalted Lord (Mt 19.28 par.; 1 Cor 6.2f.), because only then will they have attained full transparence to God (cf. Jn 16.26). But even now, their ideal must already be the 'simplicity' and 'transparence of their whole being' (Mt 6.22 par.), in opposition to the dipsychia, 'having two souls', which makes man disunited in himself, opaque for others, and ineffective before God in his prayer (Jas 1.8; 4.8).

Let us return from the ecclesiological ramifications to the original phenomenon, the judging transparence of Jesus himself, which makes him the incarnate Word of God. We saw that from this point both a futurist and a realised eschatology can branch off, which however, when considered more deeply, mutually determine each other: the seven letters of Revelation show that the exalted Christ always judges his Church in the present, but each of them ends with a futurist promise; for Paul too, the judgment of the Lord is a present reality (1 Cor 11.32, 34), and is futurist only inasmuch as the existence of man and the world is oriented towards its complete laying-bare by the Judge. Because the Judge retains his kingly freedom, he draws to himself the whole character of wrath and salvation belonging to the 'Day of Yahweh' in the Old Testament, and thus his judgment remains likewise a 'judgment in accordance with works' (Rom 2.6; 1 Tim 5.24); nevertheless, it is his judgment, the judgment of the redeemer who has made satisfaction for the sins of all men. The dilemma of Christian eschatology cannot be resolved within time, because of the freedom of the Judge. We are not left with certainty, but with hope; naturally, this is a Christian hope, based on the grace of the Cross, and therefore a unique kind of hope. It is strengthened through all the ways in which it is conformed to Christ, which may be interpreted as an anticipation of his judging in grace (1 Pet 4.17). Through God's love, we may 'have confidence for the day of judgment' (1 Jn 4.17).

Because of his presumption, Jesus was condemned. In the last analysis, it is immaterial whether he explicitly used 'the absolute "I am"'[26] or not. Its earliest occurrence is not in John, 'If you do not believe that I am' (8.24), 'Then you will know that I am' (8.28), 'So that, when it takes place, you may believe that I am' (13.19), and in the pericope of the storm on the sea, 'It is I; do not be afraid' (6.20); it occurs already in the Markan apocalypse, 'Many will come in my name, saying, "I am"' (13.6). Ἐγώ εἰμι renders in various ways the formula of revelation in the Old Testament (alternating with 'I am Yahweh'), where a man is confronted quite directly with the 'I' of God, or where a word of God is to be guaranteed, or where someone expresses his acknowledgment that he has found God in his activity within history, or where the uniqueness and incomparability of Yahweh are to be highlighted. The formula is alive in the great period of revelation to Israel, and when the word of revelation ceases, the formula disappears along with it. How is Jesus' reference to his 'I' related to Yahweh's reference of old to his 'I'? It does not at all express a direct identity with God; and yet the content which he indicates by means of the utterance goes beyond everything that could be contained within contemporary messianic categories. Jesus does not employ the formula like a prophet, through whose mouth God declares his own identity and the fact that he lives; nor does he employ it to indicate the 'I' of a distinguished man who could be defined by means of a title, such as the Messiah or the awaited prophet like Moses, etc. His employment of the formula is absolute, and thereby refers back to the old formula of revelation, yet with a difference from this.[27] The only solution to the mystery hidden here is the trinitarian solution. The numerous metaphors in John ('I am the light, the resurrection and the life, the way, the truth', etc.) refer all these abstractions back to the infinite concreteness and uniqueness of the 'I' which gives expression to itself in its existence, and is 'logically prior' to the images.[28] 'The ἐγώ of Christ is the metaphysical point of coincidence of the Johannine concepts of salvation in the single reality of salvation.'[29] In the same way, the 'I' of Yahweh too gave itself concrete utterance in each of the great divine attributes, and thus concretised his glory.[30] [26] H. Zimmermann, 'Das absolute "Ich bin" in der Redeweise Jesu', Trierer Th. Ztschr. 69 (1960), pp. 1–20; idem, 'Das absolute Ego eimi als die neutestamentliche Offenbarungsformel', BZ NF 4 (1960), pp. 54–69, 266–276, with discussion of the older secondary literature. E. Stauffer, TDNT II, cols. 349–354.

---

If Jesus' claim poses a limit to all questionings, then in him there is not only the fulfilment of all the promises of Yahweh in salvation history, but also, quite naturally, of all the words of promise that the creator had implanted in his Creation—in the cosmos and in man. A 'redeemer' who did not make the claim to be the one who fulfilled God's intentions in creation, would be unworthy of belief; such a schizophrenia between cosmos and salvation (which every gnosis, up to Ernst Bloch, has attempted) has been decisively rejected in the name of theology since Justin, Irenaeus and Tertullian. Jesus' message has therefore authority over all commissions given to men in relation to the Creation too—the establishment of a just order upon earth that is worthy of man, the struggle against injustice and inhumanity—and it is he who will utter the definitive word to bring in the harvest of the endeavours of the world, which will be laid at his feet. Jesus' authority does not relieve mankind of the exertion required of it, but rather permits this exertion to assume full concreteness: now that his word and example have been among us, active human love—individual and social, personal and acting through structures—cannot be postponed. He has only removed the obstacles that prevented us from taking on our creaturely responsibility without excuses, and he has opened up for us the eschatological space that lets us dare to do the one thing necessary 'at his word' (Lk 5.5). It is not only the Word of promise of Yahweh that has become man, but also 'his Word of power, through which he upholds the world' (Heb 1.3): therefore Jesus' claim can ring out with the sound of the Creator's voice, summoning man precisely to what is most human in himself.[31]

---

[27] It is therefore impossible to agree with Zimmermann ('Das absolute Ego eimi . . .', p. 270) that Jesus reveals therewith not himself, but the Father. Zimmermann says later on, more correctly, that he bears witness to God and to his absolute unity with God (p. 271).

[28] E. Schweizer, Ego eimi (2nd edn. 1965), p. 9.

[29] F. Mussner, 'ΖΩΗ, Die Anschauung vom "Leben" im vierten Evangelium', MThStud I, Abt. 5 (1952), p. 187.

[30] On the quality of momentum in the epiphanies of the Old Testament, in which kabod first of all expresses the presence of God's being, cf. E. Pax, Epiphaneia (1955), pp. 107f., 114f.

b. Poverty

What has been said so far has allowed us to see the formal element that runs through the life of Jesus on earth and the kerygma of the early Church, as a constant that seemingly crosses over the hiatus of the death of Jesus. It is as if the 'not-word' of this death were taken up in advance in his universal claim to be the present Word of God. Such a jumping across death would not be human, and would therefore make the Verbum-Caro unbelievable, unless it were more closely determined by the second element, namely, the behaviour of the man Jesus within this claim. The prophet was ordered to cry aloud: 'And I said, "What shall I cry?" All flesh is grass . . . the grass withers, the flower fades . . . but the word of our God will stand for ever' (Is 40.6ff.). The distinction between flesh and word remained evident to all the prophets who were ordered to cry aloud the Word of God for a certain time: even in their almost superhuman existence in obedience, where they had to show forth God's dealings with Israel as a whole, the distance remained, as between the actor and the role.[1] They lived out, in the present, what God wished to accomplish in the near future. And even when the same God in his dealings forced them into the obedience which thereby signified that his act was near, at the very doors, yet these men who proleptically made the future present were never themselves God's Word. They were vessels for the Word, taken up and then allowed to go on their way once more.[2] But through prophecy, and the great judgments of destruction which were proclaimed and accomplished in prophecy, Israel was educated into an attitude that covered all of existence—into that poverty, which, being absolutely robbed and deprived of rights through God's judgment, can hope for any right and any good thing only from God.

[31] Cf. the third part of this volume: In Laudem Gloriae.

This is not to suggest that Jesus' attitude could be historically derived from the attitude of the groups of the anawim,[3] for how would a 'poor one of Yahweh' come to make a claim such as Jesus made, to be more than a prophet? But right from the start, he goes to those 'poor ones', as the beatitudes show, and if he requires men to imitate him in the programme for life that is developed there, then this requires that he paradoxically combine the claim to be more than a prophet with the complete attitude of poverty. Imminent expectation of the End is characteristic of both: the expectation that God will do very soon what the prophet announces, or what the poor man longs for; but neither can change this 'very soon' into a 'now'. We might formulate it aprioristically thus: if the word that the prophet possesses and the attitude of poverty of the anaw can become identical in their orientation towards the same 'soon' of God's action, then we would possess a model (the content of which could not be filled out) for what the Incarnation of the Word is; the existence of Jesus himself shows that this is inconceivable, for in his existence the Word (precisely in its divine claim to authority and to be judge) is present, and yet the accomplishment of the Word (the kingdom of God which has drawn near) remains future.

---

[1] G. Fohrer, Die symbolischen Handlungen der Propheten (1953).

[2] III/2,1, pp. 293-297.

[3] As E. Käsemann rightly says: Das Problem des historischen Jesus, op. cit., p. 208 (ET p. 39).

The paradox of Jesus becomes visible where he makes his absolute claim in equally absolute poverty and in the vulnerability which belongs to poverty, in the renunciation of all earthly power and every earthly possession. An authority such as Jesus has and bestows is not something that the one who bears it can delight in, as if it were his private possession (Lk 10.20). Jesus is the bringer of salvation, equipped only to pass on what he has to others; for himself, he has nothing. Those who receive the gifts, as in the Old Testament, are the poor of every sort, as they are listed in the beatitudes: those who have become poor in their inmost attitude ('in spirit'), the 'lowly and small' (πραεῖς), those who have been interiorly emptied and cleansed (καθαροί), those who live in mourning over the present and in hunger and thirst for what ought to be, while doing what they can in their powerlessness—having mercy, indeed making peace between the embittered through their own state of being reconciled; and all this in the powerlessness that brings them persecution for the sake of what they do not have and cannot force to come about (Mt 5.3–10). Sinners are not named here, as though the poverty of their souls would make them poor before God; but, continuing and bringing to its fulfilment the old covenant, Jesus goes to them too—indeed, to them especially, the genuine sick who need the physician (Mt 9.12), 'For the Son of Man came to seek and to save the lost' (Lk 19.10). The poor and the sinners sit together in the same darkness (Mt 4.16); and when the sinner sees and accepts that he is helpless in his poverty, this joins him to the anawim, as far as Jesus is concerned (the tax collector in the Temple, Lk 18.9ff.; the lost son, 15.11ff.). Jesus knows that, when he takes the side of 'Lazarus' against the glutton ('Woe to you that are rich! . . . to you that are full . . . to you that laugh!', Lk 6.24f.), he brings the old covenant to its fulfilment: Moses and the prophets suffice for anyone to realise this (16.31), especially when Jesus lays emphasis grotesquely on the malpractice: 'They devour widows' houses, and for a pretence make long prayers' (20.47). Mk and Lk close the instructions of Jesus, before the apocalypse which makes the transition into his Passion, with his comment on the poor widow's gesture, which stands as the perfect accomplishment of his demand for poverty: 'They all contributed out of their abundance to the treasury, but she out of her poverty has put in everything she had, her whole living' (two lepta = one penny) (Mk 12.44 par.). The commandment concerning 'hidden almsgiving' (Mt 6.2ff.) is here fulfilled.

The requirement Jesus makes is two-fold: in the Sermon on the Mount, the requirement to be poor; to the disciples, the requirement to leave everything. The Sermon on the Mount and the Sermon on the Plain emphasise the essential poverty of human existence, its dependence on God (Mt 6.25ff.): God cares for tomorrow, and if man cares about God, then his tomorrow is also taken care of. The rebuke to Martha makes this very clear (Lk 10.41). The lack of care goes so far that one must not only avoid amassing possessions which God will anyhow require tomorrow of us 'fools' (Lk 12.20), and must avoid gathering on earth rusting treasures that hold fast the heart in what passes away (Mt 6.19ff.); one must willingly let oneself be robbed, without striking back (Mt 5.39–42; 1 Cor 6.7), without anxiety, because we are kept safe in God (Lk 12.6f.), and we will lack nothing when we are sent out by Christ (Lk 22.35). Luke weaves together from the very beginning this general directive about the attitude of poverty with the particular instruction to those who 'follow' to sell all 12.33f.). For these, perfect poverty is one with perfect obedience: at the call of Christ, they must leave everything (Lk 5.11, 28), must 'renounce all that they have' (14.33), 'sell all that they have and distribute to the poor' (18.22), without taking farewells, without burying a father (9.59ff.); Jesus himself takes the place of the family bond that is cut, as the unity which binds together, just as he himself relocates his own family in the fellowship of those who believe and follow (8.21). This unconditional leaving of all things is the presupposition of the necessary readiness for all things on the part of the disciple ('Master, I will follow you wherever you go', Mt 8.19): not only the general readiness 'with loins girt' for the approaching kingdom of God (Lk 12.35ff.), but already in the present the readiness to let oneself be sent out by Jesus 'like sheep among wolves' (Mt 10.16) in the service of the coming kingdom 'without pay' and without means of support (10.8–10), and indeed unprepared spiritually, because the Spirit will inspire what is needed (10.19f.).

These unheard-of requirements, seemingly inhuman, can be based upon only one presupposition—that Jesus himself is the one who is absolutely poor. How could he make such demands, unless he had first accomplished this archetypally, representatively and inclusively. When he thus sharpens the requirement of the Old Testament, he can appear as the simple claim of the Word made flesh only if he is the one who goes ahead on the way (ἀρχηγός, Heb 12.2), the one who completely accomplishes the requirement. As Irenaeus insists to the gnostics, he cannot require of his disciples achievements that he himself did not accomplish,[4] for otherwise the disciple would 'stand above the master' (Lk 6.40), and otherwise the fullness of his heart would not flow over on to his lips (Lk 6.45). How could he say to his disciples, 'Why do you call me "Lord, Lord," and not do what I tell you?' (6.46), if he himself did not do it, and thus show himself to be their Lord? It is for this reason that he warns those who wish to follow him, 'The Son of Man has nowhere to lay his head' (Lk 9.58). He has entrusted his cause so exclusively to the future which belongs to God that he can dare to do what is humanly speaking irresponsible: he can make others exclusively dependent upon himself, and thereby expose them to complete poverty, in order to give them in return the absolute promise of God as responding gift and guarantee (Mt 19.29 par.).

---

[4] Adv. Haer. III 18.5–6.

Jesus' poverty that looks to God can be characterised in more detail by means of three concepts: prayer, faith, and Spirit. Prayer, essentially as the attitude of a beggar, as the parables about prayer dramatically describe this: one must keep on dinning into God's ears, indeed one must become a nuisance to him, begging for the 'minimum for existence', i.e. for him himself (Lk 11.5–8; 18.1–7).[5] The prayer which Jesus gave as a model of prayer, the Our Father, is a beggar's prayer from start to finish. It demands God's coming, placing at its beginning the address of intimacy, 'Abba',[6] which was reserved for Jesus alone; it demands that his name be hallowed, that his kingdom come, that his will be done on earth as in heaven—three petitions which express the same thing in three different ways, the prayer that God's power prevail where men are powerless. Then the prayer begs for the bread that is necessary for life, not for a store to be laid up, but from day to day; then it begs for the forgiveness of sins, displaying its own poverty as far as righteousness is concerned (for the one who forgives his debtor waives justice); and finally, the prayer begs to be borne through temptation, for only God's power permits us to stand fast in temptation. Total dependence on God means that the one who knocks is sure of being heard (Lk 11.9; developed christologically at Jn 14.13f.; 15.16c). Jesus himself lives from the prayer in which the Father gives him the nourishment which he needs (Mt 4.4; Jn 4.32, 34). Luke has all the great events of his mission take place in prayer: the baptism and the pouring out of the Spirit (3.21), the questioning of Peter (9.18), the transfiguration (9.28), the teaching about prayer (11.1), the Mount of Olives (22.42), the Cross (23.34); in between lie the moments of withdrawal to 'desert places' (4.42; 5.16; Mt 14.13; Mk 6.31), into lonely mountains (Mt 14.23; Mk 6.46; Jn 6.15), so that here too he may pray (Lk 5.16; Mk 1.35). However unique the intimacy of Jesus with the Father may be, he does not teach the disciples to pray otherwise than he himself does, praying for the self-giving of the Father, who gives himself to Jesus as the food that is completely satisfying.

---

[5] We may leave aside here the question of whether these parables were originally instructions about prayer. Cf. Joachim Jeremias, Die Gleichnisse Jesu (7th edn. 1965), pp. 157f., 153f. (The Parables of Jesus, 1963, pp. 157f., 153f.).

[6] J. Jeremias, 'Kennzeichen der ipsissima vox Jesu', in: Festschrift A. Wikenhauser (1954), pp. 88f. It is in this form of address that the distance between the prayer of the New Testament and the prayer of the Old Testament lies. As far as the content is concerned, especially in the first petitions of the Lord's Prayer, Old Testament prayer could sound essentially the same: 'May his great name be magnified and hallowed in the world which he made according to his will. And may he establish his kingdom in our lifetimes and in our days, soon and in time near at hand' (beginning of the Qaddush prayer): I. Elbogen, Der jüdische Gottesdienst in seiner geschichtlichen Entwicklung (3rd edn. 1931), pp. 92ff.

Another word for poverty is faith, as this is used in the Synoptic Gospels: the faith that Jesus presupposes as the active element in his miracles,[7] the faith in which he summarises the attitude of God as covenant-partner. But here Jesus is no waiting onlooker, but through his own attitude he conveys and inspires faith (πίστευσον, Lk 8.50), and indeed he helps the one who is weak in faith in such a way that he gives him a share in his own attitude and confers the power of faith that is lacking (Mk 9.24). Since Jesus himself fulfils in himself the Old Testament attitude of full confidence in God, what he imparts can be called archetypical faith.[8] Jesus is 'leader and perfecter of faith' (Heb 12.2), as the Letter to the Hebrews describes him, in unbroken continuity from the old covenant to the new (ch. 11, describing faith in the old covenant as looking proleptically to the attitude of Christ, and in the new covenant as deriving from this attitude). Considered from such a height, the Synoptic faith automatically becomes, after Easter, faith in Christ, who does not merely synthesise in himself the Old Testament attitude, by his total giving of himself to the Father,[9] but transcends this and indeed establishes its foundations (cf. Heb 11.26; 1 Pet 1.11). Jesus trains the one who believes imperfectly, in what he himself possesses perfectly; only so can he demand that one not merely 'hear and follow the word of God' (Lk 11.28), but 'hear and follow my word' and thus build one's house upon the rock (6.47f.). For his word is not only a word that comes from God in authority, but a word that is directed to God in complete poverty.

---

[7] 'Your faith has made you well', Mt 9.22 par.; 15.28; Mk 10.52; Lk 17.19; 18.42. Unbelief prevents him from working wonders: Mt 13.58; Mk 6.6.

[8] This is especially emphasised by F. Gogarten (Was ist Christentum (1956), p. 36; Verhängnis und Hoffnung der Neuzeit (1953), pp. 49–64), by E. Fuchs ('Jesus und der Glaube', in: Zur Frage nach dem historischen Jesus (1960), pp. 238–257), and by G. Ebeling ('Der Zeuge des Glaubens', in: Das Wesen des christlichen Glaubens (1959), pp. 48–65; ET The Nature of Faith, 1961, pp. 44–57). On the tradition of this idea, cf. my essay, 'Fides Christi', in: Sponsa Verbi. Skizzen zur Theologie II (1960), pp. 45–79.

Finally, Spirit. It is God's breath and wind that 'drives' the one who is poor and obedient into the direction and on to the paths of the divine will and commission (Mk 1.12; Lk 4.14; Acts 16.6; Rom 8.14). It is the presence of God in him, blowing him in divine freedom to meet the future that belongs to God (Jn 3.8). This is what the poor man needs above all, this is what he must ask for; and if parents do not give their children a stone instead of bread, a serpent instead of a fish, or a scorpion instead of an egg, still less will God withhold from him the divine Holy Spirit (Lk 11.11–13).[10] When poverty asks, it receives unfailingly—not what is earthly (that will be 'given as well'), but the good things of God. It is possible to blaspheme against Jesus in his powerlessness; but to blaspheme 'against the Holy Spirit' who drives him, who is the definitive bond between man and God, is to exclude oneself definitively from salvation (Mk 3.29 par.).

Jesus' poverty is not only requirement and instruction, but also, since he is the bringer of salvation, above all an act of

---

[9] See the next section of this chapter.

[10] Luke makes clearer the general expression in Mt ('How much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things to those who ask him!', 7.11), on the basis of his post-Easter faith, by interpreting the logion to refer to the embodiment of all good gifts, the Holy Spirit.

solidarity. It is necessary to take a panoramic view of all the various groups of men with whom he is in solidarity, in order to understand the unity of his conduct. Most noticeably, we have his fellowship of house and table with 'all the tax collectors and sinners' (Lk 15.1f.), and his entering the house of the tax collector Zacchaeus who thereby changes from one who is 'rich' and 'lost' to become one who 'gives' (Lk 19.1–10); but no less important is his taking the side of those who are spiritually unsheltered, the 'little ones' who are open to scandal (17.2), his taking the side of the 'simple ones' to whom (in opposition to the wise and clever) the mysteries of God are revealed, and above all his taking the side of the 'children', when he puts forward physical childhood as a concrete image and parable of the inner attitude of the child (18.15ff.; 9.47ff.); finally, he takes the side of those who are persecuted, cast out, belittled, those who are robbed of their good name (6.22f.). In the case of the last group, we see that God's solidarity in the Old Testament with those persecuted for his sake (the prophets: Lk 6.23; 11.49ff.) now passes over into the new solidarity of Jesus with those who are persecuted 'for the sake of the Son of Man' (Lk 6.22), 'for my sake' (Mt 5.11); how indeed could Jesus fail to be in solidarity in a wholly new way with such people, who comprehend him not only as the embodied Word of God, but as the model of the poverty that looks to God, and are therefore ready to follow him on a humanly impossible path into the complete nakedness of the 'cross', where only one thing is certain, that they will 'lose their life' (Lk 9.23f.)? The three parables which have their starting point in the scandal of his solidarity with the sinners, that of the lost sheep, that of the lost drachma and that of the lost son (Lk 15), are thus first of all illustrations of the grace of God which is united with the poor against the rich, grace that is already present in the Old Testament but takes on here such a clarity and definitiveness of form that it is impossible to overlook the appearing in Jesus of the Father's love for 'those who have lost their way'. The 'weakness' of the love in the heart of God, as this had been revealed since the prophecy of Hosea,[11] becomes definitively visible in the figure of the father who runs to meet his lost son as he comes home, falls on his neck and kisses him, for the simple reason that he has been found again. There is no trace in Old or New Testament of a sympathising of God or of Jesus with the sinner qua sinner; but there does exist a bond of sympathy with the one who knows that he is a 'poor wretch', one whose tears flow much more quickly than those of the hard, righteous Pharisee (Lk 7.44f.), and whose melting heart makes directly for the melting heart of God.

---

[11] III/2,1, p. 227.

This incarnation of God's solidarity with the poor (in every form) has, however, a catastrophic logic: if he takes this seriously, it will bring him to the cross—not most deeply for the external reason that he has appropriated to himself an authority that does not belong to him, but for an internal reason, because he now must really 'be reckoned among those who have broken the law' (Lk 22.37). The transition from the historical crucifixion to its interpretation after Easter, even before Paul, as 'for us', 'for our sins', a transition that at first sight is difficult to comprehend, is the logical result of taking the solidarity seriously. Whoever puts himself at the head of the poor, in order to lead them along an unmarked path into the kingdom of God which is 'near' and coming towards them, puts himself also at the head of the sinners, in order to lead them, as the first of the 'lost sons', to the Father who is drawing near and hastening to meet them. If one wished to plot out the trajectory of a New Testament constant in the same way as this was done in the preceding section, from the Jesus who 'sees through' men to the 'judge over the living and the dead', then this trajectory would lead from the poor Jesus to the 'Lamb slain before the foundation of the world' upon the throne of God (Rev 5.6, 9, 12; 13.8).

In this solidarity, we see in Jesus' existence the form that has been termed proleptic.[12] Here we may leave on one side the problem of the apocalyptic thought-form that it is said provides the explanation, because the question of Jesus' time will be discussed later. Here we need only observe that the so-called apocalyptic imminent expectation has its roots in prophetic imminent expectation; but at the beginning of our presentation of Jesus, it was shown to be an essential aspect that genuine prophecy once more came on the scene, after a long interval of time that was in part filled by the apocalyptic writings; and Jesus is nowhere compared in the Gospels with an apocalyptic figure, but repeatedly with a new prophet, a great prophet, or a prophet of old reborn. Now, it can be an aspect of prophetic discourse that it must await a coming deed of God and thus a coming verification by God (Deut 18.21f.); the truth of what Elijah declares on Mount Carmel is brought about when God's fire descends and consumes the sacrifice that has been prepared, and in Deutero-Isaiah God shows that he is the lord of history by establishing the truth of the past and the present by means of the future new thing that he is creating.[13] But whereas in the case of the prophet, the fulfilment of the Word that is uttered through him lies with God and remains independent of the person of the prophet himself, the claim that Jesus makes, to be the present Word of God in judgment, refuses to permit such a distancing: the future of God, into which Jesus leads the poor and the sinners, must finally lie in him himself. And what other absolute future has a man to offer than his own death?

---

[12] W. Pannenberg, Grundzüge der Christologie (1964), pp. 47–61.

He possesses something like a verification in advance: 'Go and tell John what you hear and see: the blind receive their sight and the lame walk, lepers are cleansed and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good news preached to them. And blessed is he who takes no offence at me' (Mt 11.4ff.). But the 'noticeable reluctance to confer on the miracles the status of a direct eschatological legitimation of Jesus'[14] is clear in all the Gospels. They place the accent on the final fate of Jesus, and they become a narrative river when they must begin to narrate this final fate. But the unheard-of words, both the requirement made and the promise pledged, and the unheard-of deeds of the public life of Jesus were, taken together, 'proleptic' to the extent that they could have been spoken and performed only by one who was prepared from the outset to give in payment for them everything that a man can pay: the hard currency that backed up his words and deeds was his blood, his death. But how could a death go far enough to satisfy these requirements and claims and promises? Here there is no further answer, if one reckons the price of this death to be the price of an ordinary human death—the price of such a death would not cover one single claim. In this 'criminal's death', God's kingdom must come, otherwise the claim is pure madness. The claim therefore entails in itself the absolute overcharging of this human life, the exorbitant demand that this human life pay for all failure and all sin with what is of worth in a life (in living and in dying).

---

[13] III/2,1, pp. 271f.

[14] U. Wilckens, 'Das Offenbarungsverständnis in der Geschichte des Urchristentums', in: W. Pannenberg (ed.), Offenbarung als Geschichte (2nd edn. 1963), p. 59.

The exorbitant demand made upon what lies within human proportions is, therefore, a fundamental trait of the life of Christ and—at a distance—of the life of a Christian. There is disproportion between the greatness of the harvest and the scarceness of the workers (Lk 10.2), and therefore exorbitant demands are made upon the worker, who is not invited, after bearing the burden of work in the fields, to sit down at table for a well-earned meal, but must first serve food to his master—without being expressly asked or thanked—and who is never perfect in his serving: 'When you have done all that is commanded you'—and when have we done so?—'say, "We are unworthy servants; we have only done what was our duty"' (Lk 17.7–10). An excessive demand is made of the fig-tree, when it is absolutely required to produce fruit because the Lord needs it, although it is not the season for fruit (Mk 11.12f.). What is specifically Christian begins at the point where necessity, justice, and the thought of balanced settlement cease. Thus, the feast is made ready for the prodigal son, but the good son who stayed at home does not receive it; thus, 'Do good and lend, expecting nothing in return' (Lk 6.35), and 'When you give a dinner or a banquet, do not invite your friends or your brothers or your kinsmen or rich neighbours, lest they also invite you in return, and you be repaid. But when you give a feast, invite the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and you will be blessed, because they cannot repay you' (Lk 14.12ff.). Thus, the Samaritan pays for the man left half-dead, without awaiting anything in return (Lk 10.35). In the parable of the 'steward', this goes as far as open 'injustice': the man who has squandered the goods of his master is excused and helps himself by lowering the sums on the debtors' bills (Lk 16.1–7): he practises in an odd manner the logic of the petition in the Lord's Prayer, 'forgiving' in his master's name the debt of his neighbour, on the presupposition that what is crooked will become straight for the master. This logic makes sense to the master, for he praises the steward for it (16.8). He who loses gains, but he who wishes to gain loses (Mk 8.35 par.); this law too is in force with the addition 'for my sake'. He who gives out the master's money, to make it work for him, gains double: but what is sterile will be taken away from the one who buries his talent in a napkin, and given to the other, who grasped the law of fruitfulness (Lk 19.11–26). Therefore there is no limit for the forgiveness of offences (Mt 18.21f.; Lk 17.3f.), and indeed ultimately there is no limit between friend and foe in the love of neighbour (Mt 5.43–48). 'Thus you will be sons of the Most High; for he is kind to the ungrateful and the selfish. Be merciful, even as your father is merciful' (Lk 6.35–36).

The more Jesus proclaims such an 'unrighteousness' of love, the more responsibility he loads on himself; and since he, the poor man, has nothing with which to pay, he can only offer 'himself as ransom for the many' to God (Mk 10.45; Mt 20.28). He, who was to baptise 'with Spirit and fire' (in the Baptist's words), who himself came 'to cast fire upon the earth' (naturally, a fire other than the Baptist imagined), longs 'to be baptised with a baptism' (Lk 12.49–50) which is unambiguously his death (Mk 10.38), the reality of the dipping down into the abyss and the chaos which stood behind the sacramental act of John the Baptist. Here, the reality of the Word made flesh as poverty flows into the third aspect: into total self-abandonment.

Before we speak of this, a glance at John can show how much the two first aspects, authority and poverty (or, as we more properly say in his case, obedience), are one for him.

The unity lies in the transparence of the one sent, who does not his own will, but the will only of the one who sent him (Jn 6.38), who does not speak from himself, and accordingly does not seek his own glory, and precisely for this reason is 'true' (7.18), i.e. a word that is transparent to the one who is speaking: 'My teaching is not mine, but the teaching of him who sent me' (7.16; 14.10, 24). But the synthesis which is before John's eyes comes about in the already present death of Jesus, in his 'being given up', 'falling into the earth', 'being raised up'. Everything points to 'the hour', and is already outlined on this basis.

c. Self-abandonment

The distinguishing marks of Jesus' existence, 'authority' and 'poverty', are prima facie irreconcilable: as the one with authority, he acts and speaks with a power in which God makes himself present, and as the one who is poor, he is wholly lacking in power and means of defence—at most, he can evade the powers of the world; and he trains those who are his in the same poverty that looks to God. But even if both distinguishing marks could be comprehended in one view (as is the case in the Johannine transparency to the Father), and could persist through everything as formal characteristics at the basis of Jesus' existence, where then would 'what is not a word' (as we have termed it above, when setting the scene) remain as the midpoint of the Word? It will be shown that the third and final implication of the Word made flesh, in which alone the first two distinguishing marks really come together, leads to this midpoint, to the word as not-word, as a word that abandons itself and dissolves itself.

The first meaning of 'The Word became flesh' is quite straightforward: word, this particular form of personal utterance, known to everyone, takes on a form of being which, as such, is foreign to the word, for flesh as such does not speak. Even if 'flesh' here stands for 'man', speaking is only one of the forms of activity of the being 'man'; the birth is preceded by nine months of existence in deepest silence, so that, in so far as the event whereby 'the Word becomes flesh' occurs precisely at the conception, the act of the Word's becoming man means an act of becoming silent. Human existence is finite, an existence that moves towards death; in death, human utterance ends once for all, and what was spoken as word in the course of the mortal life, whether significant or insignificant, is in any case bound to the form of temporality and thus to transitoriness, and thereby inescapably to futility. Words from past moments, if they are to live again, must always be reincarnated in a present moment. And even though a man were able to incorporate into his uttered word much of his experience of life, indeed much of the truth of his life, he would precisely then be unable to bracket off the fleetingness and futility of his existence so that this found no place in his utterance—or else, he would have to renounce precisely the (approximate) synthesis of existence and word that seemed worth striving for, by anchoring the possible supratemporal significance of what was said somewhere else than in his own existence. The idea that a mortal being ('flesh') could give itself utterance as immortal 'word' is a contradiction that would seem necessarily to burst open and destroy human existence. But if the divine and eternal word wished to give itself adequate expression in mortal flesh—however mysterious the manner of this might be—this could not happen through man himself, unless he were to place his entire existence in the flesh, mortal and futile, at the disposal of the divine Word in such a self-exposition, by handing himself over like an alphabet or a keyboard, for the act of formulation in words, handing over himself as a whole; birth and death, speaking and silence, waking and sleeping, success and failure, and everything else that belongs to the substance of human existence.

Only now does the full paradox become visible. For if God's Word has become flesh, then everything that is to be disclosed—despite every seeming impossibility—must become present in this 'flesh', in this finite and transitory existence. It is from it that everything must be drawn forth. No supratemporal contents, nor contents from another period of time, may be put into it (although they might suggest themselves in the case of this existence), for this would mean that at most a fraction of the divine Word would have become flesh. Rather, the human life in which God's Word was flesh must be capable of being interpreted to an extent that is immeasurable, indeed infinite. On the other hand, if this human life is at all to be a genuine and normal life and not that of a semigod, it cannot be burdened with the duty of transmuting everything that as such is temporal into what is supratemporal, or everything that comes to nothing and so is futile into something that is lasting and filled to the brim: this would mean that this human life would be robbed of the fundamental, genuinely human act of trusting self-abandonment to a future that is not at one's own disposal, a future that can bear the name of death or of God. Such a man would be obliged to accomplish through his own disposition and exertion the synthesis between his existence and its meaning, between flesh and word; such an extreme thought, that could never be realised, shows clearly that in such a case the meaning and the immanent word of his life would be destroyed at its root. This is true also, a fortiori, in the case of the man in whose human existence God willed to proceed to his final act of self-utterance. Then, assuming that this man is conscious of the commission to live in such a way that he remains for God one capable of infinite interpretation, the paradox here is that he must bring into the narrowness of his time everything that God needs for his self-interpretation. Here lies the momentum of Jesus' existence, the originality of which can be traced even through the interpretation after Easter and through every interpretation by the Church; here too is that strangely pressing haste that somehow numbers its days for itself: 'Are there not twelve hours in the day?' (Jn 11.9); 'I must go on my way today and tomorrow . . . and the third day I finish my course' (Lk 13.33, 32); and this haste urges the others to make use of the time: 'The light is with you for a little longer. Walk while you have the light, lest the darkness overtake you' (Jn 12.35).[1] Yet there is nothing precipitate about this haste, which anticipates nothing and does not force the decisive 'hour' to come, but knows about the time that is qualitative,[2] and maintains the distances that are set: 'My kairos has not yet come, but your kairos is always here' (Jn 7.6). The momentum of Jesus' self-consciousness and of his claim is not restricted by this tranquillity which waits upon events, and is not incompatible with it, but rather receives precisely through this tranquillity the room to spread itself out in its majestic self-possession, far from any constraining haste. This happens in the most emphatic way possible, for Jesus makes no temporal ordering for the superhuman programme that he is to accomplish in the space allotted to his human life, but abides tranquilly in the attitude, common to man (Mt 6.27), of readiness for the 'hour' that is known only to God (Mk 13.32). And if we must assume a growth in the clear self-conscious comprehension of his mission, as must be the case in a genuine human being—although, since this mission is unique, it is naturally impossible for us to trace the individual stages of this growth—and an ever deeper initiation into the unique dimensions of the whole commission, this intensification (a priori to be reckoned with) displays no corresponding taking over of the control by Jesus, but precisely the opposite: an increasing self-abandonment to the control by the one who alone can draw out of the whole lived existence the definitive word that God needs to complete his new and eternal covenant.

---

[1] On the element of urgent haste in the proclamation of Jesus and his sending-out of the disciples, cf. A. Vögtle, 'Exegetische Erwägungen über

It is not possible, further, to approach the direction of the journey towards Jerusalem and the Passion, which comes into the life of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels after Peter's confession, as an act of assuming the direction of his own fate, for it is rather the opposite: a more conscious going towards the hour which 'only the Father knows'. In this hour, there is no doubt that the principal meaning of this existence will condense itself, but in such a manner that this meaning will be loaded on to the Servant of God in a way that is for him passive and blind. When the 'momentum' of the claim das Wissen und Selbstbewußtsein Jesu', in: Festschrift Karl Rahner, I (1964), pp. 616f.

---

[2] A. Vögtle, 'Zeit und Zeitüberlegenheit im biblischen Verständnis', Freiburger Dies Universitatis 8 (1960/61), pp. 99–116.

receives this completely open space for its working-out, it is possible to speak in a first sense that lies quite close to the original sense, of the radiance of the glory (ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, Heb 1.3).

And this occurs in the elementary sense of the renunciation of one's own δόξα. The early Christian hymn coined for this the concept of emptying out or making-vain (κένωσις) (Phil 2.7), and John expressed the same fact in the words of Jesus, that he does not look for δόξα before men (Jn 5.41) but for the δόξα of the only God (5.44), and that therein lies his truth (7.18). The hymn understands the emptying out as the renunciation of the μορφὴ θεοῦ, the 'form of God', but then goes on to present the Incarnation, not as the assuming of the corresponding 'form of a man', but explicitly as the assuming of the μορφὴ δούλου, the 'form of a slave'. But the slave has no form of his own, but has to take on, in pure obedience, the form that his lord imposes on him; thus this 'effulgence of the glory' of God is in itself without any glory of its own; as Justin declares, it is ἄτιμος καὶ ἄδοξος.[3]

In its outward lack of form, his existence has something of the wastefulness that runs as a leitmotiv through so many of his parables: the wastefulness of the seed sown carelessly, that falls on the path, on rock and on thorns, and only to a small extent on good soil (Mt 13.4ff.), of the unweeded field (Mt 13.24ff.), of the unemployed worker (Mt 20.1ff.), of the banquet made ready but scorned (Mt 22.1ff.), a wastefulness that is dominant also in the miracles of the multiplication of the loaves and the changing of the water into wine. Not only so, but as Jesus' involvement in his mission increases so too does the resistance on the part of men, so that, from a human point of view, the prospect of success, of accomplishment of the commission, continually dwindles, and Jesus in his activity sees that he too has his place under the general law that 'no prophet can perish away from Jerusalem' (Lk 13.33). This general law, under which his followers too have their place (Jn 16.1ff.), is called futility. 'They hate me without a cause'

---

[3] [Without honour and without glory], Dialogue 32 and 89 (ed. Otto, I, 2, 106, 326).

(Jn 15.25). The hatred has no cause: correspondingly, the one that the world cannot bear has no form, for he has emptied himself out, so that he may be formed and filled by God alone.

The hymn at Phil 2.6–11 speaks of Jesus, after his renunciation of the form of God, as becoming obedient unto the death on the Cross, and then, 'therefore', being exalted as the Kyrios to the right hand of the Father. The one who was 'emptied out' received a share in the δόξα of God the Father, through the bestowal of the divine title 'Kyrios'; it is not this δόξα, however, which is of course presupposed, that the hymn wishes to glorify, but the thing that was inconceivable in the Old Testament, the reason for his exaltation—his opening-up of the empty space through which the δόξα can send its rays. In this very early text, we apprehend something like the replacing of one ideal by another: of the ideal of a divine glory that is so much the property of the only God that he can and may never rid himself of it by a new ideal which as such cannot yet bear the name δόξα, because it consists precisely in ridding oneself of what bore this name in the Old Testament, in order to make ready the space of complete poverty, indeed more than this, of full abandonment of self, which holds itself open for this new splendour and glory alone. The first concept is closely tied to 'power' (δύναμις),[4] the second to an utter powerlessness that will prove to be that which is genuinely glorious in its final attitude, and will perhaps absorb the first concept of glory into itself. We shall return to this theme later.

Now we must see how Jesus translates his claim and commission into poverty (or into obedience) in such a way that he lets his entire formless and therefore wordless existence (as 'flesh') be yielded up in an ultimate gesture, so that it may become something that God's hand can form in its entirety, including his mother's womb and his burial, into 'the Word of God'. John underlines the genuine difference between such a final gesture and the normal state of man as one 'thrown in to the world' from the womb until his death: Jesus has 'authority' to 'give himself up' (Jn 10.18). Here, the 'giving up of self' certainly means in the first place death, but it is quite essentially a phrase that includes the whole existence in itself, as the directive that the believers must 'give themselves up' for their brethren shows (1 Jn 3.16). The 'authority' to 'take back' what has been given up is not the revocation of the self-abandonment, but its inner completion, inasmuch as the going out into the final dispossession of self-abandonment belongs to the original 'authority', which thereby distinguishes itself from every other human authority, even that of a prophet.

---

[4] Cf. Rom 1.16 with 2 Cor 4.4; Rom 1.20 with 1.23; Rev 19.1, doxa together with other concepts of power: Col 1.11; 2 Thess 1.9, Rev 1.6; 1 Pet 4.11; Jude 25. On the Old Testament, cf. ThW II 293 (Grundmann).

There are two moments, which can be distinguished from each other but belong together, in which the event of the abandonment is 'accomplished', in the double sense that it goes 'to the end' (Jn 13.1) with no possibility of revocation, and that it now succeeds therein in attaining the form that is Jesus' own, bestowed by God, on the far side of himself. These are the Eucharist and the verbalising of Jesus' life in the sphere of the early Church. Both are the work of the paradosis: which is now understood not as the act of God who gives up the Son, nor as the act of the Church which hands on further what has been handed on to her, but as Jesus' handing over of himself (cf. 1 Pet 2.23; Heb 9.14), so that by the power of this handing over, he may become what he should be for God and men.

In their various nuances, the words that explain the Eucharist point to numerous conceptions of sacrifice in the Old Testament, but have at their heart a simple and unambiguous meaning. It is decisive that Jesus in his gesture of giving his flesh gives something that is itself in a state of 'having been handed over', whether this is explicitly said (1 Cor 11.24; Lk 22.19; cf. Jn 6.51c) or not (Mk 14.22; Mt 26.26); likewise, that the blood should be in a state of 'having been poured out', whether this is mentioned as something taken for granted (Mk 14.24; Mt 26.28; Lk 22.20) or not (1 Cor 11.25). Gesture and state are one; with the unique gesture, Jesus gives the gift from his hand, gives himself in the state of abandonment into the hand of the Father who permits this state to take on definitive character (it is for this that Jesus 'gives thanks' to the Father), gives himself into the hand of the Spirit who brings about the sacrament as he has brought about the Incarnation in Mary, and gives himself into the hand of the Church, which through the ages 'performs' (hoc facite) actively what Jesus' gesture of self-giving has placed in her hands. One must not play off the eucharistic powerlessness of the Church's existence under the deepest concealment of a piece of bread and a cup of wine, against the 'authority' that lies in such a gesture of self-giving (Jn 10.18); nor may one pose a tension between the 'omnipotence' (Mt 28.18) and sovereign power of control (Eph 4.10ff. etc.) of the one exalted to the right hand of God on the one hand, and his state of powerlessness in the Eucharist on the other hand. For the victorious lion from the tribe of Judah (Rev 5.5) is none other than the 'lamb' upon the throne 'as if slain' (5.6,9,12) in timelessness ('before the foundation of the world', 13.8). The concepts of vicarious action (ὑπέρ),[5] ransom ('ransom money', 'redemption'), 'expiation', and 'sacrifice', concepts not rigidly separable from each other, permeate all the strata of the New Testament, essentially bound to the Cross that is anticipated in the Eucharist; the Cross is not considered in isolation, but as the embodiment and summing up of the entire lifework of Jesus. For the act of self-giving 'is the last and greatest act of his service',[6] held up by Jesus before his disciples repeatedly and urgently as an example, and impressed upon them. In the light of this incomparable self-abandonment, the full significance of the requirements Jesus makes of hatred of self, of denial of self, of the abandoning of all things, of the daily bearing of the cross, and of the losing of one's soul in order to gain it, becomes clear. Further, the self-abandonment of the whole existence, taken as the gesture that sums up this existence, makes it impossible for Jesus to control in advance what God will form out of this one who abandons himself: the much-discussed disjunction between the 'I' of the mortal Jesus (whom one confesses, or of whom one is ashamed) and the judging Son of Man (who will confess before the angels of God those who confess, and will be ashamed before them of those who are ashamed: Lk 12.8f.; Mk 8.38) is the adequate expression for the abandonment of self, just as the 'archaic' christology of the first sermons of the Apostles, with their exaltation by God for the 'servant Jesus' to 'Kyrios and Christos' (Acts 2.36), adequately expresses the caesura that is determined by the renunciation of all power over oneself. It is idle to speculate over the sense in which Jesus was aware of his identity with the Son of Man who was to come in judgment, for between the two stands the fundamental act of the eucharistic self-abandonment, which prevents every neutral identification that would leap over it, not because it is a barrier that blocks the path, but because it is Jesus' own uttermost act of renunciation of any definitive (i.e., eschatological) power to determine his own form.

---

[5] 'For the many' (Mk 14.24), 'for every one' (Heb 2.9), 'for all' (Rom 8.32; 2 Cor 5.14f.; 1 Tim 2.6), 'for the people' (Jn 11.50; 18.14), 'for the brother' (Rom 14.15), 'for me' (Gal 2.20), 'for you' (Lk 22.19f., 1 Cor 11.24, etc.), 'for us' (Rom 5.8; 2 Cor 5.21; Gal 3.13, etc.), 'for the Church' (Eph 5.25), 'for the sheep' (Jn 10.11–15). Besides ὑπέρ there are other relational words that express the vicariousness: ἀντί (Mk 10.45 par.), διά (1 Cor 8.11), and περί (Mt 26.28; 1 Thess 5.10).

[6] K. H. Schelkle, Die Passion Jesu (1949), p. 136; ibid., pp. 131–149, bringing together and analysing all the fundamental concepts mentioned. This is not the place for an inquiry into the entire range of meaning of the concepts παραδιδόναι and παράδοσις; cf. Wiard Popkes, Christus traditus. Eine Untersuchung zum Begriff der Dahingabe im Neuen Testament, Abh. ThANT 49 (1967). Cf. my Theologie der Drei Tage (1969), pp. 74f.

In this, Jesus is once again Word-flesh, Word that enters and vanishes in flesh that is utterly dependent upon God, in order to be awakened by God to life and to stand before him as his full, truly embodied Word. Thus, Jesus seeks to direct the earthly 'endeavour' (ἐργάζεσθαι) of his hearers to labour 'for the food that remains for eternal life' (Jn 6.27), by allowing their 'work' to merge into God's work on them (the faith in Jesus as 'the bread of life'; 6.29); this change from working to allowing oneself to be worked upon (this is the meaning of faith here) is in a context which does not yet speak explicitly of the sacramental Eucharist, but presents the whole Jesus—whose food is the will of the Father (Jn 4.34)—who does not allow those who come to him to hunger any more, nor those who believe in him to thirst any more (4.14). But already, Jesus is the one who no longer has any control over himself, but accepts those who come to him as men drawn by the Father (6.44) and given to him by the Father; in his self-abandonment, he cannot repel anything that the Father gives him (6.37).[7]

The handing over of the fruit of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection to the Church belongs in the most intimate manner to the distribution by Jesus of his flesh and blood as the Eucharist. John rightly transposes this to Easter day: '"As the Father has sent me, even so I send you." And when he had said this, he breathed on them and said to them, "Receive the Holy Spirit. If you forgive the sins of any, they are forgiven; if you retain the sins of any, they are retained"' (Jn 20.21–23). To understand this passage correctly, the sending must be understood as already christological, in its unity of authority and poverty; it is no mere commission, but is to be an existential participation in Jesus' self-abandonment, in which the Holy Spirit 'blows' (Jn 3.8) or 'is' (Jn 7.39). The one who makes this bequest is so 'liquefied' in his self-abandonment that his reality surpasses that of a mediator (at least according to the understanding of this concept hitherto); in the same 'liquefaction', he wills to them the kingdom, as his Father has bestowed it on him (Lk 22.29; cf. 12.32 with the command in the following verse to 'sell all'), and bestows on them the ever new actualisation of this kingdom in the forgiveness of sins, which has become available in the blowing of the Holy Spirit on the definitive basis of the Cross and the Resurrection. It is not only that he has 'merited' the forgiveness of sins (all juridical and mercantile concepts, like that of [7] In Jesus' reply to the questioners at Jn 6.28, 'the faith in the one sent by God is paradoxically characterised as "work", and thus the concept of ἐργάζεσθαι is dissolved: he fulfils God's demand, not through what he works, but through the obedience to what God works. But inasmuch as man's work is not the accomplishing of some individual thing, but in its true sense, is the attitude in which the man genuinely is, we may also say that Jesus' word actually radicalises the concept of ἐργάζεσθαι man exists truly not in what he himself brings about, but in his making over of himself to what God works, i.e., in what he allows to happen to himself in faith': R. Bultmann, Johannes, p. 164 (ET Gospel of John, p. 222).

---

'ransoming', fall short of the reality); he himself is the forgiveness of sins, with his whole authority as judge—but in the condition of self-abandonment, of his distribution in the Eucharist. It is not so much that on Easter day he forgives the disciples who betrayed him and fled; rather, he is bestowed on them as an Easter gift, the act of forgiveness which has been given the form of the sacrament of pardon. The handing over of self goes beyond the domain of ethics (e.g., the duty of mutual brotherly pardoning in the Church), without abolishing it. Therefore everything to do with the sacraments is handed over without defences to human misuse, and was indeed in its essence constituted in the Passion where this human misuse was a factor.

Alongside the sacrament stands the Word, or more precisely the reverbalisation of the Word of God that had become in the flesh wordless and ever more wordless,[8] so that it might take its dwelling in a human word and become expressible in kerygma and gospel, capable of summary as dogma and of development in its depths as theology. This is essentially the work of the Holy Spirit, who brings to light the 'whole treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden' in Christ (Col 2.3), interprets them exegetically (drawing out their contents), and thus 'leading into all truth' (Jn 16.13). To do this, 'he will take what is mine', as this is handed over and lies at the disposal of the Spirit to be given whatever form he desires; and this 'what is mine' is so little the possession of Jesus that he adds immediately, 'All that the Father has is mine; therefore I said that he will take what is mine' (Jn 16.15). That which is his, is the eucharistic liquefying of the goods of the Father, now to be formed by the Spirit to be the definitive utterance concerning the love of Father and Son. In this process, which establishes the continuity between the 'Jesus of history' and the 'historic Christ', that 'which is mine' is not to be overlooked. It is he himself who comes through the wordless death of the flesh and rises both as body and as word. The evangelists and prophets of the new covenant, who undertake in the Spirit the verbalisation of the event, know this and confess it. It would not be possible for them to say with greater clarity that they experienced it beforehand but did not understand it; that it remained hidden from their eyes, that it was obscure to them, that they could not grasp it and even were ashamed to ask him about it (Lk 9.45, etc.), but remembered it after his Resurrection (Jn 2.22; 12.16; 16.4), or first understood it then (Jn 13.7). When the memory understands, the implicit becomes explicit, the christology lived by Jesus becomes the christology taught by the Church,[9] however much it remains true in this teaching also that its content is the person of Jesus in its authority, poverty and self-abandonment.

---

[8] It is clear that with this statement we mark off the boundary between ourselves and a theology (like that of Bultmann) for which the existence of Jesus is an irrelevant fact that disappears behind the kerygmatic speech-event of the early Church; we distance ourselves equally from a theology for which the relevance of the historical Jesus lies only in the 'speech-event' which occurs in his speech to others, or in his faith as this makes itself known in words (Ebeling, Fuchs), or in his self-expression in parabolic discourse (E. Jüngel, Jesus und Paulus, 2nd edn. 1963, pp. 173f.).

Anyone who has caught sight, through the Church's teaching, of the full paradox of this person must admit that it is not to be classified in the categories of the history of religions, nor of psychology, nor of history;[10] indeed, honest exegesis will recognise a problematic that hovers between what is said and the one about whom it is said, 'which is to be resolved neither by the recourse to the so-called "Jesus of history" nor by flight to the so-called "historic biblical Christ"'.[11] This problematic was intended to be set openly before our eyes, in that the Spirit offers us four different Gospels, which the Church has not attempted to reduce to a single Gospel because, in its consciousness, no single Gospel 'has reproduced the Christ event of the one become flesh in its whole richness'.[12] Since the person of Jesus, alive in the [9] R. Bultmann, Glauben und Verstehen I (1933), pp. 204f.; for Paul: O. Michel, 'Der Christus des Paulus', ZNW 32 (1933), pp. 6–31.

[10] E. Käsemann, 'Das Problem des historischen Jesus' (1954), in: Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen I (4th edn. 1965), p. 213 (ET p. 46).

[11] P. Vielhauer, 'Gottesreich und Menschensohn in der Verkündigung Jesu', in: Aufsätze zum NT (1965), p. 91.

[12] O. Cullmann, 'Die Pluralität der Evangelien', in: Vorträge und Aufsätze 1925 bis 1962 (1966), p. 556. For Cullmann, this is the 'theologically

Holy Spirit, was the centre of the Church's life, the fullness of the verbalisations must be experienced as approximate and a source of joy. Because in the New Testament the faith was a unity taken for granted in love, it was possible for such a fullness of writings to come into being, without any anxiety that thereby the dogmatic unity could be endangered.[13] Looked at from the outside, the unity of the New Testament appears to be 'syncretistic',[14] but from the inside, all the writings with their distinct theologies are so closely and inextricably bound together that they form a single testimony to the same faith in Jesus, the Son of God, the bringer of salvation for Israel and the world in his life, dying, and rising.

An essential aspect of this phenomenon is the inseparable whole formed in the reverbalisation of what Jesus lived (a part of which is also what he said) by memory and by the light that shines backwards from Easter; and further, there is a genuine backward-looking prophecy in this dawning understanding (1 Cor 12.28; 13.8; Eph 2.20; 3.5), receiving in the Holy Spirit the correct formulation of what was intended in the horizon of the eschatological revelation. And obedience to the Spirit requires, in order to preserve the identity of the person of the historical Jesus and the historic Christ present in the Church, an inevitable transposition at various points from the situation of Jesus into the situation of the community after Easter. This transposition seems to bring an element of legitimate concern' which is seen historically in the double, contradictory tendency of the early Church to write new, 'better' Gospels—which do not indeed suppress the earlier Gospels available, but aim to be more complete and relevant—and on the other hand, to reduce the production of apocryphal Gospels, the luxuriant growth of which threatened to have no end—without taking the step of replacing the other Gospels by a Gospel harmony. With these contradictory tendencies, the whole 'remained so to speak at the half-way point of having a plurality of four Gospels'.

---

[13] A. Schlatter, Die Theologie der Apostel (2nd edn. 1922), p. 525. 'Belief was in Christ, not in christology', p. 524. Thus 'there was no attempt to achieve an external uniformity of the teaching', p. 525, cf. p. 530.

[14] H. Köster, 'Häretiker im Neuen Testament als theologisches Problem', in: Zeit und Geschichte, Dankesgabe an Rudolf Bultmann (1964), pp. 65f.

historical uncertainty into the proclamation, but on a deeper level, it obeys the law of theological truth. The Spirit permits such a transposition, recognising as it does so the 'danger' that the translation from the situation of Jesus into that of the community is again a transition into an historically-determined situation: the risk can be borne because with this transposition, the horizon of the pneumatic-eschatological understanding is 'once for all' opened: within this horizon, all later accommodations to the contemporary understanding of present reality imply only slight displacements that are theologically easily made, which moreover retain their model in the decisive first verbalisation. The next chapter will show that the period of the Church has another structure than that of the period of Jesus, and that therefore a word of Jesus must be translated from the unique horizon of his period (which fundamentally was only his period) into the horizon of the period of the Church, in order to remain valid for the Church. This applies to the form of the (imminent) expectation, as well as to the judging interpretation of the present: thus, the 'allegorisation' of certain parables of the Lord, although often sneered at, is legitimate and not to be relativised.

It is certain that there existed in the early Church a prophecy, distinct from other offices, which held fast to the imminent expectation and was aware of its authority to speak in the name of Jesus.[15] However easy it may have been for such a charism to degenerate (as the facts show), it was in great measure the presupposition for the coming into existence of the scripture of the New Testament through the working of the Spirit; this scripture then set a norm for all wandering prophets. Prophecy also lay behind the origins of sacred (canon) law, which is essentially a law that comes from the authority of Jesus, the one crucified and exalted to be judge, and has an eschatological character that shares in his judging. 'Separating spirit and law from one another is one of the most grave errors of liberalism', says E. Käsemann, against R. Sohm. 'There are truly decrees that come from the Holy Spirit. The insight of the hearers is neither the presupposition nor limit of the obedience . . . God . . . binds hearts more sternly than any teacher of the law has ever done. But . . . his kingdom decrees the total self-giving of those who are free, and is law and decree in that it sets opposition under the curse; it is spirit, in that it empowers the obedience that sees.'[16] Here too, degeneration threatens, but the creation of a tradition with its roots in such a law (seen already in the Pastoral Epistles) is unavoidable, and points legitimately to the legal character of the original apostolic church-order. The various logia of Jesus which declare that his own authority is handed over to the Apostles, and in them to the Church, are an adequate theological expression for his self-abandonment, governed by the Holy Spirit.

---

[15] R. Pesch, Naherwartungen (1968), p. 220.

This is not at all to say that the Gospels are free poetical-pneumatic creations of the early Church;[17] we see how strong was the will to make a historically correct presentation both in the prologue to Luke (which expresses the spirit of all the Gospels) and in the care with which Paul aligns his proclamation with the earliest tradition, as well as in the effort the evangelists make to hand on scattered logia of Jesus, which perhaps were no longer wholly comprehensible to the evangelists themselves, or were uncomfortable. In general, one may say that the interest in making present the historical life, work and words of Jesus remained alive and renewed itself on the basis of the mystery of his final self-abandonment, as this came to its fulfilment in Cross and Resurrection; but also that this interest was at the same time the remembrance of the mystery of the pre-Easter unity of authority and poverty, to which now the Spirit handed over the key, on the basis of the self-abandonment of Jesus. The light shed by the Spirit was so bright that when its dazzling rays turned back on to the hiddenness of Jesus, it bathed him proleptically in the light of Easter, and proleptically transfigured his kabod as pure momentum, into a doxa as brilliance, in some passages. As the Word become flesh, Jesus was more hidden than he is shown to be by the light of the Gospels, just as without any doubt God's deeds of salvation in the redeeming of Israel were more hidden and inconspicuous than the transfiguring images in Exodus or Joshua portray them. Such a lighting-up may take place for purposes of catechesis, if it is a means for the catechete to guide the hearers to the authority of the poor, obedient, self-abandoning Jesus. Like the Eucharist and all the sacraments, the Gospels conceal by revealing: how could it be otherwise, when God's humility, descending beneath all that may be uttered, can be fully grasped in no act of reverbalisation? The eucharistic signs of the broken bread and the poured-out wine separated from the bread speak out loud; but they cannot be anything more than signs that point. The words of the Holy Spirit, giving their guarantee, speak more loudly, but how should they give expression in words to what 'speaks' most of all—the silence of the Word? 'God's restraint constitutes his glory, just as silence is more eloquent when a word would be of necessity inappropriate.'[18] This is not in any way to agree with the superiority of a gnostic Σιγή and the debasement, known from the history of religions, of the word to a 'stammering' about what is ineffable; for, as the one who fulfils the 'word'-revelation of the Old Testament, Jesus Christ remains 'the' Word (Jn 1.1; Heb 1.3), which precisely as Word-flesh remains a word that is superior even to all the inspired speech that concerns him. Therefore all the New Testament theologies, as though gathered around him in a circle, look up to him as their common centre that gives meaning,[19] yet a centre that wills to exist only in the pouring out of itself towards the entire periphery.

---

[16] E. Käsemann, 'Sätze heiligen Rechts im Neuen Testament' (1954), in: Exegetische Besinnungen und Aufsätze II, pp. 69–82, quotation from pp. 78–79. 'Sentences of Holy Law in the New Testament' in: New Testament Questions of Today, 1969, pp. 66–81, quotation, p. 75.

[17] Against the over-estimation of the prophets' role: F. Neugebauer, 'Geistsprüche und Jesuslogien', ZNW 53 (1962), pp. 218–228.

It goes without saying that the already-existent contemporary thought forms are employed in the verbalisation, for otherwise there is no possibility of understanding—neither by the disciples themselves in their act of handing on the tradition, nor by those who hear their instruction. It is, however, no less self-evident that no ready-made thought form can suffice to verbalise what is unheard-of and unique; and therefore, from the very beginning we must expect a shading-off of various thought forms into one another, an impossibility of defining by means of one particular thought form (e.g., apocalyptic), and thereby the appearance of syncretism. As receptacles and elucidating pointers, 'mythical ciphers' can be recruited, uprooted from their native soil of origin and thus 'formalised',[20] for example, in the image of descent and ascent of the saviour in the liturgical hymn at Phil 2.6–11, or in John: in each case, however, this occurs with such decisive 'correctives' (in the hymn, through the motif of obedience; in John, through a great many contrary motifs that run counter to the myth that the 'mythical' demythologises itself. It was perhaps impossible to express the advantage of the New Testament in the 'physical' unity of the Church with Christ in the sacrament, over the predominantly 'moral-juridical' relationship to God in the old covenant, otherwise than by means of certain analogies to the mystery cults. The corrective lies here self-evidently in the relatedness of the Church's act to the historical event of the death of Christ in its salvific significance. All this shows once again how far it is true that in this unique instance the obtainable adequacy of the verbalisation can be attained only through an inadequacy of the means of thought, concept and speech employed—the inadequacy can be constantly demonstrated on the historical-critical level.[21] The inadequacy is obvious where through necessity individual events, handed on as such and indeed capable only of being handed on as such, are strung on the thread of a redactor;[22] but it is yet more obvious when a form of panorama is chosen that attempts to portray a horizon, as for example in the hymns in Jn 1, Phil 2.6–11, Col 1.15–20, 1 Tim 3.16; Rom 11.33–36, and the hymns of Revelation; or, on mid-way between these two extremes, when methods of presentation that can be identified by form criticism are chosen as pre-existent frameworks for a content that is finally, when seen as a whole, unique.

---

[18] R. Thibaut, Le Sens de l'Homme-Dieu, Mus. Less., sect. théol., 37 (1942), p. 74.

[19] Cf. my article, 'Einigung in Christus. Gedanken über die Vielheit der biblischen Theologien und den Geist der Einheit in der Kirche', Freib. Zft. f. Phil. u. Theol. 15 (1968), pp. 171–189.

---

[20] H. Schlier, 'Das Neue Testament und der Mythus' (1956), in: Besinnung auf das Neue Testament (1964), pp. 85, 87.

[21] It is not purely fortuitous that research establishes the presence in all the layers of the New Testament of fragments or entire passages from early Christian liturgical hymnody, or formulae of liturgical doxologies and acclamations (cf., e.g., G. Bornkamm, 'Das Anathema in der urchristlichen Abendmahlsliturgie', Th. Lit. Ztg. 1950), whether these can be defined precisely and isolated from the surrounding commentary or not. Much of

To close, we look from the self-abandonment of Jesus to the 'ethics of discipleship', because at this point the whole problem of the transposition of the one who is unique and inimitable into an object of imitation—indeed, an object to be imitated in all circumstances—becomes once more acutely what today is characterised as 'mythological' is to be attributed, in analogous character to the Old Testament, to the creative imagination of poetry, for as A. Schlatter rightly observes, 'Even with the most austere attention to veracity, no one can relate once more what is past without the co-operation of the imagination'. He continues, 'The coming into existence of a poetry which is concerned about the image of Christ is as old as evangelisation itself, and we find in many passages of the Gospels brilliant achievements of early Christian poetry, through the clarity of the graphic power contained in the narratives and simultaneously through the delicacy of the drawing, which knows how to direct the eye to the aspect of the event which has value for its beholder. In some cases, there are no precise boundaries to mark off the point at which remembrance became poetry and the graphic forming and narrative became remote from the real course of events. But the greatness of early Christian poetry is essentially due to the fact that its imagination . . . remains subjected to a powerful discipline, which has its raison d'être in the fact that the presentation of Christ never separated itself from the faith, and for this reason never forgot the difference between myth and reality', op. cit., p. 529.

---

[22] It is no misfortune that the Gospels offer us no possibility of writing a biographical 'life of Jesus'. 'If something like a chronological annal existed, then in all probability it would in its nature have nothing else to relate than what is presented in the first part of the Gospel of Mark as a collection of many individual events . . . It is obvious that what is essential has come down to us too: Jesus went about in Galilee—until he decided to go up to Jerusalem, a decision that in fact implied the journey to his death': U. Wilckens, 'Das Offenbarungsverständnis in der Geschichte des Urchristentums', in: W. Pannenberg (ed.), Offenbarung als Geschichte (2nd edn. 1963), p. 60.

visible. Jesus alone possesses the possibility of making out of his whole existence including his death, with full authority and in accordance with his mission, something handed over for God and men, out of which God is able to form his final word to the world through the Holy Spirit. The questionable character of the so-called 'transcendental christology'[23] becomes clear here; for, if we follow this christology, what is to prevent the wholly and immaculately transcendent human being Mary from becoming likewise a 'God-human being' (Gottmensch)? But if the Christian cannot make any progress along this path, then the relationship of the believing man to Christ must fork off into two paths: first, the obedience of faith, allowing what is possible only to Christ to be bestowed and impressed on the believer by God, and second, the attempt at an 'ethical' obedience of imitation, which in the confidence of faith in Christ ('for my sake', Mt 5.11; 19.29; etc.) 'abandons' or 'hates' everything and one's own self. This obedience of imitation too has its goal in the 'poverty' of a complete readiness for Jesus and for the needs of the kingdom proclaimed by him, and indeed goes beyond human limits in the love of enemies and shares in the mercy of the Father (Lk 6.36). And because this poverty was also the form that Jesus' life had (in fulfilment of the Old Testament faith), God's condescendence bends down therein to what is humanly possible, indeed to what is humanly perfect, in order to empower and legitimate such obedience of imitation from above, without promoting the imitators to the position of the God-man.

This composite structure finds its resolution only in the trinitarian mystery, which lies deeper. The paradox of Christ, an absolute authority (occupying even the Father's position in judgment) in absolute poverty that goes as far as total-self-giving, reveals the essence of the pure 'relationality' ('fluidity') of the second divine person (and conceals it at the same time in the Cross on which he is no longer word). This points to a self-giving so divine and absolute that it can be answered from the side of the creature only with the perfect fiat of the 'handmaid of the Lord' (as the basic attitude of the Church), whereby man lets God be what he wills to be, and allows himself to receive from God and be formed by him, as God wills and as much as he wills.

---

[23] As this was proposed first by B. Welte (in: Grillmeier and Bacht, eds., Das Konzil von Chalkedon III, 1954, pp. 51–80), then by Karl Rahner, 'Zur Theologie der Menschwerdung' (reprinted in his Schriften zur Theologie IV, 1960, pp. 137–155), and, among many others, also by J. Ratzinger, Einführung in das Christentum (1968), pp. 189f.

In this chapter 'Word-Flesh', we have gone along a path that seemed at first to take us ever further from the momentum of an absolute claim in the person of Jesus, through his poverty and self-abandonment, into a preponderance of 'flesh', which as such is not Word, but is the form of the Word in emptiness and silence. In the claim made with his seeing through men in judgment, the emphasis lay not on the verbal address (for speech is only one of the forms of utterance of the person of Jesus), nor on the 'calling' of those addressed 'to make the decision', but on a quality of his person that was well recognised by the people: his 'prestige', kabod. This, however, is not the word that was to be uttered through the destiny of Jesus, but at most its notification. Only the form that God gives to Jesus' increasing poverty and self-abandonment in the Passion and Resurrection, when Jesus submits his destiny to the Father, allows the Word that has disappeared into the flesh to become truly the Word that 'was in the beginning with God', and that as the Alpha is now to be also the Omega-word that fills the creation (Eph 1.10). At that point, the momentum of the claim becomes the brilliance of the glory.

4. MOMENTUM OF TIME

a. The time of Jesus

One of the most difficult themes of New Testament exegesis is the theme of time; the texts offer a skein of conceptions of time that overlay and intersect and contradict each other in a mesh that is scarcely any more to be disentangled. It depends on views which they bring with them to the texts, whether or not scholars attribute to Jesus the logia concerning time; how the stratifications are variously determined, either asserting the precedence of this or that thought-form—prophetic, apocalyptic, hellenistic; by some a wholly futurist conception of the kingdom of God is attributed to Jesus (A. Schweitzer and his school), or a wholly realised conception (Dodd and his school), or else a mixed conception (W. G. Kümmel, O. Cullmann), which often enough looks like a compromise; or else (as with R. Bultmann and with the majority of his school) the core, which alone is relevant, is distilled from the irrelevant apocalyptic ('mythological') rind which is to be discarded.

We should not need to enter this much fought-over field, except that it is of central importance for the theme of 'kabod as momentum'. This has been already shown implicitly by the preceding chapter, the contents of which would be quite unthinkable without the form of time; in the present chapter, therefore, our task is only to expose the temporal presuppositions of those contents. It ought to be immediately obvious that the presence is in the 'claim' and in the 'authority', but that, inseparable from these, there is a future in the 'poverty' and yet more in the 'self-abandonment'.

In order to unravel this further, we have to think back to what was said by way of 'setting the scene' about the subject who receives revelation. The point that gives perspective, gathering the traditions together and finally interpreting them, lies in the Church: for she makes explicit the meaning that has lain in earlier strata, mostly discoverable only in the traces they have left behind; from this starting point, it is a secondary question, how far, for example, Jesus attributed to himself the Old Testament titles of the (Danielic) Son of Man and the (Isaianic) Servant of the Lord, how far he was explicitly aware of himself—if it should be the case that these titles were only later attributed to him—as the one who fulfilled these prophetic figures, and understood himself thus, and whether or not he achieved such consciousness in a deepening and clarification that came by stages. For one thing is clear: the momentum of his claim and of his authority before Easter, attested unanimously by the whole tradition, cannot be made sense of except by saying that Jesus was aware that he was God's final Word of salvation to mankind. The interpretation which points to the most important embodiments in prophecy of God's salvation is therefore at least justified; but beyond this, it would be strange and indeed contradictory if Jesus, who knew Scripture exactly, had announced his claim to finality without any reference to those models of salvation—for he himself brings his own destiny into the succession of the destinies of the prophets.

This then further gives us the right to approach the problem of the time of Jesus (and the times of the Church and of imitation, which functionally depend on the time of Jesus) from a theologically meditative distance, and to draw conclusions from the conclusion, so to speak, and apply them to the content of the premisses. We begin with an assertion which will perhaps be sufficient, by virtue of its formal character, to take account of the justified concerns of the most diverse directions of research, which seem to be irreconcilably opposed to each other. It is widely recognised that neither Jews nor Greeks knew of a purely abstract quantitative time, into which the events of history could be plotted as if into an already existing system of coordinates; they experienced a time determined and filled by events; nevertheless, the Greek writers aim for a historiography of the world determined by chronology,[1] while the Jews, who understand their own history not as world history but as salvation history, are appropriately unconcerned with the continuous description of events in the presentation of their religious history—or, more precisely, of the history of God's dealings with them—for [1] G. Delling, Das Zeitverständnis des Neuen Testaments (1940), pp. 54ff., cf. esp. what is said about ἱστορεῖν in the case of Arrian.

---

'salvation history' must hold fast to the debarim (word-deeds) of God which are not to be fitted into a chronological scheme, but fall vertically and unforeseen into the horizontal existence in time; and in this, gaps of centuries may well have to be reckoned with. The chronological time of Israel in history is 'filled' with the 'moments' (καιροί) of divine activity and speaking that give it its character; in the intervals—one thinks above all of the long period after the exile, almost wholly without prophecy—Israel must pass the 'empty time'[2] in carrying out and meditating upon what has been given, hoping for what has been promised. A period that lies between the events of revelation, which as such always contain promises, can never be completely empty; and the moments of new fulfilment are always at the same time a recapitulation that actualises and offers a new interpretation of what has been before, and thereby intensifies the promise. Thus, to use the language of Oscar Cullmann, there are in 'salvation history' constants as well as contingency.[3] There is a tension between the time (the καιροί) of God and the time of man, and the latter, for the Old Testament, is essentially—and once again, wholly appropriately—the finite time of the individual, which has its end in death. A conception of time that would trivialise death as something irrelevant, would be anthropologically and biblically unreal.

If this means that the time of the Old Testament is no rigidly determined time, but, because of this tension, is 'time set in motion',[4] then we can go on to speak of a time which is filled in yet another way, a time which is itself qualitatively different through its different contents, without for this reason causing a dissolution of the quantitative substratum which must unconsciously accompany it. It is possible to speak of an analogy[5] between the periods, and this will be especially significant in the relationship of the period of Jesus to the period of the Old Testament and to the period of the Church. We may say at the outset that the period of Jesus is an absolutely unique period—the divine-human period, into which indeed the time of the Old Testament flows, and in which the time of the Church can in a certain way participate, but which can never be identified with these. If the period of Jesus was characterised by an 'imminent expectation', then this must have been of a unique kind; it is, that is to say, a theological postulate that it must have been qualitatively distinguished from the merely analogous imminent expectations of prophecy or apocalyptic, or those of the early community and the later Church. What Jesus so emphatically terms 'my time' (in opposition to 'your time', Jn 7.6ff.) is characterised by a momentum that is strictly incomparable, something to which the momentum of the other imminent expectations only remotely approximate. This must now be argued in detail by theological reflection on the biblical data.

---

[2] III/2,1, pp. 337-365.

[3] Heil als Geschichte (1965), pp. 104ff. (ET Salvation in History, 1967, pp. 122ff.). The book offers the mature and balanced summing up of Cullmann's long endeavours concerning the problem of time in the Bible and especially in the New Testament, in which he keeps the entire theological horizon open against all the abridgements of the fashionable theological trends.

[4] E. Jüngel, Paulus und Jesus (2nd edn. 1963), p. 141.

The time of Jesus is the time of a single mortal man, a time that unhesitatingly runs towards death—and a death the time of which can be known (if this is genuinely to be the time of a man) only to God, and can be determined only by him (Mt 6.27 following Job 14.5; Sir 17.2). It is part of the nature of such a human period that it is also somehow embedded in a surrounding human period; others existed before Jesus, and others will exist after him. He makes the 'now' of his presence stand out clearly against these surroundings: now the bridegroom is here, and one may fast afterwards (Mk 2.19f.); now they have him, whereas they always have the poor (Mt 26.11); now, in the 'short period' in which they have the light, they are to walk in it (Jn 12.35). The finitude and limitation of his life force him, like any other man, to limit his plans and his undertakings; thus, from a human point of view, his mission is limited exclusively to Israel (Mt 15.24). But this limited period is to be the sphere within which God's definitive dealing with the world is to take place, the definitive act that the old covenant called the Day of the Lord: the final division, the final justification of God and man, the final salvation. This must take place in this unique 'existence that goes towards death'; precisely for this reason, the 'kingdom of God', which Jesus proclaims as 'near' and 'at the very door', is both already come, in so far as it is indeed present, and yet also 'in process of coming', in so far as it is heading towards its own public and decisive end, its own 'hour' ('my hour', Jn 2.4). 'When he goes, the kingdom comes.'[6] One can also say: in that he goes his way, he is 'the way' (Jn 14.6). More precisely, this means—and the entire paradox of this assertion must be maintained—that 'if the eternal Word of God, who can say of himself, 'Heaven and earth will pass away, but my words will not pass away' (Mk 13.31), has seriously become man', then for this man, 'his going towards death must coincide with his going towards the end of 'heaven and earth',[7] or more exactly, that the free design of himself which this man makes through his death, in complete self-abandonment that looks towards God, just coincide with the continuance of God's Word of salvation beyond all passing-away of the world, in the past and in the future. And since this Word of salvation cannot occur otherwise than as an accompanying judgment on everything that opposes God, then in the 'theological' consciousness of the man Jesus Christ (not in his 'psychological' self-awareness) there must be present also the assumption of the definitive judgment. This is more than Is 53 prophesies, and therefore it is basically irrelevant to what extent Jesus identified himself with the Servant of Yahweh, and to what extent a development (always unprovable)[8] in his consciousness may have taken place. It is certain that if one robs Jesus of the consciousness of being a proxy for the whole of mankind in the judgment of God—although this is something that Paul continuously attributes to him—then one brings down at a single stroke the whole edifice of the Church's proclamation of faith in Jesus Christ and the portrayal of his earthly life. There is a deep-lying distinction between the task that the Father has given Jesus, the cup that he must drink (Mt 20.22)—which can only be the cup of God's wrath—and the 'baptism' which he must undergo, and for which he yearns (Lk 12.50), and every destiny that is only that of a prophet.[9] The temptation which he withstood at the beginning of his ministry has given him the strength to dispense with the possibility of acting with superhuman means and powers (which might perhaps be magically available) in the presence of this destiny, which contains the absolute demands of God's will; rather, as is required by a genuine Incarnation, he must act only with the means and powers granted by God, while from the human side, he must act only with poverty, prayer, docility and self-abandonment. But this implies 'that the presence characterised by the activity and proclamation of Jesus stands in a particular relationship to the coming day of judgment', the threatening character and imminence of which it includes and expresses.[10] [5] Cullmann (op. cit., p. 59) too employs the term 'analogy', but only in order to characterise the relationship between salvation history and history. Our use will depart slightly from Cullmann's when we speak of the analogies within salvation history.

---

---

[6] 'Glaube und Naherwartung', in my Zuerst Gottes Reich (1966), p. 10, with my whole detailed exposition there.

[7] Ibid., p. 11.

[8] W. G. Kümmel, Verheissung und Erfüllung. Untersuchungen zur eschatologischen Verkündigung Jesu (2nd edn. 1953), p. 134.

If we take all this seriously, then we find that we have suddenly moved beyond the dilemma of a purely future imminent expectation (A. Schweitzer) and a present interpretation like that launched by Dodd's 'realised eschatology', in a manner that inevitably brings him close to Platonism: the eternal being present in the transient moment. In fact, the eternal is present in this human life and in each of its moments, in a manner never realised before or afterwards, not as what is timelessly valid (the 'idea'), but as that which occurs here and now, that which must and will impose itself at any price (the price will be the abandonment by God on the Cross), not in a moment that is a 'point of time' (of decision, as the existential interpretation says in its reductionism), but in the going and passing away in time of this one life. This is new and unique, and bestows on the time of Jesus a momentum in the revelation of God that can exist neither in the prophetic-apocalyptic understanding of time nor in the Greek-Platonic understanding of time.[11] The Greek understanding may be able to contribute the idea of the καιρός as the qualitatively right moment (of the god with the forelock that is to be grasped), and the Jewish understanding may be able to contribute the idea of the near and inescapable immanence of the coming of God; but a unifying of the elements is impossible, on grounds of internal logic, apart from the existence of Christ.[12] If the pre-existence of Jesus is deduced from this unique indwelling of the God who is present in his saving activity in Jesus, then this is indeed a correct conclusion; but this is not the matter we are discussing here, which can almost be termed the correlative reversion of the pre-existence. Only when the 'self-realising eschatology' (J. Jeremias) will be able to be termed fully realised with the death and Resurrection of Jesus, will the correlation to an identity have come about, and then will the exalted Lord be able to term himself the one who absolutely includes all things, the Alpha and Omega, or (with Origen) the autobasileia; in the meantime, in temporality, he is the one seized and wholly contained in God's destiny for him.

---

[9] Cf. Kümmel, p. 63: Jesus reckons with the certainty and with the necessity of his dying.

[10] Ibid., p. 31.

He lives under the 'chiming of the hours', in God's 'timetable', step by step. Through the 'already' of his earthly presence (and only of his presence), the 'not yet' of the end that is drawing near receives its inexorability. The αὐτομάτη ('of itself', Mk 4.27) of the parable of the seed that grows automatically declares that the matter is on its way, and cannot be checked.[13] The same thing is meant by the warning at Jn 12.35 that the time of the light is short, and the hour of darkness stands at the door. This is more than prophetical, more even than the threatening announcement in Jeremiah, because the prophet himself is not the light that is departing, and the darkness of God is not bound up with his departure. It is also far more than apocalyptic, although it is by no means beyond question that Jesus could have made use of apocalyptic images and phrases to express the momentum of his own time.[14] It was only to be expected that Jesus would have to unite in his temporal horizon both the prophetic imminent expectation, which directs itself to events of earthly history, and the apocalyptic imminent expectation, which looks forward to a complete changeover from the old age to the new, to an opening of the heavenly world (often, of course, imagined in very earthly terms).[15]

---

[11] 'It is clear that the manner in which the New Testament, in what is proper to it, experiences time represents something fully new', that is different both from what is Greek and from what is Jewish. 'Everything indicates that this new feeling of time is no invention of the writers or of Paul—this would be quite inexplicable, even approximately—but has its secure place within the preaching of Jesus, and finds already in his deeds a realisation that accomplishes it.' Delling, op. cit. (n. 1 above), p. 73.

[12] 'The understanding of the kairos proper to the New Testament is in its essence neither Greek nor Jewish, but precisely Christian', ibid., p. 87.

---

[13] J. Weiss, Reich Gottes (new edn. 1964), pp. 84f., says in his own way that draws close to the mystery and yet misses the mark: 'As the countryman after finishing the sowing can only wait and must leave the development of the corn to itself . . ., so no one, not even Jesus, can bring about the coming of the kingdom of God by himself actively grabbing hold of it.' Similarly J. Jeremias, Gleichnisse (7th edn. 1965), p. 151 (cf. ET Parables of Jesus, p. 151f.): 'Just as surely as the harvest comes for the farmer after long waiting, so God brings surely the final judgment and the lordship of God when the eschatological measure is filled up.' One must, however, add that this certainty is achieved within the being of Jesus. On the interpretation of the parable that takes it as speaking of Jesus: F. Mussner, 'Gleichnisauslegung und Heilsgeschichte', Trierer Theol. Zt. 64 (1955), pp. 257–262.

[14] Again and again the attempt has been made to separate the proclamation of Jesus from all apocalyptic. Thus, e.g., M. Goguel, Das Leben Jesu (1934), pp. 390–393; R. Otto, Reich Gottes und Menschensohn (2nd edn. 1940), p. 169 (ET The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man, 1938, p. 155); cf. G. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu I (1930), pp. 110 (ET The Words of Jesus, 1902, pp. 135f.); in detail, W. G. Kümmel, op. cit. (n. 8 above), pp. 81ff.: 'The teaching of Jesus is prophetical, eschatological, evangelical – but antiapocalyptic, antipharisaic, antisadducaic': ibid., p. 97, citing J. W. Bowman, The intention of Jesus (1934), p. 52.

Then there is always a substantial difference between those who see the whole horizon of Jesus' conceptual world as determined by the late Jewish apocalyptic (as A. Schweitzer and his pupils M. Werner, F. Buri and Neuenschwander wish to do), and those who wish to see in apocalyptic only one element in the background of his understanding, perhaps an indispensable element (like W. Pannenberg and those associated with him). Cf., e.g., U. Wilckens: 'If one wishes to understand historically the personal claim of Jesus that is made efficacious through words and deeds, then one must at the very least point to the claim of proleptic-eschatological 'revelation' made in apocalyptic theology as the general historical presupposition for his claim': 'Das Offenbarungsverständnis in der Geschichte des Urchristentums', in: Offenbarung als Geschichte (2nd edn.

With all of this, we have not yet touched the question of how this temporal horizon of Jesus must be considered theologically; the reason for the difficulty of this question is that two seemingly incompatible lists of statements stand alongside one another. The first has the inbreaking of the end as something that is about to happen immediately, so immediately indeed that 'in this generation' the inbreaking of the end, the coming of the Son of Man in glory to judgment, 1963), p. 50; cf. also W. Pannenberg, Christologie: 'The claim of Jesus to authority corresponds through its proleptic structure to the relatedness of apocalyptic vision to history, which for its part goes back to the concern of the prophetic word of God for the future' (p. 55). This always leaves room for E. Käsemann's view 'that Jesus' point of departure was the apocalyptically determined announcement of the Baptist, but his own preaching was not constitutively characterised by apocalyptic' ('Die Anfänge christlicher Theologie', 1960, in: Exeg. Vers. u. Aufs. II, p. 99 ET 'The Beginnings of Christian Theology', in: New Testament Questions for Today, p. 101). For Käsemann, it is only after Easter that real apocalyptic is brought in again; for him, Jesus is pre-apocalyptic, or better, above apocalyptic (cf. ibid., II, pp. 109f.). O. Cullmann has rightly taken up arms against the 'properly exaggerated anxiety' about apocalyptic, an anxiety that exists in schools most strongly opposed to one another (Heil als Geschichte, p. 207 ET Salvation in History, 1967, p. 229). As long as one sees in apocalyptic only an inherited thought form (certainly brought providentially), which has opened and made ready an indispensable dimension for New Testament experience and theology (cf. III/2,1, pp. 298ff.), its use by the Apostles and even by Jesus himself can create no problem. How far he made use of it, and how far the Synoptic apocalypse is a construction of the community, is a second question that is to be decided by the exegetes. Cf. R. Pesch, Naherwartungen, Tradition und Redaktion in Mk 13 (1968), with detailed bibliography.

---

[15] Delling (op. cit., n. 1 above, p. 103) states this by saying that for Jesus the law of the ages (with a present age and an age to come) is de facto annulled. E. Käsemann (op. cit., n. 14 above, pp. 109, 117f.) comes in effect to the same conclusion, since for him the period in which Jesus lives is unique and cannot be comprehended within any conceptual scheme.

is reckoned with; the second seems categorically to require a span of time between Cross and Resurrection on the one side and parousia on the other side, a span in which the time of the world, that has existed hitherto, continues. One can seek the solution of this aporia by saying that in the temporal horizon of Jesus the period between Resurrection and parousia must have been quite short;[16] there is then no necessity to posit, like Kümmel, a clear, if harmless, error of Jesus in the question of the date of the end,[17] for one can point to a 'tension' in the thinking of Jesus that permits the temporal widening of the period that occurred in the first community and later in the Church as it established itself in time. Against such unsatisfactory attempts at compromise, the more difficult hypothesis seems theologically required: that one attributes to Jesus as it were a double temporal horizon,[18] because, in accordance with his mission, he must in the time of his own finite existence complete what has to be done with the 'world' as a whole (and that includes its temporal future), so that he attains the end of time in the fullest truth with his death and his Resurrection; and because, equally in accordance with the truth, he can foresee a continuing period of chronological time for the others, for the disciples and for their commission, and with this chronological time also a continuation of the time of salvation that has been transformed in the coming of the Spirit. In virtue of a theological postulate, this must be absolutely possible and necessary, because Jesus' own time, which ('psychologically') becomes timeless through his bearing the sin of the world on the Cross, and again and in a different way more timeless still in the descent into the condition of Hades, in order to issue with the suddenness of the Resurrection from death into the eternal and perpetual, contains and shelters the 'time of the others', which will continue on earth, in itself. It is not possible to achieve this quite simple and unique insight from outside; therefore the logia, their revision and redactional classification, must give an impression of contradictoriness. Nevertheless they are all correct, each in its own perspective. One only has to make the effort of holding two things together:that in the first perspective, that of the unique time of Jesus, the end of time is reached in all truth with the bearing of the sin of the world and the descent into the death of all, and therefore it is absurd to distinguish the 'point of time' of the Resurrection (or Ascension) and the 'point of time of the parousia', for here there are no 'points of time' any longer. These exist only in the 'time of the others', in 'our time', in respect of which Jesus can also make objectively justified interventions. It must not be forgotten, moreover, that it is not until the Passion that Jesus experiences what it means to bear the sin of the world, and that before this, he sees its fearsome 'timelessness' as it were threatening in outline, from the outside; it threatens as an endless end, that sinks into the eternal timelessness; it is objectively impossible and theologically false to allot this endless end a place in the 'chronology of salvation history', and to situate in a temporal succession the radical change of the Resurrection which, seen from Hades, is impossible, the unthinkable, unlocatable moment when 'death is swallowed up in victory' (1 Cor 15.54) in divine 'suddenness' and the perpetuity of eternal life 'begins' (but this 'beginning' too must be cancelled, for despite the character of event which belongs to the Resurrection, Jesus soars up into the glory which 'he had before the world was made', (Jn 17.5). The formula of Jesus' Resurrection 'after three days' or 'on the third day' can be formulated only from a standpoint that lies utterly outside, a standpoint that projects on to the continuing time of the world that which is timeless, or at any rate has a qualitatively different time; the time of the world is no longer the proper time of what is endless, and although it can be continuously present to it (Mt 28.20), this does not mean that for it itself Resurrection, Ascension, and parousia are separated by distances in time. In all this, we have not yet touched on the other theological question (above all a question of Pauline and Johannine theology), how the Christian in the transitory time of the world can share in the time of Jesus' earthly life, in the non-time of the Cross and Hell, and in the perpetuity of the exalted Lord. All this is so paradoxical that every one-sided solution is false from the outset. 'Therefore the same evangelist is able to reproduce the formally contradictory statements of Jesus about the future, without bringing them forcibly into harmony with each other.'[19] [16] This is the solution of O. Cullmann, Heil als Geschichte, p. 201 (ET pp. 222f.). For him, the remaining intervening period has for Jesus 'an especial significance in salvation history, despite its brevity' (p. 197, ET p. 218).

---

[17] 'Die Naherwartung in der Verkündigung Jesu', in: Zeit und Geschichte. Dankesgabe an R. Bultmann (1964), p. 45 and n. 76.

[18] With J. Weiss (op. cit., n. 13 above, p. 96), one can point to the 'double platform' of the apocalyptic image of the world; but this is at best a remote analogy, that can contribute a form of expression for what is christologically unique.

It is therefore absolutely incorrect to suppose that all the sayings about the period of the Church remaining after Jesus' 'assumption' (Lk 9.51), or about the 'interim period', are to be denied him; as has been seen already, to speak otherwise would not be human; and these 'days to come' can be coloured in simple human colours (as at Mk 2.20), or apocalyptically (Mk 13.19), or eschatologically (Mk 14.25), or specifically christologically (in all predictions of persecutions 'for his sake', Mk 13.9 par.).[20] John writes so much from the standpoint of the Lord, who is at once the one who comes and the one who goes, the one on the Cross and the one exalted to the Father, that the non-time of the Cross is called 'a little while'—an absolutely qualitative, non-chronological designation—and the 'coming again', 'seeing again', and 'taking to the place where he is' refer equally to the Easter appearances and to the 'later' parousia, events which are to be situated within the unique time of Jesus and do not need to be chronologically distinguished there; for this reason, it is unnecessary to excise as redactional additions all the futurist utterances about the judgment and the rising of the dead on the last day (5.28; 6.39, 40, 44, 54; 11.24; 12.48).[21] For why should John have neutralised the terrible tension of the New Testament utterances about time, and impoverished them so that they indicate only a 'presence' 'at a point in time'? The Johannine presence is only the radicalisation of the time of Christ as the all-determinative form of the time of the Church—a thought that has its basis in the Synoptic Gospels, when they have Jesus' working begin with an overpowering of Satan, when for them too the kingdom is present inasmuch as the stronger one has forced his way into the house of the strong man and bound him (Mt 12.28 par.), and when Jesus sees Satan falling like a bolt of lightning from Heaven (Lk 10.18). Nevertheless, the 'vertical' event has not only its 'horizontal' correspondance; rather, it becomes reality and something present for us, only when 'what has happened once for all' takes a firm place in human time as this goes on its course. It is in accord with this that the believing man lives towards this event, which for him too will be something unforeseeable (Mt 24.44), breaking in like a flash of lightning (Mt 24.27; Lk 17.24).

---

[19] G. Delling, Zeitverständnis (n. 1 above), p. 115.

[20] R. Schnackenburg, Gottes Herrschaft und Reich (1959), p. 146.

[21] A. Vögtle, 'Exegetische Erwägungen über das Wissen und Selbstbewusstsein Jesu', in: Festgabe K. Rahner I (1964), pp. 608–667.

The unique time of Jesus is the one that the prophets awaited; 'they inquired εἰς τίνα καὶ ποῖον καιρόν what quantitative and qualitative time was indicated by the Spirit of Christ within them, when predicting the sufferings of Christ and the subsequent glory' (1 Pet 1.11). Here is both the internal difference of the time of Jesus from that of the Old Testament, and the reason for the difference, in terms of its contents—the eschatological sufferings and glorifications—laid clear before our eyes. 1 Peter goes on to say that even the angels longed to look into these finally decisive events (1.12), and this agrees with the statement of Paul that only now, in the time of the Incarnation, has the manifold Wisdom of God (in the dispensation of salvation) been made known through the Church to the authorities and powers in heaven (Eph 4.10f.),[22] and that thus the time of Christ becomes the time that is inclusive of the 'times' of the worldly powers and heavenly powers also (cf. 1 Pet 3.22; Heb 1.4; 2.5; Col 2.10, 15). The inclusive character of the time of Jesus lies in his 'having been chosen in advance before the foundation of the world' (1 Pet 1.20) to appear in the last times as the 'lamb without spot or stain', so that the earthly time of Jesus is from the outset already taken up into the plan and the disposition of the created world, and belongs to the eternal contents of the providence that governs the world (cf. Rev 13.8).

---

[22] Cf. the important excursus of H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser (1957), pp. 159–166, ad loc.

b. The time of the Church

We have identified the subject who receives revelation as the Church; anyone who accepts this must speak of a time of the Church as such, a time which for this reason cannot be equated with the 'punctiliar' determination of individuals at those moments when they are addressed by God's Word and reply to it. But the time of Jesus must be as much determinative for the time of the Church as the Word is determinative for the reply. If the Word in its inmost logic categorically requires a reply (Is 55.10f.), and indeed goes forth for the sake of the reply, then the time of Jesus too intends to imprint itself on the Church in such a manner that a time of the Church is produced, through grace and yet in a free response. Because the Church can never identify herself with her Lord, not even as his 'body' and his 'bride' ('one flesh'), then this is no more than an analogy which always also implies difference. But on the other hand, since Church is wholly determined by her origin from the Lord and her going towards him, her time can be made comprehensible only through the analogatum princeps, the time of Jesus.

This can be seen most clearly by considering the insight that the time of the Church has no momentum of its own, but is in its entirety determined by the momentum of the time of Christ. The momentum of his time was conditioned by the inclusion of the whole will of God to save and judge within his finite mortal existence. This is unique and unrepeatable; but it can become the measure under which the Church sets herself in her temporality. In the appearances of the Risen One, the disciples do not in the least experience themselves as 'risen with him': they remain within the chronologically on-going time, in an existence that outwardly, despite the fundamental breaking-through the ban of death by the Lord, is characterised as an existence that goes towards death. If a ray from the victory falls upon it, if a hidden overturning of values results, this comes only from him.

In order to understand this, it is necessary first to establish that the Easter appearances, which give the disciples a perfect certainty of the Resurrection of Jesus, do not present themselves as the glory, now revealed openly, which had lain hidden, though ready to break forth, in the momentum of the claim of Jesus of Nazareth (in poverty and self-abandonment). The disciples are not 'stunned' or 'cast to the ground' by these appearances, as in the epiphany of the glory on Mount Tabor, or at the beginning of Revelation. There remains a place for failure to recognise, for discussion and questioning, indeed for doubt; a place for the practicality of the instruction and of the commission imparted. Not even the closing scene of the Ascension is distinguished by the glory of an epiphany; it emphasises only a certain definitiveness of the disappearing. From the Easter appearances, the whole light of comprehension falls backwards upon the momentum of Jesus' 'existence towards the Cross', but these appearances retain something suspended, something of a transitional character, that expressly forbids holding fast (Jn 20.17) and makes understandable and almost necessary the further reference that the interpreting angels make to the return at the end of time (Acts 1.11). In Mark, this is so strong that the reference to the Resurrection that has taken place, and to the seeing which will take place, suffices as conclusion; in Luke, the theme of the instruction first of the Emmaus disciples, then of the Apostles (24.44f.), stands at the centre of interest; in John, the interest is above all in the constitution of the Church (symbolism of the episodes of Peter and John) and in the sacraments (forgiveness of sins, 'breakfast'), in the faith that does not see, yet sees (20.29), or sees only through signs (20.8–9), and in the letting-go of the Lord so that he may go the Father (20.17) in order to accomplish his work on earth both through the ministry and existentially (21.18f.). Only in Matthew do we see a tendency to draw Resurrection and parousia closer together as the one definitive reality for the Church too: Matthew draws close to giving a picture of the glory of the Resurrection event (but without actually doing so, as do the apocryphal gospels, 28.2–4; in accordance with this, he had already described the crucifixion at 27.51–53 with apocalyptic images as the presence of the final judgment); he underlines the proskynêsis before the risen Jesus (28.9,17), and shows Christ appearing as the pantokrator of all times and places in the closing words (which are in fact spoken from Heaven, 28.18–20). Yet he leaves place for the doubt, precisely in the presence of this final appearance of power (28.17); he leaves room too for the 'ambiguous report' that perhaps Jesus was not risen at all (28.11–15). Thus it is clear that even in Matthew, the eschatological brilliance which he spreads over the Resurrection is an anticipation of the 'liturgical' faith of the congregation.

As a whole, the character of the Easter appearances confirms the double horizon of Jesus' time, which has been described above: for himself, he reaches out in the Cross and Resurrection over all chronologically future time to the end of time and of the world, and thereby includes in his grasp also the continuing chronological time of the Church (and through her, of the world as a whole). By virtue of this being included in his grasp, the time of the Church comes to lie objectively between 'Resurrection' (as divine summing up of the earthly life in its journey to the Cross) and parousia: it is a time within these brackets, determined from both sides, from the certainty of the end that has been reached in Jesus as well as from the certainty of the running on towards precisely this end (his 'return').

The unity of this double certainty is given to the Church through the Holy Spirit, who bears her through the paradox (and thereby the apparent incomprehensibility) of this 'interim period', consoling her, defending her, illuminating and strengthening her, training her to attain the unity and diversity of the missions and charisms. The Pauline and Johannine theologies, like the Acts of the Apostles, are full of the reality and power of this gift of Father and Son. He, the Spirit, is the indubitable present tense, identifying himself as the synthesis of past tense (the history of Jesus) and future tense (his return), and making both believable by virtue of this synthesis.

But this synthesis in the present tense, which in addition makes known the present tense of the exalted Christ which has become perpetual (Mt 28.18f.; Jn 14.19,23; Acts 7.56; 9.4ff., etc.), cannot allow past and future to disappear into itself like moments that have become antiquated; Paul has to emphasise this against the gnostics of Corinth,[1] just as much as John must against other gnostics. The true Spirit of Christ refers back to the Cross of Jesus (1 Cor 1.17ff.; 12.3; Jn 16.14) and forward to his coming again (1 Cor 13.8ff.; Phil 3.12f.; Jn 16.13), and it will be repeatedly necessary, from Montanus and on through Joachim to Hegel, to struggle against the misunderstanding of the gnostic spirit-synthesis. The present tense of the Spirit is neither timeless (as the present tense of a timeless 'idea' that determines every temporal present) nor the autonomous synthesis of the periods of time; rather, as Paul with profound insight says, it is a 'deposit' (2 Cor 1.22; 5.5; Eph 1.14) that looks to the final synthesis, and therefore kindles a unique hope that cannot be compared with anything that is inner-worldly. It is a hope that is distinct both from the hope of the Old Testament that was based on mere 'promise', and from the definitive possession (and the form of fulfilment of hope that remains in possession),[2] and allows that indescribable anticipation, both confident and reverently cautious, that is proper to the chosen bride who has received from the bridegroom the 'deposit' that looks to the marriage ceremony. Seen from the standpoint of the world, this penultimate hope is so ultimate that the time given its form by it can be termed only the 'end time' (Acts 2.17; 1 Cor 10.11; 1 Jn 2.18).

The end time is qualitatively such that in it the power of chronos as 'present' and 'future' (which belongs also to the powers and authorities, Rom 8.38) is fundamentally broken.[3] It is qualitatively 'shortened time' (1 Cor 7.29),[4] inasmuch as the new immediate nearness to what is definitive brings about this 'concentration' of 'compactness' (the obverse side is that Satan too ὀλίγον καιρὸν ἔχει, 'has a short time', after Christ's victory, Rev 12.12). It is understandable that this qualitative character, an essential aspect of which is the anticipation of hope in the end, was first understood as a chronological (quantitative) imminent expectation; indeed, it was inevitable that this should be so, because Jesus spoke above all on the basis of his own time, in which Resurrection and parousia are included together in the same act, and because before Easter he urgently introduced the disciples into his own attitude of waiting confidently for his 'hour'. The texts which speak of watching and attentively waiting for the coming belong absolutely to the original proclamation of Jesus.[5] But the imminent expectation, in its most original sense, had its foundation for the early Church so deeply in the qualitative aspect of the interim time, that, contrary to what modern theologians like to suppose, the delay of the parousia[6] did not pose for them a problem that touched the centre.[7] It is only in a few peripheral passages that the lengthening of the time is felt as a theological question.[8] The modern constructions necessarily think from the outside and primarily in a chronological manner, and therefore they get the essence of the hope in the end time wrong, since this can be understood only theologically; then they turn to the equally misleading existential interpretation with its use of the present tense, which logically leads away from the Jesus of the gospel to a Platonism of the eschatological 'taking leave of the world'.

---

[1] U. Wilckens, Weisheit und Torheit. Eine exegetisch-religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu 1 Kor 1 und 2, BHTh 26 (1959).

[2] On this, cf. my 'Fides Christi', in: Sponsa Verbi (1960), pp. 45–79.

[3] Delling, op. cit. (n. 1 of previous section), p. 106.

[4] Delling (op. cit., p. 89) rightly points to the qualitative character of this shortened time, but he overplays his hand when he wishes to exclude from this the element of chronological ('horizontal') time: for such things as marrying, buying, etc., there is to be 'no more time' in the Christian's life. But if one takes the expression literally, it still remains a play on words.

---

[5] B. Rigaux, 'La seconde venue de Jésus', in: La venue du Messie, Rech. bibl. VI (1962), p. 185.

[6] Bibliography on the delay of the parousia in: R. Schnackenburg, Neutestamentliche Theologie (1963), p. 61; E. Grässer, 'Das Problem der Parusieverzögerung in den synoptischen Evangelien und in der Apostelgeschichte', in: Beiheft zur ZNW 22 (1957); A. Strobel, Untersuchungen zum eschatologischen Verzögerungsproblem (1961).

[7] On this, O. Cullmann has written very tellingly in various polemical articles, collected in: Vorträge und Aufsätze (1966), pp. 337–465, esp. 414ff., and in his work Heil als Geschichte (1965), esp. pp. 218ff. (ET pp. 240ff.).

[8] 2 Pet 3.3f., one of the latest writings of the canon; and Jn 21.23, where it is a case only of an individual instance, since the beloved disciple should have been spared death before the return of Christ, and his death therefore raises a question. It is noticeable how little the original expectation of Paul, that he would experience the return of Jesus (1 Thess 4.17), became for him a problem with the later prospect of his own death; for he himself, like Jesus, had already spoken at 1 Thess 5.1ff. of ignorance of the hour and of the coming of the Day 'like a thief in the night'.

Here, however, it is decisive that the exalted Lord, who apparently stands timelessly above the end time between Resurrection and parousia, is no atemporal Platonic idea—he becomes this in the application of a merely ecclesiastical kerygma that is separated from Jesus—but precisely the Jesus who willed to have a temporal existence together with men on the earth. Here we see a theme that was not yet fully visible in the preceding section on the time of Jesus. Seen theologically, Jesus may indeed have had a time that was genuinely his own (Jn 7.6,8); but he received this only by sharing in universal human time. He declared himself to be in solidarity with the temporal destiny of the prophets of Israel and of John the Baptist. He played a game on a common field of time, on which he had those who played with him and those who played against him. He himself chose those who played more closely with him, in order that he might go along his own path, not alone but accompanied by others both externally and, as far as possible, internally. The reason for the emergence of those who played against him was their refusal to accept the role of players with him, the role which was to have been theirs. In the next section, we shall consider how radically Jesus intended this going with him, the 'following after' Jesus, to be—he intended it so seriously that he felt able to take those who were his with him into the last phases of his own path, although here he could only go alone, because of the breakdown caused by men's sins. He asks them if they can drink his cup; he promises them a share in the judgment of the twelve tribes of Israel, i.e., an active role in the decisive act of God's judgment. Paul seconds these indubitably authentic words of Jesus, when he assures the community of this role in the final judgment once again (1 Cor 6.2–4).[9] This contemporaneity of Jesus with our time establishes a communication that allows the time of the Church to share in his eschatological perpetuity and supratemporality.

---

[9] G. Schrenk, Die Weissagung über Israel im Neuen Testament (1951), pp. 17f.; Kümmel, op. cit. (n. 8 of previous section), p. 41.

The Jesus who was with us imprints on the time of the Church his own form, the form of the one who became the lord of all times through the perfecting of his temporality. This perfecting is his total poverty and self-abandonment, which made possible the event of the Cross in which God's love was able to go to the limit and carry out what it designed. By virtue of Jesus' Resurrection, this 'going to the limit' is set up as the norm of all fulfilment in transitory time: 'If one has died for all, therefore all have died. And he died for all, that those who live might live no longer for themselves but for him who for their sake died and was raised' (2 Cor 5.14f.). The imprint of the time of Jesus implies therefore an objective dispossession of one's own life, eliminating in advance every act of the will or of resistance: it implies a being taken into the end of time accomplished by Jesus, which includes death, judgment and Resurrection—the 'reconciliation of God with the world' (2 Cor 5.18)—as an event brought about 'for us' and 'for me'. Because the fact has already been brought about, and gives its character to the remaining time of the Church, there is a distance between the two forms of time that is not to be removed; if the time of Christ contains in itself the whole momentum of the eschatological act of God, then the time of the Church can give a response to this momentum only in so far as it projects itself wholly, in believing and loving hope, towards this perfected time as towards its own goal—the existence of the one who bears the impress of this form must shape itself into a flying bullet: 'forgetting what lies behind and straining forward to what lies ahead, I press on toward the goal for the prize . . . to make it my own, because Christ Jesus has made me his own' (Phil 3.13f.,12). The believer has been made Christ's own, and therefore the absoluteness of this forward movement which results transcends every other absoluteness, however utopian, of human hope or of the programming of the future. Simply by being lived, this absoluteness can take its place at the spearhead of all worldly hopes for the future, and can preserve them from stagnation and from acquiescing in the established present. In this sense, it can indirectly exercise by itself functions of 'social criticism', but without letting itself be led astray from the straight line of its own flight-path by such criticism or by preoccupation with worldly projects of evolution. For this reason, it will 'keep awake and be sober', because it has already been bathed in the light and does not need to search for light (1 Thess 5.5ff.). It knows that its 'home is in Heaven' (Phil 3.20), and that we are 'pilgrims and strangers in this world' (Heb 11.13; 1 Pet 2.11).

The element of the sacramental on the one hand, and of the institutional, the official which is bound with it on the other, has an interior appropriateness for this pilgrim state of the Church. The sacramental is seen with special clarity in the three forms of baptism, Eucharist, and forgiveness of sins, as the once-for-all (Rom 6.3ff.) and then ever new receiving of the imprint of the form of the dying and rising Lord. This takes place because the Eucharist is the proclamation of the death of Christ (1 Cor 11.26), as a participation in 'Christ, the paschal lamb slain' for us (1 Cor 5.7), 'sharing in the blood of Christ' (1 Cor 10.16), 'until he comes again', i.e., a memory that looks both backwards and forwards, both to what has been fulfilled and to what is promised,[10] with its gaze set on the judgment which is escaped by the one who 'discerns' the body of Christ, examining himself (1 Cor 11.29). This takes place then in the forgiveness of sins, because this is imparted to the individual sinner out of the treasury of the total forgiveness on the Cross, in a judging and pronouncing of sentence that belong to the eschatological act of judgment by God on the Cross (1 Cor 5.1ff.; Mt 16.19; 18.18; Jn 20.22f.). But the dispensation of judgment from the eschatological grace presupposes an office that is to say, a participation in the authority of Jesus, which (as has been seen) is not separable from poverty and self-abandonment. If ministerial authority is to be credible for Christians, it must therefore attest itself by bearing in a special way the imprint of the sufferings of Christ on the Cross; this is archetypically represented in Peter (Jn 21.18f.) and Paul (2 Cor 4.10–15; 6.1–10), so that it is possible to say, pointedly, 'The time of the event of the death of love is sumultaneously the time of the apostolic existence'.[11] By going back to the Cross of Christ, Paul can justify his discernment of what is truly Christian, as well as his own apostolic ministry, against the Corinthian gnosis which thought it could leave behind the earthly Jesus and understand the risen Jesus as an idea with exclusive reference to the present tense, so doing without any hope in a future Resurrection. There is an authority in the Church, which establishes order over against mere enthusiasm (1 Cor 14.33, 40), but authority is exercised only in the humiliation that is caused by one's own weakness (as 2 Corinthians shows).

---

[10] N. A. Dahl, 'Anamnesis, Mémoire et commémoration dans le christianisme primitif', in Stud. theol. (1947).

What is true of the ministry, whose weapons can be only spiritual (2 Cor 10.4), is true also of the Church as a people that receives the impress of ministry and sacrament: the 'nearness of the Lord' requires from his people the ἐπιεικές of Christians before all men (Phil 4.5): 'Your forbearance, that is to say, the joyful calmness that is able to bear all suffering and injustice. "Forbearance" is the exact opposite of the attitude that insists on its rights . . . Thus it is only another word for "meekness", which Jesus avows of himself, for the "humility" which Christ demonstrated in his earthly life . . . It is a struggle of patient enduring against injustice, of powerlessness against force'.[12] Paul goes on, like the Sermon on the Mount, to forbid 'cares'; rather, all concerns should be borne before the God of peace in a prayer that is at once petition and thanksgiving (Phil 4.6f.). These concerns will be those of all mankind too, and of mankind's future: concerns that in worldly terms are enormous, but which nevertheless are to be borne in a final pacification to the point where 'the peace of God, which passes all understanding', rules anterior to all present and future strife.[13] [11] E. Güttgemanns, Der leidende Apostel und sein Herr. Studien zur paulinischen Christologie (1966), p. 316.

---

[12] E. Lohmeyer, Philipper (9th edn. 1953), p. 168.

[13] Ibid., p. 7.

This much may be said of the imprint stamped by the time of Christ on the time of the Church;[14] there is yet one final aspect to be considered. The momentum of the definitive act of God in the Cross and Resurrection of Christ is so strong that its impact on mankind bursts through the time of the Church, making this no longer one particular, circumscribed time. Unlike the particular time of Israel, which had boundaries separating it from the Gentiles, the time of the Church in its manifest character can be only what the time of mankind is through Christ, in a truth that lies hidden. The apparent brackets—between Cross and parousia—that surround the time of the Church are in reality the opening of all brackets, since God has acted in Christ 'once for all' ἐφάπαξ and thus for all times and places before and after Christ, and not as the redeemer of a little group or of one single people, but as the creator of the world, accomplishing his original plan 'to unite all things in Christ, things in heaven and things on earth, as the Head' (Eph 1.10), his plan 'as the one saving God' to bring 'all men to salvation and to knowledge of the truth' through 'the one mediator Christ Jesus, who gave himself as a ransom for all' (1 Tim 2.4ff.). Thus he planned to overcome the dangerous two-sidedness of the Sinai covenant, which in the last analysis could serve only to demonstrate man's incapacity; so he would show the righteousness of God, on earth as in Heaven (Gal 3.19f.). This bursting through of the special time of Israel into the time of Christ and of his Church which embraces all times is a theme on which Paul never tires of ringing the changes; and if he gives such strong emphasis to the negative aspects of the law and thereby seems to erect a wall between law and gospel, where hitherto none had existed—for in the old covenant, law and promise (prophecy) were one—then this serves only to dispose more definitively of what was finite and limited. It serves, further, to overcome the dreadful twilight into which the old covenant had ever more deeply entered, and which had become so definitive with the destruction of the Temple and the Exile that, since then, the continuing existence of the original covenant had become an open question, and the law and its observance had become a kind of abstract substitute for the living intercourse of God with his people. Paul brings this ambiguity to light when he sets a temporal and therefore material distance between the promise to Abraham and the event on Sinai (Gal 3.17), and indeed between the promise and circumcision (which exists since Abraham, Rom 4.10ff.), and when, from the viewpoint of the definitive dispensation, he shows that the final purpose of the law was to make obvious the sin that lay latent, in individual transgressions that could not be denied (Gal 3.19; Rom 4.15). Thus the Jews would be brought to the same level as the Gentiles, who in any case were shown to be 'without the law', so that no one might be able to boast, but every mouth would be silent and the whole world confess its guilt before God (Rom 3.19). The apparent dialectic of law and gospel set up by Paul is in reality the abolition of every dialectic, as is clear in the simpler pattern of the Letter to the Hebrews, where the old sacrifices stand in place of the old law, in their temporally-conditioned necessity and simultaneously in their uselessness in the presence of the one and unique self-offering of Christ, in whom finally priest and sacrifice become one, just as in him finally the promise (and thereby also the law, Mt 5.17) is fulfilled, and God brings about his own righteousness of salvation (tzedek) on earth as in Heaven.

---

[14] We do not need to enter upon the question of how far Christ foresaw and willed a Church in the interim period, how far he founded a Church through specific instructions. His being with mankind, his will to call men to follow him and to instruct them and send them out, is sufficient reason to give a fundamentally positive answer, if we accept the double temporal horizon of Jesus that has been described. The decisive link between the two temporal levels is the institution of the Eucharist: what was done eschatologically once for all on the Cross, is to be many times repeated in the Church. Bibliography on the question in Trilling, Fragen zur Geschichtlichkeit Jesu (2nd edn. 1967), p. 114.

By excluding such ambiguity, Paul implies inclusion in what has only one meaning, in the promise of God, who alone is able to accomplish with full power what is his own (his righteousness) in what is other than himself. Therefore the recognition of this act of God has first place in the new covenant, and Paul can identify the original attitude of Abraham, faith, as the origin of the attitude that has final validity before God. Faith is meant in the fully inclusive sense that is shown in Heb 11 and can include at the margin even the acknowledgement of God by the pagans (11.3), just as for Paul the Gentiles will be judged by their conscience as the law that has been inspired within them (Rom 2.14f.); already in Abraham, faith meant a total lived obedience to God's promise, that went as far as blindness and scandal (as far as Mount Moriah, cf. Jas 2.21), and in the New Testament still, faith finds expression as lived obedience to God's fulfilment of his promise, so that there are not two kinds of faith, but only one.[15] This is not to say that the one form is limited in the New Testament, being changed from an attitude of mere confidence in the ('unconcrete') God of the Old Testament to a dogmatic-categorical holding the truth of propositions, on the contrary it experiences a breakthrough into the depths where all limits are abolished: for the righteousness of God is no longer, as in the old covenant, an earthly rescuing of Israel through the condemnation of its enemies, but the eschatological rescuing of all sinners that takes place through the krisis of the one Cross. For this reason, there is an inner continuity of faith in the time of promise and in the time of filfilment, but 'apart from us, they were not to be made perfect' (Heb 11.40). This is only to bring to fulfilment the Old Testament's attempt to open the limited time of Israel's covenant (from Abraham to the Messiah) out to a time of salvation of all mankind, by going back from the covenant with Abraham to the covenant with Noah which was made with the whole of mankind and indeed with the whole of creation,[16] and in the opening forwards in the prophets, where the Gentiles are to stream to the eschatological Jerusalem, and in the opening sidewards in the Wisdom literature which supposes a certain contact between God and all peoples through his power, expressed in creation and in providence, which penetrates all things and is immanent in the world. The concentration of God's definitive act in Christ is a flash of lightning, to which there answers a roll of thunder that expands through all the times of the world from beginning to end. This double movement does not destroy the work of salvation in the Old Testament, since God's world-wide act always retains a basis and midpoint in Israel, just as the Wisdom that holds sway over all the world likewise pitched her 'tent' in Israel (Sir 24.4–10). Indeed, this double movement corresponds to the very being of God, who is both unique and infinitely determined in himself, and the one who includes all things in his embrace.

---

[15] M. Buber, Zwei Glaubensweisen, in: Werke I (1962), pp. 651ff.

[16] III/2,1, pp. 178ff.

If we say that the Church then simply cannot be an entity closed in on itself, but must understand itself as a moment of the time of mankind that has become visible, this does not however mean that we have thereby already adequately characterised the time of mankind in its particular structure in the world. The question of the evolution from matter to spirit, of the evolution of culture and technology towards a final goal, has not yet been touched upon. Our aim was only to speak of the self-understanding of the time of the Church, which defines itself qualitatively as time between (Cross-) Resurrection and parousia, without consideration of any self-understanding of the time of the history of the world, which may well interpret itself as evolution towards a Day Omega. It is true that the time of the Church gives this time of world history a home within itself, and thus receives a 'double temporal horizon' analogous to that applied to Christ: as, for him, the continuing chronological time could be comprehended within his eschatological time, so it is possible for the time of world history, as it stretches out chronologically, to take its place as a subordinate material element under the time of the Church. But formally, the time of the Church is not determined by the time of world history. Therefore it is irrelevant for the qualitative 'imminent expectation' of the Church, how long or short the extension of the chronological time of the world is. At this point, the chronological imminent expectation of the early Church had to be changed to a qualitative imminent expectation; far from being the breakdown of Christianity (so Overbeck, Schweitzer, Werner), this change rather brought Christianity to a better self-understanding. The qualitative immanent expectation of the Church remains a matter of a decision about values: 'Seek first the kingdom of God' (Mt 6.33). The eye looks first to the eschaton, to the Lord of the Church, and it is within this perspective that the inner-worldly tasks find their place. Because the Lord, who always stands already at the end of history, is also 'with you all days, until the end of the world' and thus is immanent with the Church in history, her act of looking ahead to the end does not need to be hostile to the world and history, taking flight eschatologically from the world; it can be just as much a look through the worldly tasks to the eschaton. And if the heart proleptically dwells with its definitive treasure in heaven, the things of earth can be lit up for it in the light of its definitive love. The imminence of the Church's near imminent expectation is determined in no other manner than by the precedence of love.

c. The time of discipleship

The momentum of the time of Jesus expresses itself in the time of the Church as the momentum of imminent expectation: the next thing to happen to her temporally will in every case be her Lord himself, and she draws her life from her yearning for him and for his revealing. In the life of the disciple, however, the momentum of the time of Jesus expresses itself as the momentum of the call to unconditional discipleship. The four gospels set the pattern for this in their many call narratives: if anyone wants to be involved with Jesus, or if Jesus takes the initiative to involve himself with anyone, this means for the disciple a choice of all or nothing. Discipleship is an indivisible adherence which demands the whole existence, and is marked with the brand of his ownership not only in one place, but in all places.

But here there arises a bewildering dialectic, which seems to call everything into question, indeed seems to explode everything. The end of Jesus' earthly path is the Cross: this is the aim of his life, the vocation that is properly his. He can endure it only alone, bearing the burden of all. If he knew from the beginning that his path would lead to this end—and this must be supposed, in a general form that does not fill in any details of the picture in advance—how can he commit men to go along a path on which they must necessarily fail? Can he truly lead them to this abyss? For it is a vocation that is most genuinely his alone to fall into this abyss, while the others will be forcibly left behind, helpless, stripped of everything, and with the awareness that they have broken their fidelity by betraying him, by denying him, and by fleeing. Do we not have here a tragic intensification of what Jesus says to his brothers: 'My time is not your time' (cf. Jn 7.6)? The Synoptic evangelists try to solve this tormenting puzzle of a discipleship that is ultimately impossible, when they adduce the 'must' of prophecy as the reason: 'You will all fall away, for it is written, "I will strike the shepherd, and the sheep will be scattered"' (Mk 14.27, quoting Zech 13.7). John sees it more kindly, when, in place of the disciples' flight he introduces a scene where Jesus explicitly dismisses them: 'Let these men go' (Jn 18.8), and further, promises to Peter the fulfilment of following: 'Where I am going, you cannot follow me now; but you shall follow afterward' (13.36). And all four Gospels bring at this point, after Peter's protestations of fidelity, the prediction of his betrayal. Are these in fact post-Easter attempts at explanation and toning-down, made at a period when following Jesus in the proper sense was no longer a possibility?

The Church was aware that this could no longer be, as we see from the fact that Paul never describes his own existence as a following (ἀκολουθεῖν), nor ever uses it to describe Christian existence in the Church: after Easter, the distinguishing form of having been there with Jesus, which empowers the first disciples to be eyewitnesses, exists no longer. It is not that Paul did not have the certainty, in an outstanding way in his own case but for all believers too, that they now have the possibility, in the grace of the risen and exalted Lord, to go with him in some manner along the way that led Jesus to the Cross and into the Resurrection from the dead; for Paul's whole teaching has as its central concern the placing of the believers in the midst of this event of salvation, that they may live on the basis of it. The evangelists all write after Paul: how is it then that they can ascribe such significance to the 'following' which is de facto no longer accessible for the second generation, building so much community theology and ethics on to the call to follow, and on to the promises of Jesus which are joined to this call, that what Kierkegaard calls the 'contemporaneity' appears to be absolutely actual? Is this not a romanticism that spreads a smoke-screen in its effort to cover up a contradiction—and precisely in this, sets man before the hiatus of the Cross, which he cannot leap over? For in the case of those who were really contemporaries, it is declared openly that they failed in the presence of the Cross. Is it, then, that the later Christians are seduced by the idea of 'contemporaneity'—led to this, however, by the Gospels themselves—and think that they can do better than the Twelve? There is not the slightest indication in the whole of the New Testament that any such idea was at the back of their minds.

Should one therefore say that the re-presentation of discipleship in the Gospels is only an image that depicts the same thing that Paul's theology intends when he speaks of life on the basis of faith and of 'being in Christ', always presupposing the accomplished work of redemption by the Cross and Resurrection of Christ? But would it not be better, then, to abandon such images, which inevitably focus attention on the failure of such 'contemporaneous' discipleship? Or was precisely this re-presentation of the failure necessary, in order to dam the virtually uncheckable trend that slipped over from the idea of following to the idea of the imitation of an ethical-religious 'model'?[1] For in those passages of the New Testament where there is a clear tendency to claim the concept of following for the later Christians too—as at 1 Pet 2.21, when the slaves who suffer injustly are told that they are 'called' to this, 'because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example (ὑπογραμμόν, to be copied), that you should follow in his steps'—then it appears that a levelling down of the unique Cross to the level of something that all can accomplish is at least perilously near. But is this danger not already present, albeit in a more concealed fashion, in Paul, when he presents himself in his apostolic existence as a model for the community: 'Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ' (1 Cor 11.1)? When compared with this idea of the model, the descriptions of the Gospels have the effect of deliberately holding back, an effect that is intensified by their radicalising of Jesus' requirements to follow him, in the expressions they employ for the Church's preaching and catechesis (we shall shortly speak of this): the effect of this is to make the failure of the disciples at the decisive moment all the more blatant. Indeed, Schulz can speak of an involuntary play on words,[2] since the introductory scenes of calling almost all include the phrase, 'they left everything and followed him' (Lk 5.11; cf. Mk 1.18; 1.20 par.), while the final sentence in Mark concerning following runs, 'they all left him and fled' (Mk 14.50 par.). Nevertheless, it would be going too far to say that the evangelists understood their logia about following Jesus as a corrective over against the community theology (clearly formulated in Paul). Rather, their logia are intended as the conformation of this theology, when they take the true radicality that lay hidden in Jesus' demand to follow him, and, looking at the Cross after Easter, make this radicality visible and bring it as a claim in the most serious manner before the eyes of the young Christian communities. This ultimately unintended situation, precisely by its endeavour to achieve an equilibrium, creates such a paradox, as far as the time of following Jesus is concerned, that it appears to be theoretically incapable of disentanglement, and discloses in a nearly unique manner the true situation of the believer in this world: a situation characterised by the impossibility of situating himself either over against Christ or over against the world. He must be there, and he was not there. Over against the καιρός of Christ, he comes irrevocably too late (Rom 5.6), but over against the world, he must behave—not only in appearance, but in truth—as one who takes as the measure of his own time the time of Christ and of his Cross.

---

[1] On what follows, cf. A. Schulz, Nachfolgen und Nachahmen. Studien über das Verhältnis der neutestamentlichen Jüngerschaft zur urchristlichen Vorbildethik (1962), with bibliography; K. H. Rengstorf, art. διδάσκαλος, μανθάνω, μαθητής in: TDNT II 152–163, IV 390–415, and 415–461; K. H. Schelkle, Jüngerschaft und Apostelamt (1957); M. Hengel, Nachfolge und Charisma (1968 ET The Charismatic Leader and His Followers, 1981); R. Pesch, 'Berufung und Sendung, eine Studie zu Mk 1, 16–20', ZKT (1969), pp. 1–31.

---

[2] Schulz, op. cit. (n. 1 above), p. 131.

Taking into account the results of the enquiry into the text, it will be necessary to say, on the one hand, that when the evangelists undertake the radicalisation of Jesus' demands to follow him, with the corresponding idealisation of what happened to the disciples, especially to the Twelve who were called by name, they do so in the light of their reflection after Easter on the radicality of Jesus' requirement and of the situation of those called. One must also say, on the other hand, that this reflection only makes explicit what lay already, more or less implicitly, in the existence of Jesus and in his claim to authority. Certainly, Jesus apparently did no more, in gathering 'disciples' (μαθητής) around himself, than the contemporary rabbis, outwardly speaking—he himself is addressed, indeed, with the title 'Rabbi' (in Greek διδάσκαλος), and he preaches like the rabbis at the public worship on the sabbath. The disciples had to be at the service of the teacher like slaves (cf. Mk 6.35 par.; 8.1ff.; 11.1ff.; 14.12ff.), and had to enter into a life shared with him (even though only temporarily; cf. Mk 3.14; 4.10, etc.). In return, they received from him special instruction: in the case of the rabbis, this was the interpretation of the will of God which stood in the Torah. In John, we see two former disciples of the Baptist directed by him to cross over into the circle of Jesus' disciples, and at the beginning there is a kind of free advertisement from one man to the next (Andrew and Peter, Philip and Nathanael), inviting him, at least for a trial period, to enter the circle of Jesus' disciples, the size of which, even according to the Synoptics, seems to have been greatly fluctuating.[3] But even if the framework was contemporary, it was filled with a new and unique content, which in its origin is determined by Jesus' claim to authority. He sets himself above Moses as interpreter of God's will, and breaks the holiest commandment, that concerning the sabbath. He is habitually in the company of 'tax collectors', 'harlots', and 'sinners'—something out of the question for any rabbi—and he even calls a tax collector into the inner circle of his disciples (Mk 2.14). And when he accepts his disciples into a life shared with him, they necessarily receive a share in the quality of his task that makes it different from that of others; from the beginning he explicitly gives them authority, not only to preach, but also to drive out evil spirits (Mk 3.15), that is, to bear witness in deeds to the coming of the kingdom of God. In his own deeds of power, he demands faith always, as the summing up of the right covenantal attitude towards God; yet always in practice in such a way that he himself appears as the trustworthy mediator of this right attitude.[4]

---

[3] Cf. the seventy (-two) at Lk 10.1, 17, who are all sent out by Jesus on a trial mission of proclamation.

De facto—even without the explicit demands to leave all, to sell all, to take no farewells from those at home, to leave the dead father unburied, etc.—this means that the existence of the disciples is set in a quite unique manner at an outer limit, which is rightly expressed by Peter, when he reacts to the idea that he could or must leave the master: 'To whom shall we go?' (Jn 6.68). De facto, through the being of this master, the existence of the disciple is wholly laid claim to; this following is a full-time 'calling' as a co-worker in the proclamation of the imminent kingdom of God. And as Jesus himself does everything in anticipation of the hour of God which is unknown to him, and in self-abandonment to the sole disposition of God, so a shared life with him can expect as 'reward' nothing other than coming of the kingdom itself (as 'eternal reward', Mk 10.30).[5] Whether the original demands were more absolute or less so, in any case Jesus leads his disciples to the place of the precipice, beyond which they cannot go. But there is likewise no returning for them to the world in which they were earlier at home. And it is precisely this experience of the inability to go either forwards or backwards—which of course finds a resolution with the Easter experience—which is put into words in the radical logia of following, which are set up right at the beginning of the disciples' path as warning notices. Apostleship as a 'calling' is appointed absolutely for service of the kingdom of God, and this is made clear in the 'ideal scenes' in which Jesus 'calls' his disciples with the suddenness of a 'Follow me!', that is answered by those summoned with an equally abrupt and absolute obedience, just as if (as in John) they could already have known at the first encounter that they stood before the 'Messiah' (Jn 1.41, 45), the 'Son of God' and 'king of Israel' (1.49), and upon such a summons (as in Luke especially) have [4] Not only explicitly at Mk 9.24 ('I believe, help my unbelief!'), but also precisely at the point where Jesus is astonished to find 'greater faith' outside Israel than within Israel (Mt 8.10; 15.28), for it is each time faith in his authority. Even if the Gospels do not speak of an explicit obligation of faith on the part of the disciples when they are accepted into the shared life with Jesus, this is unquestionably involved, in an implicit manner—both as faith in the God who now fulfils his promises of old in the coming of his kingdom (cf. Mt 17.20), and as faith in Jesus, whose claim and authority are the support on which that faith rests, and in whose name the disciple undertakes the preaching of the kingdom. It is necessary to take due account of this element of the 'Synoptic faith' when passing from the idea of following in the Synoptics to the Johannine interpretation of following as (explicit, post-Easter) faith (Schulz, op. cit., n. 1 above, p. 172f.); Schulz takes this too little into consideration. Martin Hengel's excellent book (n. 1 above) offers here, as elsewhere, the critical counterbalance to Schulz. Here 'sharing the Master's destiny' (Schicksalsgemeinschaft, 80; ET, pp. 72), with the goal of the proclamation of the kingdom of God before and after the death of Jesus (pp. 82ff. ET pp. 73ff.), is the true meaning of the summons to follow Jesus, a summons addressed to the one who is expressly chosen; this, however, leaves the uniqueness of the Cross of Jesus as an open problem.

---

---

[5] On the inauthenticity of the words which promise an earthly reward, cf. Schulz, op. cit. (n. 1 above), pp. 117–125). The question of the disciples, posed by Peter at Mk 10.28 and clarified by Matthew through the addition, 'What then shall we have in return?' (19.27), is redactional, and Jesus' reply undergoes much adaptation by the evangelists (each in his own way). When the Twelve are told that they will 'sit on twelve thrones' for judgment, this is originally not a promise of reward, but a piece of instruction; but already in Luke, through the linking of the logia, the theme of reward for having stood firm in the trials of Jesus (22.28) is clear. The other goods of salvation which are promised, such as table-fellowship with the Messiah, award the disciples, who 'have left everything', no special distinction apart from the many others who will have a share in the kingdom (Mt 8.11). Besides this, Jesus rejected the request of the sons of Zebedee for places of honour in the kingdom; if such do exist, it is the Father alone who assigns them (Mk 10.35–40). All the less, therefore, will Jesus promise a 'reward' other than the kingdom itself.

'left everything (earthly) at once' (Lk 5.11, 28; 18.22).[6] It is not possible to decide here whether the logion about bearing the Cross (in Luke, bearing the Cross 'every day', 9.23) can have been spoken by Jesus, and if so, whether he meant thereby his own Cross that was to come (this seems impossible), or used a metaphor for the total exposure of one's self. It is certain that, behind all Jesus' demands for renunciation and self-denial, there stands the single radicality which he himself embodies in his existence: whoever wishes to be with him must give the coming kingdom (which is present in Jesus) the unconditional predominance over everything earthly, over worldly profession, family, and material and spiritual goods (to which self-assessment belongs). And because in every case—whether a spontaneous summons goes forth from Jesus, or he admits someone who offers himself spontaneously—it is Jesus who decides the vital question whether someone shall be with him or not (he can also deny this, Lk 8.38); he bears the responsibility for the one who is accepted into the group of disciples, even and precisely when the shared life externally comes to an end with his necessary dying.

This obvious responsibility is one reason why Jesus certainly prepared his disciples for his coming Passion, even if the precise details of the predictions have been filled out after Easter. There are characteristics that it is not possible to suppress from the picture of the historical Jesus: when he labels Peter a Satan who tempts him and tries to entice him away from his essential mission (Mk 8.33), when he challenges the leaders of the people, taking all the consequences upon himself, and when he anticipates his offering-up in the institution of the Eucharist. As he considers his calling as the bearer of sins, then he knows at the same time that in this event his disciples must stand, not on the side of the one who bears, but on the side of those who are borne, and he tells them this in advance, especially when he says to Peter, 'You will all fall away on my account'. With Jesus' arrest, those who accompany Jesus are no more called 'disciples' (μαθηταί) in Luke's double work; other terms are used for them later, and in the Acts of the Apostles the expression μαθητής signifies one who belongs to the Church; thus the instruction of the exalted Lord at Mt 28.19 to the apostles, that they are to 'make disciples' (μαθητεύειν) of all peoples, betrays the explicitly post-Easter use of the word.

---

[6] On the other hand, it is precisely Luke who warns against sudden and unconsidered decisions: Lk 14.26–33. R. Pesch demonstrates that even the 'ideal scenes' have their historical background (cf. n. 1).

The breaking-off of discipleship at the Passion is so decisively important because it remains one presupposition for the possibility that the Christian, out of the grace of the risen Christ, can in his own time be set under the total eschatological destiny of the Lord—that, as Paul says, he may be 'crucified together with him' (Gal 2.19; 6.14), in order to share in advance in the Resurrection from the dead (Eph 2.6) for which he hopes (Phil 3.11, 21), a share that is received sacramentally in baptism and existentially in the New Christian life. Such bold formulations would at once lose all their distance, were it not that the description of the Passion in the gospel brought the necessary corrective. Naturally, Paul's theology also has this corrective in itself, in that here the whole fellowship of the Apostle and of the Christians with the destiny of the crucified and risen Jesus rests on the faith that is the ground of everything, i.e., on the fact that this fellowship is received as a pure gift that one must accept as given out of pure grace. For Paul's Christianity begins in Damascus: he is the one who was not there, the one who was in the camp of the enemies, for whom 'Christ died at the right time, while we were still sinners' (Rom 5.8). Paul can never forget this, in all his 'Christ mysticism' that bestows on him the same form as the suffering Lord, so that the life of Jesus may manifest itself in his mortal flesh (2 Cor 4.11). His time is not identical with the time of Christ.

Only John has dared to cast a bridge over the distance that is held open in the Gospels by the flight of the disciples, and in Paul by faith. He lives so much in the love of the Lord that he knows himself to stand at the place where he is borne away by the Lord over the abyss of the Cross. In the Synoptic Gospels too, women stand far off and see the crucifixion. These women represent and hint at something that becomes full reality in Mary the mother: accompaniment into the absolute forsakenness, in which, in order to be truly present, she herself must be forsaken by the son: 'Behold your son' (Jn 19.26). John too, who must receive the forsaken mother, represents the Church whose centre is Mary—the Church as second Eve, as the loving bride, springing forth from the slumber of the loneliness on the Cross and from the opened heart, out of which flows what is uttermost; John is nowhere more solemn than in his testimony to this event at the extremity. But because the sacraments have their source here, and because the disciples who fled have received communion before the Passion, they too are present, whether they will or not, under the Cross and at the Cross, since they belong to the one body of Christ. John suppresses also the cry of abandonment and the sinking down of the sacrificed Lamb of God into the night; for him, the love that performs everything is so visible that there can never be any doubt of its identity: it is precisely at the point where it goes 'to the end' (13.1) that it becomes most clearly visible as love. But the response of redeemed mankind—Mary and John—is already always taken up into this identity that belongs to love, and has already always flowed out from it: here, in a unique manner, the time of following is determined by the time of Christ. There is no intention to posit a simple identity between the time of Christ and the time of the Church, as is shown in the farewell discourses when they speak of the 'little while' of the intermission in which 'you will weep and lament' (16.18, 20), when Peter is told that he cannot now follow, but will follow later (13.36), and especially in the great prayer that commends to the Father the disciples who remain in the world, while the Son sets out on his journey home (17.11). Thus the continuity remains, and does not break down even in spite of a greater difference.

The grace that radiates forth from the Logos when he is 'raised up'—but raised up on the Cross, as much as raised up into glory—allows the Church characterised by Mary and John to accomplish the accompanying through the hiatus to the other side. Because for John this form of following has the essential character of loving self-giving in faith, the distance between the first generation and the later generations too becomes blurred for him (without being completely dissolved). All later disciples find a kind of archetype for their following in the fact that the first disciples followed: the faith of the later disciples can be a following because, according to John, the following of the first was already faith.[7] The door opens out from John for Ignatius of Loyola and the Spiritual Exercises, where Christian existence is interpreted as essentially a placing of oneself at the disposal of the call and as a following of Christ through all the episodes of his life to the Cross, but also beyond it to the Resurrection (as his appearing in the Church). John himself pronounces blessed 'those who do not see' but only believe, together with 'those who see' (20.29), and he stretches out a hand to those who follow, by transmitting to them 'what we have seen, and touched with our hands, of the Word of life' (1 Jn 1.2f.), in order to establish 'fellowship'. But he makes completely clear the fellowship that those who love and believe have in the destiny of the Lord, in Jesus' prophecies of suffering for the Church (Jn 15.18–16.4); this was already established in the predictions of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels, likewise precisely as a fellowship in destiny that he had instituted. The promise of such a following, that will go as far as suffering, does not eliminate the distance between master and disciples in any of the four Gospels (cf. the floating logion found at Mt 10.24f.; Lk 6.40; Jn 13.16; 15.20); the grace that permits them to be there with him far exceeds the idea of an imitation in the ethical-ascetic realm, and there is nowhere any hint that the disciples ought to strive after, or provoke, persecution and suffering (for the sake of a closer resemblance to the Lord). Once again, Ignatius finds the centre-point, when he sees the ultimate attitude of the disciple, despite all his yearning for the grace to be made like the Lord in suffering too, to lie in an entrusting of the distribution of the properly christological graces of suffering to the free disposition of God (Exercises

---

[7] Schulz, op. cit. (n. 1 above), pp. 137–144.

Nos. 98, 147, 167). As long as this 'detachment' is there, preferring the will of the Lord to one's own programme of perfection, Christian 'following' will not be absorbed into a general ethical 'imitation', however clearly the terminology—of Paul, for example, or of the fathers who were influenced by Greek philosophy—betrays the concept of imitation.[8]

Yet is the great distance between Christ and the Church within the fellowship of suffering sufficiently made visible in Paul and John? In Paul, we have said, everything rests on the faith which creates the distance; this faith means that God has reconciled the world to himself once for all in the Cross of Christ, without the cooperation of any believing human being. But the same faith unites the Apostle—who is called precisely to suffering (Acts 9.16)—to the Lord, so that he can suffer in his own flesh for the Church 'what still remains of the sufferings of Christ' (Col 1.24).[9] Should we refer here to 1 Cor 1.13, 'Or was Paul crucified for you?', and posit a strict dividing-line between suffering that makes satisfaction, which only Christ could perform, and 'edificatory' sufferings, such as necessarily happen to those Christ sends out as his instruments in the continuing world mission?[10] Or is the weakness of such a dividing-line indicated by the ontic unity between head and body (Augustine), or by the real dynamic presence of the Jesus who sends, in those whom he sends?[11] Even here, however, the division is maintained through the consideration that an Apostle or any other Christian who takes the place of Christ performs an act that has validity only on the basis of the act of sending by Christ; and that, further, a participation in the satisfactory suffering of Christ, which is thereby possible, cannot be based upon a lack in the fullness of the suffering of the historical Jesus, but only upon an unfathomable admittance through grace to a share in this fullness. The more intimately a Christian is invited to share in the work of the Lord, the more does he also know that this participation is nothing but incomprehensible grace. For this reason, it is impossible to add head to body in the manner of the parts that make up a complex organism.

---

[8] Schulz is right to observe, 'An explicit identification of the following of Christ with the imitatio of the Lord is, for the entire New Testament, something as yet unknown' (op. cit., n. 1 above, p. 179). One can certainly note a slight transposition in Ignatius of Antioch, when he exults that now, when he is on the way to martyrdom, he begins to be a true disciple (Romans 4.2; 5.3). But he himself did not choose this path, but was set upon it by the Lord. The limitation of the theology of martyrdom in the second century consists rather in a too one-sided equation of the following of the sufferings of Jesus with physical martrydom. This is certainly 'total self-offering' in the old Testament sense of the 'whole burnt-offering', but it does not take account of what is most characteristic of the New Testament, viz. the bearing of the sin of the world. On this theme, cf. N. Brox, Zeuge und Märtyrer [1961].

[9] J. Kremer, Was an den Leiden Christi noch mangelt (Bonner bibl. Beitr. 12, 1956), with bibliography.

[10] Thomas, S.Th. III 48, 5 ad 3: Dicendum quod passiones Sanctorum proficiunt Ecclesiae non quidem per modum redemptionis, sed per modum exhortationis et exempli, secundum illud 2 Cor 1,6: 'sive tribulamur pro vestra exhortatione et salute' (it is to be said that the sufferings of the Saints benefit the church, not indeed in the sense of redemption, but in the sense of

The whole Johannine corpus too proclaims this distance in nearness, as far as is imaginable from a mystical-enthusiastic delirium of the unity in love. Jesus remains the 'lord and master' (Jn 13.14), the only 'king' (18.37); none other than the lamb that was slain stands upon the throne of the Father (Rev 5.6), the lamb who alone accomplishes 'the expiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world' (1 Jn 2.2). Therefore Mary too remains only the handmaid of the Lord, the handmaid to whom everything happens as God disposes.

The dialectic of the beginning of this section remains, therefore: for there is indeed a 'contemporaneity', but only out of the grace of the unique Cross. It is not only the failure of those who historically followed Christ that creates the distance, but the grace of the Cross itself. John is right to conceal the flight of the disciples under a dismissal by Jesus, for he proceeds on the basis of an insight into the ultimate depth, and discloses on the far side of this flight a possibility of being present in faith and love. This is not in the least in exhortation and example, as is said at 2 Cor 1.6, 'if we are afflicted, it is for your exhortation and salvation').

---

[11] Cf. 4 dist. 20 a 3 qla 1, and Quodl. II a 16; Kremer, op. cit. (n. 9 above), pp. 63f., 187f.

dependence on the gnostic concept of an eternal 'syzygy' (of Christ-man and Church-woman), but comes from the contemplation of the glory of the Verbum caro factum, whose 'grace and truth' it is to make those who believe in him children born of God and thus 'co-heirs' (Rom 8.17). The grace of following belongs to the 'glory' of the momentum of the sole Cross.

5. MOMENTUM OF THE CROSS

a. The collision

From the outset, every path that we took directed us to this goal: to the hiatus of the Cross, and to the plumbing of the depths of this hiatus when Hell gapes open. The paths that led from the old covenant demanded an intersection which they were unable to reach by themselves; mere recapitulation of what had already been was insufficient for this. What appeared as 'form' and 'image' in the old covenant must first find its justification on the basis of what was itself not form, but yet was the source of the absolute power to give form.[1] Thus, the form of theology too was predestined: since something that is not a word stands in the midpoint of the Word, theology can never be more than a reflection in words and concepts, never capable of being brought to a close, that concerns itself with this midpoint that can never be completely pinned down; a reflection that takes place in the bosom of the Church, the transcending subject that receives in the Eucharist the Word that expires on the Cross. The fundamental character of this Word itself became visible in the triad of claim, poverty and self-abandonment, since the authority that comes from God was to take effect strictly in the sphere of powerlessness, and more radically still in the handing-over of the entire existence, including its death, into the disposition of God who was to give it form. So deeply was this the fundamental character of Jesus' existence, that it determines the form of its duration: it could only be an existence that was oriented towards the hour of the absolute commission, the hour of his death; every moment of Jesus' existence received its meaning, as he lived it, by looking towards this hour which bestowed the meaning. On a secondary level, the form of this time gave its character to the form of the time both of the Church (with its imminent expectation) and of the individual follower, for whom the time which Jesus accomplished becomes in faith determinative of his existence.

---

[1] See above, pp. 83f.

These four chapters, accordingly, always presupposed the fifth and looked towards it.[2] In this chapter, we must see what kabod, as the momentum of God, means in the New Testament in its most original sense. The material-dialectic images of the kabod of Sinai must reveal their spiritual content here—the core of fire covered in a darkness of clouds or smoke, the menace of the gathering storm, lightning flashes out of the darkness, the earth that rocked. But the rungs of the spiritual 'ladder of obedience' in the Old Testament must likewise make their contribution to the interpretation, by pointing ahead to their goal.

This is to raise the question of where to look for a key to the interpretation of the event of the Cross, whether indeed such a key can exist at all. It is clear from the start that the purely historical narrative of the crucifixion of a man—and one can put together a narrative of the crucifixion that is as objective and cinematically exact as one wills—is a priori never capable of laying down the path that leads to the inner event that is hidden therein. Therefore one is grateful to realise that the Passion narratives of the four Gospels, though beyond doubt also intending to describe an historical event, do this from the start by means of concepts and images that lay out a wide horizon of Old Testament theology, and that they thereby open a path for the history that leads to the only sphere from which a light of understanding can break in.[3] Nevertheless, the concepts and images from the Old Testament cannot be drawn into a synthesis on their own level, and can offer only starting-points and indications of direction for the understanding of the reality which altogether transcends them. These hints are to be considered seriously; they have enough power to encircle the mystery of the Cross in such a way that the lines coming from the Old Testament genuinely intersect each other in the midpoint of this mystery. A lowering and weakening of the momentum that is present in the theology of the old covenant is doomed from the outset to error. The earliest Christian faith grasped this, and sought to interpret the Cross as the point of unity of the converging lines of power, while at the same time showing its transcendence that makes the Cross the starting-point of a new Christian reflexion that can never be finished, because here 'unsearchable riches' (Eph 3.8) lie 'hidden' (Col 2.3). In this earliest reflection of Christian faith, the insight of the Church as the subject which receives the revelation finds an expression which is inchoative, but binding upon those who come later; accordingly, our interpretation of the Cross today is even less at liberty to lower and weaken this normative early Christian understanding than it is to dispense with the Old Testament hints.

---

[2] I repeat here in a shorter form certain matters that I have exposed in more detail in my 'Triduum Paschale' (in: Mysterium Salutis III 2, 1969, printed separately as Theologie der drei Tage, 1969). For the individual points and for a more complete bibliography, cf. this work.

[3] E. Hoskyns and N. Davey, The Riddle of the New Testament (1931) (with bibliography). Art. σταυρός by J. Schneider, TDNT VII, n. 27; K. H. Schelkle, Die Passion Jesu in der Verküdigung des Neuen Testaments (1949), pp. 81ff.

The interpretandum lies securely positioned between these two poles of understanding; if one detaches it from this spiritual force-field, one robs oneself of every approach to understanding it. Here least of all may one 'demythologise', for this would imply abandoning the expressive power of the Old Testament hints and of their rethinking by Paul and in the rest of the New Testament. That which needs the purification of a 'demythologisation' receives it sufficiently in the transcending of the literalness of the Old Testament images, limited to the material sphere, into the higher unity of the event of the Cross which gives them a home. This applies above all to the concepts of sacrifice that come from the Old Testament, which can never attain the identity (of the passiveness of being handed over with the free act of self-giving for the guilty) which is made possible on the Cross, because in the Old Testament what is offered is not human and consequently there remains externally (juridically) a reckoning of guilt. Nevertheless, this does not mean that the Old Testament perceptions of the divine 'wrath' (Rom 5.9 and frequently), 'curse' (Gal 3.13), and '(punitive) judgment' (Rom 8.3), which are taken up by Paul and the whole of the New Testament in speaking of the Cross, are to be represented as superseded, anthropomorphic, and incompatible with the God of love who wills reconciliation (2 Cor 5.18; Col 1.20), for this reconciliation is to take place precisely 'through the death of his son' (Rom 5.10), 'in his blood' (Rom 3.25), in his 'offering for sin' (2 Cor 5.21). The only right approach to the mystery is to see the whole momentum of 'God's wrath' in the Old Testament over the broken covenant as taken up into the far greater momentum of the love of God in the New Testament—the love of the Father, as well as of the Son—and therefore to guard against both extremes, that of interpreting the suffering of Christ as a punitive raging of divine anger against the innocent victim (as the Reformers tended to do), and that of seeing this suffering as merely the manifestation of the superabundance of divine love.

Two things are established in the Old Testament: that God's wrath or displeasure at human sin is never equated with his righteousness. His righteousness, like his holiness, is an enduring predicate of Yahweh and declares his will to accept man into fellowship with him; the 'wrath' is reserved for individual acts of judgment, which exercise a function of this covental will; the punishment passes away, but the blessing endures.[4] For this reason, the revelation of God's righteousness of which Paul speaks may never be interpreted as 'penal righteousness' (as the young Luther thought, laying claim erroneously to the theological tradition to support this); this was rather what Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite, following Origen, called δικαιοσύνη σωστική, 'saving righteousness', a description used likewise by Anselm and by Thomas after him.[5] This goodness of God is revealed in the new covenant as inscrutable love: the love of God the Father, which shows itself in the event of the Cross to be stronger than all the powers of the world (Rom 5.8; 8.32–39; Jn 3.16), and the love of Christ (Rom 8.35; 2 Cor 5.14; Gal 2.20; Eph 5.2), which proves itself in his giving-up of himself for us. This double love is, so to speak, a bracket that includes everything that takes place within it as the event of reconciliation; but this is not to be neutralised and transfigured because of the bracket of love that surrounds it.

---

[4] W. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments I (4th edn. 1950), pp. 124–131 (ET Theology of the Old Testament, I, 1961, pp. 258–269).

[5] Texts in S. Lyonnet, Exegesis Ep. ad Rom. 1–4 (3rd edn. 1963, Rome, Biblical Institute), pp. 88f., 107cd.

In order to see it at its true depth, it is necessary to look back to the further development of the history of the covenant in the Old Testament. In the prophets, there is a vigilant awareness that the day of God's wrathful judgment is drawing near: this takes place in actual fact with the disintegration of the people as a unity of twelve tribes and with the destruction of Jerusalem. Jeremiah and Ezekiel must experience and proclaim the inevitability of the punitive judgment; and Lamentations call in the devastated sanctuary to the God who has vanished and is absent; Job experiences in his own body, during the exile, how the righteousness of God has been withdrawn—without his understanding the sufferings he must endure, his existence symbolises the broken covenant. Judaism never shakes off the suspicion that God did not truly reestablish the covenant after the return of the people from exile: the prophetic proclamation of disaster spreads itself like a gloom over the whole 'old aeon'; all the faithfulness to the law, including Pharisaism, was perhaps only a new and more dangerous kind of breaking of the covenant. Jesus and Paul confirm this suspicion, and draw away the veil: this religion is 'hypocrisy' and a 'whited sepulcre' (Mt 23.27f.), and 'the anger of God from heaven' is 'revealed' against it (Rom 1.18) just as much as against the godlessness of the Gentiles. Indeed, as in Ezekiel the fallen prostitute Jerusalem is worse than her sisters and will be justified as the last of all, after Sodom and Samaria (Ezek 16.44ff.), so will Israel, through whose conduct God's name is blasphemed among the Gentiles (Rom 2.24), have to remain hardened until the full number of the Gentiles has come in (Rom 11.25). Matthew and John have described in dark hues the presence of God's wrath over the faithless people.

This wrath is no 'pretence', but fully real: the categorical 'No' of God's reaction to the attitude that the world takes up over against him. God owes it to himself and to his loving covenantal righteousness to utter this 'No' and to maintain it as long as his will is not done on earth as in Heaven. What could 'the blood of bulls and goats' accomplish here? What could be accomplished by ceremonies of reconciliation that serve only to keep awake periodically the remembrance of sin (Heb 10.4,3)? Already in the old covenant, God had proclaimed that he had no desire for these (Hos 6.6; Amos 5.25 = Acts 7.42f.; Ps 51.18f.), but only for the 'broken spirit, the broken and crushed heart'. But who could submit himself to this wrath, so that it would be quieted? Not the sinner, for he only arouses the wrath, as long as he is a sinner. There remains no other answer than that given by the scripture of the old covenant and the new: the sinless one, who 'had done no violence, and in whose mouth there was no deceit. Yet it was the will of the Lord to bruise him; he has put him to grief; when he makes his soul an offering for sin . . .' (Is 53.9–10). The objectionable element in this idea is that of vicariousness. This is not skirted around in the fulfilment of the new covenant: Jesus is this sinless one (2 Cor 5.21a; Jn 8.46; 1 Pet 2.22), who offers his own soul, i.e. his entire existence ('his blood') as a complete and spotless sacrifice (Heb 7.27; 9.12, 14, 26; 10.10, 12, 14; Eph 5.2).

But why should this be efficacious for all the rest? There is no real help to be had here from a juridical doctrine of imputation (the merits of the pure one are credited to the sinners), nor from a doctrine of physical solidarity (by virtue of the Incarnation, Jesus represents the entirety of human nature before God). The only help is to be had from the New Testament's idea of the divine love that out of love takes upon itself the sins of the world; and this love must have a double character, as the love of God the Father, who allows God the Son to go into the absolute obedience of poverty and self-abandonment where he can be nothing else than the total object that receives the divine 'wrath', and as the love of God the Son, who identifies himself out of love with us sinners (Heb 2.13), and thereby fulfils the will of the Father in free obedience (Heb 10.7). It is clear from the final interpretations in Paul and John that only this double love gives the key to the understanding: it is no juridical or physical law of vicariousness that compels them to faith in what is incomprehensible, but solely the sight of this love and its attractiveness: 'the love of Christ controls us, because we are convinced that one has died for all; therefore all have died' (2 Cor 5.14). They have died in accordance with the power of love; in accordance with the logic of love, they must let it happen and ratify it for themselves. 'By this we know love, that he (vicariously) laid down his life for us; therefore (in accordance with the logic of the same love) we too must lay down our lives for the brethren' (1 Jn 3.16). Imputation and physical solidarity are subordinate individual aspects that are taken up into the synthesis of the unique work of love, which encompasses them and makes use of them. This is possible because God's whole relationship to the world he created—inasmuch as this consists of beings that are physically interconnected, and at the same time stands in a spiritual relationship to the creator—is always included within the brackets of that love which is both double and single.

Within these brackets, as we have said, the aspect of the voluntary self-offering of the guiltless one, indeed his self-sacrificing (Heb 7.28) in the role of a high priest who is simultaneously the lamb of sacrifice (1 Cor 5.7), is not at all sufficient: the 'paschal lamb' is indeed 'slain' (ibid.), but not by himself. When the slaughtering is going on, the lamb can only endure, without opening its mouth (Is 53.7). The poverty that has no means of exercising control over oneself is one with Jesus' obedience in total self-abandonment. That is what the hymn at Phil 2.7 calls kenosis. In this, the one who has abandoned himself can be utterly and completely determined by the will of the Father, who loads on him the burden of the reality that is 'the sin of the world', or the reality that is 'the wrath of God', made concrete in everything that arouses this 'wrath'. 'God . . . had made him to be sin for us' (2 Cor 5.21) can also be translated, seen from the standpoint of Jesus Christ: 'God . . . has made him a (voluntary) sin-offering';[6] but considered from the standpoint of the Father, the other translation, 'has made him to be sin', is nevertheless correct.

Here lies the 'unfathomable' (Eph 3.8) mystery of the Cross, in the momentum of the collision of the entire burden of sin with the total powerlessness of the kenotic existence. No simile in Old or New Testament, drawn from the rituals of sacrifice, can remotely apply to this event. It does not suffice to add on to one another in a list the images for that which God loads on to him, in order to acquire a conception of what the burden is—according to Is 53, these are: scorn, abandonment by men, pains, acquaintance with sickness, being pierced and battered, being mishandled, being led to the slaughter, death in tribulation and judgment, a burial devoid of honour. What matters is that all this is 'loaded on' to him by God. It is not only the alienation from God that is involved in what is taken on, that produces absolute nausea in the one who loves God, who is nourished by God (Mt 4.4; Jn 4.34); the fact that it is God who prescribes what is absolutely opposed to God, awakes absolute dread in him. The experience of Job points in this direction: he experiences both at once, God's utter absence in everything that is loaded on to him, and the yet more terrifying presence of a God who 'hedges him in' (Job 3.23), who 'hunts' him (10.16) and 'hounds' him (10.17); and because the sufferer is in a state of complete powerlessness, he is 'oppressed' by God and 'robbed of his dignity' (10.3). The inconceivable unity of the world's sin and God's will—the world's sin that has turned in on itself in what is the object of God's absolute displeasure, God's wrath that has embodied itself in the world's sin and shown itself to be entirely justified—makes impossible any relationship either to God or to the world. The one who has been abandoned is in utter isolation. But in this solitude, he is not left alone, for 'terrors are turned' actively and aggressively upon him (Job 30.15).

---

[6] R. de Vaux, Les Institutions de l'Ancien Testament II (1960), p. 297; K. Prümm, Diakonia Pneumatos I (1967), pp. 356f.

The true subject who acts on the Cross is therefore God, and the instrument he employs in acting is sin. But the one who was God's Word in the world is dumb. The prophet could still paraphrase his experiences that were the prelude to Jesus' suffering: 'My loins are filled with anguish; pangs have seized me, like the pangs of a woman in travail; I am bowed down so that I cannot hear, I am dismayed so that I cannot see. My mind reels, horror has appalled me; the twilight that I longed for has been turned for me into trembling' (Is 21.3– 4). The crucified is beyond such words; in Mark and Matthew, he forces out only the cry of abandonment and expires with a loud shout (Mk 15.34, 37 par.). The other words from the Cross must be for the greater part interpretations of the situation as the meditating Church recognised this in the illumination love gives.

The momentum of the collision lies beyond the sound-barrier: just as the love of God in creation and election is unfathomable, so is sin, the hate of the world (Jn 15.25). But the abyss of the unfathomable love has entered the abyss of the meaningless hatred and hidden itself there. 'Outside of God, he tasted death for everyone' (Heb 2.9).[7] Here is the truth that fulfils the dreadful image of Ezek 10, where God sends an angel, who has been given a piece of glowing coal from the fire of God's glory, to set fire to the beloved city that is nevertheless abandoned and marked down for destruction. This is the fulfilment likewise of the other image of literal casting away, when Jeremiah instructs Seraiah to utter all the words of cursing against Babylon, and then to tie the book to a stone and to throw it into the midst of the Euphrates with the words, 'Thus shall Babylon sink, to rise no more, because of the evil that I am bringing upon her' (Jer 51.59–64), the image that is found also in Revelation when the angel takes a stone, mighty like a great millstone, and flings it into the sea with the words, 'So shall Babylon the great city be thrown down with violence, and shall be found no more' (Rev 18.21). Here is fulfilled every hint given in the images of obedience in the Old Testament, from the obedience of Abraham on Mount Moriah, who receives the impact of a command that flies in the face of reason and is so obedient that he takes his place on the side of the Father who accomplishes the act, and becomes the archetype of all those who obey utterly and thus receive the authority to command; through the acts of obedience of Moses and the prophets, who see themselves designated and condemned to play the role of a double representation, representing God among men and men before God; to the obedience of the 'voice in the wilderness' and of the handmaid of the Lord, who may be nothing more than thoroughfares along which God's Word and light can travel.

---

[7] On the reading χωρὶς (outside of), rather than χάριτι (by the grace of) θεοῦ (God, cf. Schelkle, op. cit. (n. 3 above), p. 54.

Only in the Cross is the true fulfilment of the paradox that the Son who bears authority, whom God sends to take on flesh as his Word, ceases to be word at the point where he takes on total identity with 'the flesh of sin' (Rom 8.3), in order to be only a free space against which the will of the Father may make its colliding impact. This will 'happens to the Word', but is not itself word. Nevertheless it is precisely now that the Word who has been reduced to silence receives his absolute transparency to the Father, who expresses himself in him in a way without precedent. The whole Johannine understanding of the Logos is marked by this starting-point, and rightly: for the one who bears such extreme suffering cannot be 'the flesh of sin', nor even be human sinlessness, but must be a uniquely suitable medium for this power of the Father as he gives himself expression, a medium that shows itself, in its capacity to bear the burden, to be itself divine. Only God himself can go right to the end of the abandonment by God. Only he has the freedom to do this. The Father shows that this is so, when he raises the Son and elevates him to be the Kyrios over all; but one who receives the dignity that belongs to God must already have possessed this (Jn 17.5), and only renounced the enjoyment of it (Phil 2.6; Heb 12.2). Precisely by disclaiming any word of its own, God's Word demonstrates that it is the 'word of power' of the Father, the 'effulgence of his majesty and expression of his being' (Heb 1.3).

b. Kenosis

If then the collision of God's will in the form of the sin of the world requires not just any subject, but a unique subject that cannot subsequently become God at his 'exaltation', but must always have been God in order to 'become' this, then the decision of a pre-existent divine person, as this is described in the hymn at Phil 2.6–11, is the necessary presupposition of the constituting of this subject. It is certainly correct to observe that the 'doctrine of the two natures' is not the theme that is expressed here, but rather the 'succession of different phases in the continuity of the one drama of salvation',[1] or, as P. Henry says, the temporal succession of 'conditions'.[2] Nevertheless, the subject of the kenosis that is described there, is not the Son who has already become man, but the pre-existent Son. To explain the possibility of such an act, it is not enough to point merely to the content of what is chosen in the 'self-emptying', however much this content is one of the determinative factors of the kenosis: the tradition of the West, like that of the East, has characterised the meaning of the Incarnation unambiguously, and in accordance with Scripture, not as the assuming of creatureliness in se, but as the assuming of the concrete human destiny, that stands under the 'curse' of sin and of the first and the second death. The Incarnation has accordingly no other ultimate purpose than the Cross: in nostra descendit, ut non solum substantiam, sed conditionem naturae peccatricis assumeret; nec alia fuit Dei Filio causa nascendi quam ut cruci posset affigi (Leo the Great).[3] To speak of Incarnation is already to speak of the Cross, as a daring formulation of Bernard shows: 'It is perhaps we ourselves who are Christ's Cross, to which he is fastened: "I am held fast in the miry clay of the abyss" (Ps 69.3), and it is of this that we are formed'.[4] This is true, but does not go far enough. The modern form of this ancient idea, which seeks to explain the genuine obedience of the Son of God through his taking on solidarity with the men whose 'fate' stands under the curse of death,[5] is likewise insufficient, because Jesus is not merely one of those who bear the general destiny, but is the unique bearer of the world's sin, and because the source of his obedience is his unique relation to the Father, not the fact that man is given over to the power of death.

---

[1] E. Käsemann, 'Kritische Analyse von Phil 2, 5–11', in: ZThK 47 (1950), pp. 313–360; quoted from his Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen I (4th edn. 1965), pp. 51–95, at p. 80.

[2] P. Henry, art. Kénose, Dict. Bib. Suppl. V (1957), 7–161 (with bibliography).

[3] [He descended into what was ours, that he might assume not only the substance, but also the condition of the sinful nature; and the Son of God had no other cause of his birth than that he might be able to be fastened to the Cross.] Sermo 71, 2 (PL 54, 387). Further texts in my Theologie der drei TagC (n. 2 of previous section), pp. 17ff.

[4] In vig. nat. sermo 4 (PL 183, 103B). On the theme, cf. J. P. Jossua, Le Salut. Incarnation ou Mystère Pascal chez les Pères de l'Eglise de S. Irénée à S. Léon le Grand (Cogitatio Fidei 28, 1968), where the thesis of a one-sided 'incarnationism' of the Greek fathers, opposed to the Latin fathers' doctrine of the cross, is refuted.

For such obedience, a divine decision must truly be required, a decision that as such implies the 'surrender' of the forma Dei, and therefore we must at least attempt to consider how such a surrender can be possible for the God of whom we cannot postulate any alteration as this is found in creatures, nor any suffering and obeying in the manner proper to creatures. In order to undertake the attempt of such a consideration, it will be necessary to posit an incomprehensible freedom in God that allows him to do more, and to be other, than the creature would suppose of him on the ground of its concepts of 'God'.

Among the fathers, Hilary undertook to ascribe to the divine Son a power to make himself powerless in himself (intra suam ipse vacuefactus potestatem),[6] without forfeiture of his own power, and in freedom. But Hilary's reflections focus too much on the divine 'nature' and its inherent powerfulness; deeper illumination, however, can be awaited only from the starting-point of the personal relationships in God.[7] It is therefore preferable to be guided by some of Bulgakov's fundamental ideas (while avoiding his sophiological excesses), and to take the 'selflessness' of the divine persons, as of pure relations in the love within the Godhead, as the basis of everything: this selflessness is the basis of a first form of kenosis, that lies in creation (especially in the creation of man who is free), for the creator here gives up a part of his freedom to the creature, in the act of creating; but this he can dare to do only in virtue of his foreseeing and taking into account the second and truest kenosis, that of the Cross, in which he makes good the uttermost consequences of creation's freedom, and goes beyond them. In this, kenosis—as the surrender of the 'form of God'—becomes the decisive act of the love of the Son, who translates his being begotten by the Father (and in this, his dependence on him) into the expressive form of creaturely obedience; but the whole Trinity remains involved in this act, the Father by sending out the Son and abandoning him on the Cross, and the Spirit by uniting them now only in the expressive form of the separation.[8] Thus 'the Cross of Christ is inscribed in the creation of the world from the beginning', as this is shown in the Johannine theology of the 'Lamb of God' (Jn 1.29, 36): the Lamb, 'slain before the foundation of the world' (Rev 13.8), stands upon the throne of the Father (5.6), giving pasture to those washed in its blood (7.17), and laying down its life for its sheep as the Lamb-Shepherd (Jn 10.15),[9] and will also become the judge of his own, and of the whole world, in the 'wrath of the Lamb' (Rev 6.16).

---

[5] P. Galtier, 'Obéissant jusqu'à la mort', RAM 1 (1920), pp. 113–145. One remains still within the framework of a contemplation of the condition which is achieved by the act of self-emptying, if one argues that a god could win nothing through the assumption of a human nature, because the created being cannot be added on to the divine being as something extra: as Athanasius says, God 'does not become something better through this act of assumption, but abases himself' (Adv. Arium I 40–41; PG 26, 93CD).

[6] [He himself is made empty, within his own power] De Trin. 9, 41 (PL 10, 314B).

[7] If Hilary's starting-point is thought out to the end, it leads necessarily to almost docetic formulations, which go beyond even John and make the powerlessness of the Cross appear as the proclamation of the divine power and glory. De Trin. 1C, 10 (PL 10, 350AB), cf. Thomas, S.Th. III q 15 a 5 ad 1.

But no necessity, no philosophical law of the structure of the created world, empowers us either to deduce the sovereign freedom of the decision of grace that is the kenosis of God, or to extend it to become a universal law. Again and again the attempt has been made to universalise it in a gnostic sense or an idealistic sense, and to deduce from it the structure of existence, or the alienation of the self and of its overcoming, or the 'die and live' of all life; or else to argue from the laws of human love and the selflessness and poverty that belong to love, to the necessary conduct of God.[10] But only his utterly free love can cause God to create a world and to redeem this world in the most wonderful manner. And even if it is true that the coming to light of the inner-trinitarian mystery in the dispensation of salvation lets us see something of the law of the immanent Trinity, it is nevertheless impossible to deduce from the inner law that this going-forth was necessary. But if the mystery of the divine love is once disclosed in Jesus Christ, then we may argue that God could do what he did in reality do, and that his self-abasement and self-emptying were no contradiction of his own essence, but corresponded precisely to this essence, in a way that could never have been thought of.

---

[8] Bulgakov, Du Verbe Incarné. Angus Dei (French, Paris 1943). On this, cf. P. Henry, op. cit. (n. 2 above), 144–158.

[9] Paul has another panorama: before the foundation of the world (and as one of the determinative factors in this), the work of redemption is proleptically present in the plan, decision and intention of the creator: Eph 1.4–10; cf. Col 1.13–23.

God confirms that he is God 'by entering into the circumscription and the misery of the human creature; he who is lord becomes a servant, and in this he abases himself, unlike the false gods; and the man in Christ Jesus, himself, without loss or limitation of his humanity, is . . . not deified . . . but, in the power of his deity and therefore in the power of God and thanks to the self-abasement of God . . . is the man exalted by God'. In all this, there is 'no paradox, no antinomy, no division' in God; by 'doing such a thing, he proves to us that he can do it, that it is absolutely in his nature to do such a thing. He demonstrates himself then precisely to be more sovereign, greater, and richer than we had thought before'. Everything depends on God's triune love, which alone can explain 'that an act of obedience' need 'not be foreign to God himself'. 'The relationship within the Godhead between the one who rules and commands on high, and the one who obeys in humility, becomes, in the work of the reconciliation of the world with God, identical with the wholly different kind of relationship between God and one of his creatures, a man' (Karl Barth).[11]

[10] Cf. the chapter 'Kreuz und Philosophie' [Cross and Philosophy] in my Theologie der drei Tage (n. 2 of previous section), pp. 40ff., and S. Breton, La Passion du Christ et les Philosophes (Edizioni Eco, Teramo 1954).

[11] Kirchliche Dogmatik IV/1 (1953), pp. 202ff. (ET Church Dogmatics, IV/1,

We may form a notion from this of how God can make good the nothingness into which creaturely freedom sinks and is lost, and how he can penetrate yet further down, through a still deeper 'annihilation' that is deeper precisely because it is divine: the emptiness of love's absolute obedience for the unconditional command, for every use and 'misuse'. But we see at the same time why the humanity of the man Jesus does not need to be identical as such with the absolute suffering of the Cross: for although his existence as a whole is determined by the kenosis of God (as is clearly said at Phil 2.7, and at least indicated at Rom 8.3), he does not himself load on to himself the burden that is destined for this existence—for that would be a flat contradiction of the kenotic condition—but is only ready to let this burden be loaded on to himself in the 'hour' that the Father has determined. It is therefore theologically incorrect to interpret Jesus' life from conception to the Cross as a single maximal suffering[12]—quite apart from the fact that this would not correspond to a true human life, which is a mixture of joy and suffering and, as a Christian life, is carried by faith, love and hope. One must go further: the deepest experience of abandonment by God, which is to be vicariously real in the Passion, presupposes an equally deep experience of being united to God and of life derived from the Father—an experience that the Son must have had, not only in Heaven, but also as a man, even if this does not mean that his spirit must already enjoy a perpetual visio beatifica. Only one who has known the genuine intimacy of love, can be genuinely abandoned (not merely lonely). Nevertheless, pp. 185ff. On the historical doctrine of kenosis, cf. ibid. pp. 196–199, and my Theologie der drei Tage (n. 2 of previous section), pp. 19ff.

---

[12] Thus Thomas Leonardi OP, Christus crucifixus, sive de perpetua cruce Jesu Christi a primo instanti suae conceptionis usque ad extremum vitae [Christ crucified, or Concerning the perpetual Cross of Jesus Christ from the first instant of his conception to the end of his life] (1648), and also Louis Chardon, La Croix de Jésus (1647). On the whole movement in spirituality, cf. F. Florian's introduction to his new edition of Chardon (Paris 1937). Kierkegaard tends towards the same exaggeration in his Einübung im Christentum (1850): the existence of Christ as a whole is uninterrupted suffering, because he is the word of love that must conceal itself, must arouse scandal. (Edn. Hirsch 1955, pp. 131f.).

the kenotic existence of Jesus (as opposed to any other human life which is merely jetsam that makes towards death) was an existence of expectation and of readiness for the 'hour', condensed in the unity of claim, poverty, and self-abandonment. And if it is first in the 'hour' that he becomes a 'martyr', when he 'makes a good confession under Pontius Pilate' (1 Tim 6.13), yet he lives a life that is directed only towards this hour, and is always already martys, 'a witness', through the absolute momentum of his whole existence that is gathered together and directed towards the hour.[13] This is the source of his life in perfect truth, this indeed gives him the power to be himself the truth as a man. This is the source that gives him the power to fulfil the will of the Father all his life, and to represent and interpret this will as it appears in God himself and in history and tradition. This is the source that permits him truly to have a 'teaching' that is yet, at the same time, not his own, for in the immanent Trinity he is the Word of the Father; this teaching will prove itself to be the truth when others put him to the test as he exercises his obedient readiness: 'whoever does the will of the Father will know whether my teaching comes from God, or whether I speak on my own account' (Jn 7.16–17).

It is possible to carry this out, because obedience to God and waiting upon his will belong to the fundamental structure of the creature. Yet this is possible only through Jesus—'without me, you can do nothing' (Jn 15.5)—because Christian fruitfulness comes only from the kenotic readiness of the Son as he looks to the Father who is for him 'the vine-dresser' (15.1). In the communication that is the gift of grace, and goes as far as making the disciples Jesus' brothers (Jn 20.17; Rom 8.29; Heb 2.12), the distance between the one 'master and lord' (Jn 13.13) and the disciples and followers is unrelentingly maintained through all the texts of the new covenant. This would not be necessary, were the kenotic readiness for the will of the Father not of a qualitatively different kind than the readiness of all free creatures; were there no such difference, then the Cross of Christ would be nothing more than the realisation of the purely creaturely attitude to God (as this is seen in Adam, for example) as he assumes the existential conditions of fallen man, who is conscious above all in his dying of 'emptiness, with no way out, that dissolves to nothing, and is devoid of substance'. Jesus could then perhaps 'institute a new existential condition' in the world, but that would still be a very different thing from the vicarious bearing of the collective sin of the world by the single one, from the turning-point of the ages—'the old has passed away, behold, something new has come about!' (2 Cor 5.17).[14] The Incarnation of the Son of God involves his assuming of this pure 'Adamic' act into his own readiness for the Father's will, accomplishing this act more decisively and spotlessly than any other; but this act can institute what God intends only because it is carried and transmuted by the act of the kenotic readiness of the Son for the Father's will, the act that penetrates deeper than every created state and is the foundation of the whole existence of Jesus. Mary's fiat too, uttered vicariously for all and founding the Church as the bride of Christ, is empowered to institute this only by this kenotic fiat of the Son (in the 'pre-redemption' of Mary).

---

[13] Cf. the frequent use of μαρτυρεῖν and μαρτυρία, especially in John.

It is this that determines the Passion, and likewise its prehistory and 'extended introduction' (to use Martin Kähler's term), the life of Jesus, in a qualitative manner. The evangelists may embellish this life in a very distinctive way with unforgettable deeds and words: its fundamental character nevertheless remains its hiddenness.[15] It may be true that the early Church perhaps had recourse to certain ideas of contemporary apocalyptic, in order to 'understand' this hiddenness—e.g., the idea that eschatological secrets, including the Messiah himself, are laid up with God for the end time, to be 'revealed' at the decisive moment. Later (certainly only after the destruction of Jerusalem), there appears the idea that the Messiah lives somewhere on earth unknown—perhaps unknown even to himself—and is to be discovered by someone else at the appropriate time, and installed in his office as Messiah. But neither version can sufficiently encompass the existence of Jesus: for he is not hidden in Heaven, but is on earth; and he is not hidden on earth (to say nothing of his being unknown to himself) in such a way that he should become publicly known to the world later on. It is true that Paul makes abundant use, of the category of the revelation (ἀποκάλυψις) in the end time, through the Church, of heavenly secrets that were hitherto hidden with God.[16] But neither in the Passion nor in the Resurrection did Jesus himself emerge from his essential hiddenness: he leaves the ἀποκάλυψις of his enduring hiddenness to the Spirit and the Church, who can 'reveal' him, interpret him and make him known to the world later on only as the one who is hidden. Thus every recourse to the 'prior understanding' of a hidden Messiah breaks down at the decisive point.[17] [14] Here it cannot be said that K. Rahner's Theologie des Todes (Q. Disp. 2, 1958) reaches sufficient christological depth.

---

[15] On what follows, cf. E. Sjöberg, Der verborgene Menschensohn (Lund 1955), and the section on hiddenness, below, pp. 318ff.

It was extraordinarily difficult for the evangelists to make it clear that the essential hiddenness of the earthly Jesus was the uninterrupted existential condition precisely of his public life as well. For here he preached in a unique manner, he worked many miracles, including sensational wonders; people discussed the puzzling personality and mission of Jesus, and accused him of making claims that were presumptuous; finally, his case was drawn into the realm of politics, and he was executed during the Passover solemnities. All of this had to be portrayed, and yet the hiddenness must be perceptible, for it is theologically fundamental and therefore essential to the portrait. Mark found the motif of the hiddenness of Jesus, which appears also in the material of the Q source, already present in his sources, and gave it sharper emphasis through his theory of the 'messianic secret';[18] through the commands to silence which Jesus issues to the demons[19] and to the men who confess him (although the acclamations remain without consequences, and the prohibitions are violated), through a massive underlining of the disciples' lack of understanding, and finally through the theory that Jesus taught the people in parables so that they should not understand—a theory that directly contradicts the original meaning of the parabolic discourse. In Matthew and Luke, the three motifs which are distinctive in Mark continue to have an effect, but they are diluted by motifs that work in the opposite sense: the authors of the longer Gospels have lost Mark's vital interest in this. It is more important for Matthew that the disciples should understand something of Jesus' teaching; and especially in Luke, the parables are so lucid that it is impossible to speak of a concealing of the truth. Only John takes up Mark's concern, and goes back to the origins in order to express this concern in an interior and enduring fashion. The harsh and immediate dialectic of hiddenness and openness in Mark becomes in the last Gospel a unified insight that is carried through to the end: the one who is revealed remains the hidden one even in his revelation; the light and the life of the Logos are present, but are not recognised by the world; only the disciples, who in John take on the stylised function of the believers from the very beginning, recognise in the hidden Lord the glory that blazes through, even if they grasp something of this only after the resurrection. Only when Jesus' death is imminent is the veil of the parabolic discourse removed for them too (16.29); the path to the exaltation—Cross and Resurrection are both included in this term—is completely hidden as far as the world is concerned ('The world sees me no more'), but is open for the disciples ('You will see me', 14.19). For the world, therefore, nothing at all can be apart from this dialectic; the hiddenness of the Incarnation, of the Cross, and of the Resurrection is maintained, even though the light shines with no covering, and Jesus has 'spoken openly before all the world' (Jn 18.20).

---

[16] Sjöberg, op. cit. pp. 14–27; for the other New Testament writings, ibid. pp. 28–40. Sjöberg is correct to say that the understanding of the gospel as a 'mystery' hitherto hidden and now 'revealed' presupposes the Jewish apocalyptic of Palestine, and does not need to be traced back to hellenistic or gnostic influences.

[17] Sjöberg sees this, when he declares (on the level of historical-critical philology), 'Apocalyptic created the milieu, but in giving form to his own outlook and message, he did not only make use of the apocalyptic ideas, but at the same time gave them a change of form' (p. 189).

---

[18] The fundamental study is W. Wrede's Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (ET The Messianic Secret, 1971). Cf. M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (4th edn. 1961), p. 232 (ET From Tradition to Gospel, 1934, pp. 223f.); H. J. Ebeling, Das Messiasgeheimnis und die Botschaft des Markusevangelisten, Beihefte to ZNW 19 (1939).

[19] The cries of the demons are not confessions, but cries that ward Jesus off. O. Bauernfeind, Die Worte der Dämonen im Markusevangelium, in: BWANT III 8 (1927).

The kenosis which forms the unique character of Jesus' existence, cannot therefore be traced back to anything that is already known and could explain it; because this is so difficult to discover, he becomes continually a skandalon, a 'stumbling-stone'.[20] In Old Testament terms, this is the 'snare' (originally the wood that is laid over snares for animals), the occasion of falling, the contradiction over which one stumbles: the cause of falling in the ethical-religious realm, and parallel to this, the cause of corruption. Because the sole aim of Jesus' existence is obedience, everything that seeks to deter him from obedience is a skandalon for him (Mt 16.23): Peter no less than Satan who tempts him. But Jesus' exposed existence has also the character of a stumbling-block and a snare: 'Blessed is he who takes no offence at me' (Mt 11.6). His preaching arouses scandal (Mt 13.57; 15.12), and far from being able to spare his disciples the decision ('Do you too take offence at this?', Jn 6.61), he must become for them all the occasion of stumbling ('You will all take offence at me', Mt 26.31), as long as nothing more is seen than his kenosis. A crucified Messiah is a contradiction in terms for the Jews (1 Cor 1.23), and therefore he himself provokes them to reject him. But because for Jesus absolutely everything is built upon this one stone, Paul and, after him, the first Letter of Peter can interweave the two passages of Isaiah which call God 'a stone of offence and a rock of stumbling, a trap and a snare' for Israel (8.14), but also, in his Messiah, 'a testing stone, a precious cornerstone, of a sure foundation' (28.16), yet the stone at which 'the builders' took offence, and 'rejected it' (Ps 118.22; cf. Rom 9.33; 1 Pet 2.6–8).[21] Precisely because this stone is unique in its quality as a precious foundation, it becomes a testing-stone—one must decide whether or not to dare to build upon it alone—and thereby a stone of stumbling.[22] The enormity of the situation of scandal is exposed completely by Luke in his proverbial expansion: 'Everyone who falls on that stone will be broken in pieces; but when it falls on anyone, it will crush him' (20.18).[23] Here, the 'horizontal' stumbling is replaced by the momentum of the 'vertical' collision, for the testing-stone retains all the weight. And because Jesus himself is set upon the uttermost consequences of the decision to accept the divine will, he can set those who believe in him only on this path that goes without any protection towards the uttermost; but for this reason, he places himself as a protection before 'these little ones' who have cast their lives upon him: 'Whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in me to stumble, it would be better for him to have a great millstone fastened around his neck and to be drowned in the depth of the sea (Mt 18.6). Paul lets this zeal of Jesus echo forth in himself: 'Who is made to stumble, and I am not indignant?' (2 Cor 11.29).

---

[20] G. Stählin, Skandalon. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte eines biblischen Begriffs, Beitr. z. Förd. chr. Theol., 2nd series 24 (1930). A Humbert, 'Essai d'une théologie du scandale dans les synoptiques', Biblica (1954), pp. 1–28.

[21] It is possible that the Old Testament passages were joined before Paul as testimonia that formed a '(messianic) theology of the "stone"' (Stählin, op. cit., n. 20 above, p. 196).

But it is at the point where the goal and aim of all his previous hiddenness are attained, in the Passion and the death, that the whole scandal offered by the essential hiddenness of Jesus' earthly existence must be condensed and finally become visible. The aim was recognised, even before Paul, to lie in the pro nobis of the crucifixion, and this was chosen by Paul as the midpoint of theology: the 'word of the Cross' (1 Cor 1.18) is essentially a scandalous word (1.23), for it is the 'stumbling block of the Cross' (Gal 5.11) that actually provokes contradiction and yet displays God's 'mysterious hidden wisdom' (1 Cor 2.7) in its seeming folly and powerlessness, the wisdom that in its folly is 'wiser than men' (1.25).

It is on the basis of the Pauline interpretation, therefore, with its exposition of the theological content of the event of the Passion, that the Passion narratives of the Gospels are to be read.[24] They are all projected against the theological background of the Old Testament, and are increasingly subordinate to the reflection after Easter, which sees the redemptive character of the event already shimmering through its judicial character. But one must still be guided by the harshest expressions because Jesus willed out of love to experience only the judicial character, and therefore to renounce everything that would have comforted him and strengthened him, everything that would have made it lighter, so that he might be in kenosis merely a free space for the collision of the sin of the world.

---

[22] The evangelists take over this 'theology of the "stone"' in the summary of Ps 118.22f.: Mk 12.10f.; Mt 21.42; Lk 2.34 (dependent on Is 8.15); 20.17.

[23] Echoing Dan 2.34 (Theodotion), 44; cf. Billerbeck I 877.

The 'hour' of the 'judgment' lies with the Father, not with Jesus (Jn 12.27f., 31), and so the hour of the darkness begins internally, with the 'horror' (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι) and the 'isolating dread' (ἀδημονεῖν, Mk 14.33) that 'knock down to the earth' on the Mount of Olives the one who goes forward into his suffering (Mk 14.35; Matthew weakens this to a prostration in adoration, Luke to a kneeling). In this place, John has the 'consternation', the 'being utterly troubled' (11.33,38; 12.27; 13.21), i.e. the transposition into the condition in which the guilt, so wholly foreign to Jesus, can be assumed by him. Naturally, John interprets this in such a manner that the ultimate anxiety and loneliness are always already illuminated by the fellowship with the Father (16.32), and the majesty remains, capable of controlling things (18.8; 19.26f.), conscious of itself (18.37), and indeed expressed in the fulfilment of the mission (19.30). The 'power of darkness' (Lk 22.53) is a power that is apportioned from above (Jn 19.11).

Against this, the Synoptic Gospels portray on the Mount of Olives the impasse in which there is contained no breadth any longer, but all is concerned with the formal 'my will—thy will'. Everything is reduced to absolute obedience (Phil 2.8; Rom 5.19), which is activated precisely in this formalisation: Jesus is 'the Son', but in 'prayers and supplications, with loud cries and tears', he must 'learn obedience through what he suffered' (Heb 5.7–8), and (if Harnack's textual proposal is correct), 'he was not saved from his dread'. Since what is loaded on to him is, for God, absolutely useless, he himself becomes the one who can no longer be used by anyone or for anything (ἀποδοκιμασθῆναι, 'to be declared useless': Mk 8.31; Lk 9.22; 17.25). Since he bears what is absolutely disgraceful, his death becomes a death in disgrace (1 Pet 2.23; cf. 1 Cor 4.10ff.; Heb 12.2; 11.26).

---

[24] On what follows, cf. my Theologie der drei Tage (n. 3 above), pp. 61ff. Here we give only a summary of the more important aspects.

Thereby he becomes the one abandoned on all sides. The word is found in the prophecies of the Passion (Mk 9.31 par.; 10.33a par.; 10.33b par.; 10.45 par.); he is abandoned 'into the hands of men', or 'of sinners', or 'of the Gentiles'. From the old covenant, the real one who abandons is God, and his abandoning (above all, of Israel) is 'in each case an act of judgment, or an act of the divine wrath'.[25] The one who is handed over in this way is 'abandoned by God', in the truest sense of this phrase; it is no longer God who holds sway over him, but the enemy (cf. 1 Sam 24.5).[26] The human instrument of the abandoning is the traditor Judas, who initiates the earthly game of the betrayals and abandonments that ends with Jesus' condemnation—the delivering by the Christians to the Jews, by the Jews to the Gentiles, by Pilate back to Herod, and finally by Herod to Pilate, who tries a final time vainly to deliver him back to the Jews, but under pressure and threat utters the sentence, but rejects the responsibility that is his own. Even Judas wants to free himself from the noose by giving back the money, but the Jews will no longer accept this for the Temple treasury, and use it for another purpose. No one wants to have been the one responsible, because no one wants to have anything to do with this Jesus. And so Christians, Jews, and Gentiles are in this way 'handed over to disobedience, so that he might have mercy upon them all' (Rom 11.32).

First and foremost, Jesus is the one abandoned by God, and then by all men, acting as instruments within God's act; it is only the later theological reflection that emphasises Jesus' own self-abandonment (a supplement that is correct). This can be seen where the causal διά of the pre-Pauline formula with its parallelism: 'He was given up because of (διά) our sins and raised because of (διά) our justification' (Rom 4.25), is replaced by final clauses, first of all at Mk 10.45b, 'The Son of Man has come . . . to give his life as a ransom for (ἀντί) all' (cf. the use of ὑπέρ: 1 Cor 11.24; Lk 22.19; 1 Cor 15.3; the use of περί at Rom 8.3); and finally the self-giving of Jesus is spoken of (Gal 2.20; Eph 5.2, 25). But this is a 'deed' only in that it is the consent to being handed over. The whole idea can be contained only within the trinitarian context, so that the entire act of judgment remains contained within the love of the Father who gives up (Jn 3.16) and the love of the Son who places himself at his disposal: within the brackets of this love lies the whole momentum of the curse of the sin of the world, which crashes against the one who bears it (Gal 3.13).[27] Inasmuch as this curse leads to death, it is nothing transient, but definitive; no faith or hope can ward off the lethal momentum of the blow; and for this reason, within the unique form of Jesus' time, the experience of such an abandonment can be only an experience in timelessness and definitiveness.

---

[25] Wiard Popkes, Christus traditus. Eine Untersuchung zum Begriff der Dahingabe im NT, AThANT 49 (1967), pp. 23f.

[26] Ibid., pp. 25, 41. Cf. the triple use of the word at the beginning of Romans: 1.24, 26, 28.

There are indeed still words before the human courts, on the way to the Cross, and on the Cross; yet the predominant element is the ever-deepening silence—a silence that brings astonishment (Mk 15.5) and scorn (Lk 23.9ff.), but is based on the pointlessness of further talking (Lk 22.67f.). Jesus becomes the lamb that does not open its mouth on the way to be slaughtered (Is 53.7; Acts 8.32). The great word on the Cross, which is the only word narrated in Mark and Matthew, is the cry to the lost God, whose authenticity is shown by the misunderstanding of those who stand near: 'He is calling on Elijah' (Mt 27.47ff.). The originality of the words, 'I thirst' (Jn 19.28), is probable, because they offer a better motive for the drink of vinegar that is given Jesus than is found in the Synoptic Gospels. It is specifically Johannine: the spring of living water that wells up to eternal life, who wills to give all drink from himself (Jn 4.10,13f.; 7.37f.), is poured out to such an extent that he himself is dying of thirst. The same paradox is expressed in the mockery about the doctor who helped others but cannot help himself (Mt 27.42). The earthly close, which John terms the 'fulfilment' that has been attained, is the giving forth of all that still lies most deeply within Jesus, the central point of this Eucharist of the Cross: the giving forth of the Spirit on the one hand, and of the open and liquefied heart on the other. At Mk 15.37, the Spirit is simply breathed forth (ἐξέπνευσεν; Mt 27.50: ἀφῆκεν); Luke underlines this, when the dying Son accomplishes his deed in the prayer, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my Spirit' (Lk 23.46a, following Ps 31.5); John is more explicit still: 'he bowed his head and gave up the Spirit' (παρέδωκεν τὸ πνεῦμα, 19.30). This is perhaps more a giving to the world than to the Father, as is indicated by the bowed head and by the immediate inbreathing of the Spirit into the Church on Easter day: in Jesus' death, his Spirit is set 'free' (Jn 7.39). At the same time, 'blood and water' are set free in his pierced heart; in John, this is without any doubt understood sacramentally, and is joined with the Spirit to form a triad (1 Jn 5.6,8) that bears witness both to Christ and to the Church that has its birth from him. The place of his heart is open, empty, for all to enter; in this self-emptying, the kenosis has reached its fulfilment. Christ's body is Ezekiel's new Temple, from which the spring of life streams forth (Ezek 47; cf. Zech 13.1; Rev 22.1); and the lifeblood of the slaughtered lamb, hitherto reserved for God alone, will for the future become the nourishment of the new Israel, as distinct from the flesh that is handed over in sacrifice.

[27] That God gives up his Son 'belongs to the most unheard-of statements of the New Testament; we must understand this giving-up in the full sense, and not weaken it to a "sending" or "gift". What Abraham did not need to do, has now taken place: Christ was abandoned to the destiny of death by the Father, with full intention; God has cast him out, beneath the powers of destruction, whether these are called man or death . . . Christ is the one cursed by God; as sinners are cast into abandonment by God (Rom 1.24ff.), so is Christ . . . Here speaks a theologia crucis in utmost radicality; it is truly a rejection that takes place . . . "Christus traditus" means first of all "Christus finitus", an absolute zero point'. Only when this has taken place, can the other pole be emphasised: the self-giving of the Son that goes to the very end. Popkes, op. cit. (n. 25), pp. 286–287.

It is still true that the evangelists understand the Cross as judgment—from different angles, but converging upon the centre of the eschatological judgment—not only as the establishment of God's righteousness (of salvation: δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ), but as krisis. 'Now is the judgment' (Jn 12.31), 'as a judgment that brings to light, convicts and annihilates, through which "this world", the old age, truly ceases to exist and comes to its end—and this is absolutely decisive—at the point of Jesus Christ himself'.[28] It is here that the definitive condemnation of sin (κατακρίνειν, Rom 8.3) takes place. While Matthew shows the solidarity of Jesus with the condemned sinners by depicting him as crucified with the two criminals, Luke shows that the crucified is the one who administers the final judgment, when he separates those on the right from those on the left (23.39ff.). The Synoptic evangelists, especially Matthew, unfold an apocalyptic scenery in cosmic images: in the tearing of the Temple curtain, which (especially in Matthew) can imply in a cryptic manner the end of the old world, since constellations of the stars were woven into the Temple curtain and it was accounted as an image of the cosmos (Philo, Josephus),[29] and in the darkening of the sun, which portrays the world-wide effects of the interior 'hour of darkness', and indeed expresses the mourning of God himself, according to Amos 8.9–10: 'I will darken the earth in broad daylight . . . I will make it like the mourning for an only son'. The other signs too are unambiguously events of the end time: the earthquake, the splitting open of the rocks which follows, then the opening of the graves (i.e., the laying bare of Sheol), and then after the Resurrection of Christ as the 'first-fruits' (1 Cor 15.20) the resurrection of many, who show themselves in the heavenly city, in the new heavenly Jerusalem above (Mt 27.51–53). For John (as already for Paul), the Resurrection of Jesus is indeed a new act of God the Father, but one demanded by the inner logic of the act of judgment on the Cross and to this extent contained within it: so much is this so, that in John the raising up upon the Cross and the raising up into glory are one single event, just as for Paul no one is raised up apart from the one who was crucified.[30]

---

[28] J. Blank, Krisis. Untersuchungen zur johanneischen Christologie und Eschatologie (1964), p. 282.

[29] A. Pelletier, 'La Tradition synoptique du "Voile Déchiré" etc.', RSR 46 (1958), pp. 161–180.

c. Hell

The step from the old covenant to the new, from the temporary to the definitive, from the prophetic to the eschatological, is taken in the 'annihilation' of 'the last enemy, death' (1 Cor 15.26), or, as Paul says with a significant alteration of the LXX text of Is 25.8, when 'death is swallowed up in victory' (1 Cor 15.54; cf. 2 Cor 5.4). The barrier of death—and this means ultimately, the adjustment of the final judgment in accordance with the situation of this life in those judged, the eschatological projection (in the apocalyptic literature) of the prophetical separation of goats and sheep (which, however, could not count as definitive, because of the prophecies dealing with salvation and with the remnant)—was for the theology of the Old Testament, the boundary that could not be crossed over, the boundary that gave occasion for the perpetual rebellion against this living.[1]

The Old Testament 'God of the living' was, of course, not limited by the world of the lifeless, for he possessed the power to lead down to Sheol and to lead up again, and retained a mobility over against all that was opposed to him that could not be held down, but pressed always forward.[2] But this mobility could find its conclusion only in the 'descent' of God, under the form of the dead man Jesus, to the lowest rung of the 'ladder of obedience'.

---

[30] J. Blank, op. cit. (n 28), pp. 289f. Criticism of W. Thüsing, Die Erhöhung und Verherrlichung im Johannesevangelium, in: NTAbh 21, 1–2 (1960), who too strongly distinguishes two phases (first exaltation, then glorification).

[1] Cf. III/2,1, pp. 313-316. On the basis of this closing situation of the old covenant, a theology of double predestination is understandable. For Qumran, cf. 1QS 3.18; 4.18; on this, K. G. Kuhn, ZThK 47 (1950) pp. 192f.; 49 (1952), pp. 296f; also Bousset and Gressmann, Religion des Judentums im späthellenistischen Zeitalter (3rd edn. 1926), pp. 257f.; P. Volz, Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde (2nd edn. 1934), pp. 272–319.

[2] III/2,1, pp. 204-208.

Every man who sins dies, and falls into the power of death. The classic theology of the Old Testament[3] characterises this death as the loss of the living relationship to God; it is this basic perception that sharpens the images, widespread in the history of religions, that portray the realm of the dead ('Tartarus', 2 Pet 2.4; 'Hades', Rev 1.18; a prison, Jude 6) as a realm of (eternal) darkness, as 'dust', 'silence', an existence without strength,[4] without activity, without enjoyment, without knowledge of what takes place on earth, without praise of God, without return, an existence in nothingness and oblivion.[5] Paul summarises this definitive lot of guilty mankind in the statement (which is endebted to Jewish theology), 'All have sinned, and have lost the glory of God' (Rom 3.23).

If the kenosis, and the form of Jesus' existence in claim, poverty, and self-abandonment that is based upon the kenosis, made possible the bearing of the sin of the world, this act of bearing can be accomplished only in solidarity with the death that is the lot of all. In the Cross, as the consequence of the Incarnation, the 'journey to the dead' already lay implicit, as the burial of the body and the going of the dead soul to the other dead: ut per utrumque fratribus suis similaretur (Thomas).[6]

---

[3] And it is on the basis of this theology that we must approach our consideration of the New Testament at the decisive point. The speculations which forced their way into late Judaism under Persian and hellenistic influences, concerning a differentiation of Sheol according to punishment and reward for behaviour on earth, are significant in their place, and can be traced on the margins of the New Testament too; it is significant that this should be so in Luke, in the parable about Lazarus (16.19–31) and in the word of the good thief (23.43). But both 'paradise' and 'Gehenna' remain polyvalent, and receive their theological unequivocalness only through the event of Holy Saturday. The Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, and Kings know of no differentiation of destinies after this life.

[4] The dead are called refā'īm, the 'powerless', Is 14.10.

[5] Documentation of the various characteristics named in J. Nelis, art. Totenreich, in Haag, Bibellexicon (2nd end. 1966), 1773f., with bibliography.

[6] [That through both, he might be made like his brethren], In 3 Sent d 22 p 3 a 1; cf. Expos. symb. a 5 (Spiazzi Nr. 926, 930). For everything that Since the momentum of the Father's will, which loaded the world's guilt on to Jesus' kenotic fiat, in the truest sense 'crushed' the sufferer (Is 53.10), we have here no active descent—far less, a triumphant descent to take possession, or even only a descent that is a struggle in battle; we have only, in this 'sinking down' into the abyss of death, a passive 'being removed'.[7]. This is indicated also by the sign of Jonah, when this is interpreted of the triduum mortis.[8] The complete disarming of the principalities and powers (Col 2.14f.), the finally effective breaking into the house of the strong man, in order to bind him in chains (Mk 3.24f.), the robbing of the 'gates of hell' of their power (Mt 16.18)—all this can take place only from within, in participation in the absolute passivity of being dead; it is only thus that the one who is exalted could attain possession of the 'keys of death and of the underworld' (Rev 1.18). The obscure text 1 Pet 3.18–20 also truly speaks of a being of the dead Christ with the dead (physical death and spiritual death are inseparable here), and the 'proclamation' (ἐκήρυξεν) of salvation there is nothing other than the gospel which becomes objectively present in the world of the dead through the event itself, and thereby is made known.[9]

When he takes on this solidarity with sinners, in their most extreme condition, Jesus carries the Father's saving will out to the end. It is an absolute obedience that reaches out beyond life and stands the test precisely in the place where otherwise follows, I refer here once for all to my Theologie der drei Tage (n. 2 of section 1 of this chapter), where the theme is discussed in detail, with evidence, in the section of the 'journey to the dead'.

---

[7] Although 1 Pet 3.19 employs an active phase, πορευθεὶς.

[8] The logion was originally without interpretation (Mt 16.4); its interpretation in the light not only of the preaching of the prophet in Nineveh (Mt 12.41; Lk 11.30, 32) but also of his three days in the belly of the monster (Mt 12.40) may be due to reflection, but is appropriate, for the decisive matter about Jonah is not his preaching (which makes him like the other prophets), but his unique fate. The genuine logion of Jesus, 'And something greater than Jonah is here' (Mt 12.41 = Lk 11.32), can refer only to this.

[9] For a closer analysis of the text and a marking of the boundaries separating this from other interpretations, cf. Theologie der drei Tage, op. cit. (n. 6 above), pp. 110f.

only coercion and servitude reign. If we use our earlier terminology, we may say that on the far side of the boundaries of earthly existence, Jesus' authority and poverty, but also his self-abandonment, exist no more, but are comprised within his obedience; but this is possible only if the whole structure of his being and his time is built upon the foundation of the free act of obedience that is his kenosis. In this deeper sense (not in a psychological sense), he is inter mortuos liber, 'free among the dead' (Ps 87.6 LXX). He is bound, in powerlessness: but this is due to his own free obedience, the only obedience that deserves to be called 'the obedience of a corpse' in the theological sense. Thereby, with the removal of the whole superstructure of the Incarnation, the eternal will of the Son within the Trinity to obedience is exposed, as the substructure that is the basis of the entire event of the Incarnation: and this is set face-to-face with the hidden substructure of sinful existence, exposed in Sheol, as the state of separation from God, the 'loss of his glory'.

Now it is precisely this face-to-face confrontation between the 'naked' God and 'naked' sin that shows that Jesus' solidarity even with the utter lostness of sinners presupposes the uniqueness of his condition: the 'inclusive quality' of his being with the dead rests upon something 'exclusive' that he alone possesses.[10] This is recognised most easily if one reflects on the fact that the condition of Sheol is theologically indeterminable. A distinction between Hades and Hell, i.e. between a 'temporary poena damni'[11] and a 'definitive poena damni', has no meaning, because the first leaves room for hope (and thereby for faith and love), and so cannot in the least be termed poena damni. But if the spiritual light of faith, hope and love can exist in Hades (something unknown to the classic theology of the Old Testament), then this light can be shed only by the future, by the redemption brought by Christ; this light can then have proleptically softened the true lostness to something else, and can have redeemed it. This dialectic leads to a merely 'conditional' state of Sheol: tenebantur debito damnationis aeternae, non quod eis aeterna fuerit, sed quod eis aeterna fuisset, nisi mors Christi eos ab hoc debito absolveret Richard of St Victor).[12] And in that case Nicholas of Cusa is correct to deduce that Jesus was the only one who suffered the complete poena damni for all, just as he expiated alone all sin on the Cross; and as the eschatological abandonment by God passed over already on the Cross into what is timeless, so on Holy Saturday this abandonment by God becomes definitively timeless in Jesus' being truly dead, in the loss of all the spiritual lights of faith, hope and love.

---

[10] On this terminology, cf. P. Althaus, 'Das Kreuz Christi', in: Theologische Aufsätze I (1929), p. 41.

[11] [punishment of loss] Pohle-Gierens, Dogmatik III (3rd edn. 1937), p. 660.

Nicholas of Cusa speaks of an 'interior view of death' (visio mortis) 'by force of immediate experience' (via cognoscentiae), and he sees in this the 'most complete punishment'. Thus 'the suffering of Christ is the greatest that can be thought of; it was like the suffering of the damned who cannot be damned any further, that is to say, it went as far as the punishment of Hell' (usque ad poenam infernalem). Jesus went to this point, 'in order to show that one must obey the Father to the uttermost torment. This means to praise and glorify God in every way possible, for our justification'.[13] Luther, and especially Calvin, followed Nicholas of Cusa in this interpretation; it was in particular Calvin who underlined the theme of obedience, and drew together the entire abandonment by God in the Passion, from the Mount of Olives through Calvary to Holy Saturday, into a single (if insufficiently differentiated) event. In Calvin, moreover, the 'brackets' of the trinitarian love are lost to sight, so that the idea of the 'severe vengeance of God' (divinae ultionis severitas) takes on one-sided prominence.[14] Nicholas of Cusa's keyword is better: obedience; naturally, this is an obedience that lies beyond the limits of what is possible to man upon earth, as the most absolute proclamation to the world of God's disposition of love.

---

[12] [They were held fast by the debt of eternal death, not because it was eternal for them, but because it would have been eternal for them had not Christ's death absolved them from this debt] De potestate ligandi atque solvendi 19 (PL 196, 1171).

[13] Excitationes, Book 10 (Basel edn. 1565), p. 659.

[14] Texts in my Theologie der drei Tage (n. 6), p. 120.

Here, and only here, does the New Testament concept of 'Hell' emerge from the Hades of the Old Testament. In various ways, it is a christological concept; first, inasmuch as only the dead redeemer, by virtue of his kenosis, has experienced the full seriousness of what Sheol must be; second, inasmuch—again by virtue of his kenosis—as his abandonment to death by the Father was a unique abandonment that was determined upon within the Trinity; third, inasmuch as in this visio (secundae) mortis the whole fruit of the redeeming Cross was seen together. That is to say, sin in its 'pure state' separated from man, 'sin in itself' in the whole formless, chaotic momentum of its reality, was seen by Jesus; and with it, the 'remainder' that could not be absorbed into the Father's work of creation, because he had left man freedom to decide for or against God—the unfinished part of the creation, that it was left to the incarnate Son to finish; and the Son, obedient to his mission, is led by the Father now into the state of existence of this sin that 'remains'. Descendit ad inferiora terrae, id quod erat inoperatum conditionis visurus oculis (Irenaeus).[15]

In this sense, the Son therefore contemplates his own work too in what is absolutely opposed to God, in an objective 'triumphal procession' (Col 2.15) that is as far remote as possible from any sentiment of victory. It is 'glory' in the uttermost opposite of 'glory', because it is at the same time blind obedience, that must obey the Father at the point where the last trace of God seems lost (in pure sin), together with every other communication (in pure solitariness). Fourth, then, Jesus becomes the true possessor, through his own experience, of what 'Hell' means in the New Testament; he becomes the judge who has measured out all the dimensions of man in his own experience, and now can assign to each his lot eschatologically. And thus it is from this point that we see the emergence of concepts of Hell, purgatory and Heaven, which for the first time are theologically meaningful.

Hell was necessarily the fate of man, where he had recognised this vicarious deed of God but consciously rejected it; anyone who has received the fullness of the goods of the end time and 'tasted them', yet 'falls away again', 'cannot possibly again attain repentance', and 'his end is to be burned' (Heb 6.4–8; cf. 12.25f.). Purgatory must be a possibility for man, inasmuch as, through the vicarious suffering of lostness, an impulse of mercy has been commingled with the eschatological 'fire' of God that tests men (1 Cor 3.12f.); Origen rightly stresses this again and again.[16] Heaven must be a possibility for man, in that precisely this uttermost separation of the incarnate Son from the Father also immediately implies his return (as John saw), viz. the laying bare of the immediacy between them in the dispensation of salvation; so great is this immediacy that the journey into the furthest depths of Hell can change timelessly in the absolute instant of the Resurrection into the uttermost intimacy of Heaven. The breakthrough of which the Letter to the Hebrews continually speaks (9.11f., 24; 10.10, 12, 20) is the breakthrough both into the absolute depth (the death of the one who leaves the inheritance, 9.16) and into the absolute height ('life without end', 7.3, 28). It is by this that principalities and powers of fate, which keep man subordinate, are absorbed into the realm of grace and freedom, and 'made ineffective' (1 Cor 2.6; 15.24ff.; Heb 2.14).

---

[15] [He descended to the lower parts of the earth, to see with his eyes that part of creation which was inactive] Adv. Haer. IV 22, 1 (PG 7, 1047A).

Yet this act of seizing fate and destiny, and wrenching them out of their axes, takes place in the deepest silence of death. The Word of God has become unheard, and no message forces its way upwards to speak of its journey through the darkness: for it can do this only as not-word, as not-form, through a not-land, behind a sealed stone. And this 'doing' itself is no longer active, but is only something that is done. So all the traces that the living Word of God left behind on earth are as it were wiped out; the soul that comes back from the untraceable land, the body that rises from the sealed grave, is 'no longer Christ according to the flesh', but 'a new creature'. The old is past: behold, the new has come!' (2 Cor 5.16f.).

---

[16] Texts in my selection, Origenes, Geist und Feuer (2nd edn. 1952), pp. 452–493. It has been shown in my Theologie der drei Tage (n. 6 above), what contradictions result from the supposition of a pre-Christian purgatory (op. cit., pp. 127f.).

II VIDIMUS GLORIAM EIUS

1. THE REQUEST FOR GLORIFICATION

In what follows, we shall be principally concerned with the use in the New Testament of the terms 'glory' (116 times) and 'to glorify' (more than 60 times).[1] There is a certain kind

[1] On the Old Testament, see III/2,1, p. 33, and (for the LXX) p. 50. Additionally, see: G. R. Berry, 'The Glory of Jahve and the Temple', JBL 56 (1937), pp. 115–117; E. F. Harrison, The Use of Doxa in Greek Literature with special reference to the NT, University of Pennsylvania 1950; L. H. Brockington, 'The Greek translator of Isaiah and his interest in ΔΟΞΑ', VT 1 (1950/1), pp. 23–32; R. Duplacy, 'L'Esperance de la gloire de Dieu dans l'AT', Bible et Vie Chrét. 8 (1954/55). pp. 40–53; L. H. Brockington, 'The Septuagintal Background of the NT use of Doxa', in: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot (1955), pp. 1–8.
On the Synoptics:
See the bibliography given below for the section on the transfiguration.
On Paul:
C. Corssen, 'Paulus and Porphyrios. Zur Erklärung von 2 Kor 3,18', ZNW (1920) pp. 2–10; J. Goettsberger, 'Die Hülle des Moses nach Ex 34 und 2 Kor 3,' Bibl.Zt. (1924), pp. 1–17; M. Morgenstern, 'Moses with the Shining Face', HUCA 2 (1925), pp. 1–28; G. H. Boobyer, Thanksgiving and the Glory of God in Paul, Heidelberg 1929; L. Champions, Benedictions and Doxologies in the Epistles of Paul (1935); J. Dupont, 'Le chrétien, miroir de la gloire de Dieu d'après 2 Cor 3', RB 56 (1949); M. Carrez, 'Souffrance et Gloire dans les épîtres pauliniennes', RHPh 31 (1951), pp. 343–353; R. Bavalcado, 'La gloria de Dios seg. S.P.', Virtud y Letras 12 (1953); R. Bavalcado, 'El Segnor de la gloria', Virtud y Letras 13 (1954); O. Kuss, Der Römerbrief II (1959), excursus on doxa, pp. 608–618; H. Schlier, 'Doxa bei Paulus als heilsgeschichtlicher Begriff', Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus cath. 1961 (Rome 1963), pp. 43–56, also in Besinnung auf das NT (1964), pp. 307–318; M. Carrez, De la souffrance à la Gloire. La ΔΟΞΑ dans la pensée paulinienne (Neuchâtel 1964); H. Schlier, 'Das, worauf alles wartet. Eine Auslegung von Römer 8, 18–30', in Interpretation der Welt (Festschrift for Romano Guardini, 1965), pp. 599–616.
On John:
G. P. Wetter, 'Die Verherrlichung im JoEv', Beitr.z.Rel. Wiss. 2 (1914/15), pp. 32–113; B. Botte, 'La gloire du Christ dans l'Ev. de S. Jean'. Quest. liturgiques 12 (1927), pp. 65–76; R. B. Lloyd, 'The Word "Glory" in the Fourth Gospel', Exp.T. 43 (1931/32). pp. 546–8; H. L. Pass, The Glory of the Father. A Study in S. John 13–17 (1935); A. Charme, 'Vie, Lumière et Gloire chez S. Jean', Collat. Namurcenses (1935), pp. 65–77, 229–241; E. Percy, Untersuchung über den Ursprung der joh. Theologie (1939); T. Jänike, Die Herrlichkeit des Gottessohnes. Eine Einführung in das JoEv. (1949); J. Dupont, Essais sur la christologie de S. Jean (1951), IV: La gloire du Christ, pp. 235–293; T. Crisan, De notione Doxa in Ev.

of detached exegesis which is keen to understand the astonishingly broad diffusion of this word through all the writings and layers of the New Testament from a syncretistic standpoint, or as the mechanical adoption of various meanings drawn from the Old Testament and Jewish apocalyptic;[2] we, however, will seek to understand it by relating it to the centre of the New Testament event of salvation itself. To put this in other words: 'glory' here has a meaning, distinctive and unique yet at the same time transforming and integrating everything that went before, and bringing it to completion, a

---

St. Johannis in luce VT (Rome 1953); W. Groussow, 'La Glorification du Christ dans le 4^{e} évangile', Ev. Jean', Etudes Bibl. III (1958), pp. 131–145; W. Thüsing, 'Die Erhöhung und Verherrlichung Jesu im JoEv.' NtAbh 21, 1–2 (1960), with bibliography; W. Thüsing, 'Herrlichkeit und Einheit. Eine Auslegung des Hohenpriesterlichen Gebetes', Die Welt der Bibel (1962); F-M. Braun, Jean le Théologien III (1966), pp. 195–240.
On 1 Peter:
J. Stimpfle, Das christliche Leben als Verherrlichung Gottes nach dem 1. Brief des hl. Petrus, Diss. Rome (1951).
On Revelation:
F. van der Meer, Maiestas Domini. Théophanies de l'Apocalypse dans l'art chrétien (Rome 1938).
General:
H. G. Mecham, 'Old Words with New Meanings. A NT Study', Bible Translator 4 (1954), pp. 4–7, 71–74; Z. Alszegy and M. Flick, 'Gloria Dei', Gregorianum 36 (1955), pp. 361–390; R. Duplacy, 'La gloire de Dieu et du Seigneur Jésus dans le NT', Bible et Vie chrét. 9 (1955), pp. 7–21; Bibeltheologisches Wörterbuch ed. J. B. Bauer, art. 'Herrlichkeit' (G. Molin); Theol. Begriffslexikon ed. L. Coenen, art. 'Ehre'/δόξα, τιμή (Aalen); TWNT art. δόξα (von Rad, G. Kittel); RGG 3rd edn., art. 'Herrlichkeit Gottes' (Fascher, Hesse).
On history of word, liturgy and theology:
W. Matzkow, De vocabulis quibusdam Italae et Vulgatae christianis (Berlin 1933), pp. 47f.; L. Turrado, Doxa en el Evangelio de S. Juan según S. Cirilo de Alejandria, Diss. Rome (1939); C. Gombos, Theologia Claritatis apund S. Augustinum. I, De claritate Christi, Diss. (typewritten) Rome (1940); M. Steinheimer, 'Die Δόξα τοῦ Θεοῦ in der röm. Liturgie', Münch. theol. St. II, 4 Systemat. Abt. 4 (1951); A. J. Vermeulen, The semantic development of Gloria in early Christian Latin (1956); M. Heghmans, Gloria Dei. Ein biblisch-theologischer Begriff nach den Schriftkommentaren des hl. Thomas von Aquin, Diss. Rome (1958).

[2] An example of this is the article 'Ehre' in the Theol. Begriffslexikon zum NT, I (1965f.), 204–210, by Aalen. Cf. L. Toussaint, art. 'Gloire', DTC VI/2, col. 1392: 'mêmes sens et mêmes acceptations' (in both the old and new covenants).

meaning that must disclose itself immediately out of the momentum shown in God's act in Jesus, a meaning that must be nothing else than the self-interpretation of this momentum. Our path goes from the centre out to the periphery: if one takes the path in the opposite direction, establishing statistically everything in the New Testament that receives the title 'glory', one will never find the true centre, and the individual traits will never unite to form a face. Yet all these traits hang together, and are indeed 'only artificially to be delimited from each other'.[3]

Three things must be borne in mind here. First, the already existing meaning of the concept, and its application to God.[4] Every living being, and above all the free person, achieves for itself a sphere of power in its own environment, so that in this it may exercise control, may make itself known and appear; this powerfulness or importance (gravitas) merges in the physical-moral sphere into esteem, acknowledgement and praise, and, in a world of beings that are both intellectual and sensual, this radiance is always both intellectual and perceptible to the senses. If the concept is transferred to the absolute and unique 'I' of God in his free manifestation in the world, this importance, this praise and its intellectual-cum-sensuous manifestation become absolute majesty; this demonstrates itself in God's creation as a whole (thus, following the Old Testament, Rom 1.20,23), and likewise in God's personal self-utterance in his deeds of salvation, which find their unsurpassable height in Jesus Christ (hence the 'δόξα of the gospel', 2 Cor 4.4, which is based ultimately in the δόξα of Christ, 2 Cor 3.18, the 'Lord of glory', 1 Cor 2.8; just like Christ himself, this glory can appear in its fullness only eschatologically). If one wished to fix approximate labels to the stages of the manifestation of the one indivisible glory of God, one could term the proclamation of the divine δόξα in the creation his 'character as ruler', the proclamation in Christ and in the gospel his 'majesty' or 'sublimity', and the eschatological proclamation his 'glory' in the truest sense of the word. But these nuances cannot be kept separate from each other, either in matter of fact or on the conceptual level, for God is one in all that he does, and, as this one, he is always incomprehensible.

---

[3] G. Kittel, art. δόξα (TDNT II 247). W. Groussow says appositely of the fundamental concepts in John (including δόξα, 'They seem to possess a kind of elasticity that makes possible a sliding of thought.' 'It would be false to think one could establish their meaning on the basis of one or two texts': 'La glorification du Christ dans le 4ᵉ Evangile', in L'Evangile de Jean, Rech. Bibl. III (1958), p. 133.

[4] III/2,1, pp. 31-36.

This is the second consideration that must be borne in mind. We have seen how, philosophically, the 'beautiful' presented itself as a transcendent property of being that governs all that exists;[5] now, on the level of theology, the 'ruling, sublime, glorious' demonstrates itself to be a property of the ground of being—God—present in everything that exists and necessarily transcending every definition in categories. 'Doxa' as a statement about God is therefore 'in fact more than a concept: it is an original cipher',[6] 'because the doxa transcends all speech and every word'.[7] On the one hand, it can hold sway over all the works of God, while shining out more brightly at certain points than at others, (cf., for example, what is said about the stars at 1 Cor 15.40f., or about man and woman at 1 Cor 11.7); On the other hand, doxa can encircle God's self-revelation and make its voice heard in very many different ways, for it would not be a statement about God unless it were the expression of his hiddenness just as much as the expression of his manifestation, possessing dimensions enough to make itself known in Cross and death just as much as in Resurrection and 'return in glory'. The message of the New Testament, transcending all the statements about glory in the Old Testament, is precisely that God's glory can embrace 'transcendentally' even these uttermost contradictions, and so need not be brought to a halt before Sheol. In so far as doxa is a theological transcendentale, it necessarily has something in common with the philosophical transcendentalia of being (the one, the true, the good, the beautiful): namely, that it exists in an indissoluble perichoresis with these, such that everything that is theologically true is also good and glorious, and everything that is glorious is so to the extent that it is also good and true; for God himself is the original One, and all his self-manifestations bear the seal of this unity. Therefore too all dogmas are only aspects of the one, indivisible, good and beautiful truth of God.[8] [5] See Vol. IV, pp. 19ff.

---

[6] H. Schlier, 'Das, worauf alles wartet', Festschrift for Guardini (1965), p. 600.

[7] Ibid., p. 611.

It is, however, the third consideration that is genuinely decisive. What God's glory in its good truth is, was to be revealed in Jesus Christ, and ultimately in his absolute obedience of Cross and Hell. The unique ray of the divine majesty of love is to become visible from the unique momentum of this event, establishing the norm for everything that can lay claim to the predicate 'glorious', at whatever distance and periphery it may be. From here sentence and judgment are passed on everything that calls itself δόξα in the sphere of creation and in the sphere of revelation, whether it be in the Old Testament, or Jewish, or hellenistic. Inasmuch as the central event, Christ's obedience unto death, is no myth but the final self-revelation of God in history, all other glory is 'demythologised' by it, as far as this is necessary. But on the other hand, inasmuch as this event, which reveals the depths of the divine love, must be named a mystery, it cannot be reduced to a one-dimensional concept: therefore, the most various nuances of 'glory' can integrate even contradictions into the statement as a whole, as with the contradictions between Paul, for whom the earthly time of Jesus (as σάρξ displays no 'glory', and John for whom this is certainly already 'glorious', as the depiction of the eternal love of the Father. In the same way, it is possible to hold together from the theologically unified point of reference the nuances of meaning in John (which 'split apart from each other in an almost intolerable manner'),[9] which resist the attempt to render them by a single term.

---

[8] Rom 1 can show this as an example in advance (for we shall come back to this later on): the revelation of God in the creation is described here equally as the 'recognisable openness' of his 'power and divinity' (1.19–20), as 'recognised righteousness' (1.32), and as similarly recognisable 'glory' (1.23). It is always the same God as he is revealed, who is contemplated first from the gnoseological point of view, then from the ethical point of view, and finally from the aesthetic point of view.

Accordingly, in what follows we must look first to this centre, to the event in which the absolute momentum interprets itself as absolute glory, as the appearing of the divinity of God.[10] From the mid-point, we shall then obtain the breadth and thereby understand what Christianity truly is. Everything that appears radiates from the mid-point of absolute inconspicuousness—as Augustine says, it is radix de terra sitienti.[11] It is precisely the 'powerfulness' in the doxa of God that shines forth from the complete powerlessness. In order to see this, we begin with the final interpretation of doxa in the New Testament, that of John, which gives us the key for the theological unity of the 'cipher'.[12]

a. Father, glorify me

Hitherto we have seen the Son as the one sent by the Father (hence the claim he makes upon men, 7.28; 8.42), who however carried out his mission in poverty and in a self-abandonment that included death, and thus in a unique obedience that is described in Phil 2 as kenosis, and in John as the fulfilling of the ἐντολή, (command: 10.18; 12.49–50; 15.10), as total renunciation of his own will (5.30; 6.38), renunciation of acting in his own power (5.19; 8.28) and of speaking and proclaiming on his own authority (12.49; 14.10); hence this is termed a unique and incomparable 'descent' (3.13).[1] This event comes to 'fulfilment' (19.28, 30) in 'his hour' (7.30; 8.20; 13.1) of 'drinking the cup' (18.11) in 'agitation of soul' (12.27), and thereby discloses its full truth: at this point, the one who has been handed over 'to the end' (13.1) is least able to 'do anything of himself' (5.19). In order to reveal what his absolute powerlessness truly is, Jesus, as the one crushed by the momentum of obedience, depends on another revealer. Christ did not 'snatch' his dignity 'for himself', did not glorify himself (Heb 5.5); this is true even when the obedience unto death—as the 'glorification of the Father'—is one with the glorification of the Son by the Father in an interior, indissoluble unity; that is to say, the statement of Hebrews remains true even though there exists an a priori synthesis between the two 'glorifications' that is based ultimately on the unity of the trinitarian act and being. The 'claim'[2] that lies in the obedience is made by the Son in no other form than that of petitionary prayer.[3] One may, however, say that it is the inner nexus binding his obedience with his glorification—a nexus the necessity of which is the [9] G. Kittel, art.cit. (n. 3 above), 248.

---

[10] 'For St. Paul the most sovereign thing in God, divinest in the Divine is the sacrificial sin-bearing love revealed in the Cross. God's glory is displayed in His mercy.' R. Law, art. 'Glory' in Hastings, Dictionary of the Apostolic Church I 452.

[11] [A root out of dry ground] Sermo 44, 1–2 (PL 38, 258–259).

[12] According to R. Schnackenburg (LThK 2nd edn., V, 1104), the Johannine writings are 'the most mature witness to Christ in the Early Church'.

[1] For the establishing of parallels between Paul and John, cf. W. Thüsing, Die Erhöhung und Verherrlichung Jesu im JoEv, NtAbh 21, 1/2 (1959), pp. 222f. E. Käsemann's criticism ('The decisive mistake of Thüsing's interpretation must be his total orientation on the scheme of Phil 2.6ff.', Jesu Letzter Wille nach Johannes 17, 1966, p. 25, n. 13) ET The Testament of Jesus, 1968, p. 10, n. 13) is itself dictated by his gnosticising interpretation of John's Gospel. The two interpretations of the event of Jesus as the obedience of the pre-existent one—given expression in different categories in Paul and in John—guarantee the deepest theological unity (to be presupposed in the case of every New Testament theology) of the Church's understanding of this event.

---

[2] The 'I will' at Jn 17.24 is uttered within a prayer, and besides this, concerns not directly the glorification of the Son, but the participation of the believers, whom the Father has given him, in the glory which the Father gave him before time began.

[3] This is not contradicted by 10.18 (nor by 10.16), where Jesus speaks of an authority (ἐξουσία) 'to lay down my life and to take it again', for in the first place, the voluntariness of the laying down of his life (as opposed to 'snatching') is given prominence; and immediately after these words, this 'authority' is characterised as the commission' (ἐντολή) of the Father. Thereby the trinitarian aspect (including pre-existence) of the work of the salvation in John is clearly set out, as is the inner nexus between laying down and taking again, which here appears as the 'power' of the freedom of love to take on the freedom of obedience—a power bestowed by the Father (7.19ff.), which can be exercised only as the Father intends.

necessity of the trinitarian love itself—that gives this prayer its unique christological παρρησία and infallibility. The decisively New Testament character of the teaching about prayer in all the Gospels derives from this christological nexus between the perfect obedience and the fact that the prayer will infallibly be heard; only on this basis can the instruction be understood. When the Synoptic Gospels speak of the unerring character of petitionary prayer, this is based in the work and prayer of Christ: one must pray in his name (with his disposition and intention) and he himself will see that the prayer is fulfilled (Jn 14.13f.); thus the prayer will infallibly be heard (15.16). He knows that the Father always hears him (11.42), and from this knowledge he can shape the prayer of those who are his, and take it up into his own prayer (17.9ff.).

John draws the nexus even closer than this, through the trinitarian mutuality in giving honour, in bringing to recognition, in 'glorifying'. The request for glorification that the obedient Son makes to the Father is born of an understanding of the obedience of the Son as the 'glorification' of the Father. This is John's transcription of the idea, common to the whole New Testament, that the 'majesty' and 'ruling authority' of the Father takes effect in the 'lowliness' of the obedient and serving Son. John introduces this idea in a readily comprehensible anthropological setting, starting from the human drive to 'make oneself respected' by others, and from the social convention to 'give honour' mutually (5.44), because each partner is concerned 'with his own honour' (7.18), i.e., acts and speaks in the last resort on the basis of his own ego ('in his own name', 5.43; 'from himself', 7.18). One may give the name of (self-)glorification (δόξα) to this lustre that the ego seeks in its presentation of itself, and demands for itself, it is precisely this that Jesus rejects: 'I do not seek my own δόξα' (8.50), in words that express, not merely one attitude among others, but his innermost self-understanding.[4] He is the one who in his entire existence seeks only the δόξα of the Father, the one who identifies himself with the execution of the mission, of the 'commandment' and 'commission' of the Father (10.18; 12.49, 50), with 'hearing' (8.47) and 'keeping his word' (8.55), to such an extent that the entire 'majesty' of the Father can appear localised in him. Like the 'teaching', the 'authority' which appears there, and has effect in the 'works', is not the property of the one who obeys, but of the one who sends him (12.49). Authority (the majesty of the Father in him) and poverty (as the refusal to seek his own glory) coincide. But all the utterances concerning this have a 'dynamic' that presses forwards to the decisive 'hour' that alone will justify everything that went earlier and govern it from an 'exalted' standpoint: in the 'hour', the unity of authority and poverty will become self-abandonment. The death on the Cross is a genuine dying, just as 'the grain of wheat falls into the earth and dies' (12.24), but a dying that is carried by the 'commission' and by the 'authority to lay down his life' and that goes as far as 'taking it again' (10.17), thereby 'accomplishing' the 'work' of the Father (4.34; 17.4); thus, in this final work, the dying 'gives glory' to the Father, in the ultimate and truest sense (13.31; 17.4f.). The uttermost end that the Son enters is the revelation of a beginning that could not otherwise have been made known; that is, it reveals that the whole obedience upon earth of the Son has its source, not in a spontaneous decision of his human ego to offer himself for a commission that comes from outside himself, but in a decision made absolutely in advance, which is the basis of his entire earthly existence. He is always already the one in whom 'the Father does his works' (14.10); and 'My food is to do the will of the one who sent me, and to accomplish his work' (4.34). This means 'accomplishing' in the strong sense of the word: not merely finishing the work, but accompanying it right to the end envisaged by the

---

[4] John emphasises very strongly, not only that Jesus 'interprets' his ego thus, but that his ego is identical with his self-understanding as the one sent and proceeding from the Father: 'I know where I come from' (8.14), 'I know him; if I were to say, "I do not know him", I should be a liar like you; but I know him and keep his word' (8.55). 'I know him, for I come from him, and he sent me' (7.29). From the same standpoint, his knowledge about his origin can be termed both a testimony to what he has seen and as justified speech ('We speak of what we know') and acting (3.11).

---

absolute divine will (13.1). This end (19.28) is attained in the self-offering on the cross, in the opening of the heart and in the breathing-forth of the Spirit (19.30,34), all in the voluntariness of a going forth in obedience (14.31). At the uttermost point where the Son makes way, the majesty of the Father is to be brought into effect ('For this reason I have come to this hour: Father, glorify your name', 12.27f.). This majesty has of course already announced itself in Jesus' claim to be the word of the Father in the world, and the Father has authenticated this claim through the 'signs'—the miracles—in which it was possible to check the correctness of the paradox that the majesty of the one who commanded appeared in the lowliness of the obedience ('If I am not doing the works of my Father, then do not believe me', 10.37). The 'signs' point to the direction in which the correct interpretation lies, but at the end, signs and what is signified must come together: the final sign, to which John solemnly bears witness, is the opened heart (19.34f.), the end of the momentum of the Father's commission and of the Son's making way, the end of the distance between the highest majesty and the deepest descent (3.13,31; 6.38), but thereby also proof that the space opened up by the utterly obedient Son suffices to make known the whole 'name' of the Father and to make completely efficacious his sovereign power.

At this point, accordingly, the reversal occurs: 'If God is glorified in him (the Son of Man), God will also glorify him in himself, and glorify him at once' (13.32). This is set at the beginning of the farewell discourses, like a law of the logic within the Godhead, and it is represented at the end of the discourses in the form of a prayer: 'I glorified you on earth, having accomplished the work which you gave me to do; and now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory which I had with you before the world was made' (17.4–5). The request can possess the infallibility of a statement; but the statement can be made only in the intratrinitarian dialogic form of a request. This identity is based upon the fact that the obedient making way of the Son for the Father is always the expression of the eternal love of the Son, who makes way for no one other than the eternally loving Father. The uttermost distance[5]—the dimensions of which go to the extreme on both sides—proves for John the identity of obedience and love in the Son, and likewise the substantial identity of the personal love of the Son and the personal love of the Father. But since the Son has 'accomplished' his work of love in the work of obedience, it belongs, not to him, but to the Father to adduce the proof of this double identity, at a single stroke, in the glorification of the Son. The 'at once' εὐθύς, 13.32) underlines the urgency of this trinitarian logic. And the reply of the voice from above, when Jesus requests glorification in the Temple, assures the fulfilment: 'I have glorified, and I will glorify' (12.28).

Here, however, we must now simultaneously see and follow two lines, that of the dispensation (in the work of salvation) and that of the Trinity (in the unity of Father and Son). The first considers that which is expressed in the Johannine metaphor of fruitfulness, of bearing fruit, of the harvest: it shows the inner coming to an end of the will for salvation of the Father who sends and of the salvation that dwells in the obedience of the Son—and both in unity. The second line follows this unity back to its final origin, into the eternal, supramundane, and substantial unity of love between Father and Son. Along the second line lie the statements about the mutual indwelling (17.10,21; 10.30; 16.15), and hence also the supramundane participation of the Son in the glory of the Father (17.5,24); these statements become fully clear only when the glory that is common to Father and Son is understood as the radiance of their eternal love (love of the Father for the Son: 5.20; 17.24,26; love of the Son for the Father: 14.31). But these statements are in their turn only the ultimate background against which the first line, that of the dispensation of salvation, comes into light: it is precisely through his obedience that the love of the Son for the Father is to become visible for the world (14.31), and this law—obedience as the sole and sufficient proof of love—is continually impressed on the disciples (14.21, 23, and frequently). Thereby, the sphere of the Father's sovereignty over Jesus is broadened out into the world, and this broadening—finally to be universal—is the goal of Jesus' work of obedience. This means that it is 'fruitful' in accordance with its own innermost law. As the act of love, Jesus' obedience is anything but 'passive'; his making way for the Father's will is not merely temporarily a joint act with the Father (in the proclamation and the working of miracles; 5.19), but remains active even during the Passion, in that he 'draws everything to himself' on the Cross (12.32) and 'gathers' it (11.52); indeed, only on the Cross does he truly begin to produce fruit (12.24) beyond himself, in those who are his, who are his 'branches' (15.1–8). This does not take place in the manner of an anonymous law of nature; the fruit borne by the Son remains in the care and at the disposal of the Father (as the 'husbandman' who 'cuts off' and 'prunes', 15.2). Accordingly, it is not as though the 'passive action' of the incarnate Son became an 'active action' from his death onwards, as a kind of 'reward' for his having been obedient upon earth, so that he would now be installed in joint sovereignty with the Father. This (Synoptic) conception is elucidated by John so that it becomes clear that even in the 'return', in the 'going home', in the 'ascent once more' of the Son to the Father, and in his 'being with the Father'—i.e., in the removal of the distance of obedience—the dependence of the Son upon the Father is never superseded. This becomes clear, where the glorification of the Son by the Father is understood as the proof brought by the Father that every glorious fruit that has resulted from the mission of the Son has its final foundation in the perfect, absolute obedience, and gives glory to this obedience too as the perfected revelation of the eternal love of the Son. The ray of the supramundane love (17.5) does not only fall upon the obedience of the Cross to transfigure it: it breaks forth from within this obedience too.

---

[5] We choose this word to express the process described by John, which is indeed materially identical with the 'kenosis' mentioned in the Philippians hymn, but presupposes an explicit trinitarian thinking and therefore merits a terminology that makes this distinction plain.

b. The Spirit will glorify me

The Father is asked to give proof that the obedience of the Son is his eternal love for the Father, a love that itself was nothing but the act of making space for the eternal love of the Father for the Son. But the distance between the glory of love and the obedience unto death came into existence because of the world's darkness; and the identity that persisted in this distance must be exhibited to the world, so that 'the world may believe' (17.21), 'so that the world may recognise' (17.23). This work of exhibiting that identity, however, cannot be the work of the Son, who has done all that lay in his power (13.1) in his obedience; nor can it be the work of the Father, who likewise has displayed his utmost love by giving up the Son for the world (3.16; 1 Jn 4.10). Rather, the mutual love, which in both is so to speak 'exhausted', must itself open up and demonstrate itself as that which is absolutely living, creative, independently getting its own way, as the eternal fruit in God and the endless fruitfulness in the world. The 'Spirit' is this result of the mutual love, apparently an end but in truth the creative new beginning. As Spirit of the mutual love, he proceeds, like everything, like the Son himself, from the Father: the Father sends him into the world (14.16, 26). Thus the Son does not independently control the Spirit who is of both, but asks the Father to send him as the counsel and comforter of those who are his in the world. But the obedience of the Son is itself eternal love, and thus the Spirit is no less fruit of this love. He was in the Son during his earthly life (1.32; 3.34; 6.63; 7.39), and the Son breathes him back to the Father in the final act of his obedience, as the 'accomplished' mission (19.30). This breathing forth is passive in Jesus' dying. Accordingly, when Jesus asks the Father to send the Spirit, the granting lies once more already in the request (in an a priori synthesis), for in his accomplished obedience, the Son is wholly one with the Father as the possessor of the Father's love—'all that the Father has is mine' (16.15), 'all that is mine is yours, and all that is yours is mine' (17.10). So he himself can send the Spirit and cause him with authority to emanate from his perfected love (15.26; 16.7). It is explicitly stated that, for this, he must first die (7.39; 16.7; cf. 20.22): the Spirit of love is set free for the world where the love of the Father in the handing-over of the Son for the world has become free, where the love of the Son in his 'self-consecration' (17.19) as 'sin-offering' (1 Jn 2.2; 4.10) has reached its completion in the opening of his heart.

The Spirit is the fruitfulness of the love of Father and Son; the fruitfulness that he is, does not take effect 'of itself', but is bestowed by the Father and the Son, and also bestows itself as free gift. That which is at the sovereign disposal of Father and Son disposes also sovereignly of itself. If this is considered at a deeper level, there is no reason to wonder why in Jn 1–12 the Spirit appears as the seemingly impersonal gift that is given, but in the farewell discourses (Jn 13–16) as the personal gift that gives and acts. Precisely in his free working, the Spirit is dependent on the autonomy of the eternal love between Father and Son, and, inasmuch as he is the Spirit who is sent out into the world, he is dependent on the eternal love of Son and Father that has appeared in the obedience of the Son upon the Cross. It is only when the Spirit is understood personally that a meaning can be found in the statement that, in the revelation of the love between Father and Son, he will 'not speak from himself, but whatever he hears he will speak . . . he will take what is mine and declare it to you' (16.13–14). Therefore, when he makes this interpretative proclamation, he will 'glorify me' (16.14), and not be simply the self-glorifying absolute love of God. Jesus adds in explanation that 'that which is mine', to be interpreted by the Spirit, has been given him by the Father, so that once again the source of all love, the Father, will be glorified together with the Son through the Spirit (cf. 13.31).

Considered as a whole, the interpretation of the Son through the Spirit forms part of a complex embracing the 'leading' (ὁδηγεῖν) the speech and proclamation (16.13; 14.25), the 'instruction' (14.26), 'bearing witness' (15.26), and, in a deep sense, the 'remembering' (14.26)—remembering the words and deeds of Jesus that the disciples experienced, but which only now are disclosed to them in their inner depth. In this whole process lies that which Jesus calls his glorification through the Spirit (16.14), which is nothing other than the bringing to light of the love that lies in obedience, of the identity with the loving Father that lies in the distance. This is 'all truth' (16.13); outside this truth, there can be no truth for John, but only falsehood and darkness. The Spirit leads into what always 'lies ahead' (16.13), inasmuch as it lies beyond the death of Jesus; for the believer, this is the semper magis of the 'whole truth' or the whole love, the understanding of which can never be pure present reality for him. It is also that which is ever anew carried forth from the concealment of image and 'parable' (παροιμία) into the open (παρρησία 16.25), throughout the whole of the Church's history.

The Johannine symbolism of Spirit, water and blood shows that the truth is love, and that the one who is glorified is the one who was crucified. The Spirit is the 'water that wells up to eternal life' (4.14), proffered by Jesus as the spring that flows from the new temple of Ezekiel, his own body (2.21), his κοιλία (7.38), his heart that is broken open (19.34), as 'my blood' for the life of the world' (6.54, 51). To 'take what is mine' means therefore not only an external interpretation of words and deeds of the past, but the pouring out of the substance itself (which is inseparably 'word' and 'flesh', proclamation and sacrament), that is to say, the revelation of the fruitfulness that dwells within this substance. Therefore Jesus can indeed link the salvific coming of the Spirit to his own departure (16.7), but at the same time promise that he will return to the believers (in the coming of the Spirit, 14.18), together with his Father (14.23), because the distance has now been taken up into the identity and dissolved: 'Then you will grasp that I am in my Father' (14.20). He returns in his own fruitfulness, in his 'harvest' and 'fruit for eternal life' (4.35f.), in the 'plentiful fruit' brought forth by the one who hates his own life and loses it in death (12.24), in the 'fruit' that the vine bears abidingly (μένειν, 15.4) in its branches. Here, a new distance in identity opens up: between the vine and its branches, between Christ and his Church; and as the Father is glorified in the Son, so is Christ through the working of the Spirit in his Church.

The Spirit however gives the interpretation of Christ (and, in him, the Father) through the Church to 'the world', in a twofold manner that corresponds to the double nature of 'world' in John: as the world that is turned away from God and unreasonably hates the love of God (15.25), and as the world that despite everything is destined for faith and knowledge (17.21,23) through the shining of the light in the darkness (1.5). Faced with the dark world, the Spirit is the 'advocate' of Christ, who triumphantly wins his lawsuit (brought by the world). The world has lost its case in the journey that the Son makes to the Father in the Resurrection, to which it is precisely the sending of the Spirit by the Father that bears witness; the world is convicted of its sin, God's righteousness has won the victory, and the ruler of this world is condemned (16.8–11). In this lawsuit, the Spirit is simultaneously both witness and advocate, and in this unity that lays low every opposing argument he is the one who 'convicts' (ἐλέγχειν), in a fashion so objective that it is quite irrelevant whether or not the world allows itself to be persuaded of this; yet all the time his work is done with the world in view, so that it is thereby directed 'from sin to repentance', and that the 'chastisement' that is undertaken is 'educative'.[6]

In that Jesus has already brought a group of disciples before his death to a certain degree of faith, so that here darkness was already lifted to make way for light, the work of the Spirit begins with this dawning light. His witness is borne within the group of disciples: 'He will bear witness to me; and you also are witnesses, because you are (not: were) with me from the beginning' (15.26f.). This is not meant paratactically: when the obedience of Jesus bears fruit, there is no question of yet another external act of witnessing on the part of God (as Jesus indeed preached to his disciples as a separate person). Rather, here we have the fruit of God, which now dwells in the fruit of the world—the Church—and bears witness; hence the inseparably close link between the fraternal love within the Church and the testimony of the Spirit. The fraternal love is continually described as obedience to the new commandment of Jesus (13.34; 14.15, 24; 15.10– [6] F. Büchsel, art. ἐλέγχω TNDT II 47. J. Blank, Krisis (1964), pp. 101f. On the whole section: F. Mussner, 'Die joh. Parakletsprüche und die apostol. Tradition' (1961), in: Praesentia Salutis (1967), pp. 146–158.

---

17), because it takes on then the form of his own love; thus and only thus does it become for the world the testimony that cannot be refuted ('so that all may recognise', 13.35), not in virtue of its own power, but as nourished and borne by the testimony of the Spirit, in remembrance and interpretation. Thus when the Spirit 'leads' and 'shows the way' and 'teaches', this, in accordance with his own character, is initiation into love and announcement of love. When later the Holy Scripture of the new covenant becomes the document of the self-understanding of the Church in her obedience to Jesus' word, commandment and example, then it will necessarily be the 'announcement that brings to mind' what happened in divine truth under the cover of historical phenomena; the gospel of the Spirit is an 'eternal gospel' (Rev 14.6) and the 'gospel of glory' (2 Cor 4.4; 1 Tim 1.11), but again, not as letter but as 'written on the tables of hearts', 'comprehensible and legible for anyone' (2 Cor 3.3,2). Therefore the Spirit is freedom too, for the 'children of God' can stand under no 'necessity' to love out of the love of God, but can know only a 'glorious' permission to love (Rom 8.21).

c. I am glorified in them

The third aspect of Jesus' glorification has thereby already been revealed. His personal characteristic is that he has never 'sought' his own glory: so he himself cannot secure his own recognition (on the ground of what he has achieved in his obedience) in the Father or through the Spirit, nor can he himself display before the world the inner power and fullness of his loving obedience. The Father does this, by accomplishing and revealing the identity of obedience and eternal love, of Cross and Resurrection; the Spirit does this, by instituting in the Church, and so making known before the world, the unity of the love between Father and Son that was lived out in the distance of the Passion for the sake of the world—for he himself is this unity of love. Thus a 'dwelling' (Jn 14.23) is prepared for the Father and the Son even in the Church (and thereby in the cosmos); ultimately, this means that a dwelling is prepared for the Church (and thereby for the world) by the Son in the Father (14.2).

The 'radiance' of the trinitarian love, which has disclosed itself in the New Testament as the truth of the kabod of God, is a radiance that has its source only in the momentum of the obedience on the Cross. Therefore the only way for the crucified Christ to be 'glorified' in the Church (17.10) is for the eternity of glory to be instituted in the Church by the Spirit of Father and Son: a love that is decisively Christian (and ultimately divine and trinitarian) if it is love out of obedience to Christ, and so love as a participation in the accomplishing of the obedience of Christ. Therefore it is first of all a love that is enjoined, an ἐντολή (13.34: 15.12) that is exactly parallel to the ἐντολή that Jesus has received from the Father (15.10). Because the commission of the Father was accepted by the Son in freedom (before the world existed), because this freedom is identical with the sonship of the one whose food is to do the Father's will (4.34), Jesus expects from the disciples, in the power of the Holy Spirit that will be bestowed on them, that they cross over from the compulsion of slavery into the freedom of sonship (8.33f.) by accepting his obedience, and so attain the common knowledge and fullness of information that is proper to friends (15.14f.). 'I have called you friends, because I have made known to you everything that I have heard from my Father' (15.15): this unlimited revelation has its source in the free separation of the Son from the Father, in his 'descent' into the world and his making known what he has 'seen' in the presence of God (3.11f.). We have to do here with an obedience out of love for love, with an 'ought' and a 'must' that lie beyond the natural 'ought' and 'must' and that are formulated in the Johannine law as a divine necessity: 'Since I, your lord and master, have washed your feet, so you too must (ὀφείλετε) wash one another's feet' (13.14). 'By this we know love, that he laid down his life for us, and so we too must (ὀφείλομεν) lay down our lives for the brethren' (1 Jn 3.16). Here is the second point: the momentum of the Church's love has its origin in the momentum of the ἐντολή given to the Son by the Father, and has its goal and end in the analogous momentum of 'laying down one's life' for the brethren. How far this 'laying down' must go, is shown symbolically in the washing of the feet, and in reality on the Cross. Jesus, who 'consecrates' himself as a sacrifice for those who are his (and through them, for the world; Jn 17.19), does this so that those who belong to him may also 'be consecrated in truth' (17.17), i.e., so that through the Spirit they may share in the fullness of Jesus' disposition of sacrifice. The same thing is expressed by the requirement of losing one's life with the grain of wheat that dies, in Jesus' 'service' and 'following him' (12.25f.); and as the Son, who offers himself up thus, is glorified by the Father, so will the one who serves him 'be honoured' by the Father (τιμᾶν 12.26).

The 'laying down of one's life for the brethren' is wholly in accordance with the law of the self-giving of the Son: this means that, by virtue of its nearness to the Son, it is also placed at a distance from the 'lord and master' who has imposed the commandment. This self-giving can and must include martyrdom as the limit of the confession; Peter's martyrdom is promised to him as the way in which he will 'glorify God' (21.19). But this limit is not the central point of what is said. This centre is the participation in the destiny of the Lord; the 'hatred by the world', the expulsion from its fellowships of worship, persecution 'for the sake of my name' (15.18ff.; 16.2), because those who obey the commandment to love are 'not of the world', but are chosen out of it (15.19; 17.14, 16). This is the appropriate, normal lot, which should cause surprise to no believer, for the law that governs his life is opposed to the law of the 'world'. Here belongs too the qualitative difference of the love and the brethren from that which in the world receives this name or a similar name: this is the opening of the inmost heart for the brother, not in words but in deeds (1 Jn 3.17), and thus the attempt at total self-renunciation, at dying to all self-will.[7] It is this that is the principle of Christian fruitfulness, because this is what it is to abide in the being and the thinking of the Lord. Nothing is fruitful in the Christian sense, unless it derives from christological obedience.

---

[7] On this, and on all of these analyses, cf. W. Thüsing, Erhöhung und Verherrlichung, pp. 123–141; idem, Herrlichkeit und Einheit. Eine Auslegung des Hohenpriesterlichen Gebets Joh 17 (1962), pp. 70–98 esp. pp. 93f. Cf. the note on p. 96 concerning Paul's employment of Jesus' obedience unto death in the ethics of Christian living ('Have the same disposition as Christ Jesus . . .', Phil

This obedience again and again passes over the boundary—indeed, the abyss—that opens up in John's Gospel between the kingdoms of light and darkness, love and hate, God and 'world'. When John represents the love of the brethren (and not love of neighbour in general) as the embodiment of discipleship, he does not intend a narrowing-down of the earliest Christian understanding of love, as it may be found, for example, in the Sermon on the Mount;[8] he intends to show the Church's love as the continuing existence of Christ's self-giving in love—if it is this, as it should be, it will share in the salvific fruitfulness of Christ, and indeed reveal the fruitfulness of this, in the 'greater works' (14.12) which the Church will be able to perform because the Son has returned to the Father. These works are the apostolic fruitfulness of Christ's love in the love of the Church. The fruitfulness of love twice throws a bridge that spans the abyss: 'There is no link, no transition from the fellowship of the Father and Jesus on the one side and the not yet redeemed world on the other side. Nevertheless, God redeems the world . . . because the Son stands in complete unity with (the Father), because he accepts the mission in total obedience and accomplishes it by laying down his life. Likewise, there is no link between the fellowship of Jesus' disciples . . . and those who stand outside this—yet Jesus sends his Apostles into this cosmos. Once again, this is possible only when and if these men who are sent out assent in full obedience to the unity in love of the vine of which they form a part, i.e., if they commit their life to the service of those for whom Jesus laid down his life . . . The full intensity of the fellowship which is made effective in obedience is therefore in both cases the presupposition for love's emerging beyond the respective fellowship.'[9] The disciples are promised that their prayer will be heard by the Father (14.13) on the basis of this law which applies both to Jesus and to them; naturally, this presupposes that their requests are made 'in the name' of Jesus, that is to say, in his apostolic intention that has as its aim the salvation of the world. They receive a share in the laws of the life within the Trinity, laws that lie beyond any arbitrary freedom and natural necessity, in the infallibility of love's granting their requests. The fruitfulness of the love of the brethren and the hearing of the prayer are therefore brought into the closest association with each other (15.16bc). Indeed, the high-priestly prayer in its third section (17.20–24) anticipates the fruitful transcendence of the love of the brethren out beyond into the world, but in such a way that it makes this fruitfulness dependent more strongly than ever on the embodiment within the Church of the unity in love of the Trinity ('so that they may be one, as we are one').

---

2.1–8), and also 'more radically still' by John. This parallel justifies the parallel that Thüsing has drawn earlier between the Pauline kenosis and what we have called the Johannine 'distancing'. In both, total selflessness is required for Christian living and loving ('in humility, let each one consider the other as higher than himself', Phil 2.3; 'let each one look not to his own interests', 2.4), but in such a way that 'faith' (for Paul) and the fulfilment of the commandment (for John) clearly maintain the distinction between the Lord and the disciple.

[8] So A. Nygren, Eros und Agape, I (1930), pp. 130ff.; see below pp. 454-458.

When Jesus says that he is 'glorified' in the Church (17.10), he sees that he has succeeded in revealing the Father's love in such a way that men have accepted it (17.6–8). The divine love has taken root on earth. And when he takes this as yet imperfect faith and consecrates it through his own sacrifice so that it too receives the same character of being sacrificed (17.17,19), his intention is not to boast in their suffering and dying, but only to bring to full effect in the world the love of the Father that consumes him.[10] Therefore all praise is referred back to the Father: 'In this is my Father glorified, that you bear much fruit and (so) will be my disciples' (15.8). For the trinitarian love is indivisible, just as the obedience of Christ is indivisible. It is always a matter of 'everything': 'All that the Father has, is mine' (16.15); 'He has given everything into the hand of the Son' (3.35). 'The Father shows the Son all that he himself does' (5.20) and the Spirit too must lead the Church, not into some truth, but 'into all truth' (16.13).

---

[9] W. Thüsing, Erhöhung und Verherrlichung, p. 138

[10] Cf. Thüsing's important discussion, ibid. pp. 206–219.

With this threefold setting-forth of the kabod-momentum of the Cross of Jesus—through the Father, through the Spirit, through the Church—as kabod-glory, the entire horizon of the meaning of the cipher δόξα in the New Testament has been staked out. Δόξα signifies, not various realities, but one single reality in different aspects. This single reality is disclosed, in the final interpretation by John, as the eternal trinitarian love that has come into the world. It is true that one passage speaks of the eternal glory of the Son with the Father before the world was made, when the Son asks the Father that he may receive this once again (17.5); but the context of John's Gospel as a whole shows that this is no mere restoration of an original state, but rather the integration of the obedient love, lived out in the separation undertaken for the sake of bringing salvation, into the original intimacy and 'perfect joy' of the dwelling with one another of Father and Son. And the final request, drawing the Church and the redeemed world too into the light of the trinitarian love, belongs essentially to this integration: 'Father, I desire that those whom you have given me may be where I am, to see the glory which you have given me, for you loved me before the foundation of the world' (17.24). The conjunction 'for' shows that the glory lay in the love of the Father, and those who belong to the Son are to see him consumed by the love of the Father, which is possible only if they themselves are consumed by the love of the Son. The individual aspects shade off from this ultimate point: something of this ultimacy shines already through the earthly existence of Jesus, and can be recognised by the eyes of faith in a genuine objective perception (αἴσθησις): 'We have seen his glory' (1.14); 'he revealed his glory (at Cana)' (2.11), 'the glory of God' is 'seen' in the miracle of Lazarus (11.4, 40); yet during this period, Jesus is 'not yet glorified' (7.39). Thus the δόξα remains eschatological, yet is present proleptically in the lowliness and hiddenness. And just as there is an objective anticipation of δόξα as glory, in the momentum of the obedience of Jesus and in the sublimity of his whole manifestation, so there is a subjective casting back of the light of the publicly revealed glory, from the Easter faith of the Church, on to the hiddenness of the one who humbled himself. 'The hour is coming, and is already here' (4.23; 5.25; 16.32), speaks of both at once, looking forward with the earthly Jesus and backwards from the period of the Church. At the beginning of this chapter we pointed to the various gradations to be found within one fundamental meaning, from lordliness in power (in the creation) through sublimity (in the work of reconciliation) to glory (in the definitive breaking-through of redemption), and similarly to the gradation (with various transitions, but a definite gradation that must not be flattened) between momentum ('power') and radiance ('light'). Thus δόξα remains a 'transcendental' of the divine revelation, present in all phases and layers. As was done for the theology of the old covenant, however, we must now draw out the concept from its formal abstract significance and fill it out with the content of the event of revelation that concretises 'glory' in the New Testament.

To do this, we have to leave again the exclusively Johannine finishing point, which we have chosen as our starting point, and to bring into the discussion the full range of the theologies of the New Testament.[11]

One final point becomes clear from this present chapter: the glorification of Christ is at the deepest level a question of the truth of Christianity. The threefold glorification by the Father, the Spirit, and the Church of his obedience that went as far as the Cross is each time the proof of what this obedience truly was. If the crucified is not risen, then 'your faith is in vain' (ματαία 1 Cor 15.17). From this point, one may say that the central concern of a theological aesthetics must be the correspondence between obedience and love, between self-emptying into hiddenness and being raised up into manifestness ('justified in the Spirit, seen by the angels, proclaimed to the peoples, believed on in the world, exalted in glory', 1 Tim 3.16); for in this way theological aesthetics would be based in the last resort on the perfect proportion which Christ, through his obedience, has established once for all between heaven and earth and between the will of the Father in Heaven and his own will on earth, a proportion which is continually shown forth in the interpretative vindication by the Father, the Spirit, and the Church. The centre and the proper object of a doctrine concerning what is theologically beautiful would then lie in this equilibrium, brought about through creative obedience, between God and the world and thereby between the (Old Testament) archetype (God) and the creaturely image and likeness (man); the theologically beautiful would itself include both the theological truth (in the sense of the Old Testament and of John) and hence also the goodness (which lies in the justification of God in man and of man in God). Such an aesthetics would be explicitly christocentric.—Against this, it must be said that Christ himself nowhere controls his own glorification, that is to say, the relationship between his obedience to the Father and his own glory, but once for all entrusts himself, in what concerns his glorification, in prayer to the Father, from whom the Spirit goes forth into Church and world to accomplish conviction, vindication and glorification. One may say moreover that the obedience of Christ never reflects on its own value nor on its appropriate outcome; this does not mean that Christ on earth had no consciousness of his coming exaltation, but rather that his concern was not for the relationship between the two stages of obedience and exaltation, but only for his transparency, to the Father and for the Father. This transparency realises itself both in his claim and in his authority, which are the authorised representation of the Father, and in his whole poverty and in his self-abandonment, which free the whole space for the Father to act in him. Both are one: but only the second can show that the first is genuine, as love. The glory of the Father can make itself 'substantially' present through both in the incarnate Son.[12] In this way theological aesthetics is transposed from christocentrism into a final (trinitarian) theocentrism, in which of course the Holy Spirit too receives a central place as the one who effects the mutual indwelling in love between Christ and the Father: the Holy Spirit is the personal identity of the personal distinction in the Godhead.

---

[11] III/2,1, pp. 133ff., 189ff.

---

[12] Cf. Casel, Das christliche Kultmysterium (4th edn. 1960), pp. 178f.

As we now go on to describe the contents of the cipher 'glory' in the New Testament, it is necessary to take the path from theocentrism to christocentrism: this is the best guarantee of the theological character of this aesthetics, which would run the risk of sticking fast in a quasiphilosophical teaching on proportion, if we took the opposite path.[13]

---

[13] From this starting point, it would be possible to offer a summary criticism of the various theologies of glory that were presented in Vols. II–IV. But in so doing one must bear in mind that it is frequently the case that a philosophical (cosmological-musical) teaching on proportion has its final yard-stick in a christological teaching on proportion, and that this (together with themes from the philosophical teaching on transcendentals) undergoes self-transcendence into a trinitarian-theocentric teaching on revelation, as e.g. in Boethius, Bonaventure, Thomas, Nicholas of Cusa, Pascal.

all between heaven and earth and between the will of the Father in Heaven and his own will on earth, a proportion which is continually shown forth in the interpretative vindication by the Father, the Spirit, and the Church. The centre and the proper object of a doctrine concerning what is theologically beautiful would then lie in this equilibrium, brought about through creative obedience, between God and the world and thereby between the (Old Testament) archetype (God) and the creaturely image and likeness (man); the theologically beautiful would itself include both the theological truth (in the sense of the Old Testament and of John) and hence also the goodness (which lies in the justification of God in man and of man in God). Such an aesthetics would be explicitly christocentric.—Against this, it must be said that Christ himself nowhere controls his own glorification, that is to say, the relationship between his obedience to the Father and his own glory, but once for all entrusts himself, in what concerns his glorification, in prayer to the Father, from whom the Spirit goes forth into Church and world to accomplish conviction, vindication and glorification. One may say moreover that the obedience of Christ never reflects on its own value nor on its appropriate outcome; this does not mean that Christ on earth had no consciousness of his coming exaltation, but rather that his concern was not for the relationship between the two stages of obedience and exaltation, but only for his transparency, to the Father and for the Father. This transparency realises itself both in his claim and in his authority, which are the authorised representation of the Father, and in his whole poverty and in his self-abandonment, which free the whole space for the Father to act in him. Both are one: but only the second can show that the first is genuine, as love. The glory of the Father can make itself 'substantially' present through both in the incarnate Son.[12] In this way theological aesthetics is transposed from christocentrism into a final (trinitarian) theocentrism, in which of course the Holy Spirit too receives a central place as the one who effects the mutual indwelling in love between Christ and the Father: the Holy Spirit is the personal identity of the personal distinction in the Godhead.

---

[12] Cf. Casel, Das christliche Kultmysterium (4th edn. 1960), pp. 178f.

As we now go on to describe the contents of the cipher 'glory' in the New Testament, it is necessary to take the path from theocentrism to christocentrism: this is the best guarantee of the theological character of this aesthetics, which would run the risk of sticking fast in a quasiphilosophical teaching on proportion, if we took the opposite path.[13]

---

[13] From this starting point, it would be possible to offer a summary criticism of the various theologies of glory that were presented in Vols. II–IV. But in so doing one must bear in mind that it is frequently the case that a philosophical (cosmological-musical) teaching on proportion has its final yard-stick in a christological teaching on proportion, and that this (together with themes from the philosophical teaching on transcendentals) undergoes self-transcendence into a trinitarian-theocentric teaching on revelation, as e.g. in Boethius, Bonaventure, Thomas, Nicholas of Cusa, Pascal.

2. THE SUBSTANCE OF GLORY

a. Essence and word

In John's unfolding of the trinitarian kernel of the New Testament δόξα Christ is revealed as the one who holds the keys of this δόξα, as the 'lord of glory' (κύριος τῆς δόξης, 1 Cor 2.8). In order to understand how this centre is the centre, however, it is necessary for us to measure off the periphery: hence, in what follows, we attempt to encompass the fullness of the contents of the cipher δόξα—Paul likes to speak of the 'fullness of glory' (Rom 9.23; Eph 3.16; Phil 4.19; Col 1.27)—and to concentrate our attention upon the midpoint. In all this we need to show that even for us in our own period this cipher remains a living, comprehensible, and indeed indispensable reality, which in no sense has to be demythologised. Because John both includes and interprets the whole event of salvation in this cipher, many aspects are integrated into it which are not explicitly termed δόξα or δοξάζειν in the rest of the New Testament; the light hidden in them is thereby brought to shine forth. It is no less true that the increasingly diverse interpretations of δόξα in the age of Judaism, which—as heavenly glory, cosmic glory, and eschatological messianic glory—fall into place around a new centre. The centring in the New Testament of all δόξα in creation and salvation history upon the inmost focus can be seen at 2 Cor 4.6: 'It is the same God who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness', who has shone in our hearts, to give us the knowledge of the glory of God upon the face of Christ.' Here at the end, there stands no longer 'word', no longer 'image', but 'face': a face that is absolutely certainly a human face (as indeed before this, a ray of God's glory lay upon Moses' face; 2 Cor 3.13,15), but the face of the Kyrios (3.18), that is substantially his as the pre-existent (2 Cor 8.9) Son.[1]

---

[1] 'This concept characterises the element in Christ that truly makes him Christ, his divinity': H. Kittel, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes. Studie zu Geschichte und Wesen eines neutest. Begriffs (1934), p. 236.

1. But how can we get a nearer understanding of what is said to appear upon his face? Before we begin, we must remember that the Son, who reveals the Father as his 'word', is essentially a word that prays to the Father, making requests of him only in adoration, and thanking him. He is not 'word' in the sense that he substantially controls the object of his utterance, for 'the Father is greater than I' (Jn 14.28). The 'prayer without ceasing' (1 Thess 5.17) of Christians is an attempt to imitate the attitude of the Word. It is necessary first to clear away all words about God's glory that merely make dispassionate statements, in order to make space for the unique word that, through absolute obedience, makes itself the place where the glory may give utterance to itself. Everything else, whether word or deed or miracle, is sign (σημεῖον) and parable (παροιμία). H. Kittel is correct to say that the employment of the cipher in Paul is 'purchased at the cost of a degree of unclarity never before attained'; Paul 'grasps so boldly at what is ineffable, that it is for him not only a central concept, but at the same time a boundary concept'. He transmits, as the concrete experience of the grace of God that has been bestowed on us, 'the most striking impression of the infinitude of the Omnipotent'; and thus, when compared with all the earlier uses of the concept, the expression 'the glory of God' here becomes 'at once the most rich in content, and something that transcends all content'.[2] Δόξα is the divinity of God as it is freely made known. The fact that it is made known means that it has placed itself within an expressive form; but the fact that it is made known means that in the same act it bursts through every form. This act of breaking-through such finite bonds makes God, in all religion and mysticism other than those of the Bible, the ineffable, before whom words can only stammer and must in the end (in a finally apophatic theology) be silent. The paradox of Biblical revelation is that the ineffable as such has placed itself in the word: this proclaims its sublime freedom and power, but also the terrifying danger that the word, where it ceases to be a word of prayer, may forget the ineffability of

---

[2] Ibid., p. 238.

God and absolutise itself as a human logos in philosophical logic or philology.[3] At the same time, the intellectual creature (upon whom a ray of the eternal glory rests: Ps 8.6) bears in itself something of this structure of absolute being: its free self-expression and self-giving is able to reveal itself and bestow itself, but always in such a manner that the coastlines of what is shown and expressed remains untouched—the inalienability of freedom, and thereby the inexhaustibility of the personal mystery. We must follow the path of this creaturely 'image' in order to reach the archetype. The Bible is wholly a word from God, a word that is determined, that encounters and challenges; yet the Bible is a word from the ineffable, a word that endlessly revolves around its subject in periphrases. No one has ever seen God (Jn 1.18; 6.46; 1 Jn 4.12; 1 Tim 6.16), apart from the Son who is in the bosom of the Father; it is always the radiance of the unutterable that we shall see upon the face of the Son (Jn 17.24; Rev 22.4) and thus see the ineffable 'as he is' (1 Jn 3.2), 'face to face' (1 Cor 13.12). The spoken words of Jesus fall silent long before he has uttered what matters most to him (Jn 16.12); with what 'words' will the Spirit interpret this to the disciples? Paul receives at the origin of revelation 'unutterable words, that a man is forbidden to utter' (2 Cor 12.4), not because of a cultic prohibition, but because of a law of being. The thanksgiving that the Apostle makes to God for his 'unutterable gifts' ἀνεκδιήγητος δωρεά, 2 Cor 9.15) will cover the entirety of the revelation of Christ. Thus there exist even in the New Testament analogies to the cultic 'initiation' (Phil 3.12,15; Heb

---

[3] This makes it possible to understand the cultic character of the verbal form of the entire New Testament. If Jesus himself is the praying Word, then the narrative about him must also be received in the prayer (of the community) and understood, mediated, and made one's own in the attitude of prayer. The letters of the Apostles are through and through the expression of the word of prayer—they spring from prayer, are saturated with prayer, and are spoken into the situation of the prayer of the communities that receive them. The Acts of the Apostles is evidence for the Spirit, who is present only in the praying Church, and the Revelation of John is shot through with prayers throughout: even the eschatological event of judgment is accompanied, commented upon and received by the eternal prayer of Heaven.

2.10; 5.9, etc.), but the mystery into which one is initiated is a single mystery, that of the love between Father and Son (Jn 17.23).[4] So one must not pay attention one-sidedly to the form of the Bible as word, but rather above all to the 'approach-roads' to God indicated by the Bible: childlikeness (which, in its angels, 'always sees the face of God', Mt 18.10), simplicity (to which alone God's indivisible simplicity is revealed, Mt 11.25), peace ('that transcends all concepts', Phil 4.7; cf. 1 Jn 3.20; Lk 19.38; Rom 2.10), prayer (that yearns in the Spirit 'with unutterable groanings' for the glory of God, Rom 8.26), joy (which already now is 'unutterable' and 'glorified', as it looks to the definitive gift of God, 1 Pet 1.8; cf. 1 Thess 2.20), thanksgiving for God's 'unutterable gift of grace' (2 Cor 9.15), insight (but an insight that understands that God's love will 'always lie beyond every insight' of man, Eph 3.20). Here is the 'superabundant' fulfilment of what was in the Old Testament: 'Can you find out the deep things of God? Can you find out the limits of the Almighty? It is higher than heaven—what can you do? Deeper than Sheol—what can you know? Its measure is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea' (Job 11.7–9). One can never afford to forget that the Bible continually passes over into poetic diction, and comes to its close, in the last book, entirely in images: in the praise of Heaven sung 'without break, day and night', to the accompaniment of 'harps of God' (Rev 15.3, 2), in streams of grace, trees of life, 'smoke of the divine glory and power' (15.8), 'golden vessels full of incense' (5.8), the radiance of all the precious stones of the world and the perfect geometry of the 'holy city' (21.15ff.), and also in frescos of battles and disasters, in one of the most grandiose laments of world literature, the lament over the overthrow of Babylon (18.9–24). And in the first books, the world of images created by Jesus in his parables spreads forth, along with the images that clothe the narrative of his infancy and much of his work and suffering, as the most adequate expression for these. There will never be a theology that gives a fully valid translation into abstract concepts of the dimensions of poetry and image in

---

[4] J. Huby, Mystiques johannique et paulinienne (1946).

Scripture; not because God's word is exclusively poetry and pictorial language, but above all because the verbal form of the Bible is the only proper form for all that is said by God's Son and Word concerning God the Father, and for all that is indwelt by God's divinity (or glory); it lies beyond both prose and poetry and all the 'literary genres' of which it makes use as human speech.

2. The God of the Bible is neither a tremendum nor a fascinosum, but first of all an adorandum.[5] He is and remains the unutterable first origin from which everything that exists, everything that is good and full of grace, comes forth—he is the Father who gives only good gifts (Lk 11.13). But, as the one who lives and is free, he is present in his creatures and gifts in such a way that he distances himself from them in order to leave them a space of freedom. Therefore his power, divinity, wisdom and radiant majesty fill the universe, and can be perceived by intellectual beings (Rom 1.19,20,23; 1 Cor 1.21); yet, at the same time, they permit the freedom to recognise God's majestic freedom or not (Rom 1.21). As the 'holy one', God makes known especially his divinity in its supramundane character separated from the world; as the 'glorious one', he makes known both his 'being present' in the world and, united to this, his sovereign superiority to the world. It is precisely this interplay of the immanence of God's power and wisdom in all that exists in the world, and his transcendence over the creatures (as the free creator who remains free), who thereby receive a space for their own existence and freedom, that is the foundation of the biblical δόξα; and precisely this free elevation above what is not God gives God again the freedom to reveal himself in his free divinity personally—in the 'Word'—to what is not God. Thus the distinction here is not one between a ground and what it grounds (for a ground can express itself completely in what is based upon it), but rather one between free creation (as the setting-free of existence that is other than God) and the free gift of God (who is the foundation of its being) to the free creature. Theology has termed this the distinction between the 'natural' and the 'supernatural'; it is never wholly reducible. As was suggested above,[6] one may call the immanence of God's divinity in the world his 'sovereignty' or 'majesty'; one may term his permanent free elevation above the world his 'sublimity' or 'dignity', to which 'honour' and adoration are due; and one may finally term the free turning of his personal divinity to the creature his 'glory' in the strongest sense. This glory can further take on ascending stages in the dispensation of salvation, from God's address, which in him will always be creatively active (dabar as word and deed), through the creation of his image (εἰκών, ὁμοίωμα) which takes root in the created order, to the definitive expression (χαρακτήρ) of his invisible 'face' (panim) in the visible face of Christ.

---

[5] Rev 3.9; 4.10; 5.14; 7.11; 11.16; 14.7; 15.4; 19.4; cf. 19.10; 22.8, 9.

There is a succession of variations between the majesty of the creator in the circle of his creatures, and the sublimity of his elevation above them which leaves him fully free to express himself to them; this makes it possible to subsume everything under the same cipher of δόξα. Besides this, at every stage there is an interpenetration (circumincessio) of the various aspects or 'properties' of God, which are not separable but can certainly be distinguished from one another, and must be so separated. We have already seen how God's holiness is distinct from his glory, although this too (in his free 'sublimity') points to God's inability to be mingled with the created world. Glory and power are close to each other;[7] and not only the 'eternal power' (Rom 1.20) that displays itself in the corruptible creatures of time, but also—and much more so—God's far more astonishing power to give comprehensible and appropriate expression to the utter otherness of his being in his supernatural 'word'-revelation for the world. This means that, without ceasing to be the one who is unfathomable, he can cross over the boundaries of the human 'search' for God 'in the hope that they might feel after him and find him' (Acts 17.27), and can establish a valid and finally definitive word concerning himself. This power that dwells in the glory is most clearly seen where God's revelation takes account of, and overcomes, man's guilty turning-away, which had led to the 'loss of δόξα' for all sinners' (Rom 3.23): this he does through the superior power of his grace (Rom 5.15, 17,20f.), but in such a way that this power of grace is displayed in the event of the Cross as the sheer momentum of the judgment over sin. God shows that this sheer momentum is at the same time the absolute power of glory, when he, as 'the Father of glory', through 'the power of the force of his might' raises Jesus, who has died for all sinners, from the dead, so that thus he makes known to us 'the immeasurable greatness of his power' (Eph 1.17–20).[8] And if 'God's wisdom and God's power' reveal themselves as united in the Cross and Resurrection (1 Cor 1.24), then glory and wisdom too stand together and interpenetrate one another (as the tradition coming from the 'Book of Wisdom' already said), especially when it is a question of growing in wisdom to the knowledge of glory (Col 1.27f.; Eph 1.18f.; cf. Rev 7.12). The 'manifold wisdom of God' (Eph 3.10) in his plan of salvation is materially one with the manifold forms in which his glory is present. Finally, glory and righteousness (or being justified by God) must also penetrate one another, because God shows himself in his genuine sovereignty in the truest sense only when through his righteousness he frees those destined by nature and a fortiori by sin to be slaves, who had in fact been reduced to servitude, so that they might obtain 'the freedom of the glory of the children of God' (Rom 8.21): 'those whom he (God) justified, he also glorified' (Rom 8.30).[9]—This survey of the forms taken by the expression of God's divinity only confirms what was to be expected from the start: God is seen in his uniqueness only through the revelation of his free grace—not only in the presence of the creatures, but for them and in them. This uniqueness is demonstrated especially by leading the free creatures to a free response to his glory, to the 'glorification' (δοξάζειν) of the 'glory' of God in the same limitless self-giving with which God has held nothing back in giving a share in what is most utterly his own (what is most 'divine').

---

[6] Cf. above, p. 242.

[7] δύναμις (κράτος) and δόξα: Jude 24f.; 1 Pet 4.11; 5.11; Rev 1.6; 4.11; 5.12, 13.

---

[8] The 'gospel of the glory of Christ' (2 Cor 4.4) which proclaims this salvific deed of God's power is itself as such filled with the same victorious power that is proper to God (Rom 1.16). On this, cf. H. Schlier, 'Doxa bei Paulus als heilsgeschichtlicher Begriff', in: Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus intern. cath. 1961 (Rome 1963), p. 51.

[9] On the close relationship between 'glory' and 'righteousness', cf. J. Jervell, Imago Dei. Gen 1,26f im Spätjudentum, in der Gnosis und in den paulinischen Briefen (1960), pp. 180ff. 'In the Kabod of Yahveh radiance, power and righteous character are inextricably blended', A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ (1948), p. 14.

3. Nevertheless, in conclusion we must maintain that God who reveals himself in all the properties of his being, God who in his revelation is beyond human thought and utterance, has in his absolute and sovereign freedom always the freedom to utter a word. The fact that this word finally demonstrates itself in Jesus Christ to be a word of prayer and dialogue does not alter anything in this fundamental statement, which guards against a double misunderstanding of the divine ineffability: against the replacement of the word, as self-expression of the divine being, by a mere reflection, a merely surrounding glory, that would have the same kind of relation to God as the Nous to the One (Τὸ Ἕν) in Plotinus; and against the identification of the word with an ultimately wordless presence of the ineffable in the world, as the Judaism of late Antiquity more and more tended to do with the theology of the shekina, by replacing the genuine word with the 'name' of God, and the name, which likewise was no longer utterable, with the presence. Finally even the shekina, which no longer dwelt in the new Temple, became an eschatological-messianic concept. The first version, which neutralises the word (λόγος) to a secondary reflection (δόξα) of the ineffable, can be found in Philo, in dependence on the hellenistic idea of emanation. Here Moses says to God, 'I take your glory to be the powers that stand around you as your bodyguard'.[10] This breathes fresh life into the archaic Greek meaning of the word δόξα as 'opinion' and mere 'mental conception': the 'glory' is the crown of the speculations that stand around the divine essence;[11] the dialectical character of the glory on Sinai can be exhibited anew in its questionable nature.[12] The Neo-Platonic way of emphasising God's unfathomability is able to persist from Gregory of Nyssa and Pseudo-Dionysius into Palamitism with its separation between the essence and the properties or forms of expression of God.

---

[10] De Monarchia 45 (ed. Cohn V II, 17, quoted following H. Kittel, op. cit., p. 175).

But both replacements of the biblical Word underestimate God's freedom to create for himself a valid expression of his incomprehensibility. The starting-point of their thinking is in extra-biblical models, which have a validity when applied to the relationship to God of the natural man (Acts 17.27), and perhaps for the stage of the 'glory in creation', but fall quite short of the greater incomprehensibility of a making-known of himself by God. 'Word' expresses God's power to disclose what is within himself for others—this is free, and thus it was hitherto concealed—and to make it accessible to them as a gift. In this comprehensive (analogous) and not univocally philological sense, God's salvation history and its writing-down is God's word.[13] And it therefore follows that God does not ask first for sight, but for (listening) faith, from one person from another—hence the prohibition of images in the Old Testament; but that, at the same time, he attests the credibility of his words in deeds (the magnalia Dei, above all the freeing of the people 'with mighty arm' from the servitude of Egypt). In this active word, God discloses himself far more deeply than in any image that he might have sketched or constructed, for such images can offer only an intramundane glory as the symbol of the glory of God that is depicted. If God has achieved for himself his fundamental praise through his Word, then human 'images' (for example, in 'religious art') can take their place in the chorus of God's praise, but they remain in the truth only as long as they take their direction from the primary image of the divine self-expression. In this sense, the Wisdom literature can place σοφία and λόγος in the closest relationship to the δόξα of God, without so hypostatising one of them that it would no longer be the free self-expression of the God who acts and offers himself (for the covenant). It is only from this point that the bridge leads across to the New Testament's expression that God's Word becomes, in Jesus Christ, man and thereby 'image': the prohibition of images in the Old Testament had passed over the sphere of images and left them out, in order that God might of himself set up his valid image in the world.[14] [11] In Exod. II 45 (=24, 16a), Loeb, Suppl. Vol. II, p. 89.

---

[12] The 'appearance of the glory of the Lord' (εἶδος τῆς δόξης τοῦ κυρίου) is like the fire, but is not itself fire. In the epiphany, God indicates only how he wills to offer himself to the power of the one who sees to perceive him, and not how he is in himself (τοῦ θεοῦ δεικνύντος δσπερ ἐβούλετο δοκεῖν εἶναι, In Exod. II 47 (=24, 17), Loeb, Suppl. Vol. II, p. 93). Cf. De Somn. 232: God indeed appears as he is to the soul bound to the body, but by presenting himself to its imagination under foreign forms, which however are seen not as an εἰκών, but as the ἀρχέτυπος (Loeb, V 419f.).

[13] In order to maintain the full breadth of this concept, one need only recall the fundamental idea of W. von Humboldt that the individual word cannot be understood as an isolated semantic construction, but only in a context of expression. A fortiori, God's word requires the context both of his creation and of his salvation history and finally his synthesising in the ultimate incarnate word Jesus Christ, in his theandric person, his historical life, death and rising. This at once multiple and unified context of expression is the presupposition of the theological understanding of any single biblical word. It is not, accordingly, a question of reducing the context of expression to the horizon of understanding of 'modern man', although it is essential that this be taken into account. This horizon of understanding cannot absolutise itself and pose ultimate ('demythologising') demands to

b. Appearing and image

1. The fact that God's Word became flesh, thus changing from a predominantly audible word that required the ear of

---

God's word, but must rather seek the approach to his 'living ineffability' in the whole word-form which God has chosen and established for self-expression.

[14] On the questions of the present chapter, cf. in Vol. II the presentations of Denys (pp. 144–210, for the revelation of the God who remains mystery), of Anselm (pp. 211–259, for the freedom of the revelation and for the form of the word as prayer), and of Bonaventure (pp. 260–362 for the christological-trinitarian interpretation of the word); in Vol. III/1, what is said about Plato and Plotinus, and especially what is said about the problematic of immanence and transcendence in Nicholas of Cusa (pp. 552–592).

obedience to a visible word, is not without preparation in the Old Testament, inasmuch as the invisible 'I' of God spoke and established for himself a quasi-form in the perceptibility of his kabod, wherever and however this appeared or was conceptualised. Israel never confused this quasi-form with a mythical self-presentation on the natural level of the God who was exalted above the world; always, it remained a signal that pointed to the decisive thing, the sovereign Word of the all-holy God.[1] If the Old Testament position was to be left behind, without thereby in any way being sold short, then the 'appearing' of the Word, its 'becoming an image' in the visibility of human 'flesh' (i.e., of human existence), must comprise within itself the full freedom and the full personality of the active Word of Yahweh. In the last analysis, it is only the mystery of the Trinity that makes it possible to conceive of such an act of transcending without loss: the Word of God (the Father) is so personal that it itself is a person; but as God it is so essentially one with the Father, and as man so transparent to the Father in obedience, that it becomes the visible presence of God's acting and speaking in the world.

If it is necessary to draw on new, hellenistic categories to express this act of transcending, this can happen only by their being uprooted from their own native soil and prepared in such a way that they may express what is unique in the Christ event. In themselves, categories such as 'appearing' and 'image' do not have the potency necessary to express a personal act that is most intimately a free act. There are of course 'appearances', theophanies or epiphanies of gods, within paganism, whether unique and unexpected or regulated within the cult;[2] the latter may take the form of symbolic signs, or else be total.[3] But these nowhere have the momentum of a divine word that demands the repentance of the heart and faith. In a derivative usage, characteristics and titles that belong to epiphanies pass over to rulers.[4] If the concept of image (εἰκών) receives a central significance through Plato's doctrine of ideas, the dominant idea in late Platonism[5] (first of all in Iamblichus' book about the Mysteries) is that the various kinds and grades of gods can present themselves bodily in clear and shining images; in Proclus, the god retains the freedom to embody himself in this form or that according to the mystic's capacity to perceive it, for in these final, post-Christian types of Platonism it is principally a magical mysticism that is the subject. And here everywhere there are elements of brilliance and light in the foreground. The word 'epiphany' and related words (φάσις, rising of the stars; φαντασία, φάντασμα, appearance; φανερόν, visible; φανερόω I appear; etc.) belong to the Indogermanic root bhā: to shine, sparkle.

---

[1] III/2,1, pp. 34f.

[2] On what follows, see E. Pax, EPIPHANEIA. Ein religionsgeschichtlicher Beitrag zur biblischen Theologie, in: Münch. theol. St. I, 10 (1955), with bibliography.

[3] The tragedians know of this, and we find it again later in the Alexandrian lyric poets, and yet later in the hellenistic diviners of Egypt; on the last, see Vol. IV, pp. 235ff.

In the New Testament, the word 'epiphany' is used exceedingly seldom. Paul uses it once, to characterise the return of Christ more intensely (Christ will destroy Satan 'through the epiphany of his parousia', 2 Thess 2.8), and the Pastorals take up this creative use of language that comes from Paul's happy inspiration,[6] using the word five times—predominantly for the second coming of Christ (1 Tim 6.14; 2 Tim 4.1, 8; Tit 2.13), but also for his first coming (2 Tim 1.10)—until finally the language of worship differentiated between 'epiphany' for the first coming and 'parousia' for the second. But the word does not stand in isolation: it is set in a wide net of verbs and nouns of appearing, showing, (self-) disclosure, seeing, which in part have the same root (e.g., the frequent φανεροῦν especially in its Johannine use as the staple expression for God's appearing on earth; Tit 2.11, [4] Bibliography in E. Pax, op. cit. (n. 2 above), p. 50 n. 122, p. 51 n. 128. The word was 'consciously borrowed from the language of the cult' for these purposes, and thereby underwent 'a lowering of its register . . . thus, in the cult of the rulers, the term epiphanes has not at all the significance that is often attributed to it. It is not possible to speak of 'an eschatological tension and cosmological breadth' as inherent in . . . the cult of the rulers and its epiphanies and parousias' (ibid., pp. 56–57).

---

[5] For Philo, see above, pp. 270ff., nn. 9–11.

[6] Thus E. Pax, op. cit., pp. 260, 267.

'God's grace' has 'appeared', ἐπεφάνη), and in part have other roots (such as the words for 'revelation', ἀποκαλύπτεσθαι, γνωρίζειν, and δηλοῦν, or the word for showing, δεικνύναι, which always refers back to God when used with 'works' or 'signs'; finally, the expression of becoming visible, ὤφθη).

The central point around which these words revolve is the mystery of the Incarnation of the Word; in Paul, this is expressed, using the apocalyptic word-group, more as a revealing of the final mystery, which was hitherto kept hidden in God, while in John it is set forth, using the word-group proper to epiphanies, more as an appearing of the divine life and light. For none of the New Testament writers does this involve an isolated emphasis on those events in Jesus' life that could possibly be compared in terms of the history of religions with the epiphanies of the gods—the baptism and the transfiguration—that would separate them from the other historical events; they are never termed epiphanies, and it is only at a secondary stage[7] that they are brought into relation with the theophanies of the Old Testament. When the Incarnation brings a new emphasis on 'seeing',[8] this does not relegate 'hearing' to the background; the reason for this can be given neither in purely philological nor psychological terms, but only theologically, for what appears and becomes visible is in its entirety[9] 'word': everything in the one who appears is an intensified address, as grace and as demand. If the theophany in the kabod in the old covenant was the prelude and signal of the coming revelation of the Word, then in the new covenant 'the epiphany itself' demands 'the decision',[10] because appearing and word fundamentally coincide. Even in the presence of the appearances of the risen Jesus, doubts are possible,[11] and this is a sign that they require [7] Only Luke gives a role to the Old Testament doxa in the transfiguration of Christ.

[8] Cf. high points such as Lk 10.24 par. (Jn 8.56; 1 Pet 1.10f.); Jn 1.14, 39; 19.35; 1 Cor 9.1; 1 Jn 1.1, etc.

[9] Cf. my 'Gott redet als Mensch', in: Verbum Caro, Skizzen zur Theologie I (1960), pp. 73–99.

[10] E. Pax, op. cit., p. 197.

[11] Mt 28.17; Mk 16.11, 13f.; Lk 24.11, 41.

faith in the very act of seeing; and this is why John can demand an act of faith (for the second generation) even in the condition of not seeing—for ultimately the acceptance of the word who appears is more (for all generations) than a physical act of looking at an object, but is rather a 'knowing' in which hearing and seeing are integrated to form an inseparable unity.[12]

The 'epiphanies' of the Word become man, precisely because they generally place men before the decision of faith, almost never take on the character of the 'superhuman' which was proper to the kabod of Sinai (or the epiphany in the storm) in the old covenant, with its overwhelming momentum. This momentum can be felt at the transfiguration, where the aim is not the decision of the witnesses, but the revelation of the hidden personality of the one who now goes forward to his suffering; at Damascus, where it is a case of the absolute act of grace in the choice of Saul, who is chosen without being asked (cf. 1 Cor 9.16f.); and at the overwhelming of Antichrist through the eschatological epiphany of the Lord (2 Thess 2.8–10). When the kabod of Sinai is called to mind—the 'blazing fire, and darkness, and gloom, and a tempest, and the sound of a trumpet, and a voice whose words made the hearers entreat that no further words be spoken to them', 'so terrifying was the sight that Moses said, "I tremble with fear"' (Heb 12.18–21)—this is not in order to outline the image of a corresponding fulfilment in the New Testament. This image is rather transposed completely into the spiritual realm, into what lies beyond this world: instead of Sinai, the new kabod is the 'heavenly Jerusalem' as the 'city of the living God', inhabited by the angels, the souls of the righteous who have been made perfect, and by Jesus, the mediator who brings the new covenant and the sprinkling (of the whole city) with his blood (ibid., 12.22–24). The final epiphany and δόξα of God's Word spreads forth from the event of the Cross.[13]

---

[12] Jn 16.30; 1 Jn 5.20. There lies here undoubtedly the problem of the relationship between the 'eyewitnesses' and those who believe through their word (on this, cf. Vol. I, pp. 308ff., 343ff.). But even this difference must finally be relativised (though not removed), as has been shown in Vol. I.

[13] See below, pp. 292, 368f., concerning what is said in Hebrews about 'seeing'.

In the whole of the New Testament, the chief accent lies on the inter-relation of revelation and love. The revelation may be termed epiphany, or receive some other name, but it is the perfect self-gift of the 'goodness and loving-kindness of God our Saviour' (Tit 3.4): this alone is the content of the audible and visible Word, to which man replies with the gift of himself in loving faith. Here it is the first epiphany, as yet hidden, which kindles in the believers the active love which is also a yearning for the second epiphany. To name only the passages which speak explicitly of 'epiphany': already in 2 Thess 2.10 we read that those who have not made their own 'the love of the truth', which would have saved them, will 'perish' at the return of the Lord; 1 Tim 6.11ff. urges on the disciple a life in 'righteousness, godliness, faith, love, steadfastness and gentleness' that looks to the epiphany of the Lord. At 2 Tim 1.7ff., God's summons to a life of testimony in divine power, love and self-control is revealed simultaneously with the first appearing of Jesus: on the basis of the work of redemption which he has achieved, this life of testimony can develop in the security of hope in 'that Day', the second coming (1.12). 'Epiphany' means here the historical appearance of Jesus, but 'this does not belong only to the past: it is essentially orientated upon the second appearing, which it requires for its own disclosure',[14] and the time that lies between the two appearings is filled by the Christian struggle for the gospel. 2 Tim 4.1–8 clearly understands the Apostle's life of testimony as a life that has its goal in 'being offered up' (4.5), based on a 'love' of Jesus' epiphany (4.8). According to Tit 2.13f., it is a yearning waiting (προσδεχόμενοι) for the 'blessed hope, the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us'.[15] It would seem that the purpose of the first appearing with God's self-giving on the [14] E. Pax. op. cit., p. 234.

---

[15] Cf. in this connection the 'longing expectation' of the creation that looks to the definitive glorification (ἀπεκδέχεσθαι), Rom 8.19, 23, 25, and 1 Cor 1.7; Gal 5.5; Phil 3.20; Heb 9.28.

Cross was to change the existence of those who have 'seen' this into a flame that burns for the final appearing: 'Maranatha! Come, Lord!' (1 Cor 16.22; Rev 22.17).

In the new Testament as a whole, it is the Johannine understanding of the epiphany (whatever may be the modifications in the terminology) that has the final word: it is the 'Word' and the act of God's love for the world (Jn 3.16; 1 Jn 3.16) that has entered the visibility of the existence of Jesus from the 'unapproachable light' of God the Father (1 Tim 6.16). Nothing else has become visible in this epiphany. This understanding is unique to Christianity; it stands alone over against the contents of the mythological and philosophical concepts of epiphany in the ancient world, and indeed against the idea of a universally theophanous character of the world's existence; but it fulfils the promises of the old covenant, which gave the prospect of the revelation of God's glory in the end time.

The six-line early Christian hymn at 1 Tim 3.16 seeks to bear witness explicitly to the unanimous (ὁμολογουμένως) faith of the 'church of the living God', inasmuch as this is the 'pillar and bulwark of the truth', in the 'great mystery of our religion', the mystery that is Jesus Christ alone, and is embraced between the two terms 'appearing' and 'glory'. The dimensions of the mystery are developed in three antitheses: 1. 'manifested in the flesh—vindicated in the Spirit', referring to the tension between the historical man Jesus and his attestation as Word and Son of God not only in miracles, but above all through the Resurrection (cf. Rom 1.4; 1 Pet 3.18; Jn 16.10; cf. Mt 11.19; Lk 7.35); in the midpoint of this tension lies the Cross, but the whole path undertaken in the flesh is reckoned as 'manifestation' (ultimately, a manifestation of the love of God). 2. 'Seen by angels—preached among the nations' introduces into the tension between Heaven and earth the objective result of the first tension: the 'justification' of the path that led to the flesh and the Cross is seen in Heaven, and is proclaimed universally on earth. 3. 'Believed on in the world—taken up in glory' goes beyond this to show the subjective result (of both previous tensions together): the proclamation enters the hearts as faith, and the self-justification of the (triune) love through the Spirit takes up the humanity of Jesus (and with it the whole dispensation of salvation, which depends on this humanity) into God's essential glory. Synoptic theology, Pauline theology and Johannine theology flow into one another here.

2. The expressions which speak of epiphany refer more to the act of appearing; the expressions which speak of image (εἰκών) and the more or less synonymous words used thereby speak more of the result of appearing.[1] Such synonyms are ὁμοίωμα, ὁμοίωσις (similarity, likeness; used together with εἰκών at Rom 1.23; Phil 2.7, 'having been given the same form as men'), σχῆμα (shape, form of appearance; used at Phil 2.7 of Christ as man, and at 1 Cor 7.31 of the world), χαρακτήρ (imprint, then more generally, impression, particular character, outward appearance: at Heb 1.3, Christ is described as the imprint of the substance of God), μορφή (form, appearance, but also more generally, manner of being: used at Phil 2.7 of the divine and human form and manner of being of Christ; cf. Mk 16.12); ἀπαύγασμα too (radiance: used of Christ at Heb 1.3) belongs to this group. When it is said that Christ is the (epiphanous) image of the invisible God, the allusion is not so much to Gen 1.26f. (man as God's likeness), but rather to statements in the Book of Wisdom; this book certainly has a background in Platonism and Stoicism in its description of Sophia, but this background—like other extra-biblical preliminary stages—has no decisive weight in the statements of the New Testament. Here, if anywhere, one must not interpret the texts in a direction contrary to their flow, but must follow the current as it makes for the Christ event. Even granted that there were a pre-Christian pattern behind the hymn at Col 1.15–20, Paul has given this a decisive interpretation

---

[1] On this, cf. especially H. Willms, Eikon. Eine begriffsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Platonismus, I (1935); F. W. Eltester, 'Eikon im Neuen Testament', ZNW, Beiheft 23 (1958); J. Jervell, Imago Dei. Gen 1,26f im Spätjudentum, in der Gnosis und in den paulinischen Briefen, FRLANT 58 (1960); von Rad, Kittel, and Kleinknecht, art. εἰκών, TDNT II 381ff. Bibliography in all these.

by canalising the statements in an ecclesiological and soteriological direction; more than this, he has assumed everything (in 1.13) under the description of Christ as 'the Son of his love'.[2]

In order to see the extensive overlapping of these concepts in late Antiquity, one need only consider the list of statements at Wis 7.25f. about God's pre-existent Wisdom that is immanent in the world: she is 'exhalation (ἀτμίς) of the divine power, pure emanation (ἀπόρροια) of the omnipotent glory (δόξα), . . . radiance (ἀπαύγασμα) of the eternal light, undefiled mirror (ἔσοπτρον) of the divine working, and image (εἰκών) of his goodness'. Elsewhere she is called the ἀρχή (beginning) of God's ways in his works (Prov 8.22) and the craftswoman of all the works (τεχνῖτις, Wis 8.21). It is certain that the Book of Wisdom has its place in a whole current of Jewish-hellenistic speculations about (quasi-) hypostases that mediate between God and the world; Philo names, in addition to Wisdom, the Logos, the Pneuma, and the heavenly man too. And behind these speculations stands the eventful course taken in the history of ideas by the concept of 'image' after Plato: at first it is 'copy', but when, for example, in the Republic (and later in Plutarch and elsewhere) the sun becomes the image of the highest invisible good, then the copy for its part acquires so powerful a creative radiance (hence the proximity of εἰκών and δόξα: Wis 7.25f.; cf. 1 Cor 11.7; Rom 8.29; Heb 1.3; cf. 2 Cor 4.4 with 4.6 and 3.18)[3] that it in turn becomes the archetype of what is within the world. Finally, at Timaeus 92c, the cosmos as a whole becomes the most perfect 'image of the spiritual', becomes 'a god that may be perceived . . . as only-begotten'. In Plato, this image is predominantly a technically 'finished' image, the work of a 'creator' who (in the myth) is free, but the relationship becomes one of a natural dynamism above all in Stoicism and later in Neoplatonism: the 'image' is at the same time a natural emanation, with the possibility either of a subordination (so that the 'image' is poorer than the archetype, and serves above all to mediate between the invisible, wholly other God and the world) or of an identity of substance (so that the 'image' is above all a 'ray sent out', or better still a 'mirror' that is naturally 'transparent'). We find also a blending or equiparation of both aspects, as when Philo takes over these intellectual starting-points; his 'existential philosophy' collects ciphers that may make comprehensible to his hellenistic milieu his Old Testament understanding of God—an understanding, however, that is substantially dehistoricised and ethicised, and indeed threatens to become depersonalised through the preponderance of the intermediary stages.

---

[2] G. Kittel, art. cit, 397. Cf. the analysis from the standpoint of the history of religions by E. Käsemann, 'Eine urchristliche Taufliturgie' (1949), in: Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, I (4th edn. 1965), pp. 34–51 (ET 'A Primitive Christian Baptismal Liturgy' in: Essays on New Testament Themes, 1964, pp. 149–168).

[3] On the hellenistic character of this drawing-together of image and radiance, cf. Eltester, op. cit., p. 155.

The cosmological speculations about the imageless God's becoming an image—through tekhnê or through physis, in the world of ideas or in the cosmos, in Sophia or in the Logos—produced a surprisingly fruitful harvest for Christian thinking, by making ready a schema of thought that offered at one and the same time the consubstantiality of the image with the archetype and the 'personal' distinction of the two: this comes about when, for the first time, on the basis of the personality of the historical Jesus and his personal relationship to the Father, it is seen that the (quasi-)hypostases of the outgoing old covenant and their relationship to the God who is the source of all may be understood in the sense of a 'personal standing-over-against' one another. But this step can be taken only when the relationship between Father and Son is disclosed from the point of view of soteriology as the act of the Father's love in the Son: this act is ultimately accessible only to a loving faith,[4] and if it is to embrace effectively and completely the world that is to be saved, it presupposes the 'cosmological' status of Christ as the archetypal image standing over against the whole creation (Jn 1.1–3; Heb 1.3; Col 1.15ff.; Eph 1.10). It is not as though the soteriology had taken hold of an originally cosmological speculation about the 'image' in a merely external manner, in order to give it a different meaning through violent interpolations and thus make it its own; rather, the whole εἰκών-cosmology is brought to a transcendent transparency that goes beyond itself in reflection upon the love of God that has appeared in Christ and has carried its act of self-giving as far as Cross and Hell. Thus this cosmology is brought to its final, and now unequivocal, fulfilment; only so is it given its secure place in Christian theology. In this process, the idea that the 'image' makes visible the invisible fundamental being is retained—'Philip, he who sees me, sees the Son' (Jn 14.9). But any idea of a concealment of God behind an iconostasis of hypostases is abandoned, because the Son offers no technical copy or physical emanation or static icon of the Father—it is in the boundless obedience of the Son that the boundless self-giving love of the Father 'appears'. In this, the whole level of image is once again transcended, because from an earthly point of view the boundlessness of the imaging love in Cross and Hell is absolutely withheld from sight—and in being absolutely withheld from sight, it makes the incomprehensibility of the divine love of the Father 'visible'.

---

[4] In Philo, the Logos (which to a great extent occupies the position taken by Sophia in the Book of Wisdom, in closer dependence on Stoicism) can stand as the objective spirit which is determinative of the things in the world; but it is also partly subjective, inasmuch as it is the best part of man, and is portrayed as the practical norm of acting and endeavour, indeed as the ideal which will be realised 'eschatologically'. In this, it possesses both proximity to God (as 'God's world of ideas') and distance from him

Only now may one understand more deeply the closeness of the relation between εἰκών and δόξα in the New Testament. For now it can be seen not in terms of the hellenistic Jewish prehistory of the concepts, where the chief image of God was at once the radiance and the representation of his own divinity (most clearly in the symbol of the sun as θεὸς αἰσθητός,[5] but in a decisively New Testament manner.[6] Why is it that the 'glory' of Christ, who as such is not merely an 'anticipatory shadow' (Heb 8.5; 10.1) but is the 'true image' (Heb 10.1; 2 Cor 4.4), is so much greater than the glory of the old law (2 Cor 3.9f.); why is it that instead of 'image', we can just as well speak of the 'glory of Christ' (4.4), 'the glory of God on the face of Christ' (4.6)? Is this not because 'all the promises of God have found their Yes in him' (2 Cor 1.20), because God has reconciled the world to himself by 'making' Christ 'to be sin for our sake' (5.18, 21)? What Paul here calls 'glory' has its final New Testament measure in what John sees as the glory of the divine love that has appeared in Christ. The prehistory of the concept of εἰκών has 'not the least speculative interest' for Paul;[7] hence, when it is said that Christ is the image of God, no doubt is cast upon his own personality, nor upon that of the Father who makes his personal utterance in the Word become flesh.

(in the objectifying of what cannot be objectified). Seen as a whole, therefore, the 'image' in Philo remains only half-real. 'The oscillation between 'distinction', which can start at any moment, and 'confusion', which has its origin in the consciousness of the one Pneuma (or Logos, as the case may be) and brings together all the discharges as emanations to a single stream, is not to be explained merely as eclecticism; it attests the beginning of a particular endeavour in late Antiquity to make comprehensible God in his relationship to man and world, to acquire a conceptual grasp of the representation of God (in our case = θεία εἰκών, 'divine image')—God's presence and absence simultaneously—in its various nuances and degrees of strength' (Willms, op. cit., p. 85).

Here it is appropriate to say a word about 'light' in the New Testament. The central statements consciously direct attention away from the light of creation to the light of revelation, which alone matters (2 Cor 4.6). All the statements are to be oriented in this direction; here too, the analogies and preliminary stages in the history of religions are of no importance. When Jesus terms himself 'the light of the world' (Jn 8.12; 3.19; 12.36,46), with an absoluteness that excludes other lights, this is because he is 'sent', and is therefore utterly obedient to the one who sent him—the 'God, who is light, [5] When Paul emphasises in many passages the 'cognitive' elements in connection with the configuration of man to the archetype Christ (or to God himself, at Col 3.10), and John does likewise (cf., e.g., 2 Cor 3.18; 4.6; Eph 1.17; 3.17f.; Col 1.9,10; 3.10f. etc.; 1 Jn 2.27 and frequently), this knowledge stands for both Paul and John in the closest connection with love, aiming at love and proceeding from love: 'may your love abound more and more, with knowledge and all discernment . . .' (Phil 1.9).

[6] On this, cf. also Wis 13.1–9.

[7] G. Kittel, op. cit., 397.

and in whom there is no darkness at all' (1 Jn 1.5). The complete openness of obedience has already made the one sent an 'image', and now it makes him 'light'; thus, the two concepts are not opposed to one another, like the formless and the formed, for in the Trinity (in the diastasis of the Incarnation) they are elevated above this opposition.[8] The formula 'light from light' touches the essence,[9] and is analoguous in structure to the statement at Jn 5.26 about the communication of life from the Father to the Son; John brings 'light' and 'life' close to one another (1.4b; 8.12b). From men's attitude to this light, it becomes clear what its nature is. If one loved the light, one would come into the light (cf. 3.19): this would mean following Jesus (8.12), walking in the light (12.35), and believing in the light that Jesus is (12.36, 46). 'To walk in the light, as he (God) too is in the light', and thus 'to have fellowship with him', means also 'to have fellowship with one another' (1 Jn 1.6–7), i.e., 'to love one's brother': 'he who loves his brother abides in the light' (1 Jn 2.10), while hatred leaves one stumbling in the dark. In order to come out of the darkness, one must moreover give up one's own darkness, one must become true and transparent by confessing one's sins (1 Jn 1.8–10; Jn 3.19–21; cf. 1 Cor 4.5). The old expression (cf. Qumran), 'children (or sons) of the light', which always has an ethical colouring in the Gospels and in Paul (Lk 16.8; Eph 5,8; 1 Thess 5.5), acquires its ultimate depths in the Johannine transparency of the Son to the Father, the transparency that reveals the whole freedom of his obedience as love and makes him the uniquely valid light for the whole cosmos (Jn 1.4). What in him is fulfilled, is for us still coming to be, in the day that dawns (Rom 13.12; 1 Jn 2.8) to herald our final entry into the 'inheritance of his holy ones in light' (Col 1.12). This rising upwards towards the light is helped in advance by 'the good gifts and perfect gifts that come down from the Father of lights' (Jas 1.17), gifts that cannot be anything else than gifts of love (cf. Lk 11.11ff.). In the New Testament, all the talk of light is purely a metaphor for the divine love that is communicated; the metaphor, which seeks to bring understanding of this love, starts from the realm of ethics but deepens this ontologically, since the Son is proleptically light and life for all creatures that do not turn away from him; the Father 'draws' them to him (Jn 6.44), just as the Son too 'draws' all 'to himself', as the one who is 'lifted up' (12.32), and makes them know that 'I am he' (8.28). Only so can he institute them in their turn in their mission to be 'the light of the world' (Mt 5.14).[10] Light is the salvation of the world. The Johannine 'light', as the silence of this salvation, can 'say' more than even the cipher of glory with its predetermined Old Testament character; the light takes the glory up into itself and stills its lightning and thunder by assuming them into the peace of the bottomless love (cf. 1 Jn 3.19f.).

---

[8] It is here that we may find what is valid in a mysticism like that of Eckhart: 'There, where time never entered, where images never shed their light . . . God creates the whole world' (Pr. 66, Pfeiffer, 207, 9f.). It is certainly not fortuitous that John avoids the word εἰκών, just as he avoids γνῶσις: this avoidance expresses his radically anti-gnostic position, despite all the formal closeness to gnosis.

[9] E. R. Goodenough, By Light, Light (1935). Further literature on 'light' in R. Schnackenburg, Johanneische Briefe (1953), p. 66, n. 1.

In the Old Testament, towards the end of the period of the prophets, the immediate momentum of the kabod threatened to reduce itself to the level of a more superficial light. In the new covenant, everything that is termed light remains firmly set, without the possibility of being removed, in the original momentum of the event of Cross and Resurrection.

3. God's epiphany in the word and the image of his essence receives a final illumination when we ask about the manner (and thereby the contents) of the way it is seen. At this point, the reason for this section's title should become clear: vidimus gloriam (Jn 1.14). Since the first volume dealt in detail (even if only in an introductory fashion) with the seeing, we can concentrate and synthesise what has to be said here.[1] Three aspects are to be developed: (a) the essence and the dimensions of seeing as catching sight of things; (b) the 'rapture' (already contained within this) of the one who sees into the specific object of revelation;[2] (c) ultimately, this being caught up in rapture (in faith) is not the act of the one who sees, but of the one who 'is seen'. It is God himself who illuminates us, who indeed marks us with his word and places his image in us, and it is only in this grammatical reversal (in which the object becomes the active subject) that Christian seeing is attained. What is finally perceived depends on the initiative of the object.

---

[10] Cf. F. Mussner, ΖΩΗ, Die Anschauung vom 'Leben' im vierten Evangelium, in: Münch. theol. St. I, 5 (1952), pp. 164–71. As in his work as a whole, Mussner exposes here the opposition of the Johannine thinking to the gnostic thinking, and sketches at pp. 170f. a parallel to the concept of light in Isaiah.

(a) It is only on the basis of the understanding he already has of interpersonal relationships that the human person can grasp the meaning of a way of 'seeing' God through his word and his image that transcends all the affirmations of God's invisibility (Jn 1.18; 5.37f.; 6.46). This understanding is double, although the aspects are mutually linked. Human seeing is more than a sensory physiological act; it is capable of seeing intellectual connections (in space and time) in what the senses perceive, and of taking an overview of these connections that gives them a unity. This is especially the case when human seeing perceives visible or audible statements of a person who is (above all) expressing himself freely, and thereby 'responds' positively or negatively to the address of this person and the claim he makes.[3] In Christian terms, this prior understanding is not abandoned as if it were an irrelevant preliminary stage; rather it is in this understanding that the divine word-image will portray itself (without thereby dissolving itself), for 'He who does not love his brother, whom he sees, cannot love God, whom he does not see' (1 Jn 4.20). The rapture into the act of seeing is an indivisible unity both of the faith that loves Jesus and God in him (Jn 14.1) and of the fulfilment of his command of love of neighbour (14.15). Human personal seeing sees truly when it is prepared to receive (perceive) what spontaneously offers itself: here, the personal seeing is first of all a becoming aware, a hearing, which then—step by step—penetrates the sphere of understanding. Accordingly, for the Bible and especially for John, seeing has many stages which lead from the outside to the inside, from the inchoative to the perfect. It is possible to see Jesus externally, as a human being, without recognising what he personally wishes to say—and his 'saying' (12.50) embraces everything that one can hear from him, and everything that one can see and experience in him and in his working. The insight that can be had through him is 'progressive', 'dynamic';[4] if it is true that the sum of a person's utterances never exhaust this person, and moreover force one to take up positions with respect to this person which reveal the person subsequently in a different light (in a more closed or a more open way), how much more will this be true of the self-utterance of God in Jesus. Besides this, God's self-revelation in the Incarnation of his Word has become visible once and for all historically in space and time, not only as a human form, but as the salvific action that is bound to this historical form, and therefore every 'seeing' of the depths of his salvific activity is always bound to the historically literal 'seeing' of the eyewitnesses; the foundation of all later perception of the Church—a perception that goes deeper in faith and recognition!—is the fact, in its historicity, that the eyewitnesses 'saw, heard and touched'. But just as this perception—a not-seeing in the earthly sense (Jn 20.29) and a seeing as the total experience of faith (14.19)—is always based anew on the archetypal seeing of the eyewitnesses (1 Jn 1.1–3),[5] so the sensory seeing of the first disciples points beyond itself (Jn 1.50f.) to the interpretation and the understanding of the one who is seen, and the presupposition for this is his returning to the Father and his being seen no longer (16.7). Just as, for Augustine, a sentence must have died away in our ears in order for its whole meaning to be grasped, so the salvific event of Cross and Resurrection must be over so that it can be seen for the very first time (through the interpreting Spirit) in its true significance. Here, the seeing of the risen Jesus by the disciples is a mediation between 'seeing him again' (16.16) and seeing him no longer (in an earthly manner), or between a definitive and self-manifesting presence of Father and Son (14.21–23) and an absence for 'a little while' (16.16–23) which is both the triduum mortis and, for the Church, the duration of this age of the world. If one looks at the question here to the exclusion of other questions, then to speak of presence in absence is not in the least a dialectic that dissolves every image and form,[6] but is a deep mystery of love that does not lack its counterpart in the antecedent understanding of human persons.[7] But this mystery lies beyond the alternative of 'direct' or 'indirect' seeing. It is indirect inasmuch as a free person can never be seen other than in his giving of self, and indeed the person will be seen all the more directly as the gaze turns from the 'signs' (σῆμεια) to what is signified in them. This is the reason for the ambiguity of the (miraculous) signs in John: they can fascinate the gaze and then prevent it from seeing what is manifesting itself truly in the signs.[8] One must be able to read the glory that appears in the signs as transparent to the definitive 'sign' (the Cross), which shows nothing any longer of its glory, but nevertheless contains the whole of the glory to which the signs are pointing.[9] The words that are formed likewise remain, although in a different manner, 'signs', an indication, a 'parable' (16.25). And yet, in all this indirectness, the seeing is direct, because in everything that the Son is, in his talking, acting and suffering, and indeed further in the very person that reveals itself in all this, nothing else is visible than his absolute obedient love to the Father, or more precisely: in the sphere of this love, there is seen directly the absolute love

---

[1] On what follows, cf. especially C. Traets, 'Voir Jésus et le Père en lui selon l'Evangile de S. Jean': Anal. Gregoriana 159 (1967), with bibliography; F. Mussner, Die johanneische Sehweise, Questiones Disputatae 28 (1965); O. Cullmann, 'εἶδεν καὶ ἐπίστευσεν', in: Mél. Goguel (1950), pp. 52–61; I. de la Potterie, 'Οἶδα et γιγνώσκω. Les deux modes de la connaissance dans le 4e évangile', in: Bibl. 40 (1959), pp. 709–725; M. Michaelis, art. ὁράω, TDNT V 315–382; H. Wenz, 'Sehen und Erkennen bei Johannes', in: ThZ 17 (1961), pp. 17–25; H. Schlier, 'Glauben, Erkennen, Lieben nach dem JoEv' (1962), also in: Besinnung auf das NT (1964), pp. 279–293 (bibliography).

[2] We recall our original distinction between a theory of vision and a theory of rapture (Vol. I, p. 125), which however cannot ultimately be separated from each other. While Vol. I was predominantly doctrine of seeing, Vols. VI and VII are predominantly doctrine of rapture, theo-logy in the narrower sense: the determination of the human person who hears, sees and believes, by God's word, image and life: cf. III/2,1, p. 11.

---

[3] M. Scheler has made us newly aware that the basic human phenomenon is present here (and not a 'conclusion' that is drawn from the reception of sensory impressions made on an alien person who is in the 'outside world'). Cf. also the works of G. Siewerth, especially Philosophie der Sprache (1962).—'If one looks in faith at the person of Jesus and especially at the events of his life, one grasps with one's eyes the mystery that offers itself to him . . . Seeing is more than a mere registration of visual images: it is essentially an act of understanding, supported by faith': Traets, op. cit., p. 219.

[4] Traets, p. 31. The four verbs in John differentiate the distinct (though mutually compenetrating) sides of the act of seeing: 'In fact, it is necessary to have eyes in order to see (βλέπεῖν in its absolute use). In order to see really, it is necessary to observe (θεωρεῖν), i.e. to bring one's eyes to bear upon the object (what Dodd calls a 'discerning vision'). In order to discern, the gaze must be penetrated by respect, characterised by receptivity with relation to the dimensions of the object (θεᾶσθαι), which are necessary conditions if one is to grasp the mystery (βλέπειν—ὁρᾶν) by committing oneself in faith' (ibid., p. 52).

---

[5] The legitimate transitions from the 'indissoluble' base of the quality of being an eyewitness into the later seeing of the Church is the chief theme of F. Mussner Die johanneische Sehweise; but this was already validly defended before him by Traets. Cf. also M. Barth, Der Augenzeuge (1946), as well as the section about 'archetypal experience' in Vol. I, pp. 301–365.

[6] As those (mostly Protestant) authors maintain, holding that the (Johannine) 'seeing' (and 'knowing') is identical with the decision of faith. M. Michaelis: art. ὁράω, TDNT V, 362f. Thüsing too speaks in one passage of the 'closeness, indeed the identity of meaning that 'believing' and 'seeing' can have in the gospel of John' (Erhöhung und Verherrlichung, p. 15) On this theme: C. Charlier, 'La présence dans l'absence: Jean 13.31–14.31', Bible et Vie Chrét. 2 (1955), pp. 61–75.

---

[7] On the one hand, a 'silent presence' (mutual understanding without words), on the other hand, mutual understanding precisely through absence or beyond death. But none of these human experiences fully embraces the mystery of Jn 14.19ff.

[8] Bibliography on σημεῖον: TDNT VII 200f. (Rengstorf); also: L. Cerfaux, 'Les miracles, signes messianiques' (1954), in: Recueil Cerfaux, II (1954), pp. 41–50. R. Formesyn, 'Le semeion johannique et le semeion hellénistique', in: Eph. theol. Lov. 38 (1962), pp. 856–894.

[9] 'This close progressive connection between the various signs'—from Cana, to the multiplication of the loaves, to the opening of the eyes of the blind man and the raising of Lazarus, etc.—'and the Hour is probably based on the common reality of glory. The signs have their total dimension in glory, in that they anticipate this glory in a way that is at once veiled and revelatory—a way proper to the reality of the sign. The glory will manifest itself in its full efficacy in the 'sign' of the cross': Traets, op. cit., p. 137.

of the Father—for the Son and for the world. By making space for the Father, the Son becomes his Word in the exactness of the one who only reproduces what has been said to him. 'I have not spoken from myself. The Father, who sent me, has given me the command what to say and make known . . . Therefore I say what I say, as the Father has commanded me' (12.49f.; 7.16; 8.26, 28; 15.15). The same is true of the works and miracles: the Father accomplishes them in the Son (14.10).[10] In the one who makes space, in his whole conduct, one can see what fills him: the love of the Father. And the act of making space can itself be seen as love for the Father. These flow into each other in such a way that one ultimately sees that here it is not two independent persons who get together to form a working fellowship: rather, both exist, from their uttermost origin, in a substantial fellowship of love.[11] 'Seeing' therefore means, taken as a whole, the ability to interpret a person and a destiny as the epiphany of absolute love.

(b) This love, however, is not an object that one could contemplate (thereby 'objectivising' it) from an impartial stance; it is seen to be what it is, only when one is oneself seized by it. It may be the case that the natural eye has 'something of the sun' in itself, so that it can see the sun; but it is only absolute love itself that can empower one to see absolute love. In the Son who offers himself to our gaze, the Father 'draws' those who believe in him—who perceive the love in him—to the Son (Jn 6.44). In the Son who is 'raised on high' defenceless, the Son himself draws all persons to himself (12.32), and all eyes will be fixed in fascination on the one who had been pierced, whether they wish this or not (19.37), so that sooner or later—early enough or too late—all will 'recognise that I am he' (8.28). But in the empowering of sight, since it is a question of the power to love, and love can be given only in a free decision, the freedom to say yes and no, the freedom for belief and for unbelief, is operative.

---

[10] A. Vanhoye, 'Opera Jesu, donum Patris', in: Verb. Dom. 36 (1958), pp. 83–92; idem, 'L'oeuvre du Christ, don du Père', in: RSR 48 (1960), pp. 377–419.

[11] On this, and on the formulae of mutual indwelling, cf. F. Mussner, ZΩH, op. cit., pp. 151ff.

The decision to accept what is brought about by the divine love that meets one in Jesus is identical with the seeing of this love through the love that answers in faith; the decision against this fails to recognise the light that comes towards one and thus misses it, and remains accordingly without any inner light of its own in the darkness of unbelief, failure to love and failure to recognise (1.5; 3.19; 12.35). The one who does not recognise the love of God in Jesus has never heard God's voice and never seen his face (5.37). It follows from this that the close connection in the farewell discourses between faith (and love) for Jesus and his commandment of love of one's brother is a simple necessity, and the First Letter of John draws the consequences of this by making the love of one's brother (as a participation in carrying out the loving obedience of Jesus, who 'gave' his life 'for us') the criterion of being in the light, while the one who hates his brother goes into the darkness 'and does not know where he is going, because the darkness has blinded his eyes' (2.11).[12] But at the outset stands the light which pours forth its own light in favour of men (Jn 1.5, 9) with the power to make those who do not resist it—i.e., those who believe in it—children of God (1.12) and thus 'children of the light' (Jn 12.36). This enrapturing power goes so far that it not only draws to itself those who believe and love, but lets them share in its own birth from its origin, from God (1.13). Every symbolic word that transcends a mere subject-object schema (of the one who sees and the one who is seen) is pressed into service: light, life, fullness, grace, truth, glory (1.14,16), way to the Father (14.6), resurrection from death to the life of God (11.25); that which is seen, Jesus, is not only the perfect dynamic transparence to the Father, but, beyond this, the perfect immanence in us of what has been shown, so that his departure to the Father—which removes the diastasis between the one who obeys and the one who is 'greater' (14.28) and who commands him—becomes his perfect coming and indwelling together with the Father (14.23).

---

[12] On the difference between the Gospel of John and 1 John with regard to the concept of light, cf. R. Schnackenburg, Johannesbriefe (1953), pp. 100f.

(c) In a final reversal, the rapture of the one who sees into what he sees is thereby superseded. What is seen (the Word-image-light of the Father) not only determines the power of sight in the one who sees, but determines him as a whole and imprints himself on him. What is seen not only gives illumination, but also gives form and transforms by configuring to itself. The Word-image of God which has form and shows itself as light and life in a manner that transcends form (and thereby demands faith) has precisely in this the highest power to give form; the quality of form (μορφή) proper to absolute love displays itself in the transformation (μεταμορφόω).[13] In the 'meta' of the morphosis (Rom 12.2; 2 Cor 3.18) lies the element of turning away (from the 'present world', from the transient glory of the old Law, more and more to the glory of Christ), especially since Rom 12.2 warns at the same time against conformity (συσχηματίζεσθαι) to the world. At Phil 3.21 Paul speaks of the yearning for the Lord who will return and 'will transform (μετασχηματίσει) the body of our lowliness into the configuration (σύμμορφον) of the body of his glory, in accordance with (form-giving) power (ἐνέργεια) with which he is able to submit all things to himself'. The transforming μέτα goes from the σύν with the world to the σύν with Christ. Thus it is possible finally to speak without any prefix of a 'shaping (μορφωθῇ) of Christ' in the Christians (with the help of the labour pains of the apostle: Gal 4.19), and this means nothing else than the self-realisation of the innermost disposition of Christ (the σπλάγχνα Χριστοῦ, Phil 1.8; the φρονεῖν Χριστοῦ Phil 2.5) and thus of his life in them (Gal 2.20; 2 Cor 13.3,5; Col 1.27; 3.11). this is not a question of the (gnostic) recovery of one's own form, once possessed and then lost, because according to Col 3.10 the 'new man' (who has been put on, in principle, in baptism) must renew himself until the inmost point of the realisation of the archetype Christ who creates him is attained,[14] and it is only thus that he himself is to become a new form, a new creation (2 Cor 5.17; Gal 6.15). Nor is the process of giving shape, in which the transformation is brought about, primarily the result of one's own endeavours, but the result of permitting the actively shaping power of God in Christ to work. This is present in the passive form, 'letting oneself be renewed' (Eph 4.23; 2 Cor 4.16; Col 3.10). For the new image is not at all formed into the 'image of the man of earth' (1 Cor 15.49): the change in its radicality is expressed through the metaphor of an act of stripping and clothing (or putting off and putting on), with the point of transition in a nakedness without images.[15] The Synoptic faith and the Johannine believing love are ultimately the same act of permitting God to work, of letting God 'teach' oneself (Jn 6.45–46). The 'turning' of Mary Magdalene on Easter morning takes place explicitly[16] in response to the call by which Jesus turns her round. Paul's endeavour as he makes for his goal has always been overtaken in advance by the fact that he has been grasped by his goal (Phil 3.12; cf. 3.20f.). The kenosis and diastasis of Christ cannot be imitated, but a possible configuration to them lies in making oneself empty of oneself (cf. Matt 5.8) in order to be filled by the active 'image' of the love of God in Christ which imprints itself on one.

---

[13] TDNT IV 758f.; bibliography, ibid., 742.

[14] 3.11 (where Christ is named) and 3.12f. (where it is the specifically soteriological qualities of Christ that are to be imitated) show that the εἰκών to be created at Col 3.10 is Christ.

As a whole, seeing the New Testament remains originally and definitively based in the perception of the form of God's appearing in Christ, and it is this basis that lets it remain open for every form of deeper and more total grasping of the one who lets himself be seen.[17] Apart from John, it is above all the Letter to the Hebrews that lets the eye rest contemplatively on the depths of the one who shows himself. Although we do not yet see (ὁρῶμεν) the eschatological submission of all things to Christ, we 'see, discern, discover with the eyes of the Spirit' (βλέπομεν) his humiliation, but also already the glorious exaltation which followed this (2.8f.) as the 'exact reality'.[18] The gaze that looks to Christ is a gaze of reflective contemplation (κατανοήσατε, 3.1), looking up (ἀφορῶντες, 12.2) to the perfecter and founder of our faith. Even on the basis of the old covenant there is more than a mere 'prior exploration' (1 Pet 1.10f.): there is a seeing beforehand (Heb 11.13, 26, 27), although this is not the same as the seeing of the community with 'faith that sees' and pierces the hiddenness of the world of Heaven.[19] It is the 'grasping' (καταλαμβάνεσθαι) on the basis of faith and love which Paul too requires: 'the full comprehension in the sense of the experience that becomes aware'.[20] John denotes the substance of what can be seen on earth as δόξα (1.14); but even for him, 'seeing' nowhere reaches out beyond faith.[21] All seeing retains an eschatological dynamic. Jesus invites the disciples to raise their eyes together with him and contemplate the fields that are already golden for harvest (Jn 4.35): it is a messianic seeing, in the light of the end, that is required here (Cf. Lk 17.37; 21.30). For us, it remains a 'seeing in a mirror and an enigma' that only begins to press on towards the perfect accomplishment of what Paul has previously described as the reversal of the imprinting of the image and thus of the act of seeing: 'But then I will grasp fully, just as I have been fully grasped' (1 Cor 13.12).[22] [15] Rom 13.12; Eph 4.25; 6.11ff.; Col 3.8ff.; 1 Thess 5.8; Heb 12.1; Jas 1.21; 1 Pet 2.1.

---

[16] Indeed, twice: 20.14, 16. On this, cf. Bertram, TDNT VII 715 n. 6.

[17] On this: H. Schlier, art. δείκνυμι, TDNT II 25ff.

[18] C. Spicq, Hébreux II, p. 33.

---

[19] F. J. Schierse, Verheissung und Vollendung. Zur theol. Grundfrage des Hebräerbriefes (1955), pp. 160f.

[20] On the nuances of meaning: Schlier, Epheser, p. 171.

[21] Cf. Jn 19.35: 'so that you too may believe'.

[22] On this, cf. the significant exposition by Paul Schütz of the biblical 'image-word' in: Parusia, Hoffnung und Prophetie (1960), pp. 541–563. 'The figures give structure to the history. They speak in it. The Bible knows no other history than that which has been understood as a history orientated towards the figures. To see the figures means to see the history as a history that brings salvation ... When God speaks the word, the word in the image gives a form to things. It is not speech that 'puts in the picture' here. Here, it is the word that inserts itself into things through the word' (p. 546). One should assuredly lay to heart what Schütz says here, in his defence of the word of the Bible, about the 'failure of historical exegesis to deal with the Bible as linguistic event', about the self-exegesis of Scripture, about the inability of any form of scholarship to touch it, about the 'form of the text which repulses attacks', etc. But he understands the biblical word univocally as prophecy, and therefore the distinction between the image-word of the Old Testament and the Incarnation (and making visible) of the Word in Jesus Christ is not seen with sufficient clarity. The triple distinction introduced by Origen (OT as shadow, NT as image, eternity as

c. Correspondence

We expound the contents of glory as the contents of the revelation of God as he is in his divinity. But these contents are only half disclosed with the self-revelation of God in his Word which at a profounder level becomes an image; they are truly seen only where, through the response to the Word, the complete correspondence between God in himself and God in his world, the perfect harmony between archetype and copy, is attained, where the perfect sovereignty of God in creation is established, and his right(ness) and righteousness come into force in the whole realm of his lordship.

1. This goes beyond the sphere of the image and of its imprinting upon the human person, as can be seen from the fact that, although man was originally created in the image of God, it was not his own quality of being an image that he lost through his sin, but the glory of God (Rom 3.23), and that he is reintroduced through Christ, who becomes God's 'image' and 'glory', not into an original glory of the human person as such,[1] but—through the continuous transcendental truth) cannot be superseded. On this, cf. Henri de Lubac, Geist aus der Geschichte. Das Schriftverständnis des Origenes (German trans., 1968), pp. 257ff.; idem, Corpus Mysticum (2nd edn. 1949), pp. 217ff.

---

[1] It seems to me impossible to hold (with J. Jervell, Imago Dei, op. cit., pp. 180f.) that Rom 3.23 alludes to the tradition in Judaism of late Antiquity that man had possessed the original righteousness of paradise as an original glory, and that he had lost both together. As evidence for this, the words of Eve in the Vita Adae 20f. are adduced: 'At the same time, my eyes were opened and I knew that I had been stripped of my righteousness, with which I had been clothed. Then I wept and said, "Why have you done this to me, so that I have been alienated from my glory, with which I was clothed?"' The devil, who seduces Eve, has fallen from his glory, because he was unwilling to venerate the image of God in Adam; he expresses to Adam his lamentation at this (12; 16). Eve reproaches him that she, who had not robbed him of his glory (11), has been robbed by him of her glory; Adam asks God that the devil be removed, 'and give me his glory, which he has lost' (17). (Following Riessler, Altjüdisches Schrifttum ausserhalb der Bibel, 1928.) One cannot say (with P. Stuhlmacher, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus, in: FRLANT 87 (1966), p. 87, cf. p. 187) that here 'the human δόξα is the gift and the correspondence of the δόξα τοῦ θεοῦ. It is precisely not this δόξα which is in question here, but the δόξα which was originally proper both to the angel and to man.

relationship to Christ—into a far higher 'quality of being an image' and 'glory' (2 Cor 3.18), that of God in Christ. The New Testament nowhere speaks of the recovery of a lost glory of the original state, but rather of the eschatological achieving of the righteousness and glory of God in his cosmos, in which ultimately no other 'word' and 'image' speaks of God and gives light, than the eternal Son of the Father.

Thereby, a new and final level in the contents of δόξα comes to light, a level characterised by the kinship between glory and righteousness (sedek, δικαιοσύνη). For under this title, God's glory is not only displayed (as word and image) to the world, but is brought into force within the realm of the world in such a way that God is not only vindicated 'vis-à-vis' the world in his lawsuit with it, but the world is subjected to him and becomes his property, so that he establishes his law 'in it' and justifies it in God.

When the question is posed in this way, the central theme of Paul's theology takes its place in our theological aesthetics: and this is itself the central place, because with it, the presentation of the contents of glory attains its highest point. When God, by establishing the δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ through Christ, establishes his lordship and glory eschatologically in the world and at present in the Church, this means that the covenant attains its fulfilment, always promised but never reached, on a path that goes beyond every analogy in creation between archetype and image, as well as every covenantal reality in the Old Testament between Yahweh and Israel with all its legal precepts, sacrifices and mediations, and even beyond the great judgment of exile and the departure of the glory of God from the Temple. It has frequently been pointed out that the establishment of the 'righteousness of God' is closely linked in Paul to the re-appearing of God's glory (not the glory of man).[2] But is it methodologically justifiable for us to take the clearly outlined teaching which provides Pauline theology with its centre, and set it here in a context that is predetermined by Johannine interpretation of christology from the point of view of δόξα/δοξάζειν? This can be affirmed for three reasons. First, 'from the Old Testament onwards, Yahweh's glory and righteousness are clearly parallel', and indeed are often 'interchangeable terms'.[3] Second, the Johannine concept of the glorification of the Jesus who is obedient to the end by the Father (in the Resurrection) and by the Spirit (with the Church), as he fights out his lawsuit against the world, is dominated by a notion of justification that includes in itself the believers too, to such an extent 'that John, with different terminology and in a different period, defends precisely the central concern of the Pauline theology of justification'.[4] But finally, the whole of Paul's teaching about justification—about God's reconciliation with the world through Christ as the only instrument of atonement (Rom 3.25), through his absolute, eschatologically adequate act of taking the place of all (Rom 8.3; Gal 3.13; 2 Cor 5.21 etc.)—the assertion which supports the entire structure of his thought, is set down so abruptly that, if it is to be understood and accepted, it must be able at least to be related to the kind of christological explanation that is presupposed as understood in the liturgical hymn in Phil 2 and will be further developed in the Gospels, especially in John. No matter how true it may be that the word of the proclamation has a divine power of its own, and that the Spirit is bestowed on those who hear, the 'proclamation' and public announcement (Gal 3.1) that the crucified Jesus was and remains the decisive event of salvation in the entire cosmos can be accepted in faith only if a context in which it can be understood is given at the same time: besides the

---

[2] Detailed discussion of this: H. Kittel, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes (1934): 'The δόξα θεοῦ in the context of the doctrine of justification', pp. 191–221. One should compare also Rom 3.23 (where the loss of the divine glory appears in context clearly as the loss of the divine righteousness) with Rom 5.2 where justification (5.1) gives us the right to boast in hope of the divine glory; cf. also the (pre-Pauline, like Rom 3.23f.) combination of justification and (present-tense) glorification of those who are predestined at Rom 8.30. Finally, at 2 Cor 3.10 the New Testament 'ministry of justification will have a much greater glory' when contrasted with the Old Testament 'ministry of condemnation'. On the connection between glory and righteousness, cf. further: W. Thüsing, Per Christum in Deum, NT Abh. NF 1 (1965), pp. 124–134.

---

[3] Stuhlmacher, op. cit., p. 196, see above, p. 270, n. 8

[4] Ibid.

christology of obedience in Phil 2, it is above all the (likewise pre-Pauline) idea of substitution in the light of Is 53 and thence the idea of the ascent of the Christ who is experienced and attested as risen, to take the place of a mediator of the whole cosmos (1 Cor 8.6) and lord in the place of Sophia or of the Logos (Col 1.15ff.). This is why it remains a task of decisive importance to bring Paul's concern—'the righteousness of God' and 'faith'—into a connection with the christology of the New Testament as a whole that makes sense, i.e. to demonstrate that the righteousness of God reaches perfection only in christology, and that the only basis of faith is derived from christology.

When this starting point is accepted, Paul's contribution to the completion of christology orientated towards an all-inclusive theology of the history of creation and of salvation becomes indispensable, since this theology is able to balance against each other, with the utmost precision, the continuity of God's plan for the world from the creation of the world (Adam) and the promise of salvation (Abraham) until the eschatological fulfilment in Christ on the one hand, and the discontinuity between the old covenant (Moses, law) and the new covenant (the Cross and Resurrection of Christ, the gospel) on the other hand. The point of departure for the extraordinary higher valuation of the Cross of Christ and for the corresponding devaluation of the law in the context of the definitive coming into force of the justice of God in the world is to be found unmistakably in the raising of Jesus from the dead: 'the one who raises Jesus Christ from the dead' becomes a standard predicate of God (Rom 4.24; 8.11; 10.9; 1 Cor 6.14; 15.15; 2 Cor 4.14; Gal 1.1; 1 Thess 1.10), and it is precisely in this way that God shows himself to be the one who is righteous and makes righteous. Indeed, the original faith of Abraham which (proleptically) justified him, was related (in a futurist present tense, because Abraham's body was as good as dead!) to such a God of the promise, who 'gives life to the dead and calls into being what does not exist' (cf. Rom 4.5 with 4.17, 24f.). In other words, Abraham's faith, which justified him before God, had as its object something that not only transcended the parenthesis of the law which had entered as a barrier (Rom 5.20; 4.10f.; Gal 3.17), but also transcended the barrier of death which was placed in front of everything that was 'flesh', the barrier which even the purest veneration of God in the Old Testament did not dare to touch and to shake in any way other than that of an eschatological hope: in Johannine terminology, Abraham's faith looked in advance to the day of Christ (Jn 8.56). It has been sufficiently demonstrated in the preceding volume that, even according to the understanding of the Old Testament, Yahweh's covenant on Sinai—and God's benevolent and righteous governance in this covenant and, on the basis of the covenant, in his whole creation—rested on the unilateral gracious initiative of his promise to the fathers.[5] Nevertheless, three things must be remembered in the transition to Paul: first, the fact that God's covenantal righteousness, which always refused to overwhelm his weak covenant-partner and, when Israel become utterly poor and helpless in the exile, took his part, always showed itself to be essentially a gracious divine governance but still—inasmuch as it was a governance that brought about justice—contained within itself its 'reverse side' in a judgment over the enemies of Israel (and over the mockers and the godless in Israel). No matter how much a truly sovereign governance intends to bring about salvation, no matter how much it may have goodness and mercy as its essential characteristics, it must possess the power to bring about its justice in the lawless sphere that is foreign to itself, and, both in the Old Testament and in Paul, the manifestation of this righteous governance which aims to destroy injustice is called 'wrath' (Rom 1.18; 2.5 etc.). In the Old Testament, the believing people was repeatedly confronted with the prospect of the 'day of the Lord' as both the day of redemption and the day of 'wrath';[6] [5] III/2,1, pp. 138f., 147f.

---

[6] For the Bible, God's 'wrath' or his 'judging according to works' is not the expression of his righteousness, inasmuch as the latter (as sedek) denotes for the Bible his divine creation of right. Rather, his 'wrath' is a concept antithetical to his righteousness: 'One could perhaps say: its reverse side' (Stuhlmacher, op. cit., p. 84). Thus 'God's ὀργή' is 'a mode of the divine activity that has a subordinate place behind his δικαιοσύνη' (ibid., p. 98).

and the more the individual became aware of his own questionable state vis-à-vis God's requirement, the more the eschatological breakthrough of God's justice became for him the perfect expression of this: the promise and the law (which always failed to be carried out) contradicted each other.—Second, for Paul, the eschatological act of reconciliation has been done by God alone, in the sacrifice of Christ (Rom 3.25), who was made 'sin' in the place of all (2 Cor 5.21, 14f.), and was made a 'curse' (Gal 3.13), who indeed freely made himself a curse (Gal 2.20), and this has been attested in the whole world through the Resurrection (which for a Jew was likewise conceivable only in eschatological terms) and through the official proclamation of this. This is why Paul speaks of the 'righteousness of God' which has dawned in Christ, in the language of Jewish apocalyptic, which looked forward to this eschatological justification, and indeed (in the Hodayoth of Qumran) could already proleptically pray for it in advance, and consider that it had received it. But when the event of the resurrection of Christ has taken place and marches with the power of God through the world in the apostolic kerygma, the eschatological event of the righteousness of God which raises the dead takes on a presence quite different from its presence for Jewish apocalyptic, a presence which has become a proleptic participation ('down payment') in the 'kingdom of God' (Rom 14.17 and frequently) through the incorporation of the believer in the Church once for all through baptism and ever anew through the experience of the Holy Spirit who is bestowed. Nevertheless, for Paul (unlike the enthusiasts of Corinth), this is not an incorporation into the (Jewish) eschaton of the Resurrection (of Christ), but incorporation into the (Christian) eschaton of God's salvific act in Christ, i.e. into the event of his dying and rising. Faith and baptism incorporate into this event (Rom 6.3ff.; 1 Cor 11.26),[7] and it is in this event that the Christian plays his role in the eschatological struggle for the righteousness of God in the world; and yet, since he is only in via, one who has been seized but has not himself yet seized [7] Also the passages drawn from sacramental contexts: Rom 3.23ff. (eucharist); 5.8f.; 1 Cor 6.11.

---

(Phil 3.12, 9), he works out his salvation in fear and trembling (Phil 2.12), refrains from judging himself, and leaves to the Lord alone the judgment about his fidelity in being with Christ the Lord and being configured to him (1 Cor 4.2–4). Precisely because the believer (as one who has been justified) is conformed to the 'sufferings of Christ' (2 Cor 1.5), he remains tied to the 'suffering of this age of the world' (Rom 8.18) and to the mortality of all that is of the flesh (Rom 8.10); he is not yet as a whole person in the eternal life where he proleptically lives in spirit. The almost dialectical formulae of Paul, which allow the 'judgment in accordance with works'[8] (and thus the possible ὀργή) to remain a real possibility for those who have been taken hold of by God's definitive act of righteousness, are best illuminated by the Johannine affirmation that the Father has handed over all judgment to the Son (Jn 5.22), and that the believers are not freed automatically and passively through the Cross from the judgment of wrath, but are much more positively given the dignity and the requirement of configuration to Christ, and that the free Lord of the judgment remains free to judge the manner in which this configuration has been lived.[9]—Third, it must be noted along the line of the continuity from the Old Testament to Paul that the sedaka of God, the establishing of his justice in the covenant and in the cosmos as a whole, is (as has been demonstrated)[10] absolutely a real, existing mastery that is immanent in the world, which as such does not exclude his free exaltation above the world but is rather the specifically Israelite characteristic of the concept (going beyond, without contradicting, the general oriental concept of the 'immanent righteousness').[11] When Paul speaks of God's act in Christ to bring about justification, it is on the basis of the same unity of justice that both has its own existence and is laid down in sovereign freedom; indeed, the reality of the man Jesus Christ, who bears the real sin of the world and, as the one who is risen, inaugurates the real new aeon, transplants from the outset the human person who is 'declared righteous' into a sphere that has its existence and brings about its own effects.[12] We must add that God's justifying Word, within which the Christ-event is set, comes upon the human person with the entire power of the divine activity, and the Spirit of God begins at baptism to dwell in him as an equally real divine power. The act whereby God's justifying act in Christ takes possession of man is therefore at the same time also the sanctification of the man (Rom 6.19), and both are carried out through Christ (1 Cor 1.30). Thereby God's activity has given the human person within himself the correspondence to his activity, but the question remains open how human freedom will relate to this free and gracious deed of God.

---

[8] Rom 3.5; 11.20ff.; 14.10ff.; 1 Cor 1.8; 3.8, 12ff.; 4.4f.; 5.5; 9.23ff.; 10.11f.; 2 Cor 1.14; 5.10; 6.1; 11.15; Gal 6.7ff.; 1 Thess 3.13.

[9] At the point where the apparent dialectic of Paul's statements about the righteousness of God (as pure governance of salvation and nevertheless as a discerning act of judging that cannot be bribed) places the Protestants in an ever new dilemma (cf. W. Joest, Gesetz und Freiheit, 3rd edn. 1961, p. 176), stands for the Catholics the doctrine of purgatory, which can be said to formulate the abiding dimension of sternness within the judgment of the grace of Christ. Fundamentally (despite all exegetical reservations) this doctrine is expressed at 1 Cor 3.12–15, cf. especially v. 15: 'If his work is burnt up, he will suffer loss; although he himself will be saved, it will only be as through fire'.

[10] III/2,1, p. 152.

2. This is the question of faith. In order to answer it, one

---

[11] 'Fundamental for the Old Testament understanding of justice . . . is the correspondence between concepts of being and of justice, as one can easily recognise in the broad spectrum of meaning of sdk(h) and mspt': Stuhlmacher, op. cit., p. 217. H. Gese attempts to show that the concept of a 'sphere of action' of God in the world 'accomplishing destiny' is a notion commonly held in the near east: Lehre und Wirklichkeit in der alten Weisheit. Studien zu den Sprüchen Salomos und zu dem Buche Hiob (1958). The historical freedom of the covenant God who establishes justice is clothed by the prophets in the concept of a 'lawsuit' (E. von Waldow: 'Der traditionsgeschichtliche Hintergrund der prophetischen Gerichtsreden', in: BZAW 85, 1963), but this does not mean that a purely forensic act of administering justice was arrived at: the background remains the 'reliable' covenantal fidelity of Yahweh to Israel, a fidelity which includes the entire cosmos (cf. Pss 96–98). On the world-historical dimension of the righteousness of God, cf. C. Müller, Gottes Gerechtigkeit und Gottes Volk. Eine Untersuchung zu Rö 9–11, in: FRLANT 86 (1964).

[12] Stuhlmacher insists on this point: op. cit., pp. 217–220.

cannot for a moment presuppose (as in the Old Testament) that the archetypal law-giving freedom of the covenant God and its image in the freedom of the creaturely partner stand in a direct relationship over against each other; the supremely decisive fact is that the free initiative of the grace of God, who reconciles the world with himself, includes the free self-giving of the incarnate Son of God, who 'loved me and gave himself for me' (Gal 2.20) and 'became a curse for our sake' (Gal 3.13). Paul without any doubt holds that these words denote a real, existent event: 'For the love of Christ embraces us on all sides. We must judge thus: if one has died for all, then all have died, and he died for all in order that the living may no longer live for themselves, but for the one who died for them and was raised' (2 Cor 5.14f.). Naturally, this 'judgment' presupposes that the one who died was not just anyone who happened to have the idea of dying out of love for the others, but the pre-existent one who 'although rich, became poor for your sake, so that through his poverty you might become rich' (2 Cor 8.9); this means that this love, which practised renunciation and was obedient even to death on the Cross (Phil 2.6ff.), had the power to take upon itself for God sin and curse, antecedent to our awareness and consent (Rom 5.8), and to 'embrace' us all in his love 'on every side' (συνέχειν) through this effective act. On the basis of this state of affairs, Paul's 'judgment' affirms first what is the case, and then what ought to be the case: in the Cross of Christ, we have died, and since this is so, we must also ratify it: we have been deprived of our egoistic and sinful self; when we acknowedge this act of God in Christ and submit to it, 'giving God the glory' (Rom 4.20), we do not make any further 'contribution' to God's act but merely accord it its own space and give it the right that it already has (as God's right over us). This acceptance of God's action is called faith. When this right is announced by the Christ who speaks (and gives proof of himself in his sign), then faith (as in John) is the obedience that hands oneself over to him; if this right is proclaimed in the word of preaching (which bears the power of God in itself and gives proof of itself in the signs of the Spirit), then faith (as in Paul) is obedience to the gospel:

ὑπακοή πίστεως (Rom 1.5; 16.26). But this obedience does not take its measure against the power of the human person who makes space, nor against his willingness to work: its measure is the power of God's act of reconciliation, which takes as the 'means of atonement' (Rom 3.25) the hypostatic obedience of the Son of God, his kenosis or diastasis—what we have called in the first part his yielding-up of himself. It is only this fact—that faith, as the acceptance (brought about by God himself) that God works in us, has christological measurements and dimensions—that brings about the correspondence which God had established in the new covenant between his righteousness in him and in us, and truly sets in motion our configuration to God's image, which is the Son.

One can pose the question of the ultimate nature of the might and power with which God arms the word of proclamation and its sacramental seal in baptism, so that it will have in itself the force to bring about the obedience and the abandonment of self on the part of the one who hears it. Paul and John reply without any concealment. It is the might and power of the love of God (Rom 8.39), which has proleptically reconciled us with himself in Christ's vicarious sacrifice and which bears down upon us in the apostolic demand that we let ourselves be reconciled to God (2 Cor 5.20), not with the force of a logical conclusion that the hearer is to draw, but with the insistency of a conclusion that has already been truly drawn and established by God. Nevertheless, this force does not work from outside to overwhelm the hearer, but works from within to give light and conviction, because it is the force of the absolute love of God, behind which there is no higher logical court of appeal, and which accordingly is pure freedom and transposes into pure freedom the one who is convinced (and obeys). But in order for this liberation of the human person whom God loves to be accomplished perfectly, his own obedient fiat of faith, allowing God to act, is needed: it is here that justification attains its goal. If the human person wishes to come into the truth that is his own, he must acknowledge what God once and for all and irrevocably has 'laid down' καθιστάναι, Rom 5.19) for man to be. This truth encounters him in the proclamation of the absolute power of God in the absolute powerlessness of the crucified—the power of love together with its proof—and this requires first of all, not a 'work' of answering love, but the pure submission ὑποτάσσεσθαι, Rom 10.3) of faith, no matter how true it is that it is always the absolute love itself that brings about this act of obedience in man and motivates him. This is why, in the parable of marriage in Eph 5, the Church as bride is required to 'submit' (5.24) to the measurelessness of the love that is shown her, just as the fiat of the handmaiden (Lk 1.38) is required of Mary who is the true believer (11.28), and this is why, for Paul, the 'faith that moves mountains' is 'nothing' without love (1 Cor 13.2); for this surely means that this faith could never begin to come into being at all without love (which responds to the absolute love in seeing and 'judging': 2 Cor 5.14).

With the love of God 'faith comes' (Gal 3.23, 25) as an eschatological event into the world,[13] objectively present beforehand and embedded in God's activity in Christ and in his word of proclamation to such a degree that the act of faith in the word is nothing other than the acceptance of what his 'fashioning power'[14] brings with it. The 'once for all' of this fashioning power, which cannot be expressed either in the transient word of an Apostle's proclamation or in the transient word of obedience of a hearer who is ready to believe, is held fast by the unrepeatable act of baptism into the existence of faith, an act that bestows a character: this act is a participation in the death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, bestowal in him of the quality of a child of God, and bestowal of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 6.11). The eucharist perfects the movement of faith, not as a 'work' whereby one conforms oneself to Christ, but as an act of abandonment whereby one lets oneself be configured into the form of Christ (1 Cor 10.16f.).

Paul (and the letter to the Hebrews following him) now dares to base the whole dispensation of the old covenant proleptically on the eschatological faith: by believing in a God who can awaken to life what is dead (his mortified body) and give being to what does not exist, he anticipates faith in Christ. Hebrews prolongs the line through the entire old covenant from Abel, Enoch and Noah to the prophets and the Maccabees (ch. 11): it is always faith in God (who establishes his definitive salvation in Christ), and Christ himself appears here as 'pioneer and perfecter of faith' (12.2), underlining once again the christological dimension[15] (which for Paul and John is to be required) and the integration within christology of the biblical act of faith. The term (first used by Deissman)[16] 'genitivus mysticus' applied to the πίστις Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ is correct as regards the intentionality of the phrase, because the act of faith, for all its freedom, is only the admission of what God has accomplished and established in Christ (and therefore continues to work powerfully). But it is precisely the antecedent character of God's activity that justifies the objective form of faith as word, and indeed as teaching:[17] this activity of God in Christ is so rich and has so many aspects that it can legitimately be put into ever new theological propositions.

---

[13] O. Michel, Römer, p. 41.

[14] H. Schlier, Galater, p. 90.

3. The door through which faith leads opens on to such a superabundance of realities, all of which express in mutual compenetration the ultimate goal of justifying grace and of faith—(eternal) life, existence as a sharing in God, the pouring-out of the Holy Spirit, knowledge of the revealed

---

[15] I repeat once again that the 'obedience of faith' (Rom 1.5) in Christian terms (as opposed to the Jewish 'work') exists only because it has its first objective presupposition in the absolute (kenotic) obedience of the Son of God, and because the second objective presupposition follows immediately from the first: thanks to his kenotic obedience, the Son of God is capable of letting his existence be determined by the Father as the bearing of 'our' ('my') utterly real guilt and unrighteousness. No matter how great the human limitations of the unconditional acknowledgment by the hearer of the word of this prior event may seem 'psychologically', the centre of gravity of this acknowledgment lies outside itself and it knows that it is both determined and brought about by this centre of gravity.

[16] Paulus (2nd edn. 1925), p. 125.

[17] O. Kuss, op. cit. p. 135, has emphasised that the Christian faith is also (though not only) 'faith that something is the case'.

depths of God, etc.—that we are obliged here to make a strict selection of the texts in accordance with our guiding idea of a theological aesthetics. Although it is certainly true that everything that is to be said here is governed by the 'eschatological reservation', which never permits us, as persons showered with the riches of God, to do more than 'go towards' complete possession, nevertheless it is equally true that we are required to 'stand fast', to 'persevere', to 'remain' in what is given us as an 'abiding' (because eschatological) good.[1] Then will 'the God of all grace, who has called you in Christ to eternal glory, after you have suffered a little, also restore, establish, strengthen and settle you' (1 Pet 5.10). The one who goes onward and remains does not establish himself in his steadfastness: he is established by the steadfastness that is God himself. For all is grace: being called, being addressed by the gospel, coming to faith and entering upon the goods of faith through the baptism that confers stability and through the ever greater stabilising of the Christian life. But if faith was the act of making space for the gift of God, the Son who has been given up, then he is it who entered into the believer with the dimensions of his being as one who has been given up and with his own self-yielding. The language about 'remaining', and correspondingly about 'indwelling', is reversed: the believer remains and dwells in Christ and in God only because Christ and God dwell in him and remain in him,[2] the formulae of indwelling become reciprocal,[3] and to this extent they are unique, especially in John,[4] because they presuppose the trinitarian revelation of the inmost depth of God for the believer who makes space in himself: more precisely, they presuppose the identity of the love between Father and Son both in the separation (which allows the obedience of faith to be conformed to the obedience of Christ) and in the abolition of this separation. It is only thus that the double formulae of immanence can be set up: 'I in them, you in me' (Jn 17.23): 'as the Father has loved me, I have loved you. Remain in my love: if you keep my commandments, you remain in my love, as I too remain in the love of my Father, since I have kept his commandments' (15.9f.).

---

[1] Jesus himself is the 'way' (Jn 14.6; cf. G. Söhngen, Der Weg der abendländischen Theologie, 1959), and the way along which he walks is prepared for him by the Baptist. Thus, the Christian too must 'walk': in love (Eph 5.2; 1 Jn 2.6), in wisdom (Col 4.5), in newness of life (Rom 6.4), in the Spirit (Rom 8.4), in a manner worthy of God (1 Thess 2.12), of the Lord (Col 1.10), of his vocation (Eph 4.1), etc.

But one also stands in firmness and constancy in the reality that has been received: in the gospel that has been received (1 Cor 15.1–2); one 'perseveres' in the grace of God (Acts 13.43; 11.23) and 'is given a place in the true grace of God' (1 Pet 5.12), and remains 'standing firm' in it (Rom 5.2). It is, of course, also possible to 'fall out of grace' (Gal 5.4), and one must therefore take care to 'persevere' in it (Acts 14.22), one must examine whether one is still in it (2 Cor 13.5), one must hold fast to it (Rom 11.20; 1 Cor 16.13; 2 Cor 1.24), and above all remain: in the light (1 Jn 2.10), in Jesus' word (Jn 8.31), in the love of Jesus (Jn 15.9, 10), in the vine (15.4f.), in the teaching (2 Jn 9), in faith and love (1 Tim 2.15), etc.

The indwelling of Father and Son in the believers is the direct result of the love (Jn 14.23) to which faith provided access, by knowing, acknowledging and accepting this love, this indwelling is the fulfilment of what was only externally accomplished in the old covenant in the indwelling of God's glory in the tent of the covenant and in the Temple. Now, the believers have become the true temple of God, both as the Church[5] and as individuals;[6] but this image is less prominent than images of what is living and spiritual: the images of water that wells up and flows,[7] of growth and bearing fruit,[8] of the gift of the divine Spirit himself to the believers,[9] and ultimately the image of being born of God.[10] The sources of the images run into one another in Paul's exuberant language: the words that express the 'superabundance' (ὑπερπερισσεύειν, Rom 5.20; ὑπερπλεονάζειν, 1 Tim 1.14) merge the ideas of 'springing up' and 'growing' into one another, and in the antithesis of the old and the new Adam (Rom 5) the latter can be expressed only in ever new expressions of profusion, of preponderance, of the priority that can no longer be measured and that shatters all proportion. The word 'fullness', 'full', 'being filled' πληροφορία, 1 Thess 1.5; Col 2.2; Heb 10.22) is frequently used to denote this superabundance. The images from nature (flowing water and light, growing life) transcend themselves into the two definitive descriptions of the perfected justification of God in his covenant with the world: the communication of his Spirit to the hearts of the believers, and their being born of the Father together with the Son. Since the creature (as 'nature') is completely indwelt there in its inmost depth by God's triune divinity ('supernature'), so that the image becomes the space in which the archetype dwells and develops its power as grace (δύναμις—χάρις),[11] it is meaningless to attempt to exclude carefully every collaboration of the creature's freedom within the indwelling divine freedom, in order to avoid any appearance of synergism. For God's affirmation of his creature in the accomplishment of his covenant does not in the least aim at bringing the powers of the creature to silence and replacing

---

[2] The Word of God remains in you (1 Jn 2.14; Jn 8.31; 15.7); what has been heard from the beginning (1 Jn 2.24), the anointing (2.27), the seed of God (3.9), the love of God (4.18), God (4.12, 15, 16), the truth (2 Jn 2), the God of Christ (2 Jn 9).

[3] Jn 6.56; 15.4,5,7; 1 Jn 3.24; 4.13,15,16.

[4] R. Schnackenburg, Johannesbriefe p. 93.

[5] 2 Cor 6.16; 1 Pet 2.5.

[6] 1 Cor 3.16f.; 6.19; Rom 8.9; 2 Tim 1.14; cf. Gal 4.6.

[7] Jn 4.10,13f.; 7.38; 19.34; 1 Jn 5.6ff. The image of pouring out is found in the prophets (Is 32.15; 44.3; 55.1; 58.11; Joel 3.1f.; Ezek 36.25; 37.5,14; 39.29; Zech 12.10; 13.1; 14.8); it is taken over for the gift of Pentecost (Acts 2.33; cf. 10.45) and is used decisively for the pouring out of the love of God in our hearts through the communication of the Holy Spirit: Rom 5.5.

[8] Beginning with the Synoptic evangelists' parables of growth, and including the image of the vine in John and the numerous mentions of growth and abundance in the Christian life: grace must grow (Rom 5.15, 17, 20; 6.1; 15.13; 2 Cor 4.15; 8.7; 9.8; Eph 1.8; 1 Tim 1.14); likewise faith (2 Cor 8.7; 2 Thess 1.3), love (2 Thess 1.3), justice (Mt 5.20; cf. 13.12), knowledge (Phil 1.9), and joy (2 Cor 7.4; 8.2; cf. further: 10.15; Eph 2.21; 4.15; Col 1.6,10; 2.19; 1 Pet 2.2; 2 Pet 3.18).

---

[9] Rom 5.5; 1 Thess 4.8; 1 Cor 2.16; 3.16.

[10] Jn 1.13; 3.5f.; Tit 3.5; and on this basis, all the passages that call Christians the children (sons) of God.

[11] Both are often mentioned together: 2 Thess 1.11f.; 2 Tim 1.8f.; 2.1; Stephen is 'full of χάρις δυνάμις and (Acts 6.8). Paul is a servant of the gospel 'in accordance with the gift of the grace of God' which was 'given' him 'in keeping with the power of his might': Eph 3.7. Paul prays that the thorn in his flesh may be taken away; the Lord replies, 'My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is revealed in weakness' (2 Cor 12.9).

them: rather, his aim is to empower them through the indwelling of his own working to an activity that lies beyond any capacity of their own for working.[12] For the 'new man created after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness' (Eph 4.24), God at the same time 'prepares in advance good works in which we are to make progress' (Eph 2.10).

The full accomplishment of the covenant, and thus the full correspondence, becomes possible only when the immanent Trinity becomes the economic Trinity: when, therefore, the righteousness (sedek) of the Old Testament, as a relatedness affecting the whole of man's being, is transcendended and deepened to a communication to the creature of the relationality of the triune life which affects the whole of being within the Godhead. For, in God, the relationship of the Father and the Son in the Spirit of God is his very being. If—through the kenotic obedience of the Son which went to the point of breathing out his Spirit—faith is given access to God to the point of being born with the Son from the Father and of participation in the Spirit of the Father and the Son (Rom 8.9f.), then grace too rises up above the antithesis between relationship and being. The condition for this unheard-of process is that it should take place while one is walking: viz., while one walks along the way of the Son together with him: the Spirit confirms to us, when we cry 'Abba', that we are children of the Father and fellow-heirs with the Son, and so it is necessary only 'to share in his sufferings, in order to be glorified together with him' (Rom 8.15ff.). Since, in God, being (φύσις, 2 Pet 1.4) and being spirit (consciousness, personal life) are one, the element of knowledge, as experience in which appropriation is made (γνῶσις, ἐπίγνωσις and correspondingly of responsibility for the gift of grace, plays a major role in the communication of the divine life through grace. This does not take the form of a gnostic particular knowledge, but occurs as the self-actualisation in prayer and existence of the ever wider dimensions of the gift that has been received (Eph 3.18f.), and this is possible only in the Holy Spirit (1 Jn 3.24; 4.13), who knows the depths of the Godhead (1 Cor 2.16,11; 12.8), but must be related essentially to the dimensions of the separation within God, to the Cross and Resurrection (Phil 3.10f.). This knowledge thus always remains bound to the act of faith: both proceed together (Jn 6.69; 8.31f.; 10.38; 16.30; 17.7f., etc.).

---

[12] The fact that Paul is weak in Christ and in his crucifixion, while God's word shows itself to be vigorously alive in his proclamation (2 Cor 13.4), does not exclude, but rather includes the fact that he has committed all his powers in carrying out his ministry and has worn himself out as parents do for their children (2 Cor 12.15).

Viewed from the point of knowledge, the unutterable transcendence of boundaries by which God enters the creature, the ineffable dialogue within our spirit between divine Spirit and human spirit (Rom 8.16; 1 Jn 5.9ff.), is once again seen to contain an element of distance (in the midst of profusion that goes beyond all measure) which in turn sets down a certain measure. The primary reason for this is not that the creature, feeling itself to be unworthy of the greatness of the gift, would distance itself (cf. Lk 5.8; Jn 13.8), but that the one who makes the gift makes an appropriate—measured—allocation precisely in the act of communication. Here we see the essence of the New Testament Church in its particularity, as distinct from the people of the Old Testament which was God's partner. The individual believer, who is so utterly overwhelmed by the gift of God's grace, never experiences this overwhelming in a private manner, but as an act by which he is expropriated and given a new relationship, out beyond his own sphere, to the Church as a whole. But since, thanks to baptism and the eucharist, the Church is the 'body of Christ', what takes place is both the expropriation of the original faith itself, which is now seen in a social context, and the expropriation of love in favour of the brothers, an expropriation which is simultaneously vertical and horizontal. The Church, which is at once both the body of Christ and the people of God, is the unity—always existing a priori and indissoluble—of both expropriations and hence of both ministries. The Greek aesthetical concept of measure μέτρον and rule κανών take on a meaning in the New Testament that is coined afresh from the innermost trinitarian-ecclesiological depths.—Whereas the mission of the Son (and therein his Spirit bestowed on him by the Father) is 'without measure' (Jn 3.34),[13] the mission is measured out to the individual as 'grace in accordance with the measure of the gift of Christ' (Eph 4.7), thus expressing both Christ's free sovereignty over the body and the allocation of the member to its role in the building-up of the body as a whole. Accordingly, 'no one is to have thoughts above what is appropriate (δεῖ), each one in keeping with the measure of faith which God has assigned to him' (Rom 12.3): this cannot mean an internal limitation of faith, but must rather indicate its personal specification by the freedom of the God who distributes it and by the aim of the ecclesial ministry. But all ministerial graces (χαρίσματα) are subsumed together by the 'analogy of faith' (12.6), in terms of which the one and indivisible entire faith of the Church shades off by analogy in the individuals,[14] in favour of the very unity which exists and is coming into being (εις τὴν ἑνότητα, Eph 4.13). The eschatological integration as the 'fullness of Christ' itself receives a measurement (μέτρον ἡλικίας τοῦ πληρώματος τοῦ χριστοῦ, Eph 4.13) from the apportionings that are made of what is in itself measureless, and this permits us to understand the images in Old and New Testaments of the measuring of the holy eschatological city (Rev 11.1; 21.15–17; following Ezek 40.3,5ff.). One understands, too, precisely the correspondance between the heavenly (angelic) unit of measurement and the human unit of measurement (Rev 21.17), which produces in the act of measuring a completely equal measure in length, breadth and height (v. 16; cf. Eph 3.18). The correspondence between the heavenly and the earthly unit of measurement ultimately explains Lk 6.36–38, where we are promised a 'measure that is shaken down, flowing over', but in such a way that we shall be measured at the judgment with the same measure which we have employed for measuring: 'Do not judge, and so you will not be judged . . . forgive, and so you will be forgiven'. This depends on the foregoing requirement of lending without expecting anything in return, in keeping with the way in which 'your Father is merciful': the measureless abundance of the grace of God becomes the measure for the Christian; charisms are not mentioned here, but rather the entire allocation of the love of God in Christ, which however contains within the gift the requirement which corresponds to it.[15]

---

[13] Unlike the missions of the prophets, to whom God had imparted his ruach in a measured manner: Billerbeck ad loc.; Deissner, TDNT IV 634, n. 11.

[14] It is at this point that the limitation of Paul's 'boasting' is to be drawn. Unlike the self-praising of his adversaries, Paul's 'boasting' may not go beyond measure, but must be 'in accordance with the measure of the area allotted to me' (κατὰ τὸ μέτρον τοῦ κανόνος), to which however the Corinthians belong: 2 Cor 10.13. If their faith increases in Paul's κανών (v. 15), he will be able to carry the gospel out even beyond the present area, without wishing to boast in the new field (κανών) of the works that have already been performed there (v. 16). There is thus no other possibility of Christian self-estimation that the mission, which discloses itself, not in a comparison with itself (v. 12), but becomes tangible on the one hand in the grace allotted by God, and on the other hand in the course it takes within the field of work. Cf. K. Prümm, Diakonia Pneumatos, I (1967), pp. 588f.—At Gal 6.16, however, κανών is the universal Christian (and thereby 'blessed') guiding principle that the pre-Christian territorial divisions between Judaism and paganism have fallen away, and that in the area thus opened up nothing now rules other than 'faith made effective through love' (Gal 5.6).

This whole possibility of combining the measureless profusion of grace on the one hand and allocation and measure on the other hand is the decisively Christian element in a theological aesthetics, because its essential basis is the inner Trinity of God and the coming-forth of this Trinity in the Incarnation.[16] Thereby, all the religious concepts of measure contained in the Old Testament are taken up and superseded: the idea that the world, which God 'has ordered according to number, weight and measure' (Wis 11.20), and whose measurements only God knows (Is 40.12; Job 28.25; 38.5), already depends on a condescension of his omnipotence and superior power, i.e. determines a background of grace and mercy;[17] further, the idea that God insists on the use of the right measure and weight, precisely vis-à-vis the poor (Amos 8.4ff.; Mic 6.10f.; Lev 19.35f.; Deut 25.14f.; Prov 11.1; 20.10), because his truthfulness is fundamentally one with his mercy; and finally, the precise prescriptions of measure for the cult: the numbers that are imparted bear in themselves something of the order of God, for they correspond to the archetype of the divine sanctuary seen by Moses in Heaven (Ex 35ff.) and to the eschatological temple seen by Ezekiel (Ezek 40ff.); only, in the New Testament, these numbers become the expression of the living missions of the saints, and the measurements of the heavenly Jerusalem are the measurements of the living eschatological bride of the Lamb.

---

[15] There are some rabbinic parallels to the retributive measurement in accordance with works (cf. Billerbeck, I, pp. 444f.), but the relationship of this 'measuring judgment' to the absolute mercy of God in Christ is new.

[16] On this, cf. the remarks of Karl Barth, quoted at the beginning, about the beauty of God in his Trinity and his Incarnation: Kirchliche Dogmatik, II/1, pp. 741ff. (ET Church Dogmatics, II/1, pp. 657ff.); C. Spicq, 'Grâce et Beauté', in: Théologie Morale du NT, I (1965), pp. 146–153.

At the end of this unfolding of the concept of glory, starting from word and image and arriving at righteousness, the concepts of the beauty of revelation inherent in this concept have come clearly into view. God's capacity for expression communicated itself both as a measurelessness of life welling up and light sparkling from the depths, and also as a fullness of order and measure. These are the concepts which were our original point of departure[18] and which have accompanied us through all the historical transformations of theological and philosophical aesthetics. The two poles of tension of the beautiful—the inner light and the outer form—are best embraced by the biblical concept of appropriateness: πρέπει, πρέπον ἐστίν reinforced in δεῖ, δέον ἐστίν to take on an inner rightness which bears its evident character in itself and can be and can appear in no other form because of its own law and being. We know and remember how Anselm made this 'free necessity' the supporting pillar of his theological aesthetics, but also how Hegel removed it from the biblical sphere and gave it a new, purely philosophical meaning. At his baptism, Jesus wants what is 'seemly' to take place (Mt 3.15). But God too brings about what is 'seemly', when he wills to lead Jesus, as the author of the salvation of all God's sons, to perfection through the Passion (Heb 2.10), and again he held it to be 'fitting' that this high priest should not come from the number of sinners, but should be holy, guiltless and pure (Heb 7.26). Likewise, however, it is 'fitting' for the 'saints', the Christians, that things like fornication and impurity or greed should not even be named among them (Eph 5.3).[19] Δεῖ is stronger because in most cases it explicitly includes the hard law of the necessity of suffering even to the point of the Cross and Hell as the centre of God's free salvific will.[20] In the background stands the 'eschatological-apocalyptic' element determined by God, which must take place, not because of a necessity within history, but because of the ultimate intention of God which gives all history its finality in view of its goal. 'The Son of Man must suffer much' (Mk 8.31 par., Lk 17.25). With this 'must', Jesus draws his little flock with him along his way, as far as this is possible. At Easter, he explains the meaning of what has happened on the basis of this 'must' (Lk 24.7, 26f., 44f.). For John, who sees everything from the viewpoint of the 'hour', everything disposes itself around the 'hour' with this kind of free necessity.[21] Nothing can be more free than the Logos of God, since God is his own freely ruling norm both in himself and in his self-revelation. But likewise, no logic can be more necessary than the absolute Logos, since every logic has its origin in him. Therefore God's self-revelation, precisely at the point where it goes into the Cross and Hell, must knock down before itself all innerworldly concepts of the beautiful, and then, by transcending them in a sovereign manner, give them norm and fulfilment.

---

[17] Cf. the context of Wis 11.20!

[18] Vol. I, pp. 20f.

'Beauty' means here that God succeeds in his revelation in justifying both himself and his creatures in one and the same act: and this, not ab extra, but in such a way that he can 'set' his law 'in the depth of the being' of these creatures and 'write it on their heart' (Jer 31.33). Through the obedience of the Son and the obedience of faith which was brought about thereby, through this double total self-yielding to God, it became possible for God to insert his law of eternal life in the heart of the realm of death and desolation, and to make out of death the resurrection of the dead. Only then is God's lawsuit with the world decided in his favour, only then do his righteousness and his will reign on earth as in Heaven. Only then can God's lordship over the world be not only the sublimity of his self-portrayal (in the gospel), but his eschatological glory.

---

[19] On what is especially appropriate for women, cf. 1 Tim 2.10; 1 Cor 1.13.

[20] E. Fascher, 'Theologische Betrachtungen über δεῖ': Festschrift R. Bultmann, ZNW Beiheft 21 (1954). K. H. Schelkle, Die Passion Jesu (1949), pp. 109ff. Further bibiliography: ibid., p. 111, n. 65.

[21] 3.7,14,30; 4.4,20; 9.4; 10.16; 12.34; 20.9. In Acts: 1.16; 3.21 (Peter); 17.3 (Paul).

But this chapter, whose purpose is to unfold the content of 'glory', has not yet brought us to this point; otherwise, we should be at the end of our investigation. We have only reached the point at which, through the establishing of God's righteousness in the Cross and Resurrection of Christ, his victory has been won in principle and can be proclaimed. We ourselves, however, are still in via towards this definitive victory of God. The eschatological glory shines on us proleptically, but we only walk towards it—in tribulation, threatened from without and within. Therefore the image of the hidden Son of Man, going towards his Cross, remains just as relevant for us as the image of the glorified Son of Man. In our exegesis, we have portrayed the impact of the Cross as the appearing of the glory of God by means of an anticipatory move: we have contemplated the Cross from the standpoint of the final interpreter, John, and we have given Paul's doctrine of salvation its place within the framework of this exegesis. If the entire picture of the New Testament is not to be falsified, we must complete this in two directions. First, we must take the step back to the Synoptic Jesus, precisely to the extent that he is the Jesus before Easter, not yet glorified, in order to look forwards from that standpoint through Paul to John. Then, in the third part of this investigation, we must consider the Christian response of man to God, in its appropriateness to the whole kerygma: the way in which man has to glorify the glory of the love of God in his existence, without himself being in the glory of God for the present.

3. HIDDENNESS

We must go back to the beginning. In order to grasp the impact of the representation of God in the Cross of Jesus, we were concerned there with the first origin of the kabod of Yahweh. It was only the impact that met the Son; no mighty splendour shone out from the event itself. Then we leapt over to the end, which is the opposite of this: the Johannine interpretation of the entire event of the Incarnation as the trinitarian δόξα that surpasses and rounds off all splendour. In the light of this uttermost point, the content of the cipher 'glory' in the New Testament was unfolded: divine self-expression (word), self-representation (image), self-realisation in the other (righteousness as grace). But a gulf yawns between the impact of the naked Cross and this developed theology, and we must now turn our attention to this, in order to follow the historical process of what is absolutely inglorious in the 'form of a slave' (Phil 2.7), so that we can see that this lack of glory is what the 'form of a slave' wishes to make present, displaying it only through its absolute hiddenness. And what discloses itself more and more here—to the point where John describes it as vision—loses nothing of its hiddenness thereby. God is incomprehensible, and the more he offers himself to our understanding mind, the more his incomprehensibility grows. Comprehendit incomprehensibile esse.[1] This is true, no longer as a theorem of negative theology in general, but of the most concrete theology of all, which Paul calls the 'folly of God' in the Cross of Christ (1 Cor 1.25).

a. Hidden life

1. Just as the concept of kabod/δόξα runs through the Old Testament, so the concept of δόξα runs through all strata of the New Testament, and both have the characteristic of

---

[1] [He understands that it is incomprehensible]: Anselm, Monologion 64 (Schmitt I, 75, 11–12). Cf. Vol. II, p. 231.

eluding every direct representation.[2] Even the Jewish replacement of δόξα by the shekinah (presence dwelling near at hand), and the replacement of this term, which seemed to be still too concrete, by 'word' (memra) and 'name', bears witness to the increasing certainty that God's glory, which in Ezekiel left the Temple, had not come back into the new buildings: the presence of the δόξα will be messianic-apocalyptic. In Daniel, the Son of Man is given 'glory and kingdom' (7.14 Th) and 'authority' (7.14 LXX), and in the Similitudes of Enoch he sits as judge on the throne of glory.[3] There can be no doubt that the oldest Synoptic logia about glory, linking δόξα with the Son of Man in a wholly future-eschatological manner, have their starting-point here: Mk 8.38; 13.26; (14.62 par.), and, with the same conception, Mk 10.37; Mt 25.31; 19.28. Jesus did not claim doxa for his earthly life—especially as he even makes a distinction at Mk 8.38 between his present self and the coming Son of Man—nor did his disciples attribute this to him. But in Luke we see God's glory breaking in on all sides up to and even beyond the limits of Jesus' earthly life, and we must ask whether Luke is stating something objectively new in this, or is merely making explicit something that was present without being mentioned in Mark (and Matthew) too. The visible kabod of God shines around the shepherds by means of the Christmas angel (2.9), and the heavenly hosts give glory to God on high (2.13f.). At the royal entry of the Messiah into Jerusalem, the crowd once again praises this divine glory in the highest (19.38). And certainly, when Luke has Mary 'overshadowed' by the Holy Spirit, he is thinking of the cloud of the kabod over the tent of the covenant and over the Temple; and when Jesus is presented in the Temple, there takes place for Luke the eschatological re-entry of the divine glory of Ezekiel's vision into the sanctuary, for Simeon sings: 'My eyes have seen your glory: light for the illumination of the Gentiles, and glory of your people Israel' (2.30ff.). Further, on the mountain of the transfiguration, not only do Moses and Elijah appear 'in glory' (9.31)—that would be understandable, since they come from the region of Heaven—but the three disciples see explicitly 'his glory', the glory of Jesus himself (9.32), a phrase that Luke has inserted with unusual emphasis in the earlier eschatological declaration too (Lk 9.26, as compared to Mk 8.38), and that will be repeated by the Risen Jesus in the conversation with the disciples on the way to Emmaus: 'Was it not necessary for the Christ to suffer these things, and thus to enter into his glory? (24.26). There is but a single step from here to John. Nevertheless, Luke remains essentially at the stage of the Old Testament figure: the glory is essentially the divine sphere that breaks in and clothes round, even when Mary becomes the living tent of the covenant and Jesus the personal Temple; the boundary is crossed only at the transfiguration, which somehow seems to break forth from the interior of Jesus when he is at prayer; but this was already true in the case of Matthew, where the shining garments of Mark are amplified by means of the face shining like the sun. This small and yet significant change alerts us to the question whether Luke does not simply put a name to something that is implicitly present in all the Synoptists.

---

[2] For the Old Testament, cf. III/2.1: Das Heute ohne Herrlichkeit, pp. 337ff., esp. p. 340.

[3] Ethiopic Enoch 45.3; 51.3; 55.4; 61.8; 62.2ff.; 69.27ff.

A. M. Ramsey points out that, for the old covenant, the start of the messianic age was thought of as indissolubly bound to the coming of the divine glory (cf. Is 35.1–6; 60.1, 13 etc.), and since, with Jesus, the kingdom of God is truly 'coming', indeed 'has come' (Mk 1.15; Mt 12.28 par.; 11.4–6 par.), then the status of the one as 'coming' or 'having come' must imply the same status for the other. And if Jesus saw the coming of the kingdom as bound to the necessity of his suffering, then it is fundamentally impossible to exclude the suffering from the glory of the kingdom.[4] Nevertheless there is here an element of reserve (indeed, one that is remarkable in Luke):[5] glory, as the old covenant understands and awaits it, is absolutely not an appropriate word to characterise the earthly life of Jesus. But is the reservation of the Synoptics then strong enough? Do they not, in spite of everything, look backwards from Easter and give a retrospective interpretation that pours too much paschal splendour over the life of Jesus?

---

[4] A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ: 'The synthesis of the messianic work of Christ and the Passion of Christ goes back to Christ's own teaching. If "glory" is rightly ascribed to the former, it cannot ultimately be withheld from the latter' (p. 38).

[5] Ramsey points out that while Luke expands the quotation from Is 40.3–5 beyond Mark and Matthew in order to characterise the mission of

Even if one rejects the expression 'demythologisation'—since, if one presupposes the reality of the Resurrection and of the disciples' experience of it, the interpretation of what went before in the light of the Resurrection was legitimate and necessary—there could still remain the question of a 'depaschalisation' of the accounts of Jesus' life. As we know, this is a very delicate question that can be approached only with the greatest theological tact. It is delicate because it would be necessary to carry out an exhaustively detailed examination of the extent to which, perhaps through necessity, the 'sovereignty' of the Son of God in his lowly state—a sovereignty that was certainly present, but scarcely to be grasped in words and concepts—had to be described with the hues and forms of expression of the 'glory' of the Old Testament and eschatology. One can think of a boundary case like Jn 18.6: is not the visible (!) sovereignty expressed here through an image of eschatological power and splendour (2 Thess 2.8)? But how can one give expression to this powerless sovereignty, that refuses to take up weapons and yet cuts down its opponents in its very powerlessness—a sovereignty that is something quite different from the Greek 'noble simplicity' or the romantic 'childlikeness'? The experience of Jesus' sovereignty in his refusal to make any display of himself or advertise himself (Jn 7.4) must have seemed so central to the disciples that they used every means at their disposal, when they began their interpretation from the starting point of the event of Cross and Resurrection, in order to make this sovereignty perceptible; they were sometimes tempted, while doing this, to trespass over the boundaries of the strict hiddenness, of the incognito. But one should always bear in mind that God's incognito in Jesus was simultaneously his appearing in Jesus' mission and task, and the Baptist, he 'strangely omits the words: "and the glory of God shall be seen"' (op. cit., p. 37, n.).

that this unity of disclosure and concealment was absolutely unique, without any point of comparison in this world. Jesus' words were truly the words of omnipotence (Mk 13.31), of the definitive demand for decision, of the bestowal of grace and promise—concealed beneath a quite unremarkable human situation. His miracles were the true signs of the fulfilment of what had been prophesied; and yet those who saw them had to have this explicitly pointed out to them (Mt 12.27ff.); even the Baptist, with another image of fulfilment before his eyes, cannot interpret them aright because they are so ordinary (Mt 11.2–6). They will generally have been quiet miracles: their effect caused a ripple of rumours, such that people came running to see Jesus. But in this they were open to being misunderstood and were indeed wrongly interpreted, so that Jesus reacted by escaping from the place or by hushing them up (the so-called commands to be silent). Since the evangelists take different paths in their expression of the relationship between intentional hiddenness and forced disclosure, it becomes possible to distinguish cautiously between the form of expression and the content; but this also shows that the evangelists all aim at the same paradox, each in his own way. Further, when they all set the deeds and words of Jesus in the structures already provided by the Old Testament—since they subsequently came to see these as the 'fulfilment' of the Old Testament structures, which then offered the background to their understanding and the means to express them (e.g. 2 Kings 4.42ff.)—they make it clear at the same time that they discovered these connections only after Easter. Nevertheless, this does not mean that one can speak of free invention of the miracles of Jesus (which in part are found in quite different settings and intellectual contexts from the models); at most, one can speak of light stylistic touches in the presentation. The radiance of the Easter understanding has the strongest effect: it is possible for the disciples to say that they did not understand then what they understand now, but it is only with difficulty that they can give a description of it (and of themselves) in the phase in which they did not understand it—although they had seen or sensed the sovereignty, for they had indeed become disciples, had listened to Jesus as the master and had received instructions of their own over and above the general sermons to the people. They speak in approximate terms, as best they can, of the incomprehensible phenomenon of the hiddenness of Jesus that is at the heart of his openness. A literarily satisfactory restrospective formulation of the paradox was impossible a priori. It is necessary to look, from the heart of the theological mystery—which is trinitarian—at the necessity of this hiddenness, if we are to recognise that the literary reproduction is the best approximation possible.

2. Jesus' sovereignty is the appearing of the free abasement (kenosis) of God's glory in the lack of freedom (obedience) of the form of a slave. This lack of freedom ('not my will', throughout: Jn 6.38) must be made recognisable in the seriousness that leads to the Cross, and likewise as the consequence of the freedom of love (Jn 10.18). It was impossible to perceive and understand this unique unity (which presupposes the Trinity), and yet more impossible to slot it into categories that lay ready to hand; for this reason, it was not possible for Jesus to attribute to himself, or to accept the attribution by others as a title, of the Messiah (in the Jewish sense, even with its fullest meaning), without giving it a wholly new interpretation and amplifying it by means of completely different approximating concepts, some of which seem to say 'more'—such as that of the Danielic Son of Man who descends from heaven—and some apparently 'less', such as Isaiah's Servant of God, without form and despised, who suffers vicariously. When, after Easter, the Apostles preach to the Jews that the crucified Jesus who has appeared to them alive is the Messiah, this is 'in a quite unique sense that does not agree with the messianic understanding of late Judaism, . . . for it is obvious that Jesus himself understood his messianic condition in an unmessianic manner'. They pick up an understanding of the Messiah 'that was communicated to them in the school of Jesus only against their own resistance (cf. Mk 8.29, 31f. par.)'.[6] A gulf yawns

---

[6] F. Mussner, 'Der "historische Jesus" (1960), in: Praesentia Salutis. Gesammelte Studien zu Fragen und Themen des NT (1967), pp. 74–75. Cf. in the between Jesus' claim ('But I say to you') and his 'messianic condition': a necessity existed, like the necessary link between promise and fulfilment, but there was also a sovereign freedom that was obedient to the Father alone, and not to the historical structures of the prophecies. It was precisely this freedom—as the superiority to all the forms (or figures) made ready by the old covenant—that allowed him to be at one and the same time the 'superior form' that embraces all 'forms' in itself and 'the lack of form' that disappoints on the basis of the conceptions previously shaped; but Jesus is not here something that is formless and dissolving, but rather the mystery that must necessarily appear from the outside to be contradiction and paradox (how could the one who is absolutely free bear the form of a slave?), yet presents itself to faith (that is, faith in his trinitarian sonship) as a unity that cannot be broken up: as the sovereignty of the love that serves, lets itself be given away, and gives itself away.[7] But this is not enough. Jesus' task is not to present God by means of an image, but to be the synthesis of salvation history: by displaying on the one hand the Father's will to save without subtracting anything from his justice as judge—and this is why he stands forth as the krisis: the foundation-stone that is chosen, the corner-stone that is rejected—and on the other hand by personifying humankind (with Israel at the head as its recapitulation) before God: in that he bears its guilt and allows himself to be judged on the Cross, it is humankind cast out, but in that he trains it for the Cross and 'leads all the sons to glory' (Heb 2.10) on the basis of the Cross, it is humankind redeemed and believing. If one bears in mind the same volume: 'Der historische Jesus und der Christus des Glaubens', pp. 42–66.

[7] Here the uniqueness of a theological (christological) aesthetic becomes obvious once more. It is possible for 'hidden works of art' to exist, secret works that reveal their form only to a particular inward vision, but these are only works of art to the extent that their form is truly pressed into this very inaccessible form. It is also possible for sculpted portraits to exist that are able simultaneously to project the various sides of the character of one individual and the different situations of his life and therefore seem to show more than one single view can offer: but even such works remain the synthetic expression of the one personality. Jesus, however, is himself by being the expression of the Father in the Holy Spirit.

multiplicity of these connections, one cannot give an account of hiddenness and epiphany on one level alone; thus, there are some things that must be clear to Jesus as the divine revealer of the Father himself, which he must conceal because only so can he show the essential hiddenness of God; there are other things known to him that he conceals, because, although he is 'Lord and Master', he must display the form of a slave; and finally there are some which he must do without knowing, because otherwise the form of a slave and 'being like man' (Phil 2.7) would not be genuine. It is impossible to reproduce in words the essential simultaneity of these aspects in the life of Jesus, even when he was able, in accordance with each particular situation, to make one aspect dominant rather than the others. In the retrospective formulation of the evangelists, it was possible to express this simultaneity in Jesus' existence only through a circumlocutory approximation; it is important, therefore, that we always see the teachings, parables, miracles, discussions, etc., in the perspective of their mutual interaction, and that we do not permit the language used to lose its transparency. It is, for example, obvious that the historical portrayal of the condemnation and crucifixion can never display the theological pro nobis, which is hidden at the deepest level and comes to light only when it is given its place in the movement that goes from the life of Jesus (just as it was) to the Resurrection. No single situation, taken on its own, shows forth the whole, but has to be interpreted on the basis of the whole—one cannot have the logia without the suffering, nor the miracles without the logia, nor anything without the Resurrection. But it is likewise true that there is no passage that, taken on its own, would fall back into custom and ordinariness: the sovereignty provides the unifying atmosphere to such an extent that it makes itself felt at each individual point. It cannot be determined by literary or psychological means, but is clearly demarcated negatively from each of these.[8] It is the unique (theological) exaltation of God in the freedom of his form as a slave, above the constraint of every innerworldly determination; as such, this freedom is not open to direct and neutral perception, but requires faith in order to be seen: it requires the sensitivity to the sovereignty in the abasement, and this can only come as a gift, as connaturalitas to it, as the interior instinctus, which establishes a proportio to this unique object.[9]

---

[8] The oscillations between more or less 'sublimity' in the literary expression, or between a more or less heavy emphasis on Jesus' lips of his own commission and his own separateness (compared with parables or

Kierkegaard (surely the only one to follow Anselm in this) dared to attempt the portrayal of the Christian paradox with the inclusion of its historical given as an 'intellectual project'.[10] How can 'the God'—who must be 'love', if he is sayings that seem to be well-nigh 'universal wisdom teaching': Mt 7.12), are normal and can be demonstrated; they have no effect on the phenomenon of sovereignty that is our concern here. Since this phenomenon cannot be grasped philologically, it must always be silently bracketed off in the exact philological examinations (of the 'historical-critical method'); this, more clearly than anything else, shows the limits of the method. For the sovereignty of Jesus and of the whole of the New Testament which deals with him is not at all identical with his 'messianic claim' or with the making of this claim about him by the writers after Easter; it cannot be limited materially in this way. But equally, it is not an irrelevant atmospheric detail that serious research, deciding to employ its surgical instruments, could excise from the matter itself without penalties. Rather, it is something that possesses in the condition of the abasement of God in Christ the same unmistakable, indeed perceptible and 'quasi-physical' (Ramsey) presence as the kabod of Yahweh in the Old Testament.

[9] On these concepts of Thomas, and other similar concepts, see Vol. I, pp. 156–71.

[10] On what follows, cf. the edition of Kierkegaard by E. Hirsch.—Vol. 10: Philosophische Brocken, p. 7: 'Denkprojekt'. On this, cf. on p. 168, n. 20, the sentence that has been crossed out: 'However, we wish to forget what has been said here (about the historical reality of the question of Christianity) . . . as if Christianity had never existed.' Here we can see the same approach as in Anselm. After Kierkegaard has started from the presupposition that the disciple (as opposed to the Socratic pupil) is not already secretly in the truth, but does not seek the truth and is therefore guilty and needs grace, redemption, conversion, etc., he asks once again: 'But is it possible to think what has been developed here?' (Vol. 10, p. 18). And whereas Anselm arrives at the definition of God as id quo maius cogitari non potest, Kierkegaard seeks 'the highest paradox of thought: to wish to discover something that cannot think of itself' (Vol. 10, p. 35), corresponding to the paradox of being in love, where the (self-)love 'wishes its own destruction' (Vol. 10, p. 36). But since Kierkegaard strictly rejects the Anselmian ontological proof of the existence of God (which had to have a reason for 'coming forth'—make himself comprehensible to a human being who is in untruth, in guilt, in the lack of love? A direct revelation of the divine glory in its condescension (like that of a king stooping down to a poor beggar maid in order to raise her up in love and make her queen) would indeed 'catch up' the beloved human being above himself to 'loving amazement' and 'thankfulness', but (as in the case of the maid) would not bring him to his own truth. Man hungers for glory, and it is precisely this glory that God must refuse him, out of love. 'Who can understand this contradiction in suffering: not to reveal oneself is the death of the beloved'.[11] God takes on the form of a slave, in order to set up the indirectness which alone can lead to the growth of loving confidence in the sinner; indeed, he must himself become the double paradox of the crucified one in order to remove the sinful embarrassment of the guilty one: it is not possible for the hidden sovereignty of love to become at this point anything other than the absolute 'scandal'. This is indeed 'the indirect test of the correctness of the paradox', but in itself it is a 'deception of the ear', because 'the paradox echoes in it', without its being able to interpret the sound (which is the sound of endless love in the form of the slave and the Cross).[12] Nevertheless, in faith, the paradox (since it is God himself) offers the possibility of an interpretation to the disciple: and there is no fundamental difference between the disciple contemporary with Jesus and the later disciple, who is brought by the proclamation into contemporaneity with him. For even for the contemporaries, God's glory is hidden in the form of a slave, 'so that, if it is not possible to see it directly, there is no point in being a contemporary; mere temporal contemporaneity does not make one a contemporary of the glory'.[13] become Hegelian in the meantime) (ibid., p. 37), and is indeed uninterested in any proof of the existence of God ('via negationis or via eminentiae'), he forms his intellectual project in a purely soteriological manner: the inability to conceive of absolute love in thought comes, not from creatureliness (for, as a creature, man is 'related' to God: Vol. 10, p. 45), but from sin.

---

[11] Vol. 10, p. 28.

[12] Vol. 10, pp. 46ff.

[13] Vol. 10, p. 63. Kierkegaard deals later with the judgments of the Kierkegaard's 'intellectual project' lacks several dimensions, above all the trinitarian (in his abasement, Jesus reveals the sovereignty of the Father) and the genuinely staurological (substitution).[14] In our present context, only the fundamental reasoning and the almost a priori method are important, in order to demonstrate the indispensable indirectness of the revelation. Given that Jesus was the Son of God, i.e. God in the condition of abasement as obedience unto death, then his relinquishment of the interpretation of himself (to the Father, the Spirit and the Church) corresponds to this; and this interpretation is possible only if it is the illumination (coming from God) of the sovereignty that had truly existed, and the

---

'autopsy of faith'. It will be above all 'the occasion for the contemporary to receive the condition required from God, so that he now sees the glory with the eyes of faith' (Vol. 10, p. 67). But this again is the same as what the disciple at second hand receives through the sermon; for the sermon cannot deal with a 'simple historical fact' (Vol. 10, p. 89): 'the historical fact that God has been in human form, is the chief matter, and the other historical details are simply not so important . . . Disagreements that would otherwise disturb do not disturb here, and do no harm to the matter' (Vol. 10, pp. 100–101); indeed, the sermon in itself would be 'foolish, were it to seek to pin a proof of probability to what is improbable', seeking to serve mankind 'by assisting it to enter what is improbable with a proof of probability' (Vol. 10, p. 91). The account by the contemporary can only be a narrative testimony 'that he himself has believed that fact' (Vol. 10, p. 99). In the Unwissenschaftliche Nachschrift (Vol. 16, p. 90), Kierkegaard shows that through this 'intellectual project' Lessing's proposition that necessary truths of reason cannot be based on contingent truths of history is challenged and superseded. The theme is brought to its conclusion in the Einübung im Christentum (1850), without essentially superseding the 'Brocken': 'If the glory were immediately visible . . . then it is an untruth that Christ abased himself and took on the form of a slave, and it is superfluous to warn about the scandal . . . No, there was 'nothing in him for the eye to see, no radiance so that we should have looked at him, no form that we should have delighted in' (Is 53.2); there was nothing immediately to be seen except a small man who at once raised the possibility of scandal with signs and wonders and by saying that he was God. A small man, who thereby expressed, first of all, what God understands as compassion . . . and second, what God understands as man's wretchedness—and this in each case is utterly different from what men understand these to be, in every generation until the end of time . . .' (Vol. 26, p. 65).

[14] On this, cf. E. Hirsch in n. 151 to the 'Brocken' (Vol. 10, p. 179). In the Einübung (Vol. 26, p. 63), there appears the Pauline-Lutheran pro te.

'noticing' and 'remembering' (on the part of the Church) of what the Church had truly experienced and yet—in an incomprehensible forgetfulness, or rather obstinacy—had not realised. This is the intensification of a thoroughly human situation that is repeated again and again: it is only after the departure of what was noble, genial and holy that the survivors become aware of what had truly been the case. Words, gestures and miraculous deeds are collected and proclaimed; but they would all miss the real point, were it not that in this one case the past became a hidden and living present, the letter became transparent to the spirit, the lowliness pointed to the inconceivable nobility, with the sovereignty of the face (p^enim) of Yahweh shining forth in the face that is twisted with pain, bloody and spat upon, the sovereignty of Yahweh mirrored in the sovereignty of the sufferer himself.[15] Nowhere is there the slightest false note—unlike the apocryphal writings, which teem with them—to disturb the harmony of simplicity and depth of insight, of straightforwardness and profundity; this harmony is so perfect that we can easily and without offence recognise the secondary character of some of the literary methods employed in the portrait—e.g., the Marcan commands to be silent—without thereby being able to dispense with them as means of expression.

3. In order to approach the hiddenness of Jesus' sovereignty, we possess the literary road, along which we come to see how the post-Easter community drew aspects of the risen Lord into its account of what happened before Easter, and indeed how it had to do so, because the risen one is the 'truth' of the mortal one who died, and it is only this truth, which integrates in itself all that went before, that concerned and still concerns believers on the existential level. But then a theological road opens up behind the literary road: for if the community is correct to see in the risen one the 'truth' of the mortal one who was finally crucified, then this perspective is necessarily valid for the historical Jesus too: his life is orientated towards 'the hour', and all that he is, says and does is confirmed on the basis of the 'hour' and is demonstrated by God to be true. It is only when the crucified one is raised up that he is exalted to be 'Lord' (Acts 2.36; Phil 2.9ff.) and has demonstrably the right to bear his titles ('Messiah', 'Son of God', 'Danielic Son of Man', etc.) and thereby require that one believes in him (something that only God can require). Although we can accept the presence of anticipations of this matter by the evangelists, since the hidden Jesus is the same one as the Christ who is openly proclaimed, we should nevertheless remove them from the picture of the historical Jesus, who did not at all anticipate his glorification by the Father. One can indicate, with the necessary brevity, the 'depaschalisation' that is theologically required, at three points of the Synoptic accounts: the miracles of Jesus, his parables, and his transfiguration.

[15] Cf. the article '(Sainte) Face' by J. A. Robillard, in Dict. Spir.

The miracles[16] or 'signs of power' (δυνάμεις) are beyond any doubt characteristic of the historical Jesus, as they were for Paul too, who speaks of his miracles as if they were the most obvious thing in the world.[17] Some of Jesus' miracles were directed against the Pharisees (healings on the sabbath, and perhaps also the touching of the leper at Mk 1.40ff.), led to the certainly genuine 'discussion about Beelzebul' (Mk 3.22 par.), and were finally one of the reasons for his condemnation.[18] Like Paul, Jesus points to his miracles as proofs of his commission to initiate the coming of the [16] On the immense literature, cf. above all H. van der Loos, The Miracles of Jesus (Leiden 1965); LThK 2nd edn. X, 1251–1265. On what follows, cf. especially: H. J. Held, 'Matthäus als Interpret der Wundergeschichten', in: Überlieferung und Auslegung im Mt-Evangelium (5th edn. 1968), pp. 155–287.

[17] Rom 15.18: 'For I shall not venture to speak of anything except what Christ has wrought in me to bring the Gentiles to obedience, in word and deed, through the power of signs and wonders and through the might of the Holy Spirit'. 2 Cor 12.12: 'The proofs (σημεῖα) of my apostleship were brought to you in all patience, through signs (σημείοις) and miracles (τέρασιν) and deeds of power (δυνάμεσιν)'. On the basis of these texts, it is inappropriate to doubt the historicity of the accounts of miracles in Acts in their kernel (individual miracles like 20.7ff. and summary accounts like 5.15ff.; 19.11ff.). But why should something that is in order for Paul and the early Church, not be permitted to Jesus?

[18] According to the Babylonian Talmud (Sanh. 43a), Jesus was kingdom of God (Mt 11.4ff.). 'Deeds of power'—i.e. salvific acts which by their very nature can be carried out only by God—are, within Judaism, first of all a reactualisation of the original salvific activity of Jahweh for the people (just as the prophetic Spirit took on a new presence with the Baptist and with Jesus). They are acts of God in the one he sends (like Moses or Elijah, and now Jesus). What is new is the thoroughgoing personalisation of the situation: it is always an individual sick person or one seeking help who stands before the individual Jesus, because the Word has become flesh and now encounters the neighbour as the one who stands closest of all to him. And most of the miracles are bound to faith: this is the central point, and is needed,[19] sometimes found to exist already and sometimes 'attributed'[20] in virtue of a silent 'substitution',[21] but always in such a way that Jesus does not require faith in himself,[22] but actively mediates faith between the human person and God, making himself the source of the faith that is indispensable for the human person and letting it well up from the heart of this person. One could put it as follows: he is, in his wholeness, the verb in the sentence and it is only through the Resurrection that he becomes the noun that was always present in the verb—capable of being formulated, but concealed. This noun cannot yet come forth, because it is precisely only through the completion of the sentence through the Cross and Resurrection that Jesus truly becomes the object of faith, the one in whom God has definitively accomplished his 'mighty works' and who has himself—acting and suffering to the uttermost point—become this personified mighty work. When Matthew sets the themes of personal encounter and faith (in a sense that is already condemned 'because he practised sorcery and turned Israel away'. F. Mussner, Die Wunder Jesu. Eine Hinführung (1967), p. 29.

---

[19] Mk 6.5 par.

[20] G. Ebeling, 'Jesus und Glaube', in: Wort und Glaube (1960), pp. 241f., 245 (ET Word and Faith, 1963, pp. 234ff., 238).

[21] Ibid., p. 244 (ET p. 237).

[22] The only text, Mt 18.6 (from which point onwards Jesus speaks of those 'who believe in me', unlike Mk 9.42), is certainly a later addition. For other texts that presuppose a post-Easter concept of faith, cf. Ebeling, op. cit., pp. 231–232 (ET p. 226).

ecclesiastical) at the centre of the miracles of healing, and thereby pushes the miraculous event into the background (often through severe abbreviations and through retouches of the colourful narratives in Mark), it is easy to distinguish his ecclesiastical intention from the theological correctness with which he lays bare the decisive point: Jesus goes back to the simplest, most primitive and most concrete situation of all, to what Paul calls the faith of Abraham, which unhesitatingly accepts that God is in the right, without doubts and without guarantees. Such a faith entrusts itself to God and therefore 'infallibly' touches God's heart (Jesus' teaching about prayer belongs here) and is heard through the obedience of a child (Mk 10.13–15). It is not disclosed how this wonderful direct contact between the believing heart and God's heart ultimately came into being through the spark of the mighty deed that bridged the gap, nor whose faith and initiatory action brought it about.[23] The 'smallest' seed, the mustard seed, is both true faith (Mt 17.20) and the kingdom of God (Mt 13.31f.): Jesus is the ἐνέργεια that brings about the mutual compenetration of faith, kingdom and covenant in the act by which they come into existence. It is true that the concrete healing by which the 'strong man' is driven back and bound in the 'deed of power' is an anticipation of the Cross and the Resurrection, and as such is in danger of being separated from these and of being misinterpreted—especially in the hellenistic milieu, in which the worker of miracles himself came to be the object of attention. But against this, there is the refusal to perform any spectacular miracle in Israel (Mt 12.38ff.; 16.1ff. par.), and a fortiori outside Israel, unless a completely genuine faith in Jesus wrests a miracle from him (Mt 15.21–28; Mt 8.5–13 with Jn 4.48), as well as the act of taking the sick man aside (Mk 7.33; 8.23) and the commands

[23] 'At one time it is the faith of the sick person himself, who then experiences healing; at another time it is the faith of another person, who concerns himself with the sick person and to a certain extent mediates the healing to him; at still another time it is clearly the faith of Jesus himself on which everything in the history of salvation depends. It would not do justice to the understanding of faith that is operative here, if one sought to harmonise it and make it amenable to classification': G. Ebeling, op. cit., pp. 252–253 (ET p. 245).

to be silent. Some of the miracles belong to the instruction of the disciples as a concretely perceptible initiation into the attitude of Christian and especially apostolic faith, confidence, prayer, and fasting (as a state of being empty for God and for the communication of his will and his power; Mt 17.14–21: 'Nothing will be impossible for you'). Thus, miracles belong closely together with the teaching on prayer and with the parables (as 'acted parables'). It is significant that the disciples, who have only the rudiments of faith before the Cross and the Resurrection, do receive 'authority' to heal and to cast out demons (Mt 10.1), but do not yet accomplish any miracle; afterwards, however, the charism of miracles will be a part of the regular existence of the Church (1 Cor 12.10). More important is the fact, exceedingly strongly underlined by Mark, that the disciples do not understand the real meaning of the miracles. The 'choral conclusions' (with universal astonishment, praise of God, etc.), which are a part of the ancient miracle accounts and are especially prominent in Luke (2.20; 4.22; 5.26; 13.17; 18.43) but are also structured by Matthew as scenes of the 'adoration' of the 'Son of God' (Mt 14.33; cf. 8.2; 9.18; 15.25), show themselves to be a mere extrinsic addition by comparison with the simple 'astonishment' in Mark (Mk 1.27; 2.12; 5.20; 12.17),[24] the hardness of heart of the spectators (3.5), the anxiety of the people (5.15), the lack of faith of the disciples (4.40), their amazement not only during the apparition on the lake, but even more so after the stilling of the storm (6.51), and their 'lack of understanding even now' (8.17). The same lack of understanding and astonishment is revealed when Jesus speaks of his future suffering and rising. Neither the visible miraculous signs nor the verbal teachings and parables can be understood in their truth before this truth of theirs has made itself known in the Cross and Resurrection. Through his repeated commands to silence, Jesus dampens the flame of false admiration that is kindled everywhere, but this is in vain: 'For it is impossible a priori to prevent the misunderstanding that goes by the name of admiration, for in a certain sense this is necessary, in order to attract people. But then, if the truth—remaining true to itself in this, since it is the truth—unfolds itself ever more clearly as the truth, the moment comes when no admirer can keep up with it: for the truth shakes off its admirers as the storm shakes off the worm-eaten fruit from the tree.'[25] The so-called 'spectacular miracles' (the walking on the lake and the stilling of the storm, the multiplication of the loaves, the changing of water into wine, and the raisings of the dead) are often surrounded by an atmosphere of calm (especially the miracles of giving food and drink) or of intimacy in the circle of disciples, where the spiritual symbolism has more importance than the miraculous (cf. the miracles on the lake);[26] but above all, they are portrayed as a concretisation of the 'compassion' of Yahweh with the distress of his people.[27]

---

[24] The 'choral conclusions' with praise of God are much more seldom found in Mark: 2.12; 7.37.

---

[25] Kierkegaard, Einübung im Christentum III, 6 (Hirsch, Vol. 26, pp. 237f.).

[26] At this point, especially for Matthew, the account of the miracle makes the transition into the 'parable' which is always valid for the Church: this is seen most clearly in his addition of the scene of Peter walking on the water (Mt 14.28–31), to which Jn 21.7 looks like a silent correction. Jn 21.4 could be a similar correction to the story of the walking on the water. Whatever the kernel of the epiphany may be—in other words, to what extent it may be the literary trumping of the miracles of Moses and Elijah and Elisha in the Old Testament (G. Hartmann, 'Der Aufbau des Mk-Evangeliums', NTA VIII 2/3 (1936), pp. 148f.; A. Heising, 'Die Botschaft der Brotvermehrung', St. Bibl. Stud. 15 (1966)—the understanding of the worker of miracles in his mediatory function within the covenant is indispensable in both Old and New Testament, if he is to be understood correctly; if this is taken away from him, he becomes the θεῖος ἀνήρ, the object of attention in a way that is unbiblical and un-Christian.

[27] The 'miracles at a distance' (Mk 7.24ff.; Lk 7.10; Jn 4.53) exclude the element of the spectacular. Cf. also the ways in which Jesus 'withdraws from the crowd' at Jn 5.13; sends the sick man away to wash himself (Jn 9.7; cf. 2 Kings 5.10), to show himself to the priests and offer the sacrifice prescribed in the case of healing (Mt 8.4; Lk 17.14); moves on from the place (Mt 11.1 and frequently), and escapes to lonely places (Mk 1.35; 1.45; Jn 11.54). The 'miracles at a distance' also show that there is no magic involved in the touching of the body, smearing on spittle, touching the fringes of Jesus' garment, or indeed in the 'power' that he feels going forth from him (Lk 6.19; Mk 5.30) or in the 'words of power' that he utters. All of this belongs to the concreteness of the presence of God in Jesus, and is a

There remains only a partial aspect of the processes and themes employed for the explicit approval of the messianic mission of Jesus by God: the Johannine theme of the 'sign' (σημεῖον). However, precisely as such, this is once again dialectical in a double sense. On the one hand, compared with the lack of ambiguity of the 'word', it is secondary and on a lower level because it is less unambiguous (cf. Jn 10.38); on the other hand, the 'signs' point to the Father who works them, and they point to the Son only to the extent that one recognises that he does not seek his own glory and hence conceals and reveals himself to an equal extent in the revelatory sign. When John speaks in the case of Jesus' first miracle of the 'revelation of his glory' and immediately adds that 'his disciples believed in him' (2.11), he gives an interpretation in both phrases of what was inchoative from the standpoint of the full accomplishment: this was truly present in the inchoative stage, but was concealed. Finally, the miracles of Jesus belong essentially to his itinerant state: the new covenant is only beginning, and this is why the physical and perceptible 'mighty deeds' carried out in this world have an Old Testament and prophetic form that looks to the single miracle of death and Resurrection, in which the 'binding of the strong man' and his 'plundering' take place definitively. But there is no point at which the confusion of the sign with what it signifies is easier and more dangerous: there is no point at which concealment is more strongly required. And yet, the new covenant is already present in the sign. This means that all the miracles are but a reference and a pointer to the one who is concealed, who is deciphering himself (as an active verb, not as a noun) in the symbols.

The parables contain precisely the same dialectic: the parables are words in the format of pictures which both clarify and conceal; as they are words en route to their own realisation: hence, although the parable presents itself as an open word, it is in need of interpretation (on the basis of its realisation). Any form that the word takes before the Cross and prelude to the sacramental dimension, as the Church fathers have emphatically stated.

Resurrection is essentially a parable (Mt 13.34; Jn 16.25, after Easter: 16.29f.), and thereby is both a normal (though original) contemporary manner of speaking and teaching[1] and at the same time a continuation, and a surpassing, of the Old Testament oracles of God, especially when it deals with the imminence of God's judgment and with his mercy that overturns all human standards of value; but, over and above these two, the parable is the form of the entire incarnate Word of God himself. This is the source of the quality found in each parabolic word (which ultimately resists being catalogued in philological terms): the word comes down vertically from above, in the greatest compactness possible, without extension, and it cannot be refuted. Each of the parables goes to the heart of the matter from a particular side, just as Jesus is always the entire Word of God and cannot be parcelled up into segments. In this respect, all the parables share in the original impact of the kabod: their form indicates what impact the Word will attain at the end of its journey, on the Cross. On the basis of the Cross and Resurrection, 'Jesus' expounds to the disciples, the early Church, what is 'hidden' (Mt 13.35): this is shown by the post-Easter character of the interpretations (especially Mt 13.36–43; 13.49f.; Mk 4.13–20). From this point of the outcome, it can also be seen that Jesus' word, which demanded a decision, became a proof of their obduracy (cf. Mk 4.10–12 par., in apparent contradiction to the intention to make a disclosure at Mt 13.35) to the 'deaf' who had no 'ears to hear' (Mk 4.9 and frequently). But the impact of the divine Word, though fully present, is hidden, first, because the event of the Cross (and thereby the coming of the kingdom) lies in the future, so that it is not yet possible to hand over the key to the whole; second, because for Jesus himself the coming Cross will be absolute salvation and absolute judgment, but in a manner other than was the case with the coming Day of Yahweh for the Old Testament prophets, because Jesus himself will embrace the totality of judgment in himself, in order to be total salvation; and third, because he nevertheless must commit the people of the covenant with him to this Day, by means of an ultimate judgment based on a knowledge of how God truly is and how he acts—and here, although the possibility is left open for the hearers, according to the evangelists (Mk 3.6) the decision was taken very early on.

---

[1] Joachim Jeremias, Die Gleichnisse Jesu (7th edn. 1965 ET The Parables of Jesus): not only does Jesus allude to the most widepsread secular images and scenes, but also to the commonest Old Testament images (p.87; ET p. 88), or to existing parabolic discourses which it is sometimes decisively necessary to know, if one is to understand the parables of the Gospel. For the parable of the fig-tree at Lk 13.6–9 cf. an ancient Ahikar story (p. 170; ET pp. 170f.), for both parables about the great feast (Mt 22.1–10; Lk 14.15–24) and for the parable about the rich man and Lazarus, cf. a story that came from Egypt and was reshaped in Palestine (pp. 178, 182f; ET pp. 176ff.); cf. p. 199 (ET pp. 198f.) for the parables of the pearl and the treasure in the field. This does not however prevent 'Jesus' parables . . . from being something completely new': 'not a single parable is transmitted to us in the entire rabbinic literature before Jesus' (p. 8).

If one looks for ipsissima verba of Jesus in the parables, one must take into account, not only the merely historical situation, but also an all-embracing theological situation which can be summarised a priori in the simple phrase '(futurist-present) expectation of the kingdom'. All the theology of the early Church, of Paul and of John, will try to put into words what is compressed in this expectation. This is why it is difficult to define the relationship between the original parabolic word and its meditation, transposition and expansive interpretation in the Church. It emerged that the Church cannot take up a situation over against the hiatus between Cross and Resurrection: at one and the same time, the Church comes after this hiatus (as the product of redemption) and stands before it because she is always called afresh to take the decision that leads to the Cross. Accordingly, the parabolic word must undergo an ecclesiastical transformation in order to preserve its vitality and relevance (for it is the same Jesus who, as the crucified and risen one, each time gives anew the summons to follow him). It is therefore correct for the Church to represent the krisis that Jesus' presence was in and for Israel as a krisis that belongs to the past—and thus the 'sketches of salvation history' that Matthew builds out of many parables are not 'allegories'[2]—but equally, it is correct for the Church to bring the krisis up to date within itself: here, the horizon of the Cross which stood before Jesus as the end of the world becomes for the Church the horizon of the second coming of Christ (for only so can she enter Jesus' horizon), and Jesus' words to the scribes and Pharisees become an address to Christians, whether to all or more precisely to the leaders who have responsibility for the community. In this process, a text with an eschatological emphasis (e.g. Lk 12.58f.) can change into a text with a paranaetic emphasis (Mt 5.25f.); practical applications for the Church, which are frequently not entirely to the point, can be added to the text of the parables—often whole collections of such reflections as in the case of the story of the unjust steward whom 'the master' (=Jesus) praises because of his shrewdness (Lk 16.8b,9,10,11,12,13).[3] This can mean that the main thrust that a parable must have had originally can be more or less displaced by one or more evangelists.[4] Such alterations remain contingent facts in themselves; the fundamental point here is that Jesus' parables—almost always calls and challenges uttered with the utmost urgency—could be freed from the terrible isolation of their unique historical situation, in which they were essentially not understood and therefore had to remain hidden, only by being changed (in a transformation wrought by his dying and rising) into ecclesiastical 'teaching', which brought them into the sphere within which they could be grasped in the Holy Spirit.

This is seen most clearly when one asks about the position of Jesus himself in his parables (here excluding the 'I am' logia of John). Once again, one will have to say that Jesus appears in them as a verb, not as a noun; they are an implicitly christological self-attestation.[5] He speaks of the accomplishment of the event that comes to be what it is, and to receive its name, with him, with his Cross and his Resurrection. For the moment, all that can be felt in him is the impact, the tremendous urgency, the haste and radicality, the presence and atmosphere that cannot be overlooked, while yet remaining invisible: in him, one must see the kairos (Lk 12.54ff.; 17.37; Mk 13.28), the great chance that is offered (the 'pearl' and the 'treasure', Mt 13.44ff.), the command to take the total risk, which—precisely for this reason—must be taken with due consideration (Lk14.28–33). But Jesus does not speak, like the prophets, simply of the proximity of the 'Day' on which the single event of the judgment of punishment and of salvation will take place: the whole accent lies on the choice made by God of tax-collectors and sinners instead of the 'righteous' (Mt 21.31)—and Jesus offends the righteous by embodying this choice of God (Mt 11.19). The prodigal son is embraced and given a feast when he returns, while the other son, who had always been there, must not envy him this (Lk 15.11–32); those who had worked only a short time are given their wages, and those who have worked a long time must not look askance at God's goodness (Mt 20.1–15); the one lost sheep is sought by God, and the ninety-nine must be content that they are left alone and that God's joy over the one that was found again is greater (Mt 18.12ff.)—just as greater joy and thankfulness echo each other where there was more to forgive (Lk 7.41ff.). The parables look directly to the heart of God, to the greater love which is better sensed by the poor, the merciful, those who yearn, and the others praised in the beatitudes (Mt 5.3ff.); the Samaritan senses it more than the priest and the levite (Lk 10.30ff.), the one who invites beggars, the lame and the blind to his feast senses it more than the one who invites rich people who will invite him in return (Lk 14.12ff.). They look directly to the heart of God, who cannot do other than hear a cry addressed to him (18.1–8), even at the most inappropriate hour (11.5–8); to God who lets one off paying even the greatest sums, but expects that man's heart will be led thereby to do the same in small matters (Mt 18.23–35). It is from this vantage point that the parables look to this human heart to see whether the little flame glows within it, the flame that one can call faith or love and hope and that can be kindled to a divine fire—or whether this flame has died in the cold ashes of self-justification. This living spark is the smallest of all things, the least noticeable on earth, but it is precisely this that receives the promise of growing to become the greatest of all (Mk 4.30ff. par.; Mt 13.33); it is sown, but must find a willing heart, in order that it may spring up (Mk 4.3ff. par.); it bears in itself the law of its growth (Mk 4.26ff.), but it demands that man too must be living, and not tie up in a handkerchief what wants to live (Lk 19.12–27 par.). It is important to have oil in one's lamp (Mt 25.1–13), to have a wedding garment (Mt 22.11–13). God has one final hope that he will receive some fruit from me (Lk 13.6–9). And then, at a moment that is not determined, he must be always awaited, the full stop is written. The door is closed (Lk 13.24–30), for it is too late, and no more knocking on the door will help. This moment is certainly coming, sudden and incalculable—perhaps quite close at hand (Lk 12.15ff.)—and one must be awake to look out for it (Lk 12.39, and frequently), coming to a full reconciliation without delay (Lk 12.58f.). In worldly terms, all this is hidden and cannot be disentangled (from the darnel that grows alongside: Mt 13.24ff.; from the net that contains both good and bad fish: Mt 13.47f.). It is intentionally hidden like the yeast in the meal, and can be recognised only indirectly, through its effects (Lk 13.20f.; cf. 17.20f.). Nothing here indicates the tendency to reveal oneself gradually within history: the harvest will come 'all at once' (Mk 4.29), the cry will ring out 'at midnight' (Mt 25.6). Then will hearts be laid bare, and the outer cover will part to reveal who had said 'yes' but done 'no' (Mt 21.28ff.), and who had turned to his fellow men in their need, in solidarity with the attitude of God (Mt 25.31–46), who had dared to forgive his neighbour his debt even to the point of 'injustice' (Lk 16.1–8).—It follows from this that the parabolic word is a word with a supreme impact, which is powerless when it begins to speak of itself—as of the one who has become incarnate. Although it is the exultant fulfilment—'today!'—of the highest promise, it sets 'all in a rage', and people want 'to throw it down' (Lk 4.16–30). If it presents itself as the physician for the sick (Mk 2.17 par.), then they counter, at first in jest (Lk 4.23) and then jeeringly, with the parabolic word about the doctor who cannot help himself (Lk 23.35). If he presents himself as a king who makes a solemn entry into his holy city, then he is killed precisely because of this claim, and his Cross is given the corresponding inscription (Mk 15.26). If he presents himself as the embodiment of the Father's mercy, by eating with the outcasts and the rejected and welcoming them into his house, he is called a glutton and a drunkard (Mt 11.19). If he casts out the demons, then this must be through the power of the devil (Mt 12.24). He cannot at all possess the 'wisdom and mighty power' that he displays, for 'is he not the son of the carpenter? Where does he get all this from?' (Mt 13.55f.). The parable is a word that is disclosed, but that conceals itself at a deeper level in its powerlessness:[6] [2] This characterisation, introduced by Jülicher (Die Gleichnisse Jesu I, 2nd edn. 1910) and rather too summarily taken over by J. Jeremias (pp. 64ff.; ET pp. 66ff.), is inappropriate, because it is not something else that is being spoken of (ἀλλα-αγορεύω), but the same thing at a different phase.

---

[3] Jeremias is correct to resist a wrenching-apart of the two poles: 'It would, however, be false to conclude that the early Church introduces a wholly alien notion into the parable through the paraenetic application. Its paraenesis is included implicitly in the original parable'. It is only a case of the 'modulation of the tone' (op. cit., pp. 44f.; ET p. 48). For examples of concluding applications that do not harmonise perfectly with the fundamental tone of the parable, cf. Jeremias, pp. 105f.

[4] An example: Lk 18.2–8 and 18.9–14 are placed by Luke under the heading of teaching on prayer (18.1).

---

[5] E. Fuchs, 'Bemerkungen zur Gleichnisauslegung' (1954), in: Zur Frage nach dem historischen Jesus (1960), pp. 136–142.

Jesus' transfiguration[1] is likewise, in its indissoluble tension between old covenant and parousia, and because of its increasingly clear reference to the coming Passion, ultimately to be seen as testimony to the hiddenness of the glory. The numerous riddles and seams that are present already in the text of Mark are not removed satisfactorily by any analysis of the sources that would go behind Mark. It must be accepted that the kernel is an epiphany in a sublime event which has itself generated the development of the references back to the old covenant—to apocalyptic, to Elijah, and to Sinai—and the prospect of the end-time (both to the suffering and to the parousia, seen in unity with the Resurrection). The attempt to disentangle from this husk the event that has been formulated in this way with reference to the whole of the Bible and to explain it on its own—as an historical psychological experience of Jesus,[2] or as a visionary experience of the disciples[3]—leads nowhere.[4] The strong Old Testament colouring, and the lack of references to a perceptible δόξα in the accounts of the appearances of the risen Lord, exclude the possibility that what we have is an original Easter narrative projected back into a time before Easter.[5] One can identify the immediacy and what we might call the vertical character of the event most precisely because it is expressed from the beginning in an apocalyptic scheme of expression that was first prepared by the visions of Daniel and then utilised further, as M. Sabbe has shown.[6] The apparition of light in heaven, shining garments, falling to the ground in fear, hearing the heavenly voice, being touched by a hand that comforts and strengthens, the command to keep silence: all these elements are found in Daniel and are taken up in Rev 1.12–16 together with other details of apocalyptic.[7] However, the apocalyptic framework provides nothing more than the form of a vertical penetration of temporality into what lies 'above', into the timeless and true world of God that has become open for a moment; at most, it has also provided the reference to the (imminent) eschatological future that is anticipated in the apocalypses. However, nothing in the scene of the transfiguration entitles us to speak of an 'enthronement' of Jesus as the coming (Danielic) Son of Man.[8] Rather, the reference to the future that the transfiguration possesses now, appropriately, directs our gaze to Jesus' 'departure' (ἔξοδος, Lk 9.31) with a freshness of vision in which the suffering, the Resurrection and the second coming are interwoven and not yet differentiated: together, they are the apocalyptic breaking-in of the new age, which is now—vertically—present in Heaven. Nevertheless, the apocalyptic imagery remains only a framework: the decisive contents are provided by the original Mosaic tradition of the kabod. The cloud of the kabod, from which God's voice resounds, comes down as a tent already in Mark (ἐπισκιάζειν, Mk 9.7 = Mt 17.5 = Lk 9.34), and is appropriately made clearer in Matthew as a 'cloud of light', because the light of the glory was within the cloud;[9] at Ex 40.35, ἐπισκιάζειν is the translation of šakan, to 'dwell in a tent'; further references to Sinai are the ascent of a 'high mountain' and the descent (Mark, Matthew; 2 Pet 1.18: 'holy mountain'), with three disciples identified by their names (cf. Ex 24.1,9); the radiance of Christ's face (Matthew, cf. 2 Cor 4.6) can be a reminiscence of Moses' face which shone with the reflection of the glory as he descended, while the huts that Peter wishes to build echo the feast of tabernacles and its memorial of the giving of the covenant; and perhaps the six days, which Mark mentions in a puzzling way when he dates the transfiguration, may be an allusion to Ex 24.16. Should one therefore posit as the original kernel a repetition of the epiphany on Sinai, in which Jesus is proclaimed as the new Moses and the Messiah?[10] But nothing permits us to detach such a kernel from the apocalyptic formulation. Rather, the original kabod tradition appears from the beginning as taken up into its late prophetic-apocalyptic form, and it may be significant here that Mark will speak of the appearance of 'Elijah with Moses'.[11] The path leads up from Sinai, by way of Elijah, to Daniel and thus to an imminent future that is already present in a hidden manner; thus (presumably in the course of redaction) the event of the transfiguration can be linked as closely as possible to the coming suffering. There certainly exists (especially in Mark) a close link between Peter's confession at Mk 8.29 and the proclamation made by the heavenly voice at 9.7; Matthew clarifies this with the statement that Peter's confession too was inspired by the Father in Heaven (16.17). But the disciple's profession of faith

---

[6] J. Jeremias concludes his analysis of the parables with this sentence: 'For there has appeared the one whose hidden glory shines behind every word and every parable' (op. cit., p. 227; ET p. 230).

[1] Literature in J. Höller, Die Verklärung Jesu (1937), J. Blinzler, Die ntl. Berichte über die Verklärung Jesu (1937), H. Riesenfeld, Jésus transfiguré (Lund 1947), H. Baltensweiler, Die Verklärung Jesu (Abh. ThANT 33, 1959); LThK 2nd edn. 1965 (Blinzler), Bibellexikon 2nd edn. 1968 (G. Schneider).

---

[2] Baltensweiler.

[3] C. v. Weizsäcker, E. Meyer, A. v. Harnack: for the last two, Peter's visionary experience is the model and cause of the Easter visions.

[4] So that D. F. Strauss's thesis of a myth dependent on Ex 24 (likewise Dibelius, Formgeschichte, 4th edn. 1961, p. 275, ET From Tradition to Gospel, 1934, pp. 275f.), or of a legend (Lohmeyer, 'Die Verklärung Jesu nach dem MkEv', ZNW 21, 1922, pp. 181f.; F. Hahn, Christologische Hoheitstitel, 3rd edn. 1966, p. 340; ET The Titles of Jesus in Christology 1969, pp. 334f.), or of a graphically narrated doublet to Peter's profession is ultimately consistent.

[5] J. Wellhausen, R. Bultmann, Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (1957), pp. 278–288 (ET History of the Synoptic Tradition, 1963, pp. 259–261). On this, cf. above all the critical remarks of G. H. Boobyer, St Mark and the Transfiguration Story (1942), pp. 11ff. C. E. Carlston, 'Transfiguration and Resurrection', JBL 80 (1961), pp. 233–240, has taken up this thesis again.

[6] 'La rédaction du récit de la Transfiguration', in: La Venue du Messie, Rech. Bibl. VI (1962), pp. 65–100. On the historicity of the kernel, cf. idem, 'De transfiguratie van Jezus', in: Collat. Brug. et Gand. 4 (1958), pp. 467–503.

---

[7] One should also note Sabbe's references (suggested by J. T. Milik) to the localities (the sources of the Jordan, Hermon) as a place of apocalyptic vision.—The concept of 'transformation' need not come from hellenistic stories of metamorphoses (as Lohmeyer at first supposed); rather, it is at home in Jewish apocalyptic, as Syr. Apoc. Bar. 51.10 shows, when it is said of the righteous after their resurrection: 'They will be like the angels and the stars, and they will be able to change themselves into whatever form they wish, from beauty to splendour, from light to the majesty of glory'. 2 Cor 3.18 is conceptually close to this. The motif of sleep (which is explicit in Luke, but already hinted at by Mark and Matthew) is likewise apocalyptic: Enoch (13.7, 10; 14.2; Test. Levi 2.5; 5.7).

[8] Cf. Sabbe, 'Rédaction' p. 83, and above all Riesenfeld. The emphasis of the heavenly voice lies not (as at the baptism) on the first part ('This is my beloved (chosen) Son'), but on the second part: 'You must listen to him' (= Deut 18.15).

[9] Cf. III/2,1, pp. 42–43.

[10] Thus H. P. Müller, 'Die Verklärung Jesu. Eine motivgeschichtliche Studie', ZNW 51 (1960), pp. 56–64.

[11] H. Baltensweiler (pp. 69ff.) seems to give the best explanation of this inversion in the oldest account available to us, when he discards all other suggestions and points to the role of Elijah—as this was understood by contemporaries on the basis of Mal 4.4–6 (= 3.22f.)—as the one who would 're-establish' the Law of Moses (p. 81). This does not mean acceptance of the speculations which Baltensweiler goes on to make about the 'peaceful Elijah' as the model set up for the suffering Jesus. But neither the traditional interpretation as 'law and prophets', nor the interpretation of both figures as 'forerunners of the Messiah' (an interpretation that scarcely can claim a biblical basis, except possibly Rev 11.3ff.?) is satisfactory. It is not relevant here to point out that Jesus is characterised in various ways as the 'new Moses' and the definitive lawgiver, since the inversion in Mark is older than this.

becomes the occasion for the first prophecy of suffering, which is immediately followed by a second prediction after the descent from the mountain (and the healing of the epileptic boy); between Peter's profession and the transfiguration comes the discourse about discipleship with two logia about the coming of the Son of Man 'in the glory of his Father' (Mt 16.27) and the coming 'in his kingdom' that is soon to be seen by some of those present (16.28). The second logion will have been given this position because of the transfiguration which comes next; the first speaks of the Danielic Son of Man, who will be seen proleptically in the vision of the transfiguration. Mark and Matthew place the discussion about Elijah (who is to return, or has already come as the Baptist) during the descent from the mountain: here Elijah becomes completely the precursor of the suffering Jesus. Matthew develops the open statement of this form from the somewhat obscure statement in Mark (Mt 17.12).

This movement of thought is present in all the narratives, and Luke does no more than expose it clearly when he defines the Old Testament theophany evoked here by means of the expression δόξα (glory). The two men who belong to the divine sphere appear 'in glory', and Jesus is not merely lit up by this glory from outside himself, nor introduced into it: it is his own glory ('when they awoke, they saw his glory': Lk 9.32). This had been prepared by Matthew, where it is not only the garments of Jesus that are radiant (as at Mk 9.3), but his face that shines like the sun (Mt 17.2); but the Lucan clarification is fundamentally present already in the concept of transfiguration, which he—unlike Mark and Matthew—does not employ. The second clarification in Luke points towards the suffering, which now forms the contents of the 'conversation', already mentioned by Mark and Matthew, between Jesus and the heavenly figures. And the cloud of the kabod, which finally encloses the three and withdraws them from sight, is a darkness that bears a coming night in its womb, since it is the same three disciples who will be witnesses on the Mount of Olives of the object of the conversation on the mountains of transfiguration. The formulation of the voice of God follows schematic patterns; quotations from the Bible obviously cannot reproduce what the voice of the Father actually said. It is probably put together from Is 42.1[12] and Deut 18.15, like the voice at the baptism; but here, it is clearly the disciples who are addressed, and in the redactional context it is unmistakable that the reference is to the Son as the one chosen to suffer, the one whose life is orientated towards his coming suffering. From this perspective, it is not easy to interpret the command, found in all the Synoptists, to silence: is it only three of the disciples who are to profit from the divine confirmation of the coming suffering?[13] Is it the Marcan 'messianic secret' at work here in shaping the narrative, or (more probably) the older Danielic scheme of the sealing of the secret (Dan 8.26; 12.4)? But the reference forward to the Mount of Olives also shows the validity in the New Testament of an understanding of the mysteries of the Passion, and an initiation into these, that go by stages. These stages run from the confirmatory voice of the Father, via Moses and Elijah who give the explanation that points to the Passion ('they told' him 'about his departure in Jerusalem', Lk 9.31), to Jesus himself, who knows about 'what has to be fulfilled', to the three who are witnesses to the prophecy but do not understand adequately, and finally to the rest, who here are waiting at the foot of the mountain and later will wait outside the garden.

The astonishing thing about the transfiguration is that, in this night on the high mountain,[14] the ever elusive doxa of the Old Testament becomes present for a moment in all its stages and forms, and attains its immediate fulfilment in its Old Testament form in Jesus and at the heart of his prayer to the Father—not as in John, where the glory as it were goes beyond itself and is dissolved into this relationship so that the entire existence of Jesus is a more or less concealed or open glory; and an individual transfiguration scene becomes superfluous; but in such a way that the intermediary stage becomes visible, the moment in which the Old Testament glory concentrates itself in a single point, so that it may enter and cross over into the glory of the New Testament. But this gathering together of scattered elements from Sinai via Elijah to Daniel is at the same time their concentration to form an arrow that now points straight at the final goal: the unity of the Cross and the parousia. What was said above about the double temporal horizon of Jesus must be kept in view here: the Cross is the end of the world, and what lies beyond it is the parousia. The transfiguration of the earthly Jesus, of his earthly clothes and in some manner of the world upon which he shines, is the promise and first instalment of the eschatological transformation of the world as a whole,[15] and for Paul this truly begins with the living of the Christian life—as a reflection of the glory of Christ—in a way that is both invisible and visible (2 Cor 3). But all this takes place in the deepest concealment—in Luke, in a scenario that is strangely close to that of the temptation on the Mount of Olives[16]—far from men, before three witnesses who are half asleep and who must seal up in strict silence what they have seen. It is only right at the end of the apostolic period that, drawing on two allusions of the First Letter of Peter (1 Pet 5.1; 1.11), the Second Letter will draw the event forth from its concealment and make of it ocular testimony to the eschatological glory that is still to come (2 Pet 1.16–18);[17] but this account of a pseudonymous 'eye-witness' has somehow gone back into apocalyptic in its 'disclosure', and is en route to the gnostic uses of the event that are found in the apocryphal literature.[18] [12] We shall not discuss here the problematic relationship of υἱός and παῖς. Cf. J. Jeremias, TDNT V 701.

---

[13] The Apocalypse of Peter has all twelve disciples present on the mountain (Akhim fragment 5; Schneemelcher II, p. 481; ET p. 680).

[14] It is above all Lk 9.37 that indicates that this is a nocturnal scene: the descent is made on the following morning. The sleep of the disciples could be an indication of this, as could Jesus' prayer (cf. Lk 6.12; 22.39). 'The night discloses the mystery of the day' (Grundmann, Lukas, p. 193).

---

[15] S. Bulgakov, Du Verbe incarné (Paris 1943), quoted by A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ (1948), p. 139.

[16] Here, however, one cannot go as far as H. Baltensweiler, for whom the historical kernel of the transfiguration scene is a decisive struggle in prayer by Jesus about his messianic function, involving the renunciation of the earthly image of the Messiah held by the Zealots and the acceptance of the Father's will, which points the way to suffering. This cannot be demonstrated. But one can say that the prayer of the transfiguration lies along the trajectory that goes from the prayer during the temptation on a 'very high mountain' (with the rejection of the 'glory of all the kingdoms of the world', Mt 4.8) to the Mount of Olives (where preference is given to the unique lordship of the Father). The only scene in John which simultaneously corresponds both to the transfiguration scene and to the scene on the Mount of Olives is Jn 12.27–33.

4. Miracles, parables and the transfiguration are each, in their kernel, historical data in which the paradox of sovereignty in concealment makes itself known, thus reflecting what the chosen witnesses experienced in the whole existence of Jesus. In the attempt to draw nearer to this unique paradox with a great variety of literary methods—which, as such, can only identify a particular facet—attention is directed concentrically to something indescribable that lies in the mid-point.

Mark begins with the systematic exploitation of the 'messianic secret' as a means of making his portrait; this leaves unresolved an open dialectic of lightning-flashes of disclosure and violent suppressions that are often plainly ineffective; we may leave aside the question of the extent to which this is the outcome of his considered intention or of his literary clumsiness. There is also the dialectic of disclosure and concealment in the 'theory of obduracy' in the case of the parables, and the repeated emphases on the disciples' lack of understanding in the presence of the theophanies of the Son of God.[19] In a theological 'composition' which blends into each other things that are historically irreconcilable, being [17] There is no need to doubt (as does Cullmann, Petrus, 1952, p. 64; ET Peter, 1953, p. 61) that it is the transfiguration that is meant here.

[18] Acts of John, chs. 90–91; Acts of Peter, ch. 20 (Schneemelcher, Vol. II, pp. 151f.; 207; ET, pp. 226f.; 301f.), and Apocalypse of Peter (n. 13 above). The way to the Jewish Merkabah mysticism is likewise open, as can be seen from W. Gerber, 'Die Metamorphose Jesu Mk 9.2 par.', ThZ 23 (1967), pp. 385–395. Nevertheless, it is clear here that all the 'metamorphoses', whether hellenistic or Jewish apocalyptic, are the presupposition of an entry into the heavenly world, i.e. they display the theme of 'verticality' of which we have spoken; but this does not suffice to account for the oscillating and complex reality of the transfiguration of Jesus.

[19] See above, p. 153, 218f.. W. Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (1901, 3rd edn. 1965; ET The Messianic Secret, 1973); H. J. Ebeling, Das Messiasgeheimnis und die Botschaft des Marcus-Evangelisten (1939). E. Sjöberg, Der verborgene Menschensohn (Lund 1959).

(Jesus as the Son of God who is known and knowable) and becoming (Jesus as the hidden Messiah who is not yet knowable) are identified; Jesus is himself both the subject and the object of the gospel as Mark understands it.[20]

The central paradoxes in Mark are taken over by Matthew and Luke as individual themes which are incorporated into a new way of describing the hiddenness of what is open.[21] Matthew both increases the distance between the two poles, by raising Jesus' sovereignty to the majesty of the pantocrator, and making his lowliness more comprehensible in principle and in practice, and more accessible to the Church. He pays the price of the possibility of this greater tension accompanied by a greater comprehensibility, through a loss of concreteness and a transition from narrative as action to narrative as instruction. The majesty is shown in the scenes of adoration (the Magi, 2.2ff.; the leper, 8.2; the ruler of the synagogue, 9.18; the Canaanite woman, 15.25; the mother of the sons of Zebedee, 20.20; above all, the disciples in the boat after the stilling of the storm, 14.33; after the Resurrection, the women, 28.9, and the eleven, 28.17). In all the blocks of teaching, Jesus is revealed at the close as the judge of the world.[22] Jesus' human emotions, which are prominent in Mark, are toned down or omitted.[23] The disciples address him as κύριε, and one of the things this implies, at least in the background, is the title of sovereignty given after Easter[24]. And now it is this exalted one who takes the path of lowliness, foreshadowed in the old covenant (especially in the piety of the anawim, which prepared the way for Jesus' understanding: cf. the beatitudes): he is the servant of God, who 'does not quarrel, nor make a noise, whose voice no one hears in the street' (12.19, after Jesus has twice withdrawn from a conflict with the Pharisees), who 'takes on our weaknesses and bears our sicknesses' (8.17, as the final interpretation of the meaning of the first miracles). He is 'meek and humble of heart' (11.29), the humble king (21.4f. = Zech 9.9 + Is 62.11), who is acclaimed by children and babes (21.15), just as God's truth is revealed only to children and babes (11.25). But all this is a lived interpretation of the old covenant, which receives its condensed embodiment in the existence of Jesus. Matthew repeatedly summarises the covenant with Israel in such embodiments: in the 'golden rule' (7.12), in the formulation of the double commandment (22.40), and in the three fundamental concepts of 'justice, mercy and (covenantal) truth' (23.23): clearly, he sees in this summary the filfilment of the whole law down to the last jot and tittle (5.18), because it is only thus that the threshold to the new covenant is crossed (5.20). It is the criterion of judgment ('what you have done to the least of my brothers . . .', 25.40,45) that shows the unity of these various concepts: to give justice (to those suffering unjustly) and to show mercy to the least (in imitation of God) is the existential realisation of covenantal fidelity. Everything is summarised in the unity of love of God and of neighbour, love for the highest and for the least, and Jesus Christ both makes this unity possible (as the kurios and servant of God) and realises it, since he existentially—in an act of obedience to the whole law (3.15)—'fulfils all righteousness' and thereby opens the path of imitation both ontologically and ethically, a path that is pure service (20.20ff.), childlikeness and abasement (18.1ff.), poverty, non-violence, and thus readiness to suffer and surrender of oneself to God (5.39ff.; 6.25ff.; 7.1ff.; 10.17ff.; 16.24ff.; 19.23ff.). The contradictory titles of Jesus, which Matthew yokes together, indicate the theological unity at [20] W. Marxsen, Der Evangelist Markus (2nd edn. 1959), pp. 86ff. (ET Mark the Evangelist, 1969, pp. 129ff.).

---

[21] Marxsen shows at the end of each of his chapters the toning-down of the Marcan paradox in the longer Gospels, but does not show how the paradox that is fundamental for all of them takes on a new form in the longer texts.

[22] Sermon on the Mount, 7.21ff: missionary discourse, 10.34ff., esp. 41; parabolic discourse, 13.49f.; address to the community, 18.21ff. (conclusion of the parables); address to the Pharisees, 24.34ff., making the transition to the apocalyptic discourse, 24.27ff. (return of the Son of Man), final parable which ends in the great judgment of the world and the statement of the criterion which will be applied there, 25.31ff.

[23] Anger (Mk 1.41; 3.5), sharp reprimand (1.43), deep sighing (8.12), indignation (10.14), tender embracing (9.36; 10.16), loving (10.21).

[24] G. Bornkamm, 'Enderwartung und Kirche im Mt. Ev.', in: G.

Bornkamm, G. Barth, H. J. Held, Überlieferung und Auslegung im MtEv (3rd edn., 1968), pp. 38f. (ET Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, 1963, pp. 41f.).

which he aims.[25] The limit and the danger of his literary devices come at the point where the uniqueness of Jesus' synthesis—more precisely, the uniqueness of his self-surrender (kenosis, detachment) to the Father—threatens to become a path of imitation that is accessible to all: and here, the Pauline corrective of the abolition of the law (beside its fulfilment) becomes indispensable. But Matthew shows from the outset that the filfilment of the law is so closely bound to the person and existence of Jesus—so strongly does the uniqueness of his sovereignty light up the uniqueness of his lowliness—that in his case too there is never the possibility that ethics can be separated from christology and become independent. In the unity of sovereignty and lowliness, Christ is truly the one who fulfils the covenant, and as servant of God it is he who widens out the human column which supports the arch, in the Church, to the ethics of imitation. For this reason, in Matthew the disciples must from the start have understanding.

In Luke too, while the Marcan paradox is taken over, it is reduced in importance and becomes a lesser theme (the formulae speaking of the disciples' lack of understanding are rare, but compact: 9.45; 18.34).[26] Neither does he choose Matthew's method of developing theologically the themes of majesty and lowliness, but seeks to grasp, from within the disposition of Jesus and God, the 'pull' from sovereignty to lowliness and to suffering. He knows of a yearning on Jesus' part for the baptism of suffering (12.50). And he sacrifices all geographical detours and distractions to the 'ascent to Jerusalem with resolute countenance' (9.51). Jerusalem is the starting-point and the goal of all that is narrated, the place (with the Temple at its midpoint) which Jesus as a child already entered as 'the salvation of Israel' and the 'light of the Gentiles' (2.22ff.), which he took in possession as a boy, since it was the place of his Father (2.49), and the place towards which he marches, since it is necessarily the place of his 'departure' (9.31) and of his 'assumption' (9.51):[27] the place of the suffering, and of the Easter appearances and the ascension into Heaven, and here there is already an echo of the Johannine double meaning of 'exaltation' (one always goes 'up' to Jerusalem: (18.31; 19.28). When he sees the city, after his long journey towards it, Jesus begins to weep (19.41) because the offer of salvation will be made in vain. Here we can see what is specifically Lucan: the boundless love of God, as Jesus discloses this and portrays it, is poor. It is not only meek and humble (as in Matthew), but powerless. The father in the parable 'must' let the younger son go, and the feast of the great forgiveness can be celebrated only when this son has followed his own paths to their end (15.11–32). It is only the man who has been robbed of everything and lies half dead at the wayside, who can truly be helped by the Samaritan (10.25–37). It is only when those who cannot make any return are invited, that the blessed love comes into its own (14.12–14). It is only to the sinful woman whose life is shattered, and who prostrates herself in confession, that 'much' can 'be forgiven' (7.36–50). The love of God discloses its hiddenness only for the one who sits 'in the lowest place' (14.10), for it is not only a love that is 'friendly to men' and 'is merciful', but a 'poor love', and hence truly an incarnate love. This is the reason for two complementary and apparently contradictory elements in Luke: on the one hand the extreme requirement of literal poverty and total renunciation, which seems exaggerated if taken at face value;[28] and on the other hand, the unique atmosphere, found throughout this Gospel but only in it, of praise, thanksgiving, joy, exultation, happiness in peace, all enclosed in a world of prayer, which is mentioned much more frequently than elsewhere:[29] prayer is in the air, and as it were the protective covering, in which the 'poor love' can live in its defencelessness. This love can already be called 'glorified' (δοξαζόμενος, 4.15) in its gift of self—here the Lucan theology borders on John[30]—but this glorification does not yet embrace the whole phenomenon, but only the half of it: this love reaps a harvest of 'amazement and applause' (4.22), but the 'rage' which breaks out soon afterwards destroys any glorification through men and leaves visible only the sovereignty with which Jesus 'went through the midst of them and departed' (4.30). And finally, it is characteristic for Luke that it is in his Gospel that women first become prominent: Mary the mother, Elizabeth who receives grace, the prophetess Anna, the widow of Nain, the sinful woman to whom much is forgiven, Magdalene who is freed from the evil one, the other helpers Joanna and Susanna; Mary and Martha of Bethany; the woman bent double who walks upright; the woman in the crowd who shouts out the blessing over Jesus' mother; the widow who gives away her last possession; the women on the way to the Cross; the faithful women who are present under the Cross and at the burial, and are the first to receive the news of the Resurrection at the tomb. The love of God, made flesh, meets in a hidden nuptial embrace the 'daughter of Sion' who has become flesh in woman. The basis of the covenant is not, as in Matthew, Jesus alone—as God and human being—but Jesus as a man, who from the outset takes up his fellow human beings with their feminine, handmaid's fiat into his own work. Paul had already recognised this (Eph 5), and John will establish it at a yet deeper level. If woman is the 'glory' of man in the order of creation (1 Cor 11.7), then the Church is the 'glory' of Christ (Eph 5.27), and is given by him the possibility of shining in the radiance that is proper to the poverty that serves in love: but in this, he himself makes use of the poverty of her love, in order to descend into the ultimate poverty.

---

[25] For examples, cf. ibid., pp. 30f. (ET pp. 32f.). From this point, the presentation of Jesus in Matthew's structure as an object of scandal and decision becomes clear. After the programmatic discourse (5–7) and the programmatic deeds (8–9) and the appointment of the fellow-workers (10), the scenes and logia of the krisis are collected in chs. 11 and 12: the question of John (with the logia referring to him), the lamentation over the cities that did not pay heed to the signs, the praise of the Father who conceals from the wise and discloses to the simple, the scandal of breaking the sabbath, the great quotation from the Servant Song, the discourse about Beelzebub with the discernment of spirits (but with eschatological definitiveness), the paradox of the sign of Jonah, and the rejection of Jesus' blood relations. Ch. 13 closes with the seven parables of the kingdom of God, which all aim at discernment and decision. Finally, there is the lack of faith in Jesus' home town. Here there is the definitive New Testament 'wisdom' (11.19; 12.42), 'prophecy' (13.17, 57), and 'Spirit' (12.28,31f.).

[26] The theme of the messianic secret is reduced to a few texts: 4.35,41; 5.14; 8.56; 9.21; but cf., e.g., 9.36.

---

[27] 'Jesus' consciousness of suffering is expressed as a journey': H. Conzelmann, Die Mitte der Zeit (4th edn. 1964), p. 57; cf. pp. 66ff. (ET The Theology of Luke, 1960, p. 63; cf. pp. 73ff.). R. Laurentin, 'Jésus au Temple', Et. Bibl. (1966), pp. 94ff.

---

[28] Here too there is a clear dependence on the Old Testament law of reversal: 1.52–53. But the cries of woe against the rich, the well fed, those who laugh and those who are praised are peculiar to Luke (6.24ff.). The chain of logia about mammon (16.9–13) is assembled by Luke himself and closes with the theme of the irreconcilability of the service of God and the service of mammon; the Pharisees are then characterised as 'lovers of money' (16.14). Mammon is 'unrighteous'. Greed is both folly and godlessness (12.15ff.). It follows that one must sell everything (12.33). Luke makes it quite clear: 'Whoever does not renounce all his goods cannot be my disciple' (14.26,33), At 5.11; 5.28; and 18.22 (as opposed to Mt 19.21), he adds a radicalising 'everything'.

[29] Texts collected in X. Léon-Dufour, 'Les Evangiles synoptiques', in: Robert Feuillet, Introduction à la Bible II (1959), pp. 244ff.

[30] 'Saint Luke is not far from the final Johannine interpretation of the life of Christ as a manifestation of glory from first to last': Ramsey, op. cit., p. 40.

b. Hidden Easter

1. The inauguration of the kingdom and the dawning of glory are one and the same thing in Jewish hopes. It was therefore inevitable that the Resurrection of the dead Lord into immortal life and the parousia should coincide; in Jesus' eschatological horizon, they had to. But it is striking that the word 'glory' never occurs in the context of the accounts of the risen Lord: it is only subsequent theological reflection that comes to see that the elemental impact of the kabod in God's action in the crucified one must imply a correspondingly elemental impact of the kabod in his action in the one who is raised up. If Rom 6.4 says that the Son was raised up 'through the δόξα of the Father', 1 Cor 6.14 goes on to say that 'his δύναμις' raised him up.[1] Eph 1.20 cannot find sufficiently exalted expressions to say what the 'Father of glory' has done in the event of the Resurrection. The reflection understands that the Resurrection is the 'fulfilment' of the promise, made a long time before, that the barriers of death would be broken through; this fulfilment makes present the 'fullness' (πλήρωμα) of the riches (πλοῦτος) which, since it is God's property, is a 'wealth of glory' (Rom 9.23; Eph 1.18; Phil 4.19; 3.16; Col 1.27). Thus the sermons of the Acts of the Apostles speak unabashedly and without distinction of the Resurrection of Jesus as 'exaltation to God's right hand' (2.33) and the 'glorification' of Jesus (3.13; both terms are found together at Is 52.13). 1 Pet 1.21 speaks of the God who has 'raised' Jesus 'from the dead and given him glory' (cf. 1 Pet 1.11). Indeed, the Lucan Christ gives the disciples on the road to Emmaus theological instruction: 'Was it not necessary for the Christ to suffer these things, and thus to enter his glory?' (24.26).[2] The liturgical hymn at 1 Tim 3.16 speaks of him in the last line as 'having been taken up in glory', and the Letter to the Hebrews goes so far as to say that 'we see him crowned with glory and honour' because he suffered unto death (2.9), with 'a far greater glory' than Moses once received, in that Jesus is invited to sit at the right hand of the Father (1.13; 8.1; 10.12).

---

[1] Cf. the closeness of both terms at Eph 1.18; 3.16; Col 1.11. They are 'interchangeable concepts for Paul ... The splendour of God is the splendour of his power, and the power of God is the power of his splendour': H: Schlier, Epheserbrief p. 77.—Cf. Däubler's verse: 'Before I shine forth in the splendour of my brilliant power ...' (Nordlicht II, Inselverlag 1922, p. 253).

This ingenuous theological language contrasts with the simplicity of the Easter narratives. Although Jesus appears several times 'in unwonted form' (Mk 16.12; Lk 24.16; Jn 20.15; 21.4), this metamorphosis bears no quality of transfiguration. It is pure concealment, a transitory desire not to be recognised. There is neither brilliant light nor overwhelming impact in the Gospel recognition scenes. On the contrary, the close of Matthew already betrays a stylised character, as the pantocrator speaks timelessly from Heaven on high. It is only the resurrection angels with their shining garments who indicate—though virtually only in a symbolic way—the atmosphere of δόξα (Mk 16.5; Lk 24.4; Jn 20.12), but this is less defined than with the Christmas angel in Luke, with whom 'the glory of God' shines forth (2.9). At Easter, this symbolic light shines only where Jesus is absent: where he is present, there is 'joy' (Jn 20.21). In Luke's account, there is first 'anxiety and terror' in the presence of what is incomprehensible (24.37; cf. Mk 16.8), but then 'they were unable to believe for very joy and astonishment' (24.41).[3] Nothing indicates that the Apostles had experienced the 'many proofs that Jesus gave them that he was alive' (Acts 1.3) as experiences of being overwhelmed by the divine eschatological impact, as did Paul outside Damascus; what they are permitted to experience is not the majesty of the Master, but his intimacy and love, together with a consciousness of the seriousness of their definitive ecclesiastical mission to the world. Luke makes the lack of glory of the period of forty days obvious by means of the disciples' question: 'Lord, is it at this time that you will restore the kingdom to Israel?' (Acts 1.6). The promised glory has not yet come; between Easter and the parousia there stretches the period of the Church, and when the Lord disappears as he ascends to Heaven, the cloud that withdraws him from sight is no 'kabod cloud' (as at the transfiguration); the same reservation about the external visibility of the divine, which is characteristic of the story of Jesus' life,[4] continues up to his Ascension. No human being saw the Resurrection; it is only attested, 'not indeed to all the people, but to the witnesses whom God had designated beforehand' (Acts 10.41): it is perceived only through their testimony, which, like the event to which they bear witness itself, conceals itself invisibly and powerlessly in the confusion of the history of the world. When Paul quotes the tradition, he gives powerful testimony to the fact and to its significance (1 Cor 15.3–5), without delaying over the mechanism of what happened. Mark gives only the angel's allusion to the encounter that still lies in the future. Matthew knows a little more: a short 'encounter en route' of the women and Jesus, the indirect publicity spread through rumours, which he links to the story of the bribing of the soldiers, and the stylised missionary discourse of the one who is exalted to Heaven. Luke and John relate encounters in the intimate circle of Jesus' close friends: Luke's emphasis is on the fulfilment of the whole of Scripture through Easter, and John emphasises the foundation of the Church (bestowal of the Spirit, 'blessed are those who do not see', the office of Peter, the relationship between the official Church and the Church of love). There is, accordingly, the deepest reserve which points to the glory, of which Jesus had often spoken, as lying in the future (Mk 8.38 par.; 10.37 par.; 13.26 par.; Mt 19.28; 25.31; 2 Thess 1.10); there is a new 'hope of glory' (Col 1.27), but the 'revelation' (1 Pet 4.13) and 'appearing' (Tit 2.13) of this glory is still to come. The martyr Stephen can see what lies in the future, the reality that is at present 'laid up' in Heaven (Acts 3.21), and even before the restoration of all things he can see the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God (Acts 7.55f.); but such a glimpse of the eschaton is reserved for the witness at the fatal close of his testimony—for the rest, both Christ and their life of faith in him remain 'hidden in God', and it is only at the end that both together 'will appear in glory' (Col 3.3f.).

---

[2] As has been mentioned already, Luke is the only one of the Synoptists to speak of a glory that belongs to Christ as his own: 9.26, 32.

---

[3] On the stylisation of Mt 28.2f., cf. my 'Triduum Paschale', in: Mysterium Salutis III (1969).

[4] E. Pax, Epiphaneia, op. cit., pp. 194–195.

2. The question thus arises, what could be the meaning of the numerous statements about glory that refer to the new covenant, to the gospel, and to the Christian life. We have indeed established that, both for the Old[5] and for the New Testaments,[6] 'glory' includes in itself the great names and styles of conduct of God in salvation history, or that this term is intimately related to these. And yet, it was not possible to separate the concept of 'glory' from an idea of the visibility—visible indeed, to the senses—of the divinity of God. This began at Sinai with a dialectical coded discourse, which is partly continued (up to the Johannine Apocalypse),[7] and is partly converted to a discourse of light and splendour in the latest prophetic writings and in apocalyptic—for John, God is light without any darkness (1 Jn 1.5). The angels of the New Testament radiate this pure heavenly light, as does, in an

---

[5] III/2,1, pp. 133ff., 189ff.

[6] See above, pp. 260ff., 264ff.

[7] 'The temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God and from his might (δύναμις), and no one could enter the temple until the seven plagues . . . were ended', Rev 15.8, corresponding to Ex 40.34f.

overwhelming manner, the heavenly Christ who appears to Paul. The extreme quality in the visible apparition of God is no longer (as is still the case, in a toned-down way, at the transfiguration of Christ) the mutual merging of light and darkness, but is now a light of such a quality that it blinds the human being who is unprepared and unable to grasp it, and casts him down into darkness (Acts 9.8). It is through the Church, embodied in Ananias, that 'the eyes of the heart are enlightened' for him once more (Eph 1.18), so that he himself may be able 'to shed light upon the dispensation of the mystery' out of 'grace' (Eph 3.9). The word 'light' occurs again three times, when Paul relates his conversion before Festus and Agrippa, first as the 'light from heaven, brighter than the sun' that casts Paul and his companions to the ground, then as the mission to the Gentiles: 'You are to open their eyes, so that they may turn from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God'; and finally as the whole proclamation of the mystery of the death and Resurrection of Christ in the gospel as a light both for Jews and for Gentiles (Acts 26.13,18,23). One can discuss whether the light at Damascus is a traditional literary motif introduced by Luke (it is not mentioned at Gal 1.15f.),[8] and further, whether the experience of light—if it was perceptible to the senses—came to influence Paul's theology, for example the great statement at 2 Cor 4.4ff. about the blindness of the unbelievers, 'so that the illumination of the gospel of the glory of Christ should not give them light . . . for it is the God who said, 'Out of the darkness the light shall shine', who has shone in our hearts to give the illumination of the knowledge of the glory of God on the face of Christ'. But even if both of these can be questioned, it is clear from the whole of Paul's theology—for which 2 Cor 3–4 can be taken as representative here—that, for him, God's glory in light and power possesses a visible component: this glory is objectively visible on the face of Christ, i.e. in the whole event of his death and Resurrection, although of course this is the case only when the objective call of God, 'Let there be light!', finds an answering creative call in the subjective depth of the hearts that are given the power to see. One cannot therefore say that the perceptible glory of the Old Testament is 'spiritualised' in Paul, since—however one estimates the influence of the theme of the perceptible light on his theology—God's glory can be perceived on the face of the incarnate Son in a human (i.e. sensory-intellectual) way. However, one cannot take the opposite line and maintain that Paul remains essentially within the sphere of the Old Testament kabod: it is precisely in the long expositions of the fundamental discrepancy between the 'perishable' glory of God on the face of Moses (3.7), which also had to be concealed, and the imperishable and open glory on the face of Christ (though this is visible only to the one who believes), that Paul makes the transition from this sphere. This exposes the wholly different dialectic of the New Testament glory between openness and concealment, a dialectic which is both fundamental and conclusive. For Paul, the δόξα is objectively visible already in the creation as a whole for anyone who is willing to acknowledge what can be known and does not darken his heart by turning away from the truth (Rom 1.19–23); and it becomes newly objectively visible, at a much deeper level yet, through the act by which God's grace brings justification for anyone who lets himself be touched inwardly by the grace of God that dawns in the gospel, so that he may become able to see.

---

[8] Discussion in: G. Lohfink, Paulus vor Damaskus, St.B.St. 4 (1965).

But it is at this point that, once again, the hiddenness of the glory of God that is revealed in Christ becomes most precisely obvious. We shall meet the section 2 Cor 3–4, which is important for the discussion of 'glory', many times later on; here, we select only the relevant themes. The statement that God's glory has dawned on the face of Christ (4.6) is central. But this glory becomes accessible only within the 'enlightenment of the knowledge' of this glory;[9] its brilliant visibility is not something it possesses per se, but is something only for particular persons to know. But what is realised in this knowledge? Or in what way does the face of Christ reflect the glory of God? The answer lies in the 'gospel of the glory of Christ, who is in the image of the Father', in the gospel which, while it certainly obtains its whole light from this, which is its central contents, still has therein a light of its own which shines (αὐγάσαι τὸν φωτισμὸν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου . . .) because its contents are God's salvific act in the Cross and Resurrection of Jesus to justify sinners. The gospel therefore contains the 'evidence' of the highest 'love of God' (Rom 5.8; 8.32), which has revealed itself in the highest 'love of Christ' (Rom 8.35). The logic of 2 Cor 5.14–15 is a pure logic of love, and 'faith' (as 'obedience to the gospel', Rom 10.16) is acceptance of the truth of the love of God (Gal 2.19–20); only on the basis of such a love can one explain how Paul finds that the prospect of 'dying and being with Christ' is 'much better' than living on here (Phil 1.23). Now it is impossible for us to come to the unheard-of contents of the gospel other than through its being preached (Rom 10.14ff.); but this preaching contains the gospel's own light, in a way that is visible to men, essentially through the 'openness' and 'transparency' of those who preach (2 Cor 4.1–2). Their service (appointed and made possible through 'God's merciful grace') has renounced all 'shameful concealment', all 'tricks', and all 'falsifications of the word' and thus 'commends itself' before God 'to every human discernment'. But this 'openness' in the preacher is not something that he himself has brought about or chosen for himself: it is strict obedience to an inexorable and unconditional calling to the office (Gal 1.15f.); thanks to the obedience of the one who obeys, the glory of the one proclaimed, whom he serves, shines through his office (διακονία) . . . ἐν δόξῃ, 2 Cor 3.8; 'for it is not ourselves that we preach', 4.5), and this existence as one carrying out an office becomes automatically, without any emphasis, the [9] On this expression, cf. J. Dupont, Gnosis. La connaissance religieuse dans les épîtres de S. Paul (1949), pp. 36–39. For the connection of these passages with Paul's Damascus experience, cf. H. A. A. Kennedy, Saint Paul's Conception of the Last Things, pp. 90–92; against this, A. Schlatter, Paulus als Bote Jesu (1934): Paul does not speak of himself alone, but of his fellow workers too. Schlatter wishes to see in the shining of God upon the face of Christ an echo of the image of the radiant face of Moses (2 Cor 3.7).

---

According to H. Schlier, 'Die Erkenntnis Gottes nach den Briefen des Apostels Paulus' (1964, in: Besinnung auf das NT, 1964, pp. 319–339, at p. 327), Paul thinks 'of his own heart, but in such a way that he sees himself standing in line with many others'.

existence of one who bears witness: service is expropriation, and expropriation (in the case of these contents) is love. Paul's expropriation outside Damascus had its own impact and visibility for his entire Jewish, Christian and pagan milieu (whether or not his companions saw the light that turned him from a Jew to a Christian), and this visibility is one of the factors taken into account in the whole process here. Here the general public receives the criterion by which to judge whether the evangelist 'is proclaiming himself', or remains solely a servant of the proclamation of Christ (4.5). The concealment of the splendour of the Father on the human face of Christ is concealed in the office and the kerygma, which in its turn is concealed in the existence of the Apostle; but this existence, in order to be 'open' for all to judge, must once again conceal itself in the dialectic of the existence of Christ: 'always we bear the dying of Jesus on our body, so that the life of Jesus too may be manifest on our body. For although we are living, for Jesus' sake we are always being handed over to the power of death . . .' (4.10–11). The vessel which bears the precious 'treasure' (the evidence of the love of the Father in the dying and rising of the Son) in itself is 'earthen', inconspicuous and fragile, in order precisely so to be appropriate for its contents: the contents and the vessel stand and fall together, and refer to each other: the one to whom witness is borne appears in the existence of the witness; and the weakness (Cross) of the one to whom witness is borne has the power (Resurrection) to make the witness credible; the witness must be weak, 'in order that the superabundant power may be attributed to God and not to us' (4.7). Thus there is built up a system of ever deeper concealments and almost alienations of the glory—but precisely at its most hidden point (that of the bare existence of the bare witness) the glory brings everything all at once into the open (τῇ φανερώσει τῆς ἀληθείας, 4.2).

If one asks whether anything at all appears and is visible in so precarious a system—in which what is disclosed conceals itself ever afresh, in order to achieve openness, and indeed ultimately everything seems to be left up to human decision and human evaluation—or whether the balance comes out on the side of the revelation of God, then Paul's reply is unambiguous: Pneuma. In his Resurrection Christ becomes πνεῦμα ζωοποιοῦν ('a life-giving spirit', 1 Cor 15.45), after he had taken on himself a 'flesh of sin' (σάρξ ἁμαρτίας, Rom 8.3), i.e. a flesh doomed to mortality and destruction, and had died in this flesh. But precisely this flesh becomes in the Resurrection σῶμα πνευματικόν (a 'spiritual body', 1 Cor 15.44), the bodiliness that is exalted into the divine sphere of life and of the giving of life, and thus of glory (σῶμα τῆς δόξης, Phil 3.21). The whole risen Christ is 'the Spirit', which means for us the concrete accessibility of the divine sphere of eternal life and the powerful communication of this life to our mortal life. The Spirit is 'the Spirit of Jesus Christ' (Phil 1.19; Rom 8.9), Christ is 'the Lord of the Spirit' (2 Cor 3.18). The synthesis between what the mortal flesh of the Jesus who was once obedient unto the death on the Cross, and what he now is as the 'life-giving Spirit', has become indissoluble in the Spirit, and this explains for us why the mortal existence of the man Jesus before the event of the Cross remains so much in the shadows for Paul, and why it receives as such no emphasis, no divine light, no δόξα. One can and must see in Paul a strong polemical quality in the one-sided emphasis on the Cross and Resurrection as the one relevant substance of the Christ-event—against people who held fast to the traditions of logia and miracles and saw in Jesus of Nazareth the last rabbi of Israel and the promised Messiah who would finally, after a short delay, restore the kingdom; and also against people who understood the Christian life above all as an imitation of the Jesus who 'did good deeds' and perhaps also of the Jesus who suffered injustly. There are sufficient hints that Paul knew and valued the traditional material that was later brought together in the Gospels; and he too had himself been a διδάσκαλος (teacher) in Antioch (Acts 13.1).[10] But none of this raises Christianity significantly above the level of an improved Jewish ethics and apocalyptic and of a Greek wisdom teaching; and so it must give up any independent significance and be subordinated to the one, all-decisive paradox of the Cross/curse and Resurrection/salvation, in the synthesis of the Pneuma which is accomplished by the powerful splendour of the Father: 'From now on, we know no one any longer according to the flesh; and even if we knew Christ according to the flesh, we know him thus no more' (2 Cor 5.16). It is only the Cross that reveals what Jesus' life truly was; and it is only the Resurrection that reveals what the Cross was—the redemption of the cosmos. It is precisely what is absolutely inglorious, the 'curse' (Gal 3.13) and the 'embodiment of sin' (2 Cor 5.21) of the Cross, that is the presupposition that makes it possible for the omnipotent synthesis that is brought about in the Resurrection to be purely divine glory. But this synthesis is at the same time the central, indeed the exclusive subject of the gospel and thus of faith (as obedient acceptance of the gospel) and of the Christian life both of the expropriated Apostle and of every Christian, who is expropriated through baptism and brought into the death and Resurrection of Christ. If the risen one is the Lord of the Spirit, then the new covenant sealed in him is also 'a covenant of the Spirit' (2 Cor 3.6), the 'gospel is the power of God' (Rom 1.16), the apostolic service is 'service of the Spirit' (2 Cor 3.8), and the acceptance of the proclamation in faith and baptism is a 'new creation' (2 Cor 5.17).

---

[10] L. Cerfaux, Le Christ dans la théologie de S. Paul (2nd edn. 1954), pp. 136–146, shows (against Bultmann) how much the earthly Jesus enters for Paul into the mystery of the Cross, and is not the mere presupposition for the occurrence of this event.

This confirms that the christology developed in the first part of this work is central to the New Testament. What is decisively Christian is brought to light only when Paul locates the main thrust of the redemptive event outside the (prophetical) claim and the (ethical-ascetic) poverty of Jesus, in the theme of his relinquishing the whole exploitation and interpretation of his absolute obedience that encompassed his life and his death, and his entrusting this to the Father and the Spirit: at this point, no merely human christology can be satisfactory, and the idea of pre-existence is demanded. Pre-Pauline hymnody and liturgy had gone a long way in preparing this concentration, but the interpolations Paul makes (in Phil 2.8 and Col 1.20) are indispensable, if the Christian accentuation is to be made with precision.

Accordingly, the acceptance of the gospel cannot be a simple continuation on a higher level of the Old Testament faith (including the faith of apocalyptic), nor of a Greek 'philosophical faith' in universal providence (as Paul's first scheme of preaching had perhaps attempted to present it: 1 Thess 1.9–10; Acts 14.15ff.; 17.22ff.): it can only be an obedience so radical that it undergirds the whole of human existence and places it under the pure truth of the gospel and of its subject-matter: he who was crucified (for all) is the one who is risen (for all). Abraham's faith can be the model of all faith—and precisely of Christian faith too—because it is faith in the God who gives life to the dead and calls into being what does not exist (Rom 4.17). But this faith is wholly based on the christological (or more properly trinitarian) event, from which it derives its essence and its consciousness,[11] and to which it continuously refers. And just as the divine power of the Pneuma has established the indissoluble synthesis, 'Jesus is the Christ', 'the one who was crucified is the one who is risen', so it presents to the world the synthesis of the Christian existence in faith, as an existence that shares in indivisible unity (transmitted through the unity of the gospel) in the unity of Jesus Christ, crucified and risen, dead and living.

The paradox of Christian existence is therefore no more of a contradiction than the paradox of Jesus Christ, although it seems to be more paradoxical still than this latter. For while the earthly Jesus was inglorious 'flesh' that came through the Cross to be a 'spiritual, glorious body', the earthly existence of the Christian after Easter, thanks to the unity of the gospel and of its subject, shares both in the Cross and in the Resurrection (in the future: Rom 6.7ff.; in the present: Eph 2.6); the glory of Christ shines over this existence as a whole, and it stands in the splendour of his light (2 Cor 3.18) even—and precisely—where the Christian takes up 'the last place' as 'refuse' (1 Cor 4.9ff.) and is 'publicly exposed to view through insult and persecution' (Heb 10.33). This happens to him 'with [11] We are speaking of the open act of faith of Christians, not of the deficient and perhaps implicit act of faith which can be hidden in the enduring awareness of God on the part of the sinful pagan: Acts 17.27; Rom 2.15f.

---

Christ' and 'in Christ' in the place where he as a Christian truly stands, and despite the ordinariness and lack of splendour of what takes place, it becomes 'somehow visible',[12] as the 'generous condescension of God to us in Christ Jesus' (Eph 2.7). The logic that holds everything together—the Resurrection of the crucified one, the gospel and the Church (founded on the Apostles), Christian faith and Christian existence—is so consistent and indivisible that the divinity (glory) of God—his generous condescension, indeed the folly of his absolute love—takes on genuine visibility in it.

This visibility of the New Testament glory of God includes in itself, but transforms and spiritualises, the visibility of the Old Testament kabod of Yahweh. The raising-up into the pneuma, into the divine sphere, thanks to the Resurrection, does not mean an 'etherialisation'. Nothing in the creation and the history of the world is analogous to this New Testament visibility of the δόξα. It breaks through the law of the old age precisely by signifying a genuine proleptic presence of the coming world in the old world. This cannot be expressed in the terms of Jewish apocalyptic (as a preview of the last things), because the coming Son of Man is the Jesus who has already died and risen; nor can it be expressed in the terms of hellenistic Platonism, because the eternal that is present is in no sense timeless, and the risen Lord works and rules as one who is present because he is the one who was and the one who is to come: 'the same yesterday, today and for ever' (Heb 13.8). This does not mean that this incomparable visibility of the glory of God in the gospel and in the Church is itself one of the last things; rather, according to Paul, it is dynamically orientated to an eschatological openness that is still to come both in the 'children of God' and in the creation as a whole, and this must still remain hidden for a time (Rom 8.24; Col 3.3). The hiddenness of the δόξα in its openness remains for the Christian as mysterious as the presence of the definitive inheritance in the 'down-payment' of the Holy Spirit and in the special Christian hope that does not deceive.

---

[12] H. Schlier, Epheserbrief, p. 112.

Although Paul clearly retains the old formulation of glory—which sees this together with the parousia and the Resurrection of Christ as a concept of salvation history and therefore sees the Cross, as the ultimate 'renunciation of the form of God', as also without glory—his very emphasis on the identity of the risen one with the crucified one prompts the question of the extent to which his reasoning implies that the shame and curse of the Cross have their part in the shining out of God's glorious love in Christ. It is only where both Cross and Resurrection are kept in view together that Christ can be called the 'εἰκών of the hidden God' (Col 1.15) and that Paul's gospel can be called a gospel 'of the δόξα of Christ, who is the εἰκών of God' (2 Cor 4.4). 'Εἰκών implies visibility; but must not the visibility of what is essentially invisible also bear in itself an element of invisibility and hiddenness?[13] One may add, with K. H. Rengstorf, that Christ is the 'image of God' precisely by returning to the δόξα of God—'this at once clothes him in the mystery of his hiddenness'—and leaves it to the Father who raises him to 'see to' the relationship between the openness and the hiddenness of God in the Son.[14] K. L. Schmidt has maintained that, for Paul, Christ in his abasement also belongs to the idea of Chirst as the εἰκών of God.[15] In the concealment [13] Thus Chrysostom, Hom. in Col. 3.1 (PG 62, 318). The question is the subject of debate among the Nicene and post-Nicene fathers. Detailed discussion in: Lightfoot, St Paul's Epistle to the Colossians (8th edn. 1886), p. 142; cf. Eltester, Eikon, op. cit., p. 148.

[14] Die Auferstehung Jesu (5th edn. 1967), pp. 102f.

[15] 'Homo imago Dei', Eranos-Jahrbuch 15 (1947), p. 190. W. G. Kümmel agrees with him in the additions to Lietzmann's commentary on Corinthians (4th edn. 1949), p. 201. Eltester argues against this (p. 133), but incorrectly, if one distinguishes between eikôn—as God's appearing in Christ—and the concept of doxa used in a more particular way, which Paul cannot employ directly to specify the Cross. On the other hand, K. Prümm, Diakonia Pneumatos I (1967), pp. 172f., points out that at 1 Cor 2.8b Christ is called the 'Lord of glory' and is not exalted, nor recognised by the rulers of the world. For Paul, the earthly Jesus is already 'the unconditional possessor of doxa', although this did not (Prümm says: scarcely) appear in his earthly life. Prümm sees doxa here (in the extension of this term by the LXX) primarily as 'an interior possession' and, in the case of Christ, as a 'designation of the dignity of the divine being', the 'exaltation of his being on the same level as God'. At p. 173, n. 1, Prümm draws attention to the closeness between Paul and John.

of all δόξα in the one abandoned by God on the Cross, he enters the most immediate relationship to the concealed δόξα of the Father, and when at Easter he rises into this divine, hidden δόξα, he is presented by the triune God to the world, in the 'gospel of the glory of Christ', as the one he is—through the few eyewitnesses who have experienced him as the living one. The gospel, the proclamation of Jesus the Christ, is fully open, unconcealed and free of dialectic: it proclaims the openness of God and of his love in the event of Jesus, and summons the proclaimer to the risk of speaking freely (παρρησία) and the hearer to the risk of faith. Here, every cover is withdrawn, and this openness is effected by the pneuma; thus the one who proclaims can 'stand forth with great παρρησία (2 Cor 3.12) and, together with the believing hearers, 'see' (or: 'reflect') 'with uncovered face the glory of the Lord' (2 Cor 3.18), although both the exalted crucified one and the Christian who suffers on earth live in hiddenness. When the 'gospel of the glory of Christ' is disclosed like this, however, it places man—the whole of humanity after Christ—before the ever new choice and decision: one must become aware of the 'good odour' that leads to life, or of the 'foul odour' that leads to death, since the 'fragrance of the knowledge of Christ is spread abroad everywhere' by God himself through the Apostles (2 Cor 2.14).[16] This uniquely penetrating quality of the gospel—here transferred from the imagery of hearing and seeing to that of the sense of smell—belongs for the New Testament to the pneumatological fulfilment of the sensory components of the old kabod of Yahweh, although the centre of the image has long since shifted to the sphere of salvation history.[17]

Nevertheless, the salvation-historical dimension of δόξα always remains a cosmological dimension: since the creation came into existence, something of God's glory has been perceptible in it (Rom 1.20.23) and everything that happens in the history of the world and in salvation history is en route to the perfect revelation of this primal event (Rom 8.18–39); we shall speak of this in the third section, because here we are considering the theme of glory only under the heading of 'hiddenness'. But at this point it is already possible to sum up what has been said as follows: for Paul, δόξα has a consistently trinitarian dimension. The 'glory of God' that 'shines on the face of Christ' (2 Cor 4.6) belongs to the 'Father of glory' (Eph 1.17), although the Son too can be called 'the Lord of glory' while still in the condition of his abasement (cf. the context: 1 Cor 2.8), who 'has welcomed us into the glory of God' (Rom 15.7); but the taking up and transformation 'from glory to glory' which begins already now is brought about by the Spirit, who proceeds from the Lord and communicates to the Church of those who believe the glory of his love, which is visible only to the eyes of faith (2 Cor 3.18).

---

[16] On the criterion of decision, cf. also 2 Cor 11.14: Satan can appear also as an angel of light.

[17] H. Schlier, 'Doxa bei Paulus als heilsgeschichtlicher Begriff' (1961, also in: Besinnung auf das NT, 1964, pp. 307–318).

3. Where the hiddenness of Christ's glory is concerned, it is but a step from Paul to John. There is a distance—for Paul, the earthly life of Jesus is without glory, while John lets the glory shine through everything, Incarnation, miracles and Passion—but this distance is not great, because, as has been shown, the life of Jesus makes sense and comes to light in his Cross, which however takes on its inner meaning only from the light of the Resurrection. And even if Paul at first understands δόξα (on the basis of the Old Testament) eschatologically and apocalyptically, the eschaton takes on a proleptic presence in the Holy Spirit through the Resurrection of Jesus, in the gospel and in the life of Christians, and the gospel itself is the definitive apocalypse.[18] This means that an almost Platonic/Philonic light falls from the eschatological glory of Christ on to the Christian present. Faith stands at the point of transition to knowledge, and the old age is proleptically lit up by the light of the new age; the dialectic that cuts right through human existence (Rom 8.10) is neutralised (Rom 7.25) because it has already been lived and overcome in Christ (Rom 4.25), and it is brought by the dynamic of hope towards the promised unity that is establishing itself (Rom 8.18ff.).[19] Now it is necessary only for the light that lights up the Christian life from the Resurrection of Christ to fall on the life of the earthly Jesus, for this too—though in a different manner—to be understood as hidden glory. The path back from John, from whom this section began, can be opened up by means of a look at Hebrews and 1 Peter.

[18] On ἀποκάλυψις in Paul, cf. J. Dupont, Gnosis, pp. 187–201; art. ἀποκαλύπτω etc., TDNT III, 563–592 (Oepke, with bibliography), art. μυστήριον TDNT IV, 802–828 (G. Bornkamm). N. A. Dahl shows the use (through reshaping) of the apocalyptic concepts of revelation in Paul and in the whole of early Christian literature: 'Formgeschichtliche Beobachtungen zur Christusverkündigung in der Gemeindepredigt', Ntl. Studien für R. Bultmann (2nd edn. 1957), pp. 3ff.

The Letter to the Hebrews begins with five statements about the glory of Christ. The first (1.3), recalling Wis 7.26, calls him the 'reflected splendour' of God's 'glory, the imprint of his being', in a 'solemn liturgical formula' which, while it derives from the Wisdom literature (and Philo), indicates—in an anticipatory summary of the later passages in the Letter about salvation history—the Son who is high priest and forerunner, the historical Jesus in the uniqueness and definitiveness of his suffering. Protologically, he is the creator of the world together with God, and eschatologically he is the 'heir of all' the world: between the beginning and the end comes the 'abasement' (2.9) in which he accomplishes 'redemption from sins' (1.3). If δόξα, like the 'majesty' (μεγαλοσύνη) which immediately follows, is 'a paraphrase for the divine being',[20] then the one so described, the pre-existent Son who has gone through abasement, is characterised as the appearing of the divinity of God in the cosmos as a whole. He is neither before [19] Cf. the dense article by H. Schlier, 'Die Erkenntnis Gottes nach den Briefen des Apostels Paulus' (1964, in: Besinnung auf das NT, pp. 319–339), where it is shown in the second and third sections how the gospel about the crucified and risen one demands faith, but at the same time takes on the development of a true wisdom discourse (against U. Wilckens, Weisheit und Torheit, 1959), how the believing community (for example in Ephesians) has to grow into the knowledge of the revealed mystery, but the subject of this knowledge is the love of God and being known by God, growth through brotherly love and inner spiritual experience into the boundlessness and 'ineffability' of the mystery of the 'suffering God'.

[20] O. Michel, Der Hebräerbrief (12th edn. 1966), p. 98.

the world nor above the world, nor can one speak of adoptionism (e.g., because of 2.5ff.); rather, 'here we have reached the unity of thought that includes in itself every individual stage of the development of christology'. This is 'bound to the word and work of an historical person, who cannot be understood on his own terms, but only on God's terms'.[21] It is true that, as with Paul, the emphasis of the human life of this unique person is consistently on his suffering—and a suffering that is described more concretely and has the accounts of the Passion in view[22]—but unlike Paul, the Letter makes a closer link between this suffering and the glory. This takes place through an applicationh of Ps 8.6 to Christ: 'What is man, that you think of him, the Son of Man, that you pay heed to him? You have abased him only a little lower than the angels, you have crowned him with glory and honour'. This puzzling transposition of an anthropological statement to a christological statement raises many questions,[23] but what interests us here is not the stages, now lost to view, which produced this text, but the great dogmatic result: the Old Testament's theological image of the free worldly partner of God, whom he raises to the dignity of the covenant,[24] is transposed into the christological key and is therein fulfilled, superseded and set free from its problematic. The glory that belongs to the human person as God's image cannot be denied here, but remains unemphasised; in the foreground we find, first God's will 'to lead all his sons to glory' (2.10)—an eschatological glory which is without doubt greater than the likeness to God which his nature gives him—and second, the abasement of Jesus 'a little lower than the angels': in the suffering of abandonment by God (2.9),[25] he 'learns obedience' (5.8) and 'tastes death for everyone' (2.9), in order to free all from the curse of the devil and from fear of death (2.14). Because of this obedience, God has made him leader of the holy people and definitive ruler. This is the christological understanding of the subjection of the universe to the power of man. Here there follows the dialectic, which we have already mentioned, between seeing and not seeing: 'Now we do not yet see that everything has been subjected to him. But we do see Jesus, who was abased a little lower than the angels, crowned with glory and honour because he suffered death' (2.9). What we see is not that the suffering of death is itself glory and honour,[26] but that this was the reason for Jesus' being crowned with glory and honour. The believers, accordingly, see through the Cross the glory of the exalted one, even although it is not yet plainly seen that everything is subjected to him. 'The death on the Cross too is a heavenly event and cannot be separated from the exaltation. The community sees not the suffering and dying Jesus, but the one who has been exalted through and in the suffering of death to become high priest' (F. J. Schierse).[27] This vision of faith is a theme that often recurs in the Letter to the Hebrews (3.1; 12.2; for the Old Testament: 11.13,26,27). For the author, in the experience of Christian existence 'the powers of the age to come can already be tasted inwardly (6.4f.; 10.19ff.), so that Christian faith already looks into the hiddenness of the heavenly world', and 'a visibility of what is invisible somehow belongs to the essence of faith'.[28] And this is not on the basis of the Easter narratives (the theme of the Resurrection occurs nowhere in the whole Letter), but comes about through an ability to discern the inner meaning of Jesus' abasement, in which the entire salvific action of the old covenant comes to fulfilment. Therefore the quotation from the psalm about the glorious image of the Son of Man is applied first of all to the history of the covenant, since the theme of intensification, which runs through the whole epistle, is applied at 3.3 to Moses and Jesus: Jesus 'was counted worthy of greater glory (δόξα) than Moses, just as the architect deserves more honour (τιμή) than the house'. The architect who created both the world and the covenant is God, and Jesus as Son belongs on the side of God and stands above the whole house of God. The covenant motif occurs again in the description of the old and the new cult: the ark of the covenant with its contents belonged originally to the holy of holies of the old Temple, and 'above it were the cherubim of glory, overshadowing the mercy seat' (9.5). Once again, 'glory' is the paraphrase for the divine presence, which was represented as dwelling (in the shekinah) between the cherubim over the ark. But all of this had disappeared after the exile, and on the Day of Atonement the high priest no longer sprinkled the blood of sacrifice on the mercy seat, but before the 'foundation stone' or against the curtain.[29] The author turns from this extinguished glory to the event (which could be described only in a paradoxical way in the categories of the old covenant) whereby Jesus, as 'high priest of the good things to come', 'offered himself as a spotless sacrifice to God through his Spirit' not once a year, but 'once for all' and 'entered with his own blood into the holy of holies', so that he might become—precisely thus, as the one who had died, the one who was sacrificed, the blood that was shed—the living high priest for us before God (9.11f.). The incompatibility of the old images—no one can be at one and the same time priest and sacrificial victim, no one can enter his priestly office in Heaven in virtue of his being sacrificed upon earth—is the proof that the new covenant is a completely new creation. It is indeed possible to catch a 'Platonic' sight of the archetype (which lacks glory on the level of the image) through 'shadowy images' (8.5) and 'copies' (9.23), but the historicisation of world affairs involved in the transition from the old covenant to the new assigns what is 'Platonic' to obsolescence and employs it only as a bridge to the uniqueness of the eschatological Christ-event. Both the cosmos of the Old Testament and that of Platonism are shattered by the Son's absolute will to obey (10.5–10), the Son who all at once breaks the barrier of death by opening for all (as ἀρχηγός) the way into the Father's eternity, and the barrier of our sinful and obstinate hearts, by purifying them in such a way that he can introduce into these hearts his own will to obey (10.16f.). It is on this basis that Christ can be portrayed as a model in suffering for the oppressed Jewish Christians, without losing his quality as archetype.

---

[21] Ibid., p. 99.

[22] Ibid., p. 80: 'The image of Jesus is marked by suffering': Heb 2.9; 5.7–10; 7.27; 10.5–7; 12.2–3.

[23] Ibid., pp. 135f.

[24] III/2,1, pp. 81–131.

[25] Following the reading χωρὶς θεοῦ (2.9), which is 'textually preferable': O. Michel, p. 141; above, p. 210, n. 7.

---

[26] As A. M. Ramsey, with Holmes, Bruce, Nairne and others would have it: 'while it is a humiliation to die, it is glorious to taste death for others' (Bruce, quoted by Ramsey, op. cit., p. 44). Spicq quotes Chrysostom, John Damascene, and Oecumenius too in favour of this view: 'The Cross is the glory and the honour'; but he refutes this view with the reference to verse 10: Hébreux, Vol. II, p. 33.

[27] 'Verheißung und Heilsvollendung. Zur theologischen Grundfrage des Hebräerbriefes', M.Th.St. I/9 (1955), p. 160.

[28] Ibid., pp. 159–161.

---

[29] O. Michel, p. 303.

In the First Letter of Peter, the oppressed situation of the community is not only, as in the Letter to the Hebrews, the occasion of the great christological statements, in which the glory is put into words, but has almost become the locus that serves to illuminate these statements. This was already foreshadowed in Paul, in that the 'earthen vessels' of the suffering existence of the Apostle belonged essentially to the authentication of Christ who was the subject of this existence: only in the weakness of Christ can the Apostle count on the strength of Christ (2 Cor 12.10). In 1 Peter, this theme becomes dominant: the author looks, from the hard experience of Christians' being unjustly reviled (2.19f.; 3.14ff.; 4.15ff.), in order to interpret this, both backwards to the ignominious suffering of Christ and forwards to the glory which he received and which is promised to Christians. As in the Synoptists and Paul, glory is primarily eschatological (1.7; 4.13; 5.4), and for the time being it is hidden. But when the Christian experience of suffering is lived in its pure state (4.15), it can be located only along the direct path between these two points of the suffering of Christ and the future glory. It is along this path that the author situates himself, when he calls himself both a 'witness of the sufferings of Christ' and a 'partaker in the glory that is one day to be revealed' (5.1); it is possible that part of what is referred to in the second phrase is Peter's experience of the transfiguration—this at any rate is how it will be interpreted later at 2 Pet 1.16–18. Once more, as in Paul though somewhat differently, the one who bears the gospel in the Church, in unity with this gospel, is a mediator between the experience of the Passion and the hope of future glory. And once more a strong light falls from the eschaton on the present, on those Christians of the second generation who 'love' Christ 'without having seen him, and believe in him, without seeing him now', and go towards him 'with unutterable and glorified (δεδοξασμένη) joy' (1.8)—a word that gives a particularly illuminating expression to the proleptic and eschatological character of joy in the whole of the New Testament. The same can be said of the beatitude speaking of those who are reviled for the sake of Christ (4.14), because on them τὸ τῆς δόξης καὶ τοῦ θεοῦ πνεῦμα, 'the Spirit of glory and of God', rests; assuming the correctness of the text which speaks of 'the Spirit of glory, who is also the Spirit of God'.[30] But both of these, the joy and the Spirit have already been promised to Christians by Jesus.[31] And thus the sufferings, lit up by an invisible glory, become for the world a strange illustration of what is concealed (3.16).

Paul, Hebrews and 1 Peter prepare the path for the conclusive Johannine synthesis.

c. Hidden love

1. We shall now consider the Johannine 'glory' for the last time, and here, specifically, from the point of view of its hiddenness. Precisely in taking the step beyond Paul and drawing the σάρξ of the historical Jesus into his synthesis of glory—'the Logos became flesh . . . and we have seen his glory' (1.14)—John already points fundamentally to this hiddenness: for, in Old Testament terms, 'flesh' characterises that element in the human person which decisively distinguishes him from God, his weakness when compared to the one who is mighty. Man's 'magnificence' is essentially a bloom that withers, [30] The Vulgate makes the first phrase independent and thereby gives a threefold exposition of doxa: quod est honoris, gloriæ et virtutis Dei, et qui est eius Spiritus. On the formation of the text, cf. E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of Saint Peter (2nd edn. 1955), ad loc.; C. Spicq, Les épîtres de S. Pierre (1966), p. 156.

[31] Texts in: K. H. Schelkle, Die Petrusbriefe. Der Judasbrief (1961), p. 124.

compared to the eternal sovereignty of the Word of God (Is 40.6ff.).[1] The 'dwelling (as in a tent) among us' in this Johannine affirmation is not only the coming down of the divine presence (in the cloud of the kabod) above our earth, so that this is lit up by the glory and 'reflects' it (Ezek 43.2), but an interior entry into the 'earth', which is indeed 'his property' (1.11), and a shining in the earth and out from within it. But the reference here is not to the Old Testament analogy, as in the Letter to the Hebrews, whereby the human person, as the image of God, is endowed with a glory which is now assumed by the heir of all things. Rather, all human 'glory'—as a 'dignity of one's own', and correspondingly as 'giving glory to one another'—is rejected, so that space is made for the 'search for the δόξα that comes from the only God' (5.44). The emphatic emphasis in John on love of neighbour, because of the Incarnation (the horizontal pole is stressed so heavily by the evangelist because of the vertical pole) is not based in the analogy 'in the order of creation' between the dignity of God and the dignity of man, between the freedom of God and the freedom of man, because here the order of creation is subsumed by the Logos and by the event of his becoming flesh: everything has come into being through him, and it is on the basis of the Logos and of his relationship to God that everything is to be 'illuminated' (1.9), interpreted and judged.

Thus, one can of course maintain that the Johannine concept of δόξα has two roots, one in the Old Testament kabod of Yahweh (this is certainly the case at 12.41) and the other in the hellenistic concept of 'opinion, praise, glory' which, however, is in continuity with Ps 8 and its later influence in Wisdom literature; and one can therefore hold that John 'slides' from one pole to the other,[2] or 'seems to play with the word δόξα'.[3] Nevertheless, O. Cullmann is right not to include the Johannine δόξα among the 'ambiguous expressions in John,'[4] because the tremendous brackets (so to speak) which John sets around both poles of the concept—'glory' and 'honour'—bring them to a unity in his theological vision in which the New Testament is, as it were, concluded. The Son of God, who alone 'honours and glorifies' the Father (and in the Father honour and glory are one), and who alone asks and receives honour and glory from the Father, becomes at this point the criterion and judgment of all horizontal human relationships. This is still true of the Letters of John, in which the expression δόξα/δοξάζειν is not found, but in which there is no less emphasis on the basis of all love between human persons in the initiative taken by God's love in Christ to us and in the acceptance of this love in faith. In order to recognise the full power of the Johannine 'brackets', which bring together both the concept of kabod (which always has a dimension perceptible to the senses) and the seemingly purely intellectual concept of 'glory' and 'praise', one must go back to the heart of the christology (or christological ontology) of the Fourth Gospel, in which already the 'glory' that the Son has with the Father before the world was made (17.5), the glory that Isaiah sees as already existing (and not only future;[5] 12.41), is always understood as the mutual relationship of love between Father and Son, as this will appear in the Incarnation: i.e., the understanding is at every stage already a New Testament, trinitarian understanding which supersedes the Old Testament idea of the kabod. The Jews, boasting of the static and apparently obvious image of God which they enjoy, 'come in their own name' and 'receive glory from one another' (5.43f.), but they have never seen Yahweh's true face, nor heard his voice, for the face and voice of God—which Abraham longed for (8.56), which Moses proclaimed (5.46), and which Isaiah saw in a proleptic vision (12.41)—is he alone who reveals the Father's glory by not seeking his own (8.50; 7.18); and this, not accidentally (by means of one particular kind of conduct on his part), but personally and substantially: he is the one who, by not seeking himself, permits the will, the love and the glory of the Other to pass through him. It is not in the created δόξα that he reflects the uncreated δόξα: it is in the relational being of the (eternal, incarnate) Son/Person that he manifests the glory of the Father. And this is not a Father who is in himself the tranquil kabod-glory, but fundamentally the Father who utters himself lovingly in the Son, represents himself in him, and makes known to the world his self-utterance in the Son's gift of himself to the world (3.16). Jesus, accordingly—in a way wholly separate from all the images of God that shed light upon themselves (i.e. his fellow-men), is—as the revealer—the one who is concealed, without splendour, unknown, hidden. As the presence of absolute love, he is taken for someone else; in the act of communication, he is essentially alone and speaks without a partner.

---

[1] Although it is not necessary, with Bultmann, to see here only 'offence and paradox' (Johannes p. 43; ET The Gospel of John, p. 66), as if flesh were identical to darkness. All that is meant here is Incarnation. Cf. J. Blank, Krisis (1964), p. 79 and frequently. For bibliography, see p. 221f. above; also E. Stauffer, 'Agnostos Christos', in: The Background of the NT and its Eschatology. Studies in honour of C. H. Dodd (1956), pp. 281–299.

[2] W. Groussow, op. cit., p. 133, speaks of 'glissements'.

---

[3] F.-M. Braun, Jean le Théologien, Vol. III (1966), p. 201.

[4] 1948, in: Vorträge und Aufsätze (1966), pp. 176–186.

[5] Against J. Dupont, 'La Gloire du Christ', in: Essais sur la Christologie de S. Jean (1951), pp. 269–273. Implicitly, the author distances himself thereby from an Old Testament vision of God on the part of Moses (Jn 1.18, 14): there is no other glory of God to be seen than the glory of Christ.

First, he is unknown. The legend of the unknown Messiah offers only a remote analogy to this, and one that is far surpassed.[6] The people think that they know 'where' Jesus 'comes from' (7.27; cf. 8.14; 9.29f.; 19.9); but if they really knew his provenance (8.14), they would also know the Father (8.19) and would see the Father in him (14.9). But that would mean believing, entering into the life-blood of the mutual indwelling of the Father and the Son. This circulation is the light that has come into the world, but cannot radiate outside the circle of love, even when it draws the passage through the world into itself (16.28). It remains a 'closed' circuit which—only for this reason—is more open than everything else that ties itself down statically, because it is the widest and absolute circle.

The faith that entrusts itself to the reality and the possibility of absolute love permits one to see and know it. In John, this does not happen abruptly, but gradually, just as Jesus' life in the flesh is continually making itself accessible in new ways in his various words, situations and miraculous signs. There exists an inchoative faith which begins to see God's glory in Jesus at his first sign in Cana (2.11),[7] although this does not prevent the true understanding from arising only after the 'glorification' of Jesus, in the act of 'remembering' (12.16; 2.22); there exists a faith that does not dare to make public profession (12.42; 19.38) and that visits Jesus by night (3.2); a faith to which Jesus does not entrust himself (2.24), a faith that believes in the truth of what lies in the future, but cannot yet understand what is in the present (4.9ff.; 11.24), a faith that does not know its own object (9.36), a faith that demands signs and 'becomes believing' when the sign is given by grace (4.48,53), a faith that at least asks what ought to be done (6.28), which springs up in the course of discussion and does not get beyond this point (7.40ff.), a faith that is ready (8.31) but then continues to discuss (8.33ff.). This awakening of faith, surrounding the incarnate one who demands faith (8.46), shows how much the greatest circuit of all, the closed trinitarian circuit which embraces all things, prepares access-roads to the narrower circles.

---

[6] See above, pp. 48f.

It is also true that for John, as for Paul, Jesus' whole life can be understood only in its orientation to the 'hour' of the Cross.[8] One can penetrate truly into the inner sphere between the Father and the Son only if one drinks the water of life, eats the bread of life, 'is born in wind and water from above': all this is possible only through Jesus' death. The path to this death makes all the basic words appear to have double meanings; but this is not as if the words were being played with. Rather, the end-point which alone truly discloses the all-embracing trinitarian circuit includes in itself the end-point towards which the narrower, unbelieving circuit is driving. Thus, the 'end' (τέλος, 13.1) itself is (in worldly terms) death, but (in divine terms) is the endless radiance of life and of love. In keeping with this, the water of life is drunk from the pierced side (19.34) of the 'dried-up spring' ('I thirst', 19.28), but as an inexhaustible spring that rises up into eternal life (4.14; 7.37ff.). The Spirit that is breathed out (19.30) becomes the Spirit that is eternally breathed in (20.22). And above all, the one 'raised up' on the Cross by men (8.28) is the one raised up, at a deeper level, from the earth in God's salvific plan (12.32f.) as the true 'serpent in the wilderness' in whom the curse of all the sick is really portrayed, becoming for them salvation from God (3.14f.). The wider circuit has so much dominance over the narrower circuit that it categorically applies its own law to it: the flesh of the Son of Man must be eaten and his blood must be drunk if one wishes to have eternal life in oneself (6.53ff.), irrespective of whether this becomes possible only through the fact that those who eat and drink must first slaughter this flesh and pour out this blood. Finally, it is only the 'giving away' of the Son by the Father and of the Father by the Son that counts: the word 'give' occurs fifteen times in the high-priestly prayer, antecedent to everything that men can acquire in violence and self-seeking. Until this final act of giving and being given, everything in Jesus' life that John calls the vision of 'glory' and 'glorification' is inchoative: essentially, it is to be read as a premonitory sign—i.e., it is to be understood in faith—of the definitive exaltation and glorification of the love of God in the self-giving of the Cross. Although the Cross, as men's deed and as God's self-utterance, is the lowest point of the 'descent' (3.13; 6.33ff.) from Heaven, it is the 'exaltation' and thereby the glorification of love as God's free act and as men's unconscious literal contribution: the glorification both of the Son's love (12.23; 13.31) and of the Father's love in him (ibid.).

---

[7] R. Schnackenburg, Das Johannesevangelium, p. 340 (ET The Gospel according to St John, I, 1965, p. 337).

[8] 'We can hardly fail to see that the motives of a whole series of σημεῖα are gathered up to this supreme σημεῖον' (the Cross): E. Hoskyns, The Fourth Gospel (1940), pp. 438f.

This glory of love has a visibility of its own which runs through the whole of Jesus' life from its very beginning (1.14); and, precisely because this is the deepest 'exposition' of God to the world (1.18), this visibility requires the eyes of faith—a faith that must let itself be taken into the 'hour' together with the Son whose life is orientated towards this. But this visibility is equally a hiddenness, since all that can be seen in the Son is his relatedness to the Father; but the Father is seen by no one (1.18; 1 Jn 4.12), except in the emptiness of the Son that is ready for him and in his own self-attestation in this emptied-out space (5.36f.; 7.16, etc.). Thus, in worldly terms, there is nothing convincing to be seen, unless one were to be taken up into the original begetting of the Son from the Father, so that one could understand therein that the innermost poverty of self-giving love is absolute wealth.

Since it is of the essence of the Johannine 'world' to oppose this expropriation, its opposition grows in exact proportion to the growth of love's offer and proof of itself: the gratuitousness of love is answered by the gratuitousness of hatred (15.25) and of blindness (12.40f.). The public character of the great signs—above all, of the multiplication of the loaves, of the healing of the man born blind, and of the raising of Lazarus—are not contrary to this law, because these deeds are through and through 'signs' that refer to something hidden, and in the act of referring, they compel decision. The Jews complain about the bread, as do the disciples themselves (6.61). In the case of the blind man whom he heals, Jesus says: 'I came into the world for judgment; those who do not see are to receive their sight, and those who see are to become blind', and some of the Pharisees ask, 'Are we too blind?' (9.39f.). The raising of Lazarus, a deed that lies between two hiddennesses (10.40f.; 11.54), has a transparent inner reference to Jesus' own dying and rising,[9] and becomes the immediate occasion of his condemnation (11.45ff.). The more that love reveals itself in its signs—as the bread of life (for the hungry), as the light of the world (for the blind), as the resurrection and the life (for the dead)—the more hidden it becomes for those who do not love. They are not merely people who do not see, but people who can see but turn decisively away from seeing: 'If you were blind, you would be without sin. But now you say, "We see". And so your sin remains' (9.41). In the confrontation with Jesus' love, there takes place what John calls judgment; this is the fundamental principle of all his kerygma, and it presupposes that this love, which has come with Jesus into the world, is interpreted in a strictly trinitarian manner: it is only because the highest personality (ἐγώ εἰμι) and the highest quality of relationship to the Father are one in Jesus, that he, the hidden one, can be made the eschatological criterion for all human persons.

---

[9] Jesus stays away for two days and comes on the third day to raise Lazarus. His weeping and inner turmoil show his inner participation in the event.

2. Since the whole of Jesus' life with his words and signs makes for the 'hour', and indeed the 'hour', which is 'coming', already 'is' (ἔρχεται ὥρα καὶ νῦν ἐστιν: 4.23; 5.25; 16.32) because it determines in advance the meaning of each step that is taken towards it, it becomes clear in the 'hour' what salvation and judgment is—as love. The 'world' is created in its entirety by the Logos who is light and life (1.3f.); the fact that already 1.5 speaks of the 'darkness' into which this light shines, but which is not able to take hold of the light, is not explained at first, but only gradually: 'not knowing' him (1.10) is shown to mean 'not receiving him' (1.11), and at 3.19f. this is specified as preferring the darkness to the light which is coming, indeed hating the light which discloses and convicts (cf. 7.7), refusing faith in the absoluteness of love which has appeared in Jesus alone. In that the world—with man as the mid-point that gives it meaning—'was created' by the Logos who is its light and life (1.10), it belongs completely to him: 'he came to what was his own', to 'those who were his own' (1.11), he has 'power over all flesh' (17.2). But in that he comes as absolute love—in the form of the absolute obedience that gives δόξα to the Father alone—he brings to light the decision of men for or against the love that is personally present in him. This is the reason for the statements about judgment, with their rigorous precision: the Son 'did not come to judge the world, but to save the world' (12.47; 3.17), but the effect of his presence for those who despise his word (which is love) is judgment (12.48; 3.19). It is not a word of verdict and judgment, and yet, since it is the word of the Father (and thereby the 'testimony of two persons', 8.17), the conviction it speaks is valid. But this does not mean that one can oppose the 'power over all flesh' to the powerlessness on the Cross of the love of Jesus who 'gives himself up freely', and is loved by the Father for this reason (10.17f.). This is why John is unable to portray the unfolding of a drama in several acts, with first the redemption of the 'darkness' through the self-giving on the Cross, and then the result of this act of redemption (perhaps through the power of the Father) in the raising of Jesus, in the justification of sinners and finally in the eschatological resurrection to life and to judgment: for John, all these essentially interlock. For the Father has yielded everything to the Son: he has given him the power 'to have life in himself', and therefore to be the one who raises the dead in freedom and holds all judgment (5.21ff.), because of his absolutely obedient love for the Father (5.19,30). The great work of interpretation and conviction that will be the task of the Paraclete is situated therefore precisely at the unique nodal point of the Cross and Resurrection, which is the ultimate concealment and the ultimate revelation of love. The Gospel of John takes on an unheard-of static quality through the concentration of salvation history (as this develops in Luke) into one single christological nodal point: there is, and will always be, only one situation which is the judge of everything: the triune love which is nailed to the Cross in Jesus and, precisely therein, is 'exalted' and 'glorified', and, confronting this directly, 'the entire and complete world, and each individual in this taken particularly by himself'.[10] But within this static quality, which explicitly includes also the eschatological situation, the 'last day' (5.28f.; 6.39,40,44,54), there nevertheless lies the highest dynamic possible, as is already clear from the plain statement: 'I judge no one' (8.15); the judgment takes place of its own accord, through the establishment of absolute salvation.[11] It is true that love reveals the depths of hatred, and indeed in a certain sense even generates hatred (15.24), but, precisely for this reason, it is impossible to speak of any original dualism in John; rather, there is a repetition on a quite new level of the [10] Ignatius of Loyola, Spiritual Exercises, no. 95.

---

[11] Cf. the important observations of Blank, Krisis, pp. 120ff.: 'Death is not an opposite power that could stand in a position dialectically over against life' (p. 128). An anthropological dualism of Greek or—still less—gnostic type is 'wholly foreign' to Johannine thought (p. 144).

Old Testament idea that the splendour of Yahweh's power exposes the lowest foundations of the earth, and that the decisive victory of God is accomplished precisely in this disclosure of tehōm and sheōl. But now the glory lies altogether in the trinitarian love that appears in the traditio of the Son.

Since the Word on the Cross is the wholeness of love, and addresses ultimately what is the lack of love, the Word becomes a monologue; and this is the case to a large extent throughout John, both in the case of the disciples and in the case of the non-believing Jews. No word worthy of him is addressed to Jesus: both the replies and the questions addressed to him aim at a mark that misses the Word, which goes on its solitary way in a logic that shatters the apparent dialogue. And yet, with the same break in the logic, beside the statement at 1.11, 'his own people did not receive him', there stands the contradictory statement at 1.12, 'but to all who did receive him . . .'. The fundamental reason for this is not that man is free either to turn to the light or to turn away from it, as he chooses, but that the Logos has received from the Father the faculty 'to have life in himself' (5.26), to lay down this life freely and to take it up again (10.18), and this includes the power to give it to others as eternal life (10.28). The others to whom he gives life are themselves given to him by the Father (10.28), and the Father leads them to him (6.44,65), and the circle of those who are thus given and entrusted remains basically open to the wholeness (17.2). This openness is nowhere called into question; rather, the one who is raised up on the Cross will 'draw all people to himself' (12.32), because it will be seen, from that exalted place, that 'I am he' (8.28). This insight is the same as the insight 'that the Father is in me and I am in the Father' (10.38). In the Fourth Gospel, with this monological character, there is therefore no abandonment of the Son by God in the sense of Mark and Matthew; even if all scatter, each to his own place, and leave him alone, 'I am not alone, for the Father is with me' (16.32). The Son can be a word that is given away, that is dying of thirst, that is poured out utterly: but he still remains an eternal word.[12]

---

[12] Even if one understands 8.25b, like the Greek Fathers, as the

This word is the unsurpassable self-utterance and self-giving of God; J. Blank is right to say: 'The ἐγώ εἰμι, which is God's decisive word of revelation in the Old Testament, and in which he expressed his being most clearly, finds its true fulfilment in the ἐγώ εἰμι that Jesus Christ, the Logos become man, speaks . . . But the Father . . . is ἀληθής; he is 'true', 'faithful', 'reliable', so that one can say that what was always meant in the old covenant by the 'emeth of Yahweh is embodied in the revealer Jesus Christ. It follows that, if one refuses to believe in the revealer, then one refuses to acknowledge God's truth, reality and faithfulness, one refuses completely belief in God' and makes God 'a liar' (1 Jn 5.10b).[13] This conclusion becomes valid when faith comes to see that here—in the mutual indwelling of the Father and the Son, as this is disclosed by the obedience and the Cross—lies something ultimate that is uttered by God, something that can never be surpassed in thought or in deed. All other possible ideas about God are simply rendered obsolete by this one self-portrayal by God; they disappear, and the only possibility that is left is the 'world' which is closed in upon itself and now takes on the role of unfaithful Israel as the unfaithful partner of God the creator and redeemer of all. This is the reason for the anticipatory pointers to the Samaritan mission in the fourth chapter (where 'the fields are already white for the harvest', 4.35), for the urgent desire of the Gentiles to see Jesus when the hour of the Passion is imminent (12.20ff.), and for the vista of 'much fruit' that will come when the grain of wheat falls into the earth and dies. The ultimate gesture of the self-giving of the trinitarian love leaves the Jewish, Samaritan and Gentile images of God behind, and becomes for all of them the τέλος: videbunt in quem transfixerunt, 'they shall look on the one whom they have pierced'. Henceforward, nothing more of God will be visible: this will be his total disclosure, but also his total interruption of innerworldly communication, because everything has been said, 'Why go back to the beginning, τὴν ἀρχὴν, why am I talking to you?', it remains the original word (according to the interpretation of the Latins: principium qui et loquor vobis) who is speaking.

---

[13] Krisis, p. 229.

concealment, and will remain so in every post-Christian atheism, in all theologies of 'the death of God'. The sign that is set up in the ultimate hiddenness, the sign in which all the other 'mighty deeds' of God disappear from sight, is so small that there is an ever increasing temptation to despise it (Is 53.3; Jn 8.49) and, in despising the Son, to despise also the Father who sends him and bears witness to him (Lk 10.16).

Nevertheless, along with the failure to receive him, there is the fact of his reception, of which the Prologue already speaks: this belongs to the primordial phenomenon of the revelation. Without a womb to receive him, there is no Incarnation of God, and without a faith to receive it, there is no basin to catch the waters of God's truth as this pours itself out. In all its freedom, this faith is 'the work of God' himself (6.29), and, as such, it makes possible the interior participation in the life of the Trinity: 'but to those who did receive him, he gave the possibility of being made children of God: to all who believed . . .' (1.12). The tiniest 'seed of God' brings about its own milieu in which it can remain alive and can grow (1 Jn 3.9); if this space did not exist, then God would not have gone forth from himself in revelation—for the darkness, as such, does not receive him. The 'faith that is as small as a grain of mustard' (Mt 17.20), which cannot say anything more than fiat, is shaped to receive the form of the hiddenness of the self-utterance of God's love. This faith descends with the incarnate Word into ever deeper depths of hiddenness; and it belongs to the Holy Spirit to let as much as he wishes grow up out of this embrace of faith and love, to bear fruit. But even when visible signs, forms and miracles are the outcome of this glorification of Christ and the Church through the Spirit, these all remain only pointers to the inconspicuous character of the love that is rich in its poverty and poor in its riches.

This leads on to the third and final question about the glorification of the divine glory through the creature which receives it and answers it. What is the meaning of δοξάζειν; what is it to give the glory of God, which presents itself thus and not otherwise, the right honour which it itself intends?

III. IN LAUDEM GLORIAE

1. GLORIFICATION AS ASSIMILATION AND RETURN OF THE GIFT

Theological aesthetics began as a 'coming to see' the form in which God's Word comes to us, gives itself to us and loves us. In this act of seeing, there already lies the 'rapture': a breaking out from ourselves in the power of our being called and affected, in the power of the divine love which draws near to us and enables us to receive itself. 'Rapture' therefore does not mean that the finite is alienated from itself, in order to find itself in its genuine nature outside of itself, in what is infinite: it means that we are no longer strangers to the absolute love—for the finite 'I' (or even 'we'), closed in on itself, at first lives mostly as a stranger to love—and it means that we are drawn into the sphere of the glory between the Father and Son, as this glory has appeared in Jesus Christ. It is the grace and the work of the Holy Spirit that gives us this new home: he makes the life of love well up, not in front of us nor above us, but in us, and thereby empowers us to 'glorify' through our life the glory that has been given to us as our own. Thus, this third section will be a book of the Holy Spirit, and will deal with glorification. Since the Spirit himself is the glorification of the love between Father and Son, wherein God's true glory disclosed itself to us, it is likewise only he who can bring about glorification in the world. His work unfolds as a consequence of the bringing about of a 'distance' between the Father and Son in the kenosis and the 'abolition' of this in the return of the Son to the Father, and hence lies out beyond the 'form' which Jesus made visible to us and the subsequent replacement of this by invisibility: but this comes about in such a way that, in the Spirit's act of glorification, we neither let go of the form 'which has existed' nor yet can dispense with its removal, if it is to be truly present for us. This produces a tension that is not to be made sense of with any general law of dialectics, but only through the truth of faith that the Spirit eternally proceeds from the Father and from the Son, and is sent by the Father (Jn 14.16, 26) through the Son (15.26) into the world in the dispensation of salvation, once the Son has risen and has been united again to the Father. This sending is completely different from that of the Son, who indeed became our brother in order to bear our guilt, but—as our brother—was always the 'other' vis-à-vis us. He was the one who did what we were unable to do, who gave God the glory where we, lacking the glory of God, all sought our own (personal or mutual) glory. The fact that this was done on our behalf, 'while we were still sinners', could only leave us in an alienation which would easily change to sadness and desperation: 'it' was done in our absence, 'it' was 'accounted' righteousness for us, and we could not resist it. At best, we were invited to follow, but then we were left behind at the decisive point of the journey; certainly, it was we ourselves who chose to flee, but how could we have gone along with Jesus? We were convicted of our sin: and what else can a sinner do but crucify God? As a sinner, he cannot glorify him. One has done it on our behalf, and he goes back to the Father. 'I go to the one who sent me, and none of you asks me, 'Where are you going?' For your heart is so full of sorrow, because I said this to you' (Jn 16.5f.). How was it possible even to ask the question of where he was carrying off this brotherly love that he had shown us on earth? Does it not then belong to us; or were we only the occasion to do something else, something more important? There was no way to know in advance the answer that Jesus gave to the unasked question: 'It is good for you that I go away; for if I do not go away, the Paraclete will not come to you; but if I go away, I will send him to you' (16.7). The 'Spirit of truth' will 'lead into all truth' those who stand outside: he will bring them within what hitherto seemed to stand apart from them. When they are thus brought inside, they both recognise and grasp from within what had apparently taken place outside those concerned in it. And when they enter the inner room of the Spirit, they necessarily become participants. It is the Spirit who empowers both these steps. This is a new work that is peculiarly his own, and yet presents itself only as the carrying out of what had been begun by the Son: 'He will take from what is mine, and proclaim it to you' (16.14). Only when the Spirit has led the disciples into the 'whole truth' of the Father and the Son, can it be disclosed how this is possible: it is because the vicarious death of the Son does not alienate his brothers from themselves, but relieves them of what was foreign to them. 'He died for all, so that those who live might live no longer for themselves' (2 Cor 5.15): what seems to these 'living ones' a deprivation is in truth already the fundamental liberation that lets them be themselves, free for love and for the possibility of communicating and giving themselves. This ability to be poor is the human person's deepest wealth: this is revealed by the Christ-event, in which the essence of being became visible for the very first time: as glory. In giving up his Son, God the Father has opened up this possibility for all. But the Spirit of God is sent to change this possibility in us into reality. He shows the world that the poverty of the Son, who sought only the glory of the Father and let himself be robbed of everything in utter obedience, was the most exact expression of the absolute fullness, which does not consist of 'having', but of 'being=giving'. It is in giving that one is and has. This cannot be explained in words—'I have yet many things to say to you, but you could not bear it now'—it can only be done, and be understood in the course of doing it.

a. Trinitarian self-giving

As a whole, the New Testament is just as full of doxologies as is the Old Testament. In this its literary dependence on the latter is clear.[1] But behind the external similarity, which also presupposes a far-reaching preparation of what is distinctively Christian through the praise found in the Old Testament, a deeper difference lies hidden. In the old covenant, God and his partner are related to one another as lord and servant: the servant is given the grace of election, of the unique and yet ever new liberation and favour, and he glorifies the glory of the gracious and powerful Lord which has become visible to him and indeed determines and reshapes his whole existence. He 'blesses' his God, and God's name, for all the blessing that flows from him. In the act of δοξάζειν the servant gives back to his Lord the lordliness and glory that he has received from the fact of his being created, gives back the very basis of his ability to grasp the mighty deeds of God in the creation and in the history of the covenant (Gen 1.27; Sir 17.1–14). We have seen how Israel's praise of God achieved its finest and most characteristic self-understanding when it went out beyond itself in ecstasy to 'dwell' in God's land, temple, territory and possession.[2]

---

[1] Art. 'Doxologie', LThK 2nd edn. Vol. III, 534f. (Nielen, with bibiliography); A. Stuiber, RAC IV, 210–226. Bibellexikon (2nd edn. 1968), 344f. (A. van den Born).

When Ignatius demands of the Ephesians that they 'glorify in every way Jesus Christ, who has glorified you' (Eph 2.2), we are transferred into another world, because the whole background has changed: the dominant place is held, no longer by the relationship of Lord and servant, but by the trinitarian relationship. The more deeply the New Testament reflects upon its new presuppositions, the more clearly does this trinitarian relationship embrace the relationship of creation (including that of Lord and servant), and thereby determine the ultimate meaning of glorification. In order to make this clear, we pass over the short doxologies formulated in Old Testament terms,[3] leaving aside also two of the greater 'benedictions' (eulogies: 2 Cor 1.3ff.; 1 Pet 1.3ff.),[4] and study in detail the third and most detailed benediction which is the hymnic introduction to the Letter to the Ephesians (Eph 1.3–14).[5] It is the 'blessing' of a God who, as the 'Father of our Lord Jesus Christ', has 'blessed us with every blessing of the Spirit' (1.3) and is therefore the answer corresponding to an act begun and determined by God. This is expressed also by the concluding formula 'to the praise of his glory', which occurs three times like a refrain (1.6,12,14); the first passage speaks explicitly of the 'glory of his grace', and the other two speak of glory by itself (meaning the eschatological and ultimate glory). The entire hymnic introduction speaks, not primarily of something that has happened between word and answer, God and man, but develops one-sidedly the unconditional and irrevocable plan and decision (θέλημα vv. 5, 9, 11; βουλή v. 9) reached by God alone, prior to anything in the world and in man (προ-ορίσας, v. 5; προ-έθετο v. 9; προ-ορισθέντες κατὰ πρό-θεσιν, v. 11), depending on God's free good pleasure (εὐδοκία vv. 5, 9) alone which is, as such, grace through and through (χάρις vv. 6, 7). It could appear that God deals with his creature in a way that goes even further than in the Old Testament, without consulting him at all; it could appear that the relationship of Lord and servant had never been more explicit than here, where the creaturely 'praise of the glory' stands as the goal set in advance for the entire plan, and a goal that has unfailingly been met—but the God who here plans in advance is the 'Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us in Christ with every blessing of the Spirit in the heavens' (1.3), i.e., a trinitarian God who is not himself called 'Lord', but Father of our Lord', who bestows the fullness of his Spirit-blessing on 'us', not in our condition of creatureliness in the world standing over against him, but in a place that transcends the quality of this world (ἐν ἐπουρανίοις, 1.3) and is more precisely defined for us as the place 'of Christ'. V. 4 explains that this God did not desire first to set up a partner whom he might subsequently cover with grace and take back to himself: rather, 'he chose us in him (Christ) before the foundation of the world, so that we might stand before him holy and spotless', in a grace which is characterised, not as subsequent to the creation of the world (the servant is subsequently freed by grace and rises up to sonship), but as preceeding it: 'He predestined us in love to become sons in Jesus Christ for him (probably: for God the Father) . . . to the praise of the glory of his grace, which he bestowed on us in the Beloved' (vv. 5–6). The double mention of love (ἀγάπη, ἀγαπημένος) here defines, not only the goal, but also the being of grace, and this grace has an object in

---

[2] III/2,1, pp. 165ff.

[3] As at Lk 2.14; 19.38; Rom 11.36; 16.27; Eph 3.21; Phil 4.19f.; 1 Tim 1.17; 1 Pet 5.11; 2 Pet 3.18.

[4] With this, one could compare the detailed doxology at the end of the Letter of Jude (vv. 24–25); also Rom 16.25–26 (doubtless a latter addition). The doxologies of Revelation will be spoken of later.

[5] For what follows, see above all H. Schlier, Der Brief an die Epheser (1957).

God which—as 'the Beloved' tout court—stands above the order of creatureliness, since it is 'through Jesus Christ' that this order as a whole rises up into the status of sonship. But it is not only at a subsequent stage that it rises up—in an ecstatic self-alienation from its former and genuine being—on the contrary, the order of creatureliness is planned, appointed and chosen to come to its true self and find its genuine being in this place. In order for this to be possible, and not seem to be an inner contradiction, a further statement must immediately be added: that God 'has blessed us with every blessing of his spirit', by 'pouring out upon us' the riches of his grace 'in all wisdom and understanding' (1.8), has given us, 'the Spirit of wisdom and revelation' (1.17) and 'enlightened the eyes of our heart' (1.18), so that we might recognise, experience and assent to the event from within, as participants in it. At v. 9, this event is called, 'the mystery of his will', which God has 'made known to us': and this 'us' refers at this first stage to all (Christians), for it is only at vv. 11–13 that a distinction is made between the Jewish Christians ('we') and the Gentile Christians ('you'), between Israel who knew beforehand and the Gentiles who have come to knowledge.

The 'mystery' is the decision that God took beforehand in Christ (ἐν αὐτῷ, v. 9) to put the flow of time in the power of his 'Beloved': 'Christ was to "govern" the periods of history, which were drawn by him into the dimension of the fullness of God', so that 'there should be no more empty history sinking down into emptiness'.[6] This means, on the one hand, that all fugacity and multiplicity 'is recapitulated in Christ as the head' (v. 10), but, on the other hand, this process is carried out only by our having in him 'redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins' (v. 7), or, as the Letter goes on to expound in detail, only by the establishment in Christ (1.19–23) and, in the same breath, in us too (1.19; 2.1–10) of the whole extreme tension between powerlessness in the lostness of death and the supremely mighty power of God's Resurrection; a secondary element in this is also the reconciliation and bypassing of the dissension between the [6] Schlier, p. 64.

---

Jews who knew beforehand and the Gentiles who arrived later (2.11–22). It is not as if the timeless anticipation of our election would dissolve the distance between the one who is eternally 'Beloved', the Son, and us who rise up through him to become sons: the distance is kept at its greatest point when it is affirmed that he alone 'descended' (4.9) into our condition below, i.e. into the condition we all shared of 'being dead' through our 'transgressions and sins' (2.1); he alone 'annihilated the enmity on the 'Cross' (2.16), so that we might then be able to rise up in him and through him to the place determined beforehand by the Father, 'out of grace' (2.8). The priority of 'the Beloved' can never be overtaken by those who know him in 'faith' and 'love' (1.15), and so they must continually grow up towards him in hope (1.18; cf. 3.16f.; 4.16); and yet they are continually becoming what they already are, the 'fullness' (1.23) of Christ, his body (1.23), his bride (5.25ff.). But for us it is an insoluble paradox that Christ's 'priority' has always embraced in itself and superseded the whole of our distance from him, through the event of Cross and Resurrection, and that we have always already entered, through our election, into such a 'priority' as the place that is truly our own, the place of our origin, by growing into our own 'inner man', that which we truly are, and becoming stronger in this (3.16), we simultaneoulsy grow towards Chirst, the 'perfect man' (4.13), as his bride. The unity of marriage in one flesh is indeed the highest parable for this (5.32), but its truth is disclosed only in the mystery of 'being one spirit' (3.16; 4.4; cf. 1 Cor 6.17). In order to assess the significance of what is being said here, one may refer across to the idea of the handing over of the Spirit of God to become the Spirit of believers (Rom 5.5f.; 8.15; Gal 4.6) and to the Johannine idea of birth from God (Jn 1.12; 3.5; 1 Jn 3.9). The meaning of 'birth from God' is illumined by the Father's 'letting go of the Son' (Jn 3.16; Rom 8.32), and likewise by the Son's obedient 'proceeding from the Father' (Jn 16.28), and in this two-sided process, the Spirit of God is clearly seen to be the 'personified handing-over', the 'gift'—but not a gift that remains on the path from the one who gives to the one whom it is given: it arrives completely in the latter, not as something extraneous to him, but as something that is the possession of the giver, handed over together with the possibility of being taken over as a gift into the possession of the one who recieves it, and of being acknowledged and possessed as his own. It is only within the New Testament's trinitarian revelation that it is possible to conceive of such a process precisely as not leading to the identification of the giver and the one who receives the gift—as in the mysticisms which lack a trinitarian structure and therefore seek only to overcome the dualism of creator/creature—but rather as establishing itself at a stage beyond this identity as the triumph of glory: God the Father chooses and calls us in the Son (in a grace of being born together with him) to be sons and fellow-heirs, by 'sending into our hearts' the Spirit of himself and of his Son (Gal 4.6). Since this is decided upon and aimed at 'before the foundation of the world', and creation is an episode in this event (with the Cross and the exaltation of the Son, and our consequent justification and sanctification, as later episodes), we are not outmanoeuvered and taken by surprise in all this, but have our home from the very outset in the inmost depth of God, of the absolute being that cannot be foreign to anything—although of course this is only so, if we are ready to recognise, in this triune sphere of absolute expropriation and handing over, such a form of being as being's glory of fullness of grace, and to become 'the praise of the glory of his grace' by dwelling in this sphere ourselves.

The text permits us to take a further step. If we, in our creaturely being, are destined beforehand to become sons in the eternal Son, this eternal Son himself—who belongs qualitatively, and in advance of us all, on the side of God—is never seen in Paul other than in relation to his Incarnation, Cross and Resurrection: he is always the one who has displayed God's expression or form (εἰκών) and God's glory (δόξα) in his obedience (Rom 5.19), his becoming sin (2 Cor 5.21), and his vicarious act for all (2 Cor 5.14; Gal 3.13). In the Son, 'we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins' (Eph 1.7). Even if for Paul one cannot say that he becomes the Son of God only through his exaltation in power (Rom 1.4), one must still say that the only way in which the eternal Son is for us, is his simultaneous act of becoming the eternal Son, or, more properly: the fact that he, as the eternal Son, is always ‘designated in advance’ (Rom 1.4) to be ‘the firstborn among many brethren’ (Rom 8.29). When we are ‘transferred’ before the foundation of the world to his position, this always means for us, not only the return to God as to our home, but the return to our own selves (in the perfected human being Jesus Christ), since we are ‘designated beforehand’ by God the Father ‘to be conformed to the image “Son of God”’ (Rom 8.29), not in a movement away from our destiny of mortality, but through being shaped into, and indeed growing together with (σύμφυτοι), the archetypal dying (Rom 6.5; Col 1.18: ‘the firstborn from the dead’) and crucifixion (Rom 6.6; Gal 2.19), so that we may arrive at the archetypical act in which all humanity is glorified (Phil 3.11): we are designated beforehand to enter and return home to God as our own dwelling-place, and to our ‘creaturely’ reality, in the Son of God.

New Testament δοξάζειν means therefore, first of all, that we do not praise God only by following his law, which (in the light of his trinitarian gift of himself) can never be more than a partial representaion of himself; nor that we praise him only by the ‘sacrifice of the lips’ above all, by acknowledging his greatness in himself and the greatness of his powerful deeds and benefits for ourselves. Rather, we must praise him through our existence, inasmuch as this is an existence that is in him and therefore what it truly ought to be: an existence in the love that hands itself over. This existence entails both an understanding of oneself ἐπίγνωσις, σοφία, φρόνησις, which is given at the outset and must be brought to conscious awareness in a process that can have no end; and life that puts into action what has been recognised (Col 1.10), confirming the insight into the being that is love (and a love that is in principle greater than any insight: Eph 3.19).

Second, it means that the entire horizon of human existence has been disclosed in a way that can never be surpassed (even this horizon is also unattainable); in other words, there is no possibility of any further revelation of the mystery of existence and of God behind the 'mystery' of Christ that has already been made known—and this is the mystery of the Trinity of God. The eschatological glory which we shall one day praise (Eph 1.12,14) essentially exists already in the glory of grace which has already now been made known to us in order that we may praise it beforehand; and this glory is inexhaustible in its contents, so that it can always be praised afresh, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, 'unto the ages of ages', in its unlooked-for gloriousness. The numerous doxologies of the New Testament are a proleptic proclamation of this insight, and it is above all Revelation that always accompanies within eternity the entire action of the intratemporal struggle to redeem the world. In these heavenly songs of praise, the biblical expressions for glorification are piled up and mingled with the divine qualities which those who sing praise attribute to God: 'Amen! Eulogia and doxa and sophia and eucharistia and honour (τιμή) and dunamis and might (ἰσχύς) be to our God for ever and ever, Amen!' (7.12; cf. 11.17f.; 12.10; 15.3f.; 19.1f.,5,7f.). The songs demonstrate that the drama of redemption and the succession of time itself have been intergrated beforehand into that fullness under Christ's dominion of which the hymn in Ephesians spoke. The ultimacy of the glory and of the glorification is seen also in Paul's use of πᾶν when he speaks of the gift of grace that has been handed over (πᾶσα εὐλογία), Eph 1.3; πᾶσα σοφία, 1.8; cf. 4.2; Col 1.28; Jas 1.2; also Rom 8.32; 1 Cor 3.21f.).[7] The horizon of these statements is essentially universal; the only thing that could not be included is nothingness itself. It would, therefore, be possible to demonstrate a doctrine of the transcendentals of being in various ways within this trinitarian disclosure: the basic elements of a logic, ethics and aesthetics, their mutual compensation, but also their pointing beyond themselves to this ultimate mystery.

Third, it means that New Testament δοξάζειν no longer

[7] Cf. also the very numerous texts in which the totality of the world is set under the salvific action of God which embraces, organises and governs all things. Cf. Schmoller's Handkorkondanz, 12th edn., pp. 388f.

has the δόξα of God as its object, but as its inner principle. Thanks to the glory of God's love, which has become visible in Jesus Christ and in his Cross and Resurrection, we are drawn into this love through his grace and are empowered to give it the response that has been planned and attained by God himself. 'Having been introduced into this mystery (of God's will) by the definition of our being, we experience it in the forgiveness of sins, and it becomes plain to us in gnōsis. Thus, because of what we are and of what we experience, we bear this glory upon ourselves, and we praise God with what we are through his blessing' (H. Schlier).[8] Faith, love and hope are the divine life that is lived in us, a life that comes from divine glory and enables us to live the Christian life (δυναμούμενοι κατὰ τὸ κράτος τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ), Col 1.11) and thereby has as its inmost goal εἰς ἔπαινον καὶ δόξαν καὶ τιμήν, 'the praise and glory and honour' of the divine life (1 Pet 1.7), while God's wisdom has always aimed beforehand at our own glorification ἣν προώρισεν ὁ θεός πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων εἰς δόξαν ἡμῶν: 1 Cor 2.7; cf. Rom 8.30). If the wife is the δόξα of the husband (1 Cor 11.7) and the Church the bride of Christ, made pure and spotless through his own blood, then she can be ἔνδοξος through him (Eph 5.27), and at the same God can receive ἡ δόξα ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ καὶ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ for all eternity (Eph 3.21). God's activity in us through Christ promises us all this, and it is on this basis that we can answer him with the Amen that glorifies him (τῷ θεῷ) πρὸς δόξαν: 2 Cor 1.20): here too, the answer of the Church is the inherent and logical end of an act of glorification begun by God himself. Finally, it becomes clear too that the Church's life, above all the mutual love of Christians, is an act of praising God not only in an external way, but with an inherent relationship to the essential glory of God.

b. Appropriation as Expropriation

What is new in the New Testament is the fulfilment of God's promise in the Old Testament that he would write his law (of love) on human hearts, so that they would know God from within (Jer 31.33f.; 2 Cor 3.3). This law (of love) is the Spirit: he himself. It is therefore he himself who puts himself in our heart. But by handing himself over to us in this way, he reveals himself as the one he is: the Father who from the beginning has made the gift of himself to his Son, and who has carried on this handing over of himself up to the place and condition that are ours: to the point of becoming man and of being lost. It is therefore not possible to take God to oneself through an act of appropriating him, because God is personified handing-over, and one 'knows' him and 'possesses' him only when one is oneself expropriated and handed over. It is precisely thus that the creature can be fully affirmed by his creator. The struggle against gnosis, which runs through the whole of the New Testament, is fought here, where the knowledge of God is not willing to be identified with the appropriation of his ultimate intention of expropriation, the intention that has revealed itself in the Incarnation, the Cross and the Resurrection of his Son, through which God 'annulled the wisdom' of the world and 'destroyed' it (1 Cor 1.19f.). The original ζητεῖν, the search for God (Acts 17.27), for Yahweh and his face (Ps 105.4 and frequently), has become a ζήτησις, a philosophical disputation, and the seeker after God has become an expert in the wordly business of philosophy συνζητητής, 1 Cor 1.20),[1] with the result that the object of the search disappeared behind the human battle of words λογομαχίαι, 1 Tim 6.4), which is fond of disputes and is therefore a priori useless and meaningless. The truth that affirms the human person and takes possession of him requires that one be ready to be taken hold of and to give up control over oneself to another (Lk 1.38).

---

[8] Schlier, p. 74.

Where is a beloved person loved—in himself or in the one who loves him? The question cannot be answered, for he is loved in the act of the one who loves him, who affirms him as he is in himself and, at the same time, as the one who is constituted this person through this act—precisely as this particular beloved person who exists in this way. The act with which God loves us and definitively draws near to us, affirming us and at the same time bringing us into being by his own action, is his Son. Everything that God has promised men finds in him the fulfilment that affirms it and assents to it (2 Cor 1.20), for the Son is nothing less than the 'servant . . . of the promises' (Rom 15.8); God loves man in such a way that he let his word of promise to him—which promised him what was the highest of all, God himself and existence with God—become man, beloved: and indeed a beloved just as man is, turned away from love and deprived of glory. Thus we are to take Paul's sentence quite strictly and literally: if God 'did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all, how could he not give us all things together with him?' (Rom 8.32). For, in the Son, God gives us both the entire expression of himself and also the embodiment of our being, which is affirmed in its own particular nature. In order that love—even the love between God and man—can develop in accordance with its own law, without man being overwhelmed by a power that snatches him away, but in peace and in the joy of affirmation of man as God's partner, without however excluding the power to assure him of absolute love and to make this over to him in fact, there is a presupposition on God's side of the immanent Trinity, and on man's side of the willingness to undergo his share in the expropriation which will bring him into the sphere of expropriated love. This willingness is called faith, and in its kernel it means allowing love to have its way: not only in what love does for me, but also in the goal of this act, which is affirmed and accomplished when I am seized by love.

---

[1] TDNT II 892ff. (Greeven).

The distinction which comes into view here is once more that between justification and sanctification, or between the working of the Son and the working of the Spirit. Both are the original working of the Father: the Father gives us his Son, and likewise gives us his Spirit (1 Thess 4.8; Rom 8.9, 11, 14; 1 Cor 2.11, 14; 3.16, 6.11; 7.40; 12.3; 2 Cor 3.3), who is also the Spirit of his Son (Rom 8.9; 2 Cor 3.17,18; Phil 1.19) since, according to the word of the Son, 'All that is mine is yours, and all that is yours is mine' (Jn 17.10). But when the Word becomes flesh, it becomes for us a fellow human being; and no matter how gifted such a fellow human being might be (as the Word of God) to carry out a valid work of loving vicarious atonement for all his fellows, he is necessarily bound to the limits involved in genuinely being their fellow, if he is to do this work: this limit is the essential freedom of decision which is left to the other, who must say yes and no to this work. It is for this reason that the act of faith must be free, even when the freedom to say neither yes nor no is taken from us through the action of God in Christ: it is not possible to be indifferent in the face of this action, because man cannot adopt a position of indifference vis-à-vis his own true being. But in the act of one's fellow man Christ—if this act is affirmed in faith to be what it portrays itself to be—there lies an act of the total self-expropriation of the love of God, the deepest aim of which is to give man the gift of the same love. This is, therefore, an act that has penetrated beforehand into the 'private space' of the sinner who privatises himself (Rom 5.6) and has robbed this space of its private character: 'If one has died for all, then all have died' (2 Cor 5.14). This must be 'considered', 'evaluated', 'held' to be correct, and thus 'ratified' by man (λογίζεσθαι): 'Therefore count yourselves to have died to sin, and as men who live for God in Christ Jesus' (Rom 6.11; cf. 8.11; 1 Cor 4.1; Phil 3.10). But is man on his own capable of this correct λογίζεσθαι? Or must not the objective crossing of the boundary, the objective abolition of man's alienation from God, where the boundary is the human nature which Christ shares with him, be completed through a subjective crossing of the boundary that transforms the act of 'being laid hold of' into an act of enthused 'taking up' and 'pursuing' (Phil 3.12–14)? Now it is not possible for this abolition of the boundary to be an extension of the unfinished work of Christ, as if the Pneuma had to round the work off by starting at the point where the Logos had had to give up; rather, this perfect accomplishment of work undertaken by the Father must at the same time display the accomplishment of the Son's work: in perfect 'relinquishing' (a condition lying out beyond 'authority' and 'poverty'), the Son breathes out his Spirit, the Spirit of the love that has gone 'to the end', and simultaneously the Father ordains something new and different for the Pneuma: now that the Son has breathed forth the Spirit of love in absolute weakness, the Father can demonstrate the absolute power δύναμις[2] and glory δόξα of his Spirit of love, by raising the Son through the Pneuma (1 Pet 3.18; cf. Rom 8.11; 1 Tim 3.16) to be a 'spiritual body' (1 Cor 15.43f.), i.e., a body that is no longer bound to the earthly demarcations between body and body, between 'I' and 'you', and can therefore, thanks to the Pneuma whose Lord he is (and has become) and in whose boundless sphere he rules, draw in our spirits and bodies too. The power of this act of drawing in is the exproportion of our privacy, i.e., in concrete terms, of our sealed-up egoism, of our addiction to the desires (ἐπιθυμίαι) that seek to draw everything to ourselves; it is the liberation that brings us into freedom (Gal 5.1), for 'where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom' (2 Cor 3.17). This freedom is the opposite of addiction: it is the possibility for those who have been set free 'to live, no longer for themselves, but for him who died and rose for them' (2 Cor 5.15), and therefore, as an act of handing over, it is essentially service—service first of the self-expropriating love of God, and, coming directly from this, service of all those for whose sake God has expropriated himself. We shall say more about this later on.

It is important at this point to see that the dissolution of the boundaries that God imposed upon himself in the Incarnation of his Word who was to bring all things to fulfilment, had to take place from within, in accordance with logic of the Incarnation and the Cross, but in such a way that the taking on of finitude (going as far as the prison of being forsaken by God and of Hell) should not be nullified, but brought to fulfilment in God: not disincarnated, but made spiritual in the Resurrection. Otherwise, we should never have been liberated into our own freedom at all: there would have been no appropriation, but merely robbery. God would not be faithful to his first creation up to the ultimate point, acknowledging it and 'honouring' it (Jn 12.26): he would require from it merely the glorification of himself. And this glory would be no glory, because the love of God would not have been capable of bringing its work of love to completion. As long as the Son is in the flesh, 'the Spirit does not yet exist ' (Jn 7.39), although the Son is obedient to the Spirit of his mission from the Father and 'fulfils all (covenantal) righteousness' (Mt 3.15), and bears the 'Spirit' of the Servant of God who 'brings justice (of God) to full victory' (Mt 12.20) through his vicarious suffering;[3] but, in the power of the Spirit of God (12.28), he lets the weight of the world's guilt be piled on him, and he lives to carry out his task. It is only the carrying out of this task that shows that the power which encompassed his earthly task was the Spirit of the love of God condensed in him. In the 'glorification', his living and dying are displayed for what they always were: living 'for God' the Father (Rom 6.10). Simultaneously, we, for whose sake the task was carried out, are set in the sphere of 'being for God', without our freedom being violated. For we still live in the boundaries of our common humanity, and the message of the victory of the 'Servant of God' comes to us from the sphere of the Church (which is penetrated through and through by the Spirit and formed to become the place of love and of the service of God), so that we may say yes to the deed that God's love has accomplished, and may live for God's righteousness in the Pneuma of God who dwells in us (cf. Rom 8.10).

---

[2] On the relatedness of δύναμις and πνεῦμα, cf. I. Hermann, Kyrios und Pneuma (1961), pp. 120f.

The fiat of faith, which is not reducible to anything other than itself, is nevertheless not the creation of a truth, but the acceptance of the truth which from the start has had the believer in view and was intended for him; and this truth has in principle dealt with his refusal from the very outset. For Christ died for all sins. Another reason why it is not the creation of a truth is that it enters in each case a sphere of answering truth—the Church—and must understand its own fiat too as the acknowledgment of this greater and mightier fiat which includes it. The believer must still be dispossessed of his own acceptance of love's expropriation, and this takes place in the sacramental event: baptism introduces the 'yes' of his faith into the 'yes' of the whole Church, which itself speaks its 'yes' only out of the power of the obedient fiat of the Crucified (Eph 5.25ff.). When the individual believer is drawn into the whole Church, he is baptised 'into the death' of Christ (Rom 6.3), in order to be led down into a depth and definitiveness of self-surrender that remains unattainable for him as a limited human being but which he makes his aim in the act of faith and which he longs to see carried out, because he wishes to 'appropriate' to himself the total self-giving of God, opening up the whole space for it and giving it the adequate response which it intends. As a believer, he does not remain passive: in his baptism, he is admitted into the sphere of the Spirit of God and of the Church, and he declares himself in agreement with this Spirit and makes him his own. He lets himself be 'led' and 'driven' by the Spirit, but not as by a foreign spirit (a 'spirit of slavery'): this is his own Spirit, the 'Spirit of sonship, who makes us cry out: "Abba, beloved Father!"' (Rom 8.15). And when Paul continues: 'This Spirit confirms to our spirit that we are children of God' (8.16), then this confirmation lies beyond monologue and dialogue: the fact that we ourselves cry 'Father!' confirms to us that we are crying out of the Spirit of God and consequently are his children: the dialogue is not between our spirit and the Pneuma, but between our spirit, borne by the Pneuma, and the Father, a dialogue in which the Pneuma cannot be other than the Pneuma of the Son, in whom we have come to share in sonship: 'because we now are sons, God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, who cries out: "Abba, beloved Father!"' (Gal 4.6). But it is precisely this that demonstrates the Pneuma to be the Spirit of the Father, because it is only through him that we can be sons (with the Son), drawn into the event of the eternal generation of the Son (Jn 1.13). But thereby we arrive precisely at the place that was already predestined for us beforehand 'before the foundation of the world' (Eph 1.4f.), so little alienated from ourselves that it is by entering into the absolute love that we first find ourselves.

---

[3] Gerhard Barth, 'Das Gesetzesverständnis des Evangelisten Matthäus', in: G. Bornkamm, G. Barth, H. S. Held, Überlieferung und Auslegung im Mt. Ev. (1968), p. 132. (ET Tradition and Interpretation, p. 141.)

The necessary condition for this is always the Trinity and the Incarnation; otherwise, the human person's coming to be himself is reduced to his directly becoming God (an idea obviously refuted by his finitude) or to a tragic absolutisation of his finitude, which remains separated by a gulf from absolute love. The one thing that could offer the appearance of a mediation would be sex (in the dual sense of intercourse and gender), but even if here for a moment expropriation and the act of finding oneself seem to become one single reality, the price paid for this is a final loss of personality. In the Christian world, the Eucharist of the pneumatological bodiliness of the Son takes the place that is indicated here for sex: together with Christ who is incarnate, crucified, buried and raised, we move—in hope proleptically, and definitively at the Resurrection—to the place of perfect sonship, incorporated in the great body of those who are redeemed. This is something more than an anonymous collectivity: it is the body of Christ, given out of all in love as nourishment for eternal life, which becomes the social body of the Church in this act of distribution.[4] It is only when this eucharistic meditation guarantees the enduring bodiliness of the divine love between God and the world (according to the fundamental vision of Teilhard de Chardin) that the historical and sexual existence that includes birth and death can be taken up eschatologically and given a home in the absolute triune love. For it is then that the inchoative creaturely forms of finding oneself find their definitive justification by the creator God through their expropriation, and are given their home in him who made all things so that they should have existence (Wis 1.14), who loves all things and hates nothing of what he has made (Wis 11.24). It follows that becoming a member of the Church through baptism also means that one's own body becomes a member of the body of Christ which has its real existence in the pneumatological dimension: this does not exist solely for the spirit of man, but also 'for the body' (1 Cor 6.13). And the body needs self-expropriation in a special way, since it is inclined to raise itself up to become a god (Phil

---

[4] On this, cf. Henri de Lubac, Corpus Mysticum.

3.19), but is designated to become a sacrificial gift to God (Rom 12.1).[5]

Since the appropriation and the expropriation take place simultaneously, 'exchangeable formulae' are found: it can be said both that 'Christ lives in me' or 'in us' (Gal 2.19f.; 4.19; Rom 8.9–11; 2 Cor 4.16; 13.2–5) and that we are, or live, or are found 'in Christ' (Rom 8.1; Gal 3.26; Phil 3.9 and frequently). The immanence of Christ or of the Spirit (in John, also the immanence of God himself: Jn 14.23) negates the idea of a loss of self through the transfer into an alien sphere. But the reciprocity involved remains not only formal, but substantial: the purpose of the indwelling is an existence for the other, so that Paul has 'died to the law through the law, in order to live for God. With Christ I have been crucified: I live, and yet it is not I that live, but Christ lives in me'. The statement that follows expresses the full correspondence to the 'life for God' of which he speaks here: 'The life that remains to me in the flesh, I live in faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me' (Gal 2.19–20). Being carried out of oneself—which is faith, and is brought about by the love of Christ—is nothing else than a clearing of space in oneself for this love, a determination of one's own existence, which allows itself to be conformed to the existence of the crucified in such a way 'that our inclusion in the life of Christ does not only give us an outward direction, but penetrates us from within'.[6] The 'life of God' is brought about precisely through the inmost indwelling of Christ in the believer, since Christ always 'lives for God' (Rom 6.10) in the whole of the life devoted to his earthly task, and a fortiori in his risen life.[7] [5] A. Wikenhauser, Die Christusmystik des Apostels Paulus (2nd edn. 1956), pp. 19ff. 37ff. On the Johannine 'formulae of immanence' and their similarity and dissimilarity to Paul, cf. R. Schnackenburg, Die Johannesbriefe (1953), pp. 91–95.

---

[6] W. Thüsing, Per Christum in Deum. Studien zum Verhältnis von Christozentrik und Theozentrik in den paulinischen Hauptbriefen (1965), p. 111.

[7] W. Thüsing takes pains to show that the life of the risen Christian 'for God' is a fundamental affirmation of Paul (and one neglected by the tradition): Jesus dies as the one on whom God weighs down with sins (in such a way 'that nothing else can be seen in him than the condensed burden

While it is therefore possible to keep three levels of thought separate from one another in the abstract, they remain completely interwoven in each other in the concrete. The first is the soteriological level: the Son of God snatches us out of the slavery of sin, of the lack of love, and of egoism, in order to bring us back from this slavery and self-alienation both to God and to our own selves. For Paul, the law becomes here a perpetual reminder of this self-alienation, since it shows us a divine will that we are incapable of carrying out; Christ dissolves (Rom 7.4ff.) this unhappy marriage, since he makes the law, to which we were bound, die through his own death: we are free for him, just as the woman whose husband died is free 'for another' (ἑτέρῳ). But the image is shattered, first because it is we ourselves who have died (with Christ) (v. 6), in order to enter upon a new service in a new Spirit, and second because it is likewise we who are free, like the woman who had remained alive, for a new husband—God himself—for whom we are to 'bear fruit' (v. 4). This shattering shows that the image was not properly applicable, since it is completely impossible for God to be a ἕτερος: he is the unique and true one to whom one must return from every alienation (just as Israel had always to return in the past).—The second level, the least emphasised, is the creaturely level: it is the nature and the task of men 'to seek God, to try to touch him and find him: for he is not far from each one of us. For in him we live and move and have our being' (Acts 17.27f.). Man's indwelling gives his bearings, his home; the fact that he seeks shows his incapacity to be with God and (thereby) to be at home with himself; therefore God builds for us in Christ the bridge to both. The second, spiritual Adam comes down from Heaven and perfects the first, physical Adam by raising him up from earth (1 Cor 15.45ff.).—But it is only the third, trinitarian level that brings the definitive solution. Since God does not alienate himself of sin', pp. 84f.). His death is disadvantageous to sin, in order to open up access to the life for God: as the sinless Son of God, who even in dying lives only in obedience to the Father, he takes this obedience with him into his risen life, in order to reveal and open up to us his trinitarian relationship to the Father (pp. 72f., 89f.).

---

from himself by becoming incarnate (since the obedient Son of Man is only the illustration of the eternal relatedness and selflessness of the divine Persons), Christ does not alienate man from himself when he raises him from the apparently closed substantiality of his personal being (in which he thinks that he definitively stands over against God) into the open relatedness of the life within the Godhead. Rather, Christ brings him into the genuine truth of his origin; he is a distant image of this (imago trinitatis) in the love between human persons.

In concrete terms, all three levels are mutually related and cannot be separated from each other, just as God's original plan, set out in the prologue to Ephesians, began with the third level—participation in the trinitarian sonship—and then included in this both the creation (as 'external basis of the covenant') and the redemption ('through his blood'). It is therefore God himself who from the very start carried out proleptically 'the negation of the negation', by annulling in his first decision the potential 'no' of man—which became actuality to the highest degree, as the reference to the 'blood' of Christ shows—in his resolve to recapitulate everything in Heaven and on earth in Christ as the head. The tendency to understand everything in trinitarian terms is so strong that, according to Rom 8, God could let the whole creation be subjected to 'nothingness' and the 'slavery of corruption', as the consequence of man's sin and self-alienation from God, in order to let the creation sigh, together with man and indeed with the Pneuma in man, for the coming of the true reality of man and of creation as a whole, which will be both the 'freedom' of the creature and the 'glory' of the creator, and, even more than this, 'the freedom of the glory of the children of God' (8.21), a freedom in which the children of God will be at home wholly in themselves and wholly in God, a glory that will be wholly theirs and wholly God's. Thus will they be 'the praise of the glory of his grace' (Eph 1.6).

It is possible to check the accuracy of what has been said by a comparison with the New Testament concepts of parrhesia (openness to God and to men, candour) and kauchesis (consciousness of one's dignity, boasting) to select only two of the most important terms for the behaviour of the Christian, terms that are very closely linked to other words. Both have their roots in Old Testament and Jewish-hellenistic tradition, but take on a particular tone in the New Testament.

Parrhesia[8] appears in its Christian form in a central position at Eph 3.12: 'In Jesus Christ our Lord, we have parrhesia and open access in confidence (in God) through faith in him'. Ultimately, it is the attitude of the Son vis-à-vis the Father that is given over to us through faith in the Son. The meanings of the three concepts 'parrhesia, access, and confidence' shade off into each other in terms of their substance. They converge to show that the consciousness of the only Son, their Lord, is made over to be the inner possession of believers, and all embarrassment in the presence of the infinite God disappears (although this does not affect reverence and adoration: Eph 3.14). The First Letter of John knows the same openness to God (3.21); it presupposes both faith in Christ (and for John, this always means also the whole compass of his new commandment of love of neighbour) and the presence of the Spirit (3.24): Parrhesia occurs where God in the Spirit dwells in those who keep the commandment of Jesus'.[9] It is realised in the mystery of Christian prayer, which, for John, has a special share in the trinitarian prayer of the Son, who prays to the Father in the certainty that he is heard (Jn 11.42) and instructs those who belong to him to pray with the same certainty in his name and in their state of abiding in him (Jn 14.13f.; 15.7): 'This is the parrhesia that we have towards him: that he hears us when we pray in accordance with his will; and if we know that he hears us in whatever we ask, then we know too that we have already received what we have asked from him' (1 Jn 5.14f.). It is scarcely possible to have a deeper insight into the trinitarian openness of Father and Son for one another in the Spirit—where asking and receiving flow into one another, and the fact of having received does not exclude asking—or indeed a more perfect entry into the trinitarian unity of appropriation and expropriation. Here the oscillation (typical of John, as of Paul) of parrhesia between present and future (eschatological parrhesia as standing without shame before the judgment seat of God: 1 Jn 2.28; 4.17; Phil 1.19f.; cf. Wis 5.1) becomes understandable, since the present parrhesia exists on the basis of a hope that, thanks to the down-payment of the Spirit, does not deceive. Paul speaks above all of the parrhesia of the apostle vis-à-vis his communities (1 Thess 2.2; 2 Cor 3.12; 7.4) or vis-à-vis individuals (Philem 8), or vis-à-vis man in general in the proclamation of the gospel (Eph 6.20), but he draws this candour out of the situation of the new 'service in the Spirit' and 'his glory' (2 Cor 3.8f.); the inner connection between parrhesia and doxa can be seen from this text. If Moses' face had to be covered vis-à-vis the Israelites after he had seen what was as yet only a transitory glory (and a concealed glory, at that), the face of Paul, who sees 'the glory of the Lord with uncovered face', is uncovered and radiant vis-à-vis men, and he can 'proclaim the truth openly (τῇ φανερώσει)' with the whole of his existence and precisely thus give testimony—and indeed a kind of demonstration—'to every human conscience in the sight of God'. Once again—this time in the service of the Apostle—the unity of appropriation and expropriation becomes visible. In his mission, Paul is expropriated: 'For we do not proclaim ourselves, but Jesus Christ as Lord, and ourselves as your servants for the sake of Jesus' (4.5). But the very next verse adds an indication of the appropriation: 'For God . . . has shone in our hearts, to bring to radiance the knowledge of the glory of God on the face of Christ' (4.6): God shines in the Apostle's heart, so that the light of the glory of God may come to shine in the hearts of the believers, the same light that shone archetypically on the face of the Son.

---

[8] TDNT V 871–886 (Schlier; with bibliography).

[9] Ibid. 881.

Kauchesis (kauchema) could best illustrate the same reciprocity, were it not for the slight unclarity that this concept suffers in Paul as a result of the polemical situation in which he employs it (especially in 2 Corinthians).[10] It lies in the nature of man, since a ray of the doxa of God shines upon him, to have a consciousness of his value and to demand that this be acknowledged; but if this consciousness is cut loose from that of the primordial value and the primordial honour that lie in God and must be given back to him by man who is his image, then the human insistence on one's own value and honour becomes 'boasting' and thus a distinguishing mark of the fool (Ps 52.3; 75.5; 94.3). The man of the old covenant had above all to learn anew the original relationship: Yahweh is Israel's honour (Deut 10.21), and Israel's cult is above all also the joyful, exultant, thankful praising of God's salvific deeds (Ps 5.12; 32.11, and frequently). Then there occurs a shift within Judaism: the reference to God becomes an object of reflection for the pious and the wise: 'the fear of the Lord is δόξα and καύχημα (Sir 1.11; 9.16; 10.22). Where there ought to be pure expropriation, the act of expropriation itself is appropriated (as virtue and merit). The teaching of the prophet is in lapidary opposition to this: 'Thus speaks Yahweh: let not the wise man boast of his wisdom, let not the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man boast of his riches; but let the one who wants to boast, boast of this: that he understands and knows me, for I am Yahweh, who practise steadfast love, justice, and righteousness on earth: for in these things I delight' (Jer 9.22f.).

---

[10] The clear line is brought out best in the concise article by R. Bultmann, TDNT III 645–654; idem, Theologie des NT (1948) §23, pp. 237f.

Paul translates what the prophet says into a radical New Testament language when he rejects all self-praise, both Gentile and Jewish: 1 Cor 1.25–31. All 'honour' (i.e., every occasion for joyful (self-)affirmation) belongs to God, but now this is 'through our Lord Jesus Christ' (Rom 5.11), in whom God has glorified himself. The Christian 'puts no confidence in the flesh', but 'finds his own value in Christ Jesus' (Phil 3.3); he is to make his boast in nothing other than in our Lord Jesus Christ' (Gal 6.14). Not only does Paul hold (ET Theology of the New Testament 1952–5, pp. 242ff. Almost involuntarily the problematic becomes clear in the minutely detailed studies of K. Prümm, Diakonia Pneumatos I (1967), pp. 29ff. (etc.; cf. p. 803: 'Ruhm'); II/1 (1960), pp. 88–114; II/2 (1962), pp. 340–355. E. G. Gulin, Die Freude im NT, I (1932), pp. 208f., 258f. O. Kuss, Der Römerbrief (1957), pp. 219–224.—On the distinction between καύχησις and καύχημα TDNT III, 648 n. 35.

that the Christian finds affirmation outside of himself in Christ: this takes place when Christ is affirmed in the believer through God's grace. Just as he can understand his suffering for the sake of faith and of the apostolate as an expression of his being 'in Christ', so he can also boast of his sufferings (Rom 5.3; 2 Cor 4.7–11, and especially 11.23–29). But Paul's total self-expropriation outside Damascus, which was imposed upon him 'by constraint' (1 Cor 9.16)—consisting of the pure service of the gospel, with the main point of his existence shifted to his mission—produces the community with its life of faith as the fruit that is called into life by the power of God, by Christ and by the Pneuma. Paul would perhaps not have reflected so much on the honour redounding to him from his mission, had not his opponents forced him to do so, by calling into question his apostolic, Christian and human value. Where the opponents force him to overstep the mark, he emphasises that this self-praise occurs 'as if in folly' (2 Cor 11.16f., 21; 12.1, 11), and turns back as quickly as possible to the honourable title of Christian 'weakness' (11.23f.) and of the freely-given charisms (12.2ff.). But his Christian (self-) praise has yet more occasions: first of all, his awareness that he has given his whole existence to his mission, i.e., the 'testimony of our conscience, that we have lived in holiness and purity before God . . . in the power of the grace of God in the world' (2 Cor 1.12); and second, the success of the mission—the faith and love of the community—is his praise, uncertain today (Phil 2.16) but certain on the day of the Lord (1 Thess 2.19f.; joy, crown of praise and δόξα), for indeed the community and the Apostle will then be each other's praise (2 Cor 1.14). For the community must acknowledge Paul as the original instrument of their coming to be Christians and hence as their praise, in order to give honour to the truth (2 Cor 1.11; at 5.12, he gives them 'evidence that you may be proud of us'; cf. Phil 1.26).[11] He is careful 'not to praise himself beyond measure', but to keep to the measure that God gives him together with the mission territory when he sends him out (2 Cor 10.12f.),[12] not forgetting in all this that all he does is owed to the power and the grace that are at work through him (2 Cor 4.7; 6.7; 13.4).

---

[11] This is the reading of the shorter text; in the longer text, objectionable behaviour of 'measuring oneself by oneself' is attributed to the opponents; cf. above, p. 313, n. 14.

Paul's task was particularly difficult:[13] to let the expropriation through Christ be appropriation in a way that would make him behave like Christ himself, who lived in the authority (ἐξουσία) of God as the one who was poor and relinquished control over himself; and also to reflect on this appropriation, on Christ who 'lives in me', in order to make it eloquent in the service of his apostolate, and indeed to give as it were an anatomical demonstration in his own existence of how expropriation and appropriation are mutually related for the Christian. Paul's precarious position vis-à-vis the first Apostles and the 'super-apostles' continually forced him to show that his mission was coterminous with his person, and that each was the legitimation of the other. What John does is much easier: although he has reflected more than the others on the tension in Christ between authority and obedience (or poverty, relinquishing of self), and has thereby arrived at the self-definitions of Christ, this reflection does not correspond at any point of the Johannine writings to a reflection on the relationship between task and person in the existence of the Apostle. To the emphatic christological 'I am' there corresponds in the Johannine Christ the rejection of any δόξα received from men (Jn 5.41), which almost seems to contain a polemical point against the Pauline kauchesis. Even less has the author of the Letters of John occasion and opportunity to receive from this community any nourishment for the sense of his personal value—indeed, this is apparently denied him:

---

[12] Cf. also the dialectic at 2 Cor 12.11ff.: it is Paul who ought to be 'recommended' by the community, but Paul feels himself to be its father, and parents must make sacrifices for their children, not vice versa. Yet, once again, is he to be loved the less for this (v. 15)?

[13] K. Prümm admits that Paul comes into 'the danger-zone of unhealthy kauchema' (II/2, p. 340), but holds that it is 'a humilitating self-exposure' for him to go in for a 'contest in fame' with his enemies (2 Cor 11.21), and that he begins this 'in a mood of bitter irony' (p. 343); he 'moves with amazing sureness along the narrow ledge of a steep mountain that falls away on either side' (II/1, p. 111) and thereby represents a 'true peak of human greatness' (Ibid.).

3 Jn 9f.—or to introduce the thought that he himself is the kauchema of the community. On the contrary, the 'we' in which he conceals himself at the beginning of the First Letter is so anonymous that he becomes unrecognisable as a person and is nothing more than a link between those who have seen, heard and touched the Word of life in the beginning and those who—through the link—enter fellowship with the original community and are to remain in it. Further, although we find the emphatic idea that the one who walks in the light of life from God 'is righteous' (3.7), and that the one born of God 'cannot sin at all' (3.9), this statement of the complete transparency to God of the one who believes and loves does not lead to reflection about a good conscience (cf. 2 Cor 1.12), but quite the contrary: it is presented on an equal footing with the other statement, 'If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us', for then 'we make God out to be a liar, and his word is not in us' (1 Jn 1.8,10). We should rather let the paradox stand, that God is greater than our heart that accuses us (3.20); this 'greater' quality is his love to us in the atoning deed of Jesus (1.7,9), showing us both that we were sinners (and can always become sinners again: 2.2), and that the emphasis in our self-awareness lies, not in our conscience which accuses us, but in our parrhesia to God (3.21). But this so much points us away from ourselves to the commandment of brotherly love that this too prevents us from having the time and the possibility of identifying ourselves in the endeavour 'to give our lives for the brethren' and 'to love in deed and in truth' (3.16,18).

c. Giving back the fruit to God

There is yet more to say about the process of δοξάζειν, for we remain within a merely anthropocentric perspective in considering how man is raised from his status as God's partner in creation on Old Testament terms to become a quite different kind of partner, determined by the inner-trinitarian love, and how he is expropriated in faith in Christ (which entails sharing in him in his dying and rising) in order to come truly to himself in God. The final step is taken when we consider the simple truth that man is a planting of God, that his fruit belongs to God and is claimed, sought and demanded by God, and that man is expropriated a priori as one who stands between the realm of fruitful nature and the grace that is a fortiori fruitful in a different way, and that he participates in both these realms.

The idea of fruitfulness is a dominant idea that runs through the whole of the New Testament.[1] Its own evident connection with 'glorification' is explicitly set out in the image of the vine: 'My Father is glorified, when you bear much fruit' (Jn 15.8). The idea is present, though less strongly, in the old covenant (cf., e.g., Amos 6.12; Jer 17.10), but Isaiah has composed the terrible and powerful 'song of the vineyard' (5.1ff.), the theme of which is developed in a line that goes from the Old Testament to the New.[2] But there is a broader basis to Jesus' parables that speak of the seed, of growth, of fruit and of harvest. In order to make the 'secrets of the kingdom of God' (Mk 4.11) comprehensible, creaturely life is drawn upon in what is at once most truly its own and most mysterious, most immanent and most transcendent, and Jesus' touch is absolutely sure in this. Two elements above all (both of which were also present in the Old Testament parable of the vineyard) are available for the comparison: God is the planter and sower, and therefore, also the owner of vine, field and tree; it follows that the produce of the planting belongs to him from the outset and beyond any question. No other source of fruitfulness whatsoever comes into consideration ('Every plant that my heavenly Father has not planted will be uprooted', Mt 15.13); nor is there any possibility for the tenant in God's fruitful field to claim the fruits for himself (Mt 21.33ff.); nor is it thinkable that a tree which God has planted as a fruit-tree could have no fruit for him, when he demands fruit from it—and the fruit has to be there when God needs it (Mk 11.12–14, 20f.). The same point is made by the related parables that speak of the talents and pounds which are lent in order to bear fruit: it is an offence against the giver, if one returns his loan without fruit. (Mt 25.14–30 par.). The second element is equally primordial: the produce of the vineyard or field or tree is expected from the plant itself. The circumstances that can and should further the inner fruitfulness—the fence, winepress, tower and workers in the vineyard (Mt 21.33f.), the servants who till the field (Mt 13.27), digging and manuring (Lk 13.8), pruning (Jn 15.2)—are secondary; ultimately, it is the plant itself that must produce the fruit. We see once again in this second element the power of the image at a fundamental level. For if a man is a field, a vineyard or a tree, then it is not through an automatic process of nature that he bears his fruit for God, but freely and responsibly. He can therefore be called to account for the fruit that he bears: he will be rewarded for good fruit, punished and cut down when the fruit is bad or lacking. The point is that the element of freedom in bearing fruit, the element of decision for or against being fruitful for God, for or against delivering the fruit to God, is not in any way weakened or neutralised by the image from nature: rather, it is precisely within this context that it takes on its full seriousness. If nothing can be subtracted from the origin and owner of the fruitfulness, God, nor from its goal, the fruit that is to be delivered, how great is man's responsibility! The theme of reward and punishment is found in all the parables of sowing and growth, of vine-dressers and of talents, and they all point with urgency to the date for delivery, the day of judgment. Nevertheless, all this is included within the logic of the fruitfulness, which is given by God and must be developed with him in view.

---

[1] Art. καρπός TDNT III 614–616 (Hauck). Also: J. Bommer, Die Idee der Fruchtbarkeit in den Evangelien (dissertation at Angelicum, partly published 1950, Blessing, Pfullingen; with bibliography); F. Böckle, Die Idee der Fruchtbarkeit in den Paulusbriefen (dissertation at Angelicum, 1953, Paulusdruckerei, Fribourg; with bibliography).

[2] Is 27.2ff.; Jer 2.21; Ezek 15.1–8; 17.3–10; 19.10–14; Hos 10.1; Ps 80.9ff.; Mt 20.1–16; 21.28ff, 33–44; Jn 15.1ff. We can leave the question open here of the extent to which the broader use of the concept of fruit in the New Testament could be due to contact, in the period after the composition of the Old Testament texts, with Iranian concepts (paradise as a garden of fruit, the soul as a plant, good works as fruits, etc.): R. Reitzenstein, Iranisches Erlösungsmysterium (1921), pp. 138ff.

Before we consider in greater detail what this initial point implies, it should be pointed out that already in Isaiah's song of the vineyard God feels the unfruitfulness of his people to be ungratefulness: 'What more could I have done for my vineyard? When I looked for it to yield grapes, why did it yield wild grapes?' (Is 5.4). To bring fruit is to give thanks for the fruitfulness that has been received, εὐχαριστία. But this also means that the thanksgiving that we owe God for his work of creation and of grace consists essentially of bringing fruit. It cannot consist solely of an 'attitude' which is not actively lived out, nor in a cult that is not also ethics, nor in an assurance that one loves God ('Lord! Lord!' at Mt 7.21, following the logion about the good tree and the bad tree) without proof of this given in the love of neighbour, nor in the most perfect faith, the highest knowledge, that is not at the same time active love (1 Cor 13.2ff.). If we take the concept of restitution as a whole, it is not thankfulness that God wants, but fruitfulness. The latter automatically includes the former, but thankfulness can prove that it is Christian only by bringing fruit. This is seen at once in Jesus' εὐχαριστεῖν, which brings the Old Testament's berakah to an end and becomes the Church's eucharist: Jesus' εὐχαριστεῖν (Lk 22.17,19) is a thanksgiving to the Father that takes the form of self-giving and consecration of self into the redemptive death, and in this thanksgiving he definitively becomes the grain of wheat that falls into the earth, in order to bear much fruit; and the commandment for the cultic repetition includes as its centre the presence of this event, both demanding and bestowing inner participation in it (1 Cor 10.16; 11.26ff.). Christian thanksgiving, giving back to God the gift that he has given, is impossible other than in the Christian bearing of fruit. In the image of fruitfulness, it becomes clear that the gift is a loan (because God remains the Lord of the vineyard, the possessor of the fruitfulness), but a gift that in being lent becomes one's own, because what naturally bears fruit bears its fruit itself, out of its own potency. When the image is taken seriously within the biblical context of God's self-communication, it immediately takes us out beyond the alternative of a gift that is lent and one that is one's own possession, of an ability that comes through God and ability that comes through oneself, of producing and bearing fruit that is one's own or that comes from outside oneself. The God-'fearer' with the single talent, who 'knows' (ἔγνων) God to be 'strict', exalted on high and wholly other, and reverently restores to him 'inviolate' what was entrusted to him, is thrust out into the darkness (Mt 25.24–30).

If this is so, then it can seem initially as if the ethics of the Old Testament—with its contrast between the God who gives and the human person who responds—is taken over unchanged when it is subsumed under the New Testament heading of the 'fruitfulness' image. We still find the 'good work' (Mt 5.16), the evaluation of a man's life on the basis of his achievement; we find the eschatological division: reward and punishment, Heaven and Hell. And this theme of personal judgment in accordance with works, derived from the Judaism of the Old Testament, is found not only in the Gospels, but also in Paul (Rom 2.6; 14.10ff.; 1 Cor 3.8; 4.4ff.; 2 Cor 5.10). Nevertheless all this had undergone a double change. First, the gift of God (according to the great prophecy of a new covenant, at Jer 31.33) is really relocated in the human heart: God appears quite simply, as a sower who sows his word—the word of the kingdom, the word which is Jesus himself, the one who speaks it—in the hearts of the hearers (Mt 13.19).[3] The sower somehow separates himself from the principle of fruitfulness, and surrenders this to the field, where it gets to work by itself (according to the parable of the growing seed, Mk 4.26ff). The sower becomes, as it were, contemplative in relationship to what the seed does; 'the earth bears fruit αὐτομάτη', and this is precisely the fruit that was sowed by God in Jesus, the fruit of the kingdom of God. With this inner dimension of the fruitful principle, we have the second New Testament element: it must be Jesus Christ himself, or his Holy Spirit, who is the one that truly bears fruit in the hearts of men; the human person who is required to achieve and to decide will be able to bear his fruit only 'in Christ', out of him and through him, working in union with him—'without me, you can do nothing' (Jn 15.5)—but in such a way that it is precisely through this unity that the human person is empowered to a new fruitfulness of his own, which was previously unknown to him. The law of appropriation and expropriation returns on a new level: man becomes the womb that receives the word that is initially foreign to him. This word is sown in him, and he bears this seed to birth—not for himself, but for God, since it is a divine seed. And he gives back to its possessor the fruit that has reached its term, which belongs to God and yet is also the product of the womb. Man is expropriated a first time, when God lays claim to him as a field for his seed, and a second time, when the fruit that is borne is taken from him so that it may be brought into God's granary (Mt 3.12). But in the midst of all this he is endowed at a deeper level with creative force that is able to respond to the requirement to bear divine fruit; indeed, he is endowed with a divine principle of fruitfulness that is the very word of God that has been sown in him: the seed makes over to the womb the appropriate form of fruitfulness, so that—in the image of the vine—the logic of the relationships is inverted: Christ becomes the womb that bears, the fruitful vine-stock, and the believers become the branches that it produces without in any way being released from the obligation to produce grapes, which is the ultimate concern of the owner of the vineyard. They do this, and prove themselves fruitful—by reason of their 'abiding' in the vine. They bear fruit because they themselves are fruit, and they become one single principle of fruit together with the stock. Nevertheless, the Johannine image preserves the distinction, derived from the Old Testament (and, further back, from creation), with its requirements and its judgment. The vine-dresser, the Father, does not prune or purify the vine, but only the branches: if they remain unfruitful, they are cut off from it and thrown, withered, into the fire; if they are fruitful, they are purified so that they may bear yet more fruit. This purification can take the form of suffering; in any case, it is a deeper expropriation in the spirit of Jesus' fruitfulness because the ultimate fruitfulness belongs to Jesus' perfect poverty which went to the point of relinquishing himself, as is shown by the logion about the grain of wheat, which is spoken anew precisely in the context of glorification: 'The time has come for the Son of Man to be glorified. Truly, truly, I say to you: if the grain of wheat does not fall into the earth and die, it remains alone. But if it dies, it bears much fruit. Whoever loves his life, loses it . . .' (Jn 12.23ff.). The image of the vine expands this statement by displaying the outcome, the 'much fruit', which consists first of all in the fact that many (the branches) will themselves become fruitful together with Jesus: the principle of fruitfulness, which at the beginning was alone and solitary, grows and multiplies in the world. And this is the essence of the Church. Thus the glorification of the Son by the Father, who permits the fruitfulness of the dying of the Son, is converted into a conclusive glorification of the Father by the Son: 'In this is my Father glorified, that you bear much fruit and (thus) show that you are my disciples' (15.8). Through the Father's purification, the disciples learn how to bear ever more fruit, and this brings them nearer to the Son's bearing of fruit in the Cross.

---

[3] It is well known that the interpretation of the parable (Mt 13.24ff.) of the weeds sown among the wheat, identifying the sower as the Son of Man, comes from Matthew himself, or from the Church's catechesis, and presupposes a post-Easter reflection on Christ.

The conversion of the fruit to a new principle of fruitfulness is latent in the Synoptic Gospels (in that here too man is fruitful only by reason of the seed that is given him); it is seen by Paul (for whom the believers are the fruit of the gospel and, as such, themselves are to bear fruit), but it is thought through most explicitly in John. Apart from the image of the vine, there are the images of water: first it is Jesus who is the spring from which a thirsty man drinks (7.37); but then the one who drinks is changed into one who gives drink: 'The water that I will give him (to drink) will become in him a spring welling up to eternal life' (4.14). It is then almost irrelevant how one punctuates 7.37b–38, whether it is Jesus himself or the one who believes in him that is the 'belly' (κοιλιά) out of which 'the streams of living water flow'. We have something similar in Jesus' words before the gates of Samaria, when he sees 'the fields white for harvest' and calls the Samaritans to conversion, and then continues: 'Already the reaper receives his wages and gathers fruit for eternal life, so that sower and reaper may rejoice together.

For here the saying is true, "One sows and another harvests"' (4.35ff.). The first, the sower, is the Father; the other, the reaper who is already beginning the harvest, is the Son; the Samaritan woman was a first fruit, and now others are drawing near, the people from the city who are looking for Jesus. In the next verse, the situation changes: 'I have sent you out where you have not laboured; others have toiled, and have entered into the enjoyment of their toil'. Here, the branches are grafted into the trinitarian fruitfulness. Presumably, it is the Samaritan mission of the early Church that is spoken of here: some, like the deacon Philip, have begun the work (Acts 8.4), while others, like Peter and John, are sent out from Jerusalem to finish off their work and to communicate the Holy Spirit to the converts (8.14–17).[4] This Johannine reflection reaches its climax in the theology of birth from God: 'to those who received him (the Logos), he gave the capacity (ἐξουσιάν) to become children of God—to those who were born, not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God' (Jn 1.12–13). This is, and remains, a mystery (3.8), all the more so in that John emphasises the uniqueness of the Only-begotten so strongly (1.18)—it is he alone who has come down from heaven (3.13)—and yet holds a 'birth from above' to be possible and necessary (3.7). The 'possibility' is the gift that he has brought with him: 'The one who is born of God does not sin, because his seed remains alive in him' (1 Jn 3.9). This germ of life is originally the Son himself, the fruit that communicates itself to the one who believes within the Church in rebirth from water and the Spirit (Jn 3.5), as the principle whereby the believer himself can bear fruit, and this ultimately means that he is born of the Father together with the only Son. This goes so far that the Son, who at other times emphasises, vis-à-vis the Church, his unity with the Father, can now emphasise, vis-à-vis the Father, his unity with the Church in the single principle of fruitfulness that is the vine and the branches. The men to whom he was sent have become his 'friends' (if they keep his commandment of love and 'go forth' as those whom he has chosen, and 'bear fruit', 15.14–16), and indeed they have become his 'brothers' with a common Father and God (20.17).

---

[4] O. Cullmann, 'Samarien und die Anfänge der christlichen Mission' (1953), quoted from: Vorträge und Aufsätze 1925–1962, ed. K. Fröhlich (1966), pp. 232–240; this interpretation is taken over by R. Schnackenburg, Johannes, Vol I (1965), p. 487 (ET p. 453).

In Paul, we find the idea of the fruit that the believer receives from God and gives back to him expressed in a dynamic that is Paul's own, indicated in the frequent employment of the word group (ὑπερ-)περισσεύειν, περισσεία, (ὑπερ[εκ]-)περισσῶς, and similar forms. The word 'fruit' (καρπός) is less concrete in Paul than in the parables and metaphors of the Gospels; in a more abstract way, it can denote the effect and the produce of human action with or without a divine working-principle[5] thus, he can speak of 'fruit of the light' (Eph 5.9), 'fruit of righteousness' (Phil 1.11), 'fruit of knowledge' (Col 1.9), 'fruit of the Spirit' (Gal 5.22), and, in the comparison of apostolic work with agriculture, of 'fruit' as success (Rom 1.13; cf. 1 Cor 3.6; 2 Tim 2.6; Phil 1.22); and, perhaps in an allusion to the parables of growth, the bearing of fruit and growth on the part of the gospel in the whole world can be praised (Col 1.5f.). Some passages (Rom 15.28; Phil 4.17) disclose their meaning only in the context of the more general concept, which is no longer dependent on the analogy from the sphere of organic life, but goes beyond this to lay bare a fundamental quality of being as such: a quality that does not appear in a philosophical, but in a theological and trinitarian frame of reference, and governs the totality of things that exist—Christ, the Church, the Christian.[6]

In Paul's thought, περισσεύειν denotes the act or condition of overflowing, or (in less material terms) abundance. But this is not at all a mere wealth that marks out is possessor (however large and extraordinary this may be), but a fullness that goes forth, bestows itself and lavishes itself, not so much in specific deeds but generally as a distinguishing mark of its being, just as a spring is characterised as such by the manner of its flowing. If one did not know that subterranean streams nourish the spring, one could think that the spring water brought itself into being afresh at every moment precisely in the act of pouring itself out from itself. More is meant in this than in the philosophical adage, bonum diffusivum sui; here we have also the mysterious power to regenerate oneself anew at every instant in the act of giving, or conversely the power to produce incessantly such a fullness in oneself that it can retain its own identity only through giving away the overflow. What has being—and ultimately the triune Being itself, as the source of all—is always more than itself. It is essentially a prodigality in which even the categories of purpose and goal (causa finalis), and hence also of plan and execution, became inadequate. 'Purpose' sets a limit from the start on the act that is initiated, and 'goal', by indicating its finishing point, quantifies the process. Both concepts remain theologically useful (cf. Jn 13.1; Eph 1.4–10, etc.), because they emphasise the intellectual and spiritual, purposive element of the divine welling-up, but they must remain subordinate to the larger characteristic that is the act of pouring oneself out for its own sake: this can be qualified in terms of purpose and goal only within the context of finitude, and even such qualifications are intended only to communicate proleptically (and, at the end, in a definitive manner) to the finite world the quality of what is infinite and of its inner pouring-forth.

---

[5] It is of course true that the bad products, unlike the good products, are often called merely 'works', not 'fruits': Gal 5.19 ('works') and 5.22 ('fruits'); Eph 5.11 ('unfruitful works') as opposed to 5.9 ('fruit of light'). When Paul speaks of the 'fruit' of sin at Rom 6.21, this is only in the form of a question: at 6.22 he speaks affirmatively of the 'fruit' of sanctification. At Rom 7.4–5, however, 'bringing fruit for God' and 'bringing fruit for death' are parallel antitheses.

[6] Apart from F. Böckle (n. 1 above), cf. art. περισσεύω etc. in TDNT VI 58–63 (Hauck); ibid., art. πλεονάζω etc., 263–268 (Delling).

All this certainly lay hidden in the Gospel logia about fruitfulness, and even more in the being and behaviour of Jesus as these are described in the Gospels. According to John, the disciples recognise his glory for the first time on the occasion of the miracle at Cana, which takes place under the sign of the sudden reversal from poverty ('They have no more wine') to incomprehensible, indeed foolish (Jn 2.10) prodigality. The banquet in the house of the Pharisee (Lk 7.36–50) shows the same reversal, only this time in a spiritual manner; while he has measured out his gestures of honour in small doses, the tears and the ointment of the sinful woman are the uncalculated gushing-out of repentant love, into which the miracle of the boundless forgiveness of sins can gush forth. The 'faith' that helps the sinful woman to carry out her superabundant deed (7.50) is doubtless already the 'work of God' in her (Jn 6.29), in the same way that a spring of water can propel its waters upwards through the pressure of a tank that is above it. The wasteful anointing by Mary of Bethany too—who, unlike Judas, does not calculate love and make use of it for other ends (Jn 12.4ff.)—is brought about through the superabundant contemplation in which she welcomes the Word of God into herself (Lk 10.38ff.). The sign of prodigality likewise stands over the multiplication of bread, which is, explicitly, not governed by the needs of the crowd,[7] as is seen in the twelve or seven baskets that hold what is left over (περίσσευμα, Mk 8.8; τὸ περισσεῦον, Mt 14.20; 15.37; Lk 9.17; Jn 6.12): they are a proleptic sign of the new manna, of the boundless eucharistic self-distribution of the Son of Man for the life of the world (Jn 6.51) which is thereby 'to live for ever' beyond all earthly dying (6.58). In the father's house, every hired worker has 'bread and to spare' (Lk 15.17): it is only the son who did not want to live in the περισσεύειν of the father, but took away his share as a separate private possession for himself, who ends up hungry. The bread of life, which the Father gives to the world, is lavished 'in overflowing' (Jn 10.10). This is why a 'righteousness' that 'far surpasses' the earlier righteousness is also required of the disciples (Mt 5.20).

Thus the foundation is laid for the Pauline 'overflowing', which is first of all the general mark of the dispensation of divine grace, when this is compared with the destructive way in which sin and death spread themselves in Adam's race. Rom 5.15–21 repeatedly abolishes the equilibrium between the two dispensations: 'how much the more did grace abound'

---

[7] Like the feeding with manna in the wilderness (Ex 16.4f.) and the miracle of Elisha at 2 Kings 4.43f., where 'they ate, and had some left.' On this, cf. A. Heising, Die Botschaft der Brotvermehrung, St. Bibl. Stud. 15 (1966), pp. 31ff., 70.

(πολλῷ μᾶλλον ἡ χάρις ἐπερίσσευσεν, 5.15; cf. 5.17, 20). In the contest between the powerful springs of sin and of grace, grace wins by a large margin; indeed, Paul describes this contest by saying that the increase of sin (v. 19) provokes an even greater increase of grace (v. 20: ὑπερπερισσεύειν).[8] In God's grace, which reveals its essence, there is disclosed a comparative which will always surpass every superlative that can be definitively attained. This quality of grace is now at work within the dispensation of salvation: this is seen chiefly at the point where God's work seems to be finished, in the Cross and Resurrection of the Son, but 'flows over on to us' out beyond itself 'in all wisdom and insight' (Eph 1.8), i.e. as the dispensation of the Holy Spirit, who draws us into the redemption that has been objectively accomplished, so that we may participate in it from within, understanding it and living it (Col 1.10). It is precisely in this that the New Testament dispensation surpasses the glory of the old, Mosaic dispensation (περισσεύει δόξῃ), namely that the covering laid on the hearts is taken away, and we see the Lord openly and are also existentially changed into the glory of his love (2 Cor 3.16ff.). Just as 'the surprisingly quick growth of the Church (Acts 2.41; 4.4; 6.7; 9.31), which is expressed at 16.5 by ἐπερίσσευον τῷ ἀριθμῷ καθ'ἡμέραν . . . does not only (contain) statistical information', but intends to describe the growth as the working of the exalted Christ in the Holy Spirit,[9] so Paul's primary concern is the inner 'overflowing' of the life of faith as 'mutual love' (1 Thess 3.12) and 'in hope in the power of the Holy Spirit' (Rom 15.13).

But it is only in the Second Letter to the Corinthians, in which the dialectic of poverty and riches, or of suffering in Christ and joy in Christ, controls the use of the theme of superabundance, that this theme takes on its deeply New Testament, i.e. christological and trinitarian, colouring. At the beginnning of the Letter, this dialectic determines the apostolic existence, which however is determined by it only so that it can flow over on to the community and, in turn, determine its life. For God comforts the Apostle in all tribulations, so that he may be able to comfort the afflicted in their tribulation 'with the comfort with which we ourselves are comforted by God'. This immanence of the divine comfort in the one who is afflicted, so that he may give away to others what he himself has received, stands under the law of progressive abundance: 'For as the sufferings of Christ abound for us, so our consolation too abounds through Christ' (2 Cor 1.4–5). Christ's sufferings are first abundant in Christ himself as redemptive sufferings for all sins, but they flow over on to the Apostles with this quality of their own, and the Apostles receive a share, in a way that can be determined neither quantitatively nor qualitatively, in the superabundance of the sufferings of Christ (2 Cor 4.10f.).[10] Because of this sharing, God's grace brings about a corresponding consolation for them 'through Christ': for it is not Christ himself who comforts them, but God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all consolations' (1.3), who controls and distributes the fruits of the sufferings of the Son in the Holy Spirit (as the insistent repetition of παρακαλεῖν seems to hint). But it is only at 2 Cor 8.1–9.15, with the theology developed on the occasion of the collection for Jerusalem, that the full christological and trinitarian dimensions of the 'overflow' become visible.

---

[8] Böckle (p. 49, n. 144) refers from this text to Rom 3.7: through the lie of the Gentiles, i.e. through their worship of idols, God's truthfulness has shown itself to be all the greater (ἐπερίσσευσεν) to his glory.

[9] TDNT VI 59.

Two things must be noted in this great text at the outset: the play of analogies in the word χάρις, which denotes both the pure grace of God and its incorporation in the hearts and attitudes of Christians, and finally also the alms which are given out of this attitude, which now appear as the fruits of the grace that has flowed over into their hearts; but these are fruits that must be produced, if the flow of grace is not to be interrupted in its course, and fruits that are utterly essential in this context but are nevertheless not particularly emphasised but occur almost as obviously and naturally as fruits on a tree.[11] It is an aspect of this natural quality that the fruit that is produced appears as the 'overflow of joy' (8.2) in the midst of the effort of growth and ripening: fruit is always the 'sweet product' of the life-process. The alms are likewise termed ἁπλότης (2 Cor 8.2; 9.11,13; Rom 12.8): as the simplicity of giving, the unpretentiousness of the gesture of generous giving that flows from an unreflected extraversion that knows no reserve.[12] These presuppositions make it possible for us to understand the bold statement about the attitude of the Macedonians, which is first presented to the Corinthians as a model of genuine beneficence: after the mention of their afflication, of their 'overflowing joy' in this affliction and their 'utter poverty', Paul says that this poverty 'flowed over into the riches of their generosity' (2 Cor 8.2) to such an extent that they asked to be allowed to share in the service of love for Jerusalem, not only 'in accordance with what they had', but 'of their own accord, even above what they had' (8.3); and in order to let their poverty overflow into riches, 'first' they consecrated 'their person to the Lord', and then to the apostolic work (8.5). This is the introduction to the greatest theme that Paul is able to offer the Corinthians when he goes on to make his request of them: the example of Christ himself.

---

[10] This christological burdening of the Apostle becomes clear at 2 Cor 1.8–9, when he says that he was 'burdened down excessively, beyond (human) power' with the result that 'every possibility of continuing to live seemed to be cut off, and we despaired of life itself'. On that occasion, it was only 'the God who raises the dead' that was able to create a way out, so that this period of the Apostle's life became for him a genuine experience of the 'overflowing' of the Passion and Resurrection of Christ. At 2 Cor 4.15, this event is once again interpreted with regard to the apostolate: 'All (this) takes place for your sake, so that grace may be multiplied and may make the thanksgiving overflow through a greater number (of believers) for the glorification of God'. These concise words make the inner connection between 'overflowing', eucharistia, and doxa clear.

---

[11] Χάρις is 'God's grace' at 8.1, but is already 'given and made over to the Church of Macedonia' there. At 8.9 it is 'the grace of Christ', which again is described as made over to the needy, so that the word includes 'the gift of love' in each of these expressions. At 8.4, χάρις becomes 'the favour of giving', and this (as the priority of the giving of oneself to the Lord shows) is the attitude of willingness (cf. v. 10f.: τὸ θέλειν, προθυμία: will, readiness). And it is only at 8.6,7 that χάρις becomes the work of love that is actually given as a gift. The conclusion at 9.14–15 brings us back to the beginning: the word once more means the 'exceedingly great grace of God' and the 'thanksgiving' that is owed him for this.

[12] TDNT I 386f. (Bauernfeind).

'For you know the gracious act (χάρις) of our Lord Jesus Christ, who became poor for you although he was rich, so that you might be enriched by means of his poverty' (8.9). The paradox that beggars can enrich others, when they give their heart to the Lord—one may think here of the poor widow who out of her utter poverty gave more than all the rich, because 'she made her gift out of her poverty—all that she had, her whole living' (Mk 12.44)—depends ultimately on the greater paradox that Christ, although rich, contrived to become utterly poor—not in appearance only, but in reality, not distributing his riches piece by piece like a rich man but disposing of them as a whole in the kenosis, so that he might then give what he had disposed of (or more precisely, the act of disposing itself) as 'the proceeds to the poor' (Mk 10.21 par.). This is something that only Christ could do, because in him his riches (to which he does not cling as to something robbed) and his act of giving away are one: the riches of selflessness in the triune divine nature, shown forth in the world in the kensois of the Incarnation. Because Jesus displayed the mystery of the divine rich poverty in man's poor poverty in the obedience unto the Cross, the riches of this poverty were set free and became accessible 'for you' in a double way: man enjoys an inner participation in the attitude of divine selflessness, and he is able, like Christ, to give an incarnated form to this attitude in giving away his own goods. Paul has shown the dependence of the second of these two on the first, by relating the well-nigh fabulous deed of the Macedonians, whose material achievement 'over and above their own strength' was determined by the measure of their spiritual attitude of self-giving, just as ultimately in Christ the χάρις (act of love, almsgiving) of his Cross received its own all-enriching value for us from the endless attitude of self-giving of the triune God. It is a divine 'overflowing' (περισσεύειν) that goes from riches into poverty, because God's riches can already be described just as well as 'poverty', and God could not be lord unless he had the freedom to be servant also. Paul bids the Corinthians either into his law of being—it is not a command, but a 'counsel' (8.8,10), since generous love cannot be commanded—but in such a way that he makes it clear how much they are in any case bound to obey this law through the fact that they are Christians and have received the riches of Christ: 'as you abound (περισσεύετε) in everything, in faith, in the Word (of God), in knowledge and in all zeal and in love' (8.7). Indeed, this overflowing of their disposition into action has already begun to show itself since the time in the previous year when the Corinthians declared themselves ready to help with the collection; Paul does no more than take them at their word, catching them in their own snare: 'Bring the deed now to completion, so that the readiness of the will may be matched by your completing it out of what you have', for indeed the willingness itself points to the presence of the necessary means (8.11–12).

The whole thing stands within a 'balance' or 'equality' (ἐξ ἰσότητος) that is to be brought about through exchange in the Church: 'now your superfluity will balance their lack, so that their superfluity may help out your lack' (8.14): Paul is thinking here of a balance between the material goods of Corinth and the spiritual goods of the mother community in Jerusalem. They have received from this community the Word of God and therefore faith: so it is right that they should send back there the fruit (καρπός, Rom 15.27; cf. Phil 4.17; 1 Cor 9.11ff.) of material support. This lack of distinction between what is spiritual and what is material as regards the fruitfulness and the establishment of 'equality' is typical of the Christian understanding of poverty and riches, especially when this is considered against the background of the Trinity and the Incarnation. It is possible (as 8.15 may indicate) that Paul thinks also of a material exchange between the communities. In any case, the decisive fruitfulness lies in the inner disposition of generous and joyful giving (εὐλογία, 9.6), which is the opposite of an anxious, miserly calculation (φειδομένως) that keeps its goods to itself. Such calculation does not reckon with God's generosity, 'for God has the power to let every (gift of) grace overflow on to you so that you may have enough in everything in all respects, in order to pour it out for every good work' (9.8). This, in deliberately exaggerated language, is the exhortation of the Sermon on the Mount not to take care for the morrow, but to put one's confidence in the Father in Heaven and seek first the kingdom of God (Mt 6.25–33). Indeed, the imagery used in the parables is taken up anew here: 'But the one who gives seed to the sower and bread for eating, will also make the sowing rich and multiply the 'harvest of your righteousness', enriching you in everything for every generous work which through us brings forth thanksgiving to God' (2 Cor 9.10). This Eucharist is the decisive event, after every situation of deprivation has been levelled up: the 'liturgical service' of almsgiving makes 'thanksgiving to God abound' (περισσεύουσα, 9.12) on the part of 'the many' who have received the alms. And thus the 'superabundant grace' (9.14), that went forth from God, enriched the hearts through the poverty of Christ and spread itself aboard among the communities, returns to God as the 'glorification' (9.13) of his 'glory' (8.19,24) and of his 'unutterable gift' (9.15). And if in this whole section δόξα taken on its own, speaks only of doxology and thus suggests little of the original characteristics of the kabod of Yahweh, nevertheless this glorification is given a New Testament actualisation and incarnation through the analogies of grace (χάρις) and through the path grace takes to make visible the Cross and then the Church with her living spiritual and material exchange of Christian love: and this actualisation and incarnation has a true glory that goes far beyond the visibility and materiality of the kabod in the Old Testament. The miracle of God's glory, which was the goal projected for all things at the beginning, is truly achieved in this restitution of grace, as the Church's love, through the brethren to God: the man who believes and loves has substantially become 'the glorification of the glory of the grace' of God (Eph 1.6).

2. THE BROTHER FOR WHOM CHRIST DIED

The force of the preceding chapter's argument was to suggest the necessity of incorporating the Church, and through her the world, more strongly into the christological and trinitarian disclosure of absolute being. God is the opposite of a strict lord who demands that what he has lent out should be given back to him intact and untouched. He is the sower who scatters what is his own over the field with a great gesture of careless lavishness, and watches to see what will come from the union of the divine vital power in the Word that is scattered abroad and the creaturely power in the world that receives it. The wedding of these two promises a fruit and harvest to which—humanly speaking—God looks forward eagerly. When God throws himself away (as seed and Word), he shows not only the principle of all fecundity and all generosity, but also the essence of his glory. The one who appropriates God's expropriation, by letting himself be expropriated, gives back to God the glory of his love; the one who bears much fruit gives glory to the principle of all fecundity; but one cannot speak here of a closed circuit, as if God must receive back with interest the glory he had given out. One cannot even speak of the attainment of a goal that had been planned in advance, for this is a very human way to speak about God; although Paul can use this expression (Eph 1, Rom 8.29f., etc.) to indicate the direction in which the divine love flows, it is made inadequate by the very flow itself. The final point of the outpouring of God's love is not at all the point furthest from the primordial source (as in Plotinus), so as to necessitate a 'turning round' and 'reverse movement' back to the centre; the final point is no 'end' at all, but is in itself endless and infinite. It is the dawning of the divine love in what is not God and what is opposed to God, the dawning of eternal life (as 'resurrection') in utter death: not the dawning of the divine 'I' in the non-divine 'Thou', but the dawning of the divine I-Thou-We in the worldly, creaturely I-Thou-We of human fellowship. In the preceding section, the incarnation of the divine χάρις (=grace) was described as χάρις (=deed of kindness) in human fellowship, a very realistic giving of a gift. In Christian terms, no further stage lies beyond this incarnation of love. The 'last things' are not and cannot be anything other than the open demonstration of this attainment (or non-attainment) of the endless end. The divine love which is bestowed vertically by God on sinful men is glorified 'horizontally' in the love of human fellowship understood and put into practice in a Christian way. 'In this is my Father glorified, that you bear much fruit' (Jn 15.8). If men are created 'for the glorification of the glory of his grace' (Eph 1.6), then the fruit that they bear has within itself the qualities of the divine glory; it does not need to be raised up at a subsequent stage into the divine light, in order to become radiant, for it is in itself the 'fruit of the light' (Eph 5.9). The disciples of the one who is the light of the world (Jn 8.12) have 'the light of life' (ibid.), and are themselves 'the light of the world' (Mt 5.14). If 'God is light' (1 Jn 1.5), then the one who 'walks in the light' is in God: and this is done by the one who passes on the divine light to his neighbour. 'If anyone says that he is in the light, but hates his brother, he is still walking in the darkness. The one who loves his brother remains in the light' (1 Jn 2.9f.). This 'horizontal' love is marked by the same realism (cf. Jas 2.1–17; 1 Jn 3.17) as the 'vertical' incarnation, for it is precisely from the self-expropriation of God and the self-surrender of Christ unto the Cross that the horizontal love receives its Christian stamp. With its seriousness and its inner blessedness, this love answers to an absolute law: it is the ultimate, eschatological love.

This permits and indeed compels us to speak seriously at this point in the discussion of the theme of 'glory' (which at first seemed to be a quality of God's being alone) about love of neighbour, even although few passages in the New Testament explicitly bring both concepts together. This is not fortuitous; it is certainly intentional precisely in the Johannine writings. For in the first place, the whole of the light that has broken into the world as love is always to be referred back to its first and only source. The Church is the 'moon', not herself the 'sun'.[1] She cannot sun herself in her own light; she must give the glory to her sun in all the love through which alone she proves that she is the Church of Christ. Where the Church is at her purest, she is at her most transparent, and does not attribute to herself the smallest radiance of her own (1 Cor 4.7; 2 Cor 3.5). This is confirmed by a second consideration. The brotherly love of Christians has not yet received its final judgment (κρίσις) by love itself; and therefore it cannot cut itself adrift from the faith that points it away from itself upwards, nor from the hope that points it away from itself forwards; it does not carry its own measure within itself, but above itself, even although it is true that the love of God has already 'been poured out in our hearts through the Holy Spirit that has been given us' (Rom 5.5). No one can identify himself with this Spirit that has been given to him, even when he pours him out in his turn. The love with which Christians give glory can never measure or calculate how much of God's glory is flowing through it. Were Christian love to seek what was its own (1 Cor 13.5)—even if that were only the measure of its glory—then it would not be permissible to discuss it under the head of 'glory'.

a. Encountering God in one's brother

1. It is difficult to locate exactly the boundary in the Synoptic preaching above love of neighbour between the preaching and example of Jesus on the one hand and the contributions of the post-Easter catechesis on the other: for it is precisely here that the preaching and example of Jesus so strongly incorporate in a proleptic manner 'what belongs to the end-times' (Lk 9.31); God's initial will, passing through the law and the prophets, aims at this in Jesus. Thus his whole proclamation can be only an implicit self-interpretation here: a word that is en route to its own fulfilment, a word that meets those who know the prior Old Testament stages on a path familiar to them, and carries them further along this path, on which the direction is guaranteed for the time being only by Jesus' own step along it and by his own certainty, until God has revealed him as the personal 'way' himself through his Resurrection from the dead.[2]

[1] Hugo Rahner, 'Das Mysterium des Mondes', in: Griechische Mythen in christlicher Deutung (1945), pp. 200–224; with greater detail in: 'Mysterium Lunae', ZKT 63 (1939), pp. 311–349, 428–442; 64 (1940), pp. 61–80, 121–131.

The chief commandment already existed: to love God with all one's heart. It is emphasised by Jesus, but he presupposes that it is already known. Likewise, there was a limited commandment of love of neighbour. The limit (apart from the fact of taking oneself as its measure) came from love for the God who had chosen Israel: God is 'obliged' and summoned to punish Israel's enemies; he hates the evil-doers, and the Israelite has the right and the duty to join God in this hatred.[3] The harsh formulation of the Sermon on the Mount: 'You have heard that it was said, "You shall love your neighbour and hate your enemy"' (Mt 5.43), does not in fact appear literally in Scripture, but it need not be a polemical exaggeration by the evangelist, for the negative formula is found at Qumran.[4] Such a limitation of love corresponds to the perspective of a covenant conceived in a particularistic fashion which made its original dynamic meaning (Gen 12.3; Jer 4.2) hard to keep in view at the same time. Jesus proclaims the lordship of God, the dominance of God's will and act and disposition not only in Heaven but also on earth, God's victorious superiority to all that men contrive in the depths of their hearts. And the starting point had always been God's goodness, disclosed in his unfathomable act of election: all the apparent limitations in Old Testament ethics derived from human deductions from the incomprehensible election of one and not of another. But the law and the prophets are a 'word en route' to the perfected word; as such, they are taken up by Jesus, who extracts their positive kernel and thereby exposes their limitation (in the 'antitheses', Mt 5.21ff.), making them transparent to the original total will of God. The direct path from the proton to the eschaton is laid down. On the journey to this point, it was known that God has mercy on the poor man and that it is God's justice that gives him the shelter of divine right; but the poor had fashioned for themselves out of their poverty a claim on God to receive their right, and thus they had secretly become rich. With the first word of the Sermon on the Mount, this riches is rejected: 'Blessed are the poor in spirit'. It is these alone who are open for what is now coming, what was intended and aimed at from the outset: the superiority of God's love, which lays low the boundaries.

---

[2] On the concept of love in the New Testament, cf. the great bibliography by C. Spicq, in: Agape dans le NT, I (1958), pp. 317–334, as well as Spicq's three-volume work with the same name (Vols. II and III, 1959); also Agape, Prolégomènes à une Etude de théologie néotestamentaire (1955). Out of the immense secondary literature, let us mention: W. Lütgert, Die Liebe im NT (1905); J. Moffat, Love in the NT (1929); V. Warnach, Agape. Die Liebe als Grundmotiv der ntl. Theologie (1951); R. Völkl, Die Selbstliebe in der Hl. Schrift und bei Thomas von Aquin (1956).

[3] Ps 139.21f.; cf. Ps 104.35; Num 25.11–13; 1 Mac 2.24–26; Tob 4.17; Sir 12.6.

[4] 1QS 1.3–4.

Protologically, as creator, God is 'your heavenly Father, who makes the sun rise on good and bad alike, and sends rain on the righteous and on sinners' (Mt 5.45). He is 'merciful' and 'kind' as the creator—not only as the God of the covenant—and this holds true for those who are 'ungrateful and wicked' (Lk 6.35–36). This exalted state is kingly; to imitate it, it is necessary to be exalted above the covenant relationship between two unequal partners—a perfection is required that corresponds to that of your heavenly Father (Mt 5.48), i.e. entry into the relationship of sonship (v. 45) and thereby into the 'kingly law' (Jas 2.8), the 'perfect law of freedom' (Jas 1.25), because the one who loves steps out, beyond the limiting differences, into the free, kingly, exalted state of God. God is present to all with equal immediacy, even if one is righteous and the other unrighteous. This means that the concept of righteousness in the relationship to God is fundamentally superseded—even when Jesus[5] and Paul[6] still use this word—in a sense that has become dialectical. The decisive point now is the transparency of the expropriated heart to the origin: 'simplicity' (Mt 6.22 par.), the new location of the heart with God (6.21), relinquishing of cares to God (6.25–34), letting oneself be expropriated, not hitting back, not refusing a request (5.39f.). It is here that the 'mild' (Mt 11.30) and 'not difficult' (1 Jn 5.3) quality of Jesus' teaching lies; one could find a starting-point for the discussion with Asian religion in this openness to the origin (πραΰτης), but in Christian terms, the meaning of the origin is fully disclosed only when the Word of God goes towards its end. The loving impartiality of God the Father, which had to present itself first in the old covenant as a kingly freedom of election, goes to its end in Jesus' partiality for the sinners, tax collectors and harlots, the lost and the rejected. In the kingly freedom of his love, he is the synthesis that makes a choice from the elements of the law and the prophets that were en route towards him: he leaves behind him what he wishes, and refers what he wishes back to the origin. The works of love of neighbour must certainly remain (Mt 7.21), but within the framework of the disposition of the Father and the Son: deriving from the heavenly simplicity of the Son's transparency to the Father, which leads to the simplicity of his Cross in which it is made concrete—for it is there that Jesus does not resist the one who is evil, it is there that he lets

---

[5] In the sense of the Old Testament or apocalyptic yearning for the righteousness of God which comes into its own eschatologically: Mt 5.6, 10; 6.33; but also in the warning at Mt 5.20 against remaining at the level of Old Testament righteousness (cf. 6.1), where Jesus speaks of the περισσεύειν of the new righteousness over 'your' old righteousness, as the condition for entry into God's kingdom.

---

[6] The Pauline 'righteousness of God' remains terminologically bound to the Old Testament, where it seeks to express the negation of self-righteousness and righteousness of works on the part of man vis-à-vis God. The expression crosses the boundary into the New Testament to the extent that it is God alone who brings about his righteousness, i.e. his love and glory, through the eschatological word that is Jesus' death and Resurrection, in the world and in man. But since the term remains tied to the intellectual world of the Old Testament (while simultaneously cancelling this), it contains an element of conditioning by time, and constantly demands a fresh translation. Ultimately, what P. Stuhlmacher (Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus (1960), p. 190) has observed with regard to G. Strecker's interpretation of the righteousness of God in Matthew (Der Weg der Gerechtigkeit, 1962) holds true for Paul also: 'The properly theological problem . . . consists . . . in the impossibility of developing a sola gratia with the help of a concept of righteousness, in a way that avoids misunderstanding'.

himself be struck on the right cheek, gives even his cloak, goes two miles, and loves his enemies (Mt 5.39ff.). And certainly self-love will remain too, but only 'on the margin' and unaccented,[7] or else as the challenge to cross boundaries that have been set unconsciously and arbitrarily.[8] The limits that belong to pure and to impure creatureliness (which can no longer be neatly separated from each other in concreto) are nonchalantly abolished in the divine crossing over to the enemies, and in this an unconditional imitation is demanded. And certainly the human (and Old Testament) expectation of the 'reward' for so superhuman a deed is not simply done away with as something superseded, but the way in which the reward grows with the deed beyond measurement and seems to take on the dimension of infinity (Lk 6.38a), and indeed becomes proportionate to the boundlessness of the deed of love (6.37, 38b), and the limited merits attached to limited love are brushed aside as irrelevant for the Christian (6.32–34), arouses the suspicion that the true reward of endless love can be only such love itself: not my love, but God's love, on the basis of which I dare to cross over the boundary in its company. The unwavering spontaneity with which Jesus goes forward remains the decisive thing in his life; the internal and external boundaries that had been set for love (sabbath ordinances, laws of purification) are very deliberately broken, the solidarity with sinners is provocatively stressed (Mt 9.11; 11.19; 21.31f.), and Jesus goes towards his death without averting his gaze, in order to live out his motto, to serve rather than to be served, to the end and 'to give his life as a ransom for all' (Mk 10.45; Mt 20.28). He wills to bring home the very last of the lost sheep of the Father. Whatever may become of his disciples on this way 'to the end' (Jn 13.1), and however the Church may later describe their role, their understanding or lack of comprehension, their following or abandoning of Jesus, it is certain that he has succeeded in pouring out his blood of the new covenant for all (Mk 14.24).

---

[7] R. Völkl, op. cit., p. 163.

[8] R. Schnackenburg, Die sittliche Botschaft des NT (2nd edn., 1962), p. 76.

This changes everything, for from now on, one's fellow-man—whether friend or foe—is 'the brother for whom Christ died' (1 Cor 8.11; Rom 14.15), and whoever sins against his brother sins against Christ (1 Cor 8.12). Now the early Christian catechesis can and must complete the equation in explicit terms (putting the words into the mouth of the 'king'): 'Whatever you have done (or not done) to one of the least of my brothers, you have (or have not) done it to me' (Mt 25.40, 45). The protological, apparently impartial love of God has arrived, by way of the Old Testament predilection of the 'chosen', 'beloved' Israel, to its eschatological end: each individual who can be addressed humanly as 'Thou' is raised to the status of a 'Thou' for God, because God's true 'Thou', his 'chosen' and 'beloved' 'only Son' has borne the guilt of this human 'Thou' and has died for him, and therefore can identify himself with every individual at the last judgment. This is impossible within the framework of paganism, because no mythical god or philosophical divine world-substance possesses the kingly freedom of Yahweh to choose a people and also show by means of it that he is God; nor is it possible within the framework of the Old Testament, because Israel remains a collective, and it is only as a member of the people that the individual perseveres in the true disposition vis-à-vis God.[9] This can only be Christian, because it presupposes both the 'I-Thou' of the Father and the Son within the Godhead in the unity of the Spirit, and the eschatological extension of this to every human 'Thou'. Israel is the indispensable transition to this eschaton, but in a remarkable manner the original amazement at the reality of the 'I-Thou' is generated and kindled when God first says 'Thou' to a human person, Abraham.

---

[9] It is therefore necessary to use the utmost care, if one wishes to project on to the New Testament the category of the mythical and Old Testament collective 'I'—and from a theological point of view, it would be essential to distinguish the mythical and the Old Testament usages. It is not possible even to set one's sights properly on the Church of Christ with this category, let alone to describe it. Use of this category can only lead astray, because it offers no possibility whatever of seeing what is decisively new, the endless personality of the individuals who make up the 'body of Christ'. The 'bibliographical study' by Caroll Stuhlmueller ('The natural law question the Bible never asked', Cross Currents 19 (1968/69), pp. 55–67) shows where the absolutisation of the category of the collective 'I' leads: viz, to the dissolution of the entire biblical theology into natural religion.

Here we must at least observe in passing that the passage of Christian thought through Western metaphysics, with its various attempts to express the glory of God in great intellectual structures,[10] remains so strongly marked by Greek thought that little room is left either for the 'Thou' of God or for the 'Thou' of one's fellow-man. Even where Christian sensibility and prayer are found (as in Augustine), the foundation that bears the structure remains a philosophy of the spirit and not of the person; the philosophy of the spirit closes up the final loopholes in Hegel, where all that is objective is dissolved into a construction of thought, thereby absolutely excluding the possibility of an eternally free 'Thou' (hence Hegel's antisemitism). It is only amid the ruins of idealism and of its late offshoot, the philosophy of life and understanding, that man discovers anew that he is alone in his perplexity and alienation, that Feuerbach and Marx ask how man can find himself again,[11] and that Rosenzweig, Ebner and Buber[12] ask more urgently what is the nature of the impassable barrier that lies for the 'I' in the fact that the [10] Vols. II, IV and V of this work.

---

[11] On the fateful consequences of the entanglement of idealism and Christianity, cf. K. Löwith, Von Hegel bis Nietzsche (1941). Löwith's analyses show how strongly those who deny the world of Goethe and Hegel remain still prisoners of the thought-forms against which they are mounting the campaign. See also H. de Lubac, Le drame de l'humanisme athée (1944 ET The Drama of Atheistic Humanism, 1949) idem, Proudhon et le Christianisme (1945).

[12] B. Casper, Das dialogische Denken. Eine Untersuchung der religionsphilosophischen Bedeutung Franz Rosenzweigs, Ferdinand Ebners und Martin Bubers (1967, with bibliography). Casper is right to emphasise Rosenzweig's writings (Der Stern der Erlösung, 1921; Kleinere Schriften, 1937). The first to develop this was K. Löwith, Das Individuum in der Rolle des Mitmenschen (1928). Without influence from these writers, Dietrich Bonhoeffer's Sanctorum Communio, Dogmatische Untersuchung zur Soziologie der Kirche (written when he was twenty-one years old, 1930, 2nd edn. 1954) signalled a new break-through that left behind idealism and the philosophy of life to arrive at a (Protestant Biblical) dialogical thought. Cf. Dietrich von Hildebrand, Metaphysik der Gemeinschaft (1955), and, developing the ideas, Heribert Mühlen, Der Heilige Geist als Person, Ich-Du-Wir (2nd edn. 1966).

'Thou' is 'Thou'. If one does not wish to fall back into idealism (or into collective sociologism), to sink into materialism and hedonism, or to break oneself on the barrier of the 'Thou' (the 'Thou' as Hell: Sartre), then the only path open is the Christian path, which can attribute endless value to the human 'Thou' because God has attributed and truly granted this value to him in the act of election and in the death on the Cross. And this is possible only if the 'I-Thou-We' relationship has itself absolute, divine value: in the triune being of love.

It is not possible to divorce the Christian love of neighbour from this theological presupposition, but one sees what Christianity is only by participating in the divine movement from the 'vertical' to the 'horizontal'. This is shown once again in the synthesis that Jesus effects—as the profoundest self-expression of his existence and his mission—between the chief commandment of the love of God and the commandment of the love of neighbour which is 'equal to it' (Mt 22.39). Although both of its presuppositions already existed, this synthesis is absolutely creative; it is identical with the unique christological synthesis itself, as this is given expression by Chalcedon. This uniqueness prevents the dissolution of the vertical dimension into the horizontal through the dissolution of the love of God into the love of neighbour, which would be the formation of a 'Christian atheism'. Christ is the Word of God which is always throughout its mission in relationship with the Father through prayer, refusing to let the act of adoration in spirit and in truth—the cultic act directed directly to God with the whole of his existence—be dissolved into the equally demanding act of doing the whole will of the Father in the whole of the mission. But this will uniformly and unambiguously consists in bearing the guilt of all his brothers: in this, the whole of the Law is fulfilled and more than fulfilled. No longer does God content himself with intervening from Heaven on the side of the poor man (who in truth is the sinner): now he crosses over to him as a man. And he does not do this in an act of condescension, by distributing alms among the poor: the crossing-over takes place down below, on the level of the poor themselves, when he takes upon himself the burden of all their poverty. This brings about the condensation of the Law, and illustrates what is meant by mišpat, ḥesed, and walking humbly with God (Mic 6.8; Amos 5.24); cf. Mt 23.23); but it also reveals the universal validity of the Law, since the brother for whom Jesus dies is not only the fellow-member of his race (or at most the foreigner who has made his home with this people), but absolutely every individual: 'He was to die, not only for the people, but also to gather into one the children of God who were scattered abroad' (Jn 11.52), and ultimately to 'draw all to himself' (Jn 12.32). God's intention in the suffering of the Servant of Yahweh was already universal (Is 52.15; 53.11,12a,12b),[13] as was Jesus' intention when he distributed his flesh and blood;[14] the universal 'all' resounds in all the strata of the New Testament (Rom 5.12–21; 11.32; Phil 2.11; 1 Cor 10.33; 1 Tim 2.4f.; 4.10; Tit 2.11; 2 Pet 3.9). To reimpose a legalistic and particularistic limitation on this crossing-over from the Law which segregated Israel to 'the poor man, whoever, he may be'—the thought that lies behind all Jewish, predestinationist, and Jansenist theologies—would be to deny that the Incarnation and the Cross are the final word that the creator of all things addresses to his world.

This is forcibly demonstrated in the hymnic passage about cosmic peace which is interpreted in the Letter to the Ephesians as speaking of the Cross of Christ: Eph 2.14–18, which H. Schlier has convincingly analysed. Christ's crossing-over 'the fence of separation', in order 'to make one out of the two' (v. 14), in order to 'make peace and change the two into one new man in himself (i.e., in Christ' (v. 15), in order 'to reconcile the two in one body to God' (v. 16) and give 'both access in one Spirit to the Father' (v. 18), takes place as it were horizontally as the abolition of the Law which divided the Jews from the Gentiles, and vertically (in keeping with apocalyptic and gnostic concepts) as the demolition of the dividing wall between the divine sphere and the cosmic sphere; this wall is set up through the quarrelling of the angels, who are the cosmic world-principles, but also through the old law, the Torah, which was instituted through the mediation of angels (Gal 3.19).[15] In this concept, the vertical and the horizontal walls of division are one and the same. For Paul, as always, it is decisively in the 'flesh' of Christ (v. 14), in his 'Cross' (v. 16) and his 'blood' (v. 13), that there lies the 'creative force' (κτίσῃ, 2.15) that relegates the dualism to the past and makes the unity present and future, the 'peace' (vv. 14, 15) that abolishes the 'enmity' (vv. 14.16), and the bodily (σῶμα, v. 16) unity. No matter how much gnostic cosmological speculation there may be in the conceptual material that Paul adapts here—and it is precisely the cosmological horizon here that must leave open the question of conceptual resources outside Judaism—this is relevant only, and precisely, to the extent to which it enters the synthesis of Jesus Christ: those who are 'far off' (vv. 13,17), 'without God in the cosmos' (v. 12), cannot be brought together with those who are already (through the promise) near, the Jews, in any other way than by the common 'reconciliation to God' of divided humanity 'through the Cross' (v. 16); it is the crucified one who 'puts the enmity to death in himself' by taking it upon himself, carrying it through to the end and suffering it to its ultimate consequence: indeed, he identifies himself with it (2 Cor 5.21). The body in which this takes place is the 'bleeding' 'flesh' of the One who already contains in himself also the bodily unity of the body of mankind: this unity is 'preached' by him (and by those whom he appoints) as 'peace' (Eph 2.17), and is thus certainly the new and vicarious 'access' between man and man, and therein the 'one Spirit' (v. 18) of love of neighbour—but for Paul, this takes place in the common access 'to God' and in the common Spirit 'to the Father'. The horizontality of the open and universal love of neighbour (not limited in any way, e.g. to members of the Church alone) derives from the verticality of its institution (on the Cross) and comes into being in the common eschatological orientation in the same Spirit to the God and Father who has established all love and unity in the institution of the Son and of the Cross. In these verses, the Church for the moment makes no thematic appearance; she is apprehended only as the dynamic unifying of all things, which becomes concrete in every place where enmity is destroyed and the new man is built up creatively, where what was far off becomes near, where the incorporation into peace takes place, and where the dividing wall of legalism's segregation is demolished through Christian love—in the 'flesh', the 'Cross' and the 'blood'—through the act of crossing over to the distant brother.

---

[13] Cf. Joachim Jeremias, TDNT VI 537f.

[14] Joachim Jeremias, Die Abendmahlsworte Jesu (4th edn. 1967), pp. 218ff. (ET The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, 1955, pp. 204ff.).

---

[15] Detailed evidence in H. Schlier, Epheser, pp. 122–136.

These verses from Ephesians have been quoted here only to make the fundamental Christian phenomenon clear: when Jesus crosses over to sinners on the Cross, the unity between the love of God and the love of neighbour is established: it is instituted by God himself, who surrenders his 'Beloved' for the world, and this is an institution that remains unthinkable and ineffective in the merely horizontal sphere (e.g. in the concept of 'vicarious representation' by one's fellow-man). This institution of God bestows in Christ on every 'neighbour'—even on the one who is 'furthest away'—the importance of one who is individually loved by God and is brought near to God. This is logically prior to everything that will be called the organised and missionary Church. For no matter what 'far off' people, 'lacking knowledge' and 'without God', Christians will meet in the course of their proclamation, they are always people to whom God has already addressed in Christ the unique 'Thou', and whom he has fundamentally acknowledged as the brethren of his beloved Son. They are always already people who have had a decisive effect on a man's attitude towards God through the very fact of his conduct towards them: 'Whatever you have done to one of the least of my brothers, you have done it to me' (Mt 25.40).

2. In this there lies the ultimate conclusion of the Synoptic and early Christian synthesis of love of God and love of neighbour, and it is Paul who comprehensively draws out the consequences for the Church. The Church is the place where the process of conforming humanity to the person and event of Christ is begun, the place where men dedicate themselves, in a faith that listens and obeys, to this event that is a person, are formed by him (sacramentally) and seek through their existence to make him effective in the world. The sphere of the Church is the model in which the creative crossing-over of the crucified love is recognised and taken over by human persons in the individual 'appropriate', 'analogous' 'measure' (Rom 12.3, 6ff.).

The first point that strikes us here (although it was to be expected, after what has been said) is the invariably 'vertical' grounding of the 'horizontal' Christian and ecclesial love of neighbour. The themes may take on individual nuances[16]—what God has done in Christ;[17] the conduct of Christ as the ontological basis and ethical model;[18] the requirements of the Church's christologically-structured fellowship;[19] the unity of the Spirit that has been bestowed on Christians;[20] the new life that has been given us in Christ and in the Spirit;[21] the Lord who will soon return[22] and judge us in accordance with his law of love—but all of these together form a single fundamental theme: 'Forgive one another, as God has forgiven you in Christ' (Eph 4.32). And this is based, not only on the origin of the divine love, but also on its ultimate goal, which becomes visible in the 'Thou': 'Let each one think more highly of the other than of himself' (Phil 2.3); and this is possible only when one sees in the 'Thou' the fact that God thinks highly of him. But between the beginning and the end lies the action of Christ's self-giving, with its rhythm that the Christian must make his own.[23] If he lets himself be carried along by this rhythm, then he need not reflect consciously on 'the glorification of God' or on his 'love for God' in the process of his expropriation in favour of the 'Thou', for he is thereby already giving glory to God and loving him.[24] This is the closest connection that can be reached between 'religion' and 'morality' without the one being dissolved into the other; such a full dissolution (in either direction) would prevent christology and the doctrine of the Trinity from being the basis and presupposition of the distinction (semper maior) between Creator and creature.[25] A maxim such as: 'None of us lives to (or: for) himself, and none of us dies to (or: for) himself; if we live, we live to the Lord, and if we die, we die to the Lord' (Rom 14.7f.), gives a glimpse of the basis of human existence in creation, but takes on its full significance in God's self-expropriation in the death of Christ: this act of self-expropriation simultaneously expropriates us of all personal decision in advance, because we are orientated to the absolute triune love.

---

[16] On what follows, cf. L. Nieder, 'Die Motive der religiös-sittlichen Paränese in den paulinischen Gemeindebriefen', Münch.theol.Stud. I, 12 (1956).

[17] Imitation of God in his pardoning in Christ: Eph 4.32; 5.1; God's will to save us: 1 Thess 5.9; 2 Thess 2.13f.; God's presence in our working: Phil 2.13; and (the same thing as this) our holiness as the outcome of his sanctifying presence in us: 1 Cor 6.11; Col 3.12.

[18] Eph 5.2; Col 3.13; Gal 5.24; Christ's act for us: 1 Thess 5.9 and frequently.

[19] Rom 12.4f.; 1 Cor 1.10ff.; 6.1–4; Gal 6.1–10; Eph 4.3–7; 4.25; 5.21; Phil 1.27–30; 2.1–8; Col 3.9f.

[20] 1 Thess 4.8 (cf. Ezek 36.27; 37.14); Gal 5.25; 1 Cor 6.19.

[21] Gal 5.25; Col 3.1–4.

[22] Phil 4.5; 1 Thess 4.6; 1 Cor 7.34 (cf. v. 29).

This 'place' for which the redeemed are chosen, and into which they are also brought in the obedience of faith, is Jesus Christ himself; in him they are 'one person' (Gal 3.28), and the unity of the Church is nothing other than the acknowledgment and putting into practice of this unity which is given in advance in Christ. The unity of the 'body' is derived from the unity of the Head which forms the limbs out of itself and brings them back to itself (Eph 4.10–16); the 'Spirit' too, who is the soul of the body, is given to it in advance as the Spirit of the Head, and points beyond the present unity to an eschatological unity that is seen only 'in hope' (Eph 4.4). The Church—as a unity that is present, that has been instituted beforehand, and that reaches out to the future—is not a unity that she herself possesses and controls: she exists only by looking upwards to a unity that is superior to herself. When Christians are told to be zealous in 'preserving the unity of the Spirit through the bond of peace' i.e., in concrete terms, 'to live in a manner worthy (ἀξίως) of their calling, in all humility and meekness, in forbearance, putting up with one another in love' (Eph 4.1–2), or 'having the same mind, in the same love, being in full accord and thinking the same thoughts' (Phil 2.2), or 'to clothe themselves in heartfelt mercy, goodness, humility, meekness and patience', and 'to bear with one another and forgive, if anyone has something against another' (Col 3.12), then this is not written against a background of merely interpersonal relationships and motivations for conduct, but against the background of a unity that lies above the persons, overlapping and embracing them all. This unity 'bears with' them all together and 'puts up with' them, to make it possible for them to enter the sphere of such a sentiment of unity. They administer and realise a love that is certainly their own, but which in every case has been destined for them in advance and has been given to them as a gift.

---

[23] Rom 15.5, 7; Phil 2.13f.; Eph 4.32–5.2; Col 3.5ff.

[24] On the lack of a motivation through 'love for God' and 'glorification of God' (found only at 1 Cor 10.31; at Rom 15.7, Paul is speaking of what Christ has done), cf. L. Nieder, op. cit., pp. 115f.

[25] R. Schnackenburg, 'Die Bedeutung des Hauptgebotes für Religion und Sittlichkeit', in: Die sittliche Botschaft des NT, op. cit., pp. 78–81 (ET The Moral Teaching of the New Testament, 1965, pp. 105–109). On the one hand, there can no longer exist 'an isolated cultic piety', and on the other side 'it is only the love for God that guarantees that selflessness which is lacking in almost all human love' and makes possible 'that overcoming of self, out of which proceed the quietest and strongest deeds of love'. The same is shown to hold good of John: ibid., p. 252.

This love that they are permitted to put into practice shows itself to be christologically formed above all when it bears the other precisely as other. This is necessary in the first place when a brother lets himself 'be so carried away as to commit an offence': 'As bearers of the Spirit, deal with such a person in mildness, and look to yourself lest you too be led astray. Bear one another's burdens, and thus you will fulfil the law of Christ' (Gal 6.1f.). There is, therefore, a sharing in Christ's carrying of the burden, but with the caution that is doubly necessary because everything would be destroyed if one were to confuse Christ's act of carrying with one's own; for, unlike Christ, 'each one will have to carry his own burden' (6.5). It is not only the sinfulness common to all that makes it difficult to bear with the other; another factor is the diversity of the gifts of grace that have been bestowed on the members of the Church. These gifts complement one another, but they can contradict one another (1 Cor 12; Rom 12; Eph 4). The administration of these wholly positive and wholly personal gifts may be carried out only in the Spirit of the one faith of the Church which is common to all (in the analogia fidei: Rom 12.6), in consideration of the unity which is superior to the Church seen as a social body.[26] The Church is to grow into this unity through the exercise of the charisms in love and through an ever deeper endowment with the Spirit of insight and prudence (Eph 1.8; 3.4; Col 1.9, etc.), but the insight that is attainable into 'the breadth and length, height and depth of the love of Christ' is given only 'together with all the saints' (Eph 3.18) when one goes out beyond one's own individual stand-point—even if this happens to be a charismatically-determined stand-point.

Against the absolutisation of gnostic-philosophical knowledge, the New Testament proposes as the highest value a knowledge that is nothing other than love itself. If one follows the shorter text at 1 Cor 8.2f.,[27] 'The one who thinks that he has knowledge, does not yet know how one ought to know; but the one who loves has the true knowledge', then knowledge is transposed out of itself into love. The text is speaking of love within the Church, and more specifically of the relationship between the 'strong' and the 'weak' as this affects the boundaries of Christian freedom. Paul begins by locating himself together with the community in the position of the 'strong': 'We know that we all possess knowledge', but he at once continues: 'Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up'. The abrupt transition crosses over from the position of the Church as a whole to the individual position. This however posits love as the boundary for knowledge (even if this should be a charism of knowledge); this knowledge is not only relativised, but exposed as dangerous, unless it goes beyond every individual insight and lets itself be integrated into the Church's love. In the longer text, this integration becomes nothing short of repentance and self-abandonment: 'The one who thinks that he has knowledge, does not yet know how one ought to know; but the one who loves God is known by him'. This reversal is genuinely Pauline (1 Cor 13.12; 2 Cor 5.11; Gal 4.9; Phil 3.12); it is not based on hellenistic pantheism, but on the priority in the Old Testament of being known and chosen by the living God.[28] Both forms of the text understand love as the authority that governs every individual insight. Even the truth of the gospel can and may be uttered and thought of only within the sphere of love.[29] If knowledge is understood in a particularistic way, and employed accordingly in praxis, it can become lethal: it 'destroys the one who is weak' (ἀπόλλυται γὰρ ὁ ἀσθενῶν), and this weak person is the 'brother for whom Christ died' (1 Cor 8.11). Here the question arises of the relationship between conscience and the Church. Paul had begun by putting himself with the whole community on the side of those who have knowledge, to whom 'everything is permitted' (1 Cor 6.12), and who 'know' that one may eat flesh sacrificed to the idols, because the 'idols are nothing'. While it is true, however, that one gains nothing in God's eyes from eating and loses nothing through refraining from eating (8.8), very much indeed is lost if a brother who lacks gnosis sees others eating in the temple and is led astray—Paul says, in irony, 'edified'—to join them in eating, against what his own conscience says. If then the weak person, for whom Christ died, is destroyed through the knowledge of the strong, these latter have 'sinned against Christ' (8.12). The brother is not merely one member of a society among other members; for it was for him—precisely for him—that Jesus undertook the whole mission of Cross and Hell, representing him vicariously before God; he is our brother, not simply on a horizontal plane, but because of his vertical connection with the Head. This is why the 'strong' person has a direct encounter with the Head in the 'weak' person (and in the Head, he meets the whole body): 'Whatever you have done to one of the least of these brothers of mine . . .' When the unity of the faith and the edification of the ecclesial body of Christ are at stake, neither the charismatic maturity of the conscience of the strong persons, nor the objectively correct insight and the greater vision of the truth which justifies this maturity, can be ultimately decisive for one's conduct.

---

[26] On this, cf. my 'Christologie und Gehorsam', in: Geist und Leben (1969).

[27] C. Spicq, Agape, I, pp. 222f., decides in favour of this reading.

---

[28] Lietzmann and Kümmel, Korintherbriefe (4th edn. 1949), ad loc.

[29] Eph 4.15, ἀληθεύειν ἐν ἀγάπῃ. According to H. Schlier (ad loc.), this refers to 'speaking the truth of the gospel', and this 'speaking' is not only 'joined to love, but is indeed transposed into love' (op. cit., p. 205). Otherwise it would not 'build up' the body of Christ (4.16), because, according to the above text, it is only love that builds up. And this building-up is the highest guideline: 1 Cor 14.26; cf. 14.5,12.

The same teaching, carried to its final consequences, is found again at Rom 14.1–15.3, the conclusion and in a certain sense the highpoint of the Christian and ecclesial instruction of Paul's greatest Letter. Once again, we have a group of the 'strong' (in which Paul again fundamentally includes himself: 15.1), and a group of the 'weak' who eat only vegetables and presumably (since the conclusion goes on to speak of the contrast between Jewish and Gentile Christians) consist of Judaeo-Christian ascetics.[30] The situation is more dramatic than at Corinth, because the ascetical group is characterised to a degree by constraints that come from pre-Christian Judaism, though not so strongly as with the group at Colossae, where Paul will have to intervene much more energetically. The situation in Rome points in the same direction, as is seen in the (astrological?) preference for certain days (14.5f.). In order to demonstrate that the misgivings of the 'weak' have no objective foundation, Paul refers back explicitly to the authority of Jesus: nothing is in itself impure (Mk 7.15; Mt 15.11): Rom 14.14. And yet this is not the final word about the relationship between New Testament freedom and Old Testament constraint. The three stages of the argument (14.1–12; 14.13–23; 15.1–13) rise in intensity towards the christological argument of the third section, which itself can be broken down into two sub-sections (15.1–6; 15.7–13): first, Christ's freedom meant, not that he judged 'arbitrarily' (or: 'to please himself'), but that he, as the Servant of God, let 'the reproaches of those who reproached you (God)' (Ps 69.10) fall on himself; second, in this way Christ 'welcomed' (προσλαμβάνειν, 15.7) both Jews and Gentiles 'for the glorification of God', by becoming a 'servant of circumcision' in order to demonstrate God's truthfulness in his promises (15.8). He himself was circumcised, although he was 'strong' and 'the one who brings to fulfilment', and did not need this; and he did not simply disregard the other Jewish feasts and customs. Paul has put himself as a 'strong' person on the side of Jesus at 14.14 and—partly in opposition to the abstract Paulinism that would press with too rigorous consistency the theme that the law is superseded—he must remain with Jesus (1 Cor 9.20) when he identifies himself with the weak, not out of weakness, but out of obedience to the promises of the Father (Rom 15.8). The 'ancient scriptures' are explicitly included here: they are both a burden (since they require 'patience' with those who are weak) and 'consolation' and 'hope', since they always train one to make the transition into the unity of the 'kingdom of God'. The unity of the Church, which consists of righteousness (sedek), peace (shalōm) and joy in the Holy Spirit, already permits one to see this kingdom as eschatologically present (14.17).

---

[30] On the question whether this group of ascetics is Gentile Christian or Jewish Christian—for there were similar trends among the Gentiles from much earlier periods (Orphism and Pythagoraeism), just as in later Judaism (Essenes and Philo's Therapeutae)—cf. the excursus in Lagrange, Epître aux Romains (6th edn. 1950), pp. 335–340.

The tension within the Church could not be more extreme, yet it must at all costs be endured and transcended—in the love of the 'harmony in accordance with the measure of Christ Jesus' (15.5). The tension arises because the 'strong' person is objectively right in his judgment, but is not authorised to extend this judgment to the position of his brother; both have an immediate relationship to the Christ who died for both of them; even the weak person 'stands and falls for his own master; but he will remain standing, for the Lord has the power to keep him upright' (14.4). Both sit at the same table (14.6,15)—for this is the matter at issue!—and neither may offend the other; the contradictory convictions of both are based on the criterion of faith in Christ and must be based on this, to avoid being sinful (14.23). The correct conviction of the strong has its limit in the (horizontal) fellowship of table and Church, which demands social consideration of the others (14.20f.; 15.2,5), but this horizontal regulation has a double vertical reference to the transcendental unity of Christ: first, each one of the 'brothers' (14.10) belongs to the Lord who died and rose for him, so that no one lives and dies for himself (14.7–9); since each one will have to give an account of himself before the judgment seat of God (14.10–12), he has absolutely no right to judge (κρίνειν) his brother (14.13). The second vertical reference comes from the fact that, as one redeemed, he has been borne as a burden and endured by the Lord, and therefore receives from the Lord the commission to 'bear the infirmities of the weak' like a cross (βαστάζειν, 15.1), making the same gesture of welcome as the Lord (προσλαμβάνειν, 14.1, 3; 15.7). 'The act of welcome should take place without discussions and investigations of the thoughts of the "weak" . . . Paul wishes to achieve the welcome of the "weak" without an official condemnation of their point of view and an absolutisation of the point of view of the "strong" in the community, because this absolutisation would endanger the agape.'[31] It seems that what is demanded here is impossible: it is only love that makes it possible for one who knows that he judges correctly—more correctly than the other who is weaker—not to stop at this judgment, but to open up his own judgment to God's judgment: 'Blessed is the one who does not judge himself in what he takes (with good reason) to be right' (14.22), the one who 'does not please himself' in what is 'obvious' to him with his superior knowledge (15.1,2,3).[32] Christian faith is in no sense primarily a self-understanding of Christians, or even of the Church as a fellowship; it is rather obedience, acknowledgment that one is expropriated by being made over to Christ who has expropriated himself for all in his dying and rising. Thanks to this obedience, which roots the being of the Christian outside of himself, in Christ, love—which descends vertically and spreads itself horizontally—is made superior to all knowledge, even the most absolute. The brother for whom Christ died is the boundary of this knowledge.[33]

---

[31] O. Michel, Der Brief an die Römer (4th edn. 1966), p. 336.

[32] Ibid., p. 354, n. 4: 'The verb (ἀρέσκειν) therefore describes not only one individual act in the life, but also a certain fundamental orientation of thinking and acting in the Spirit. What is at stake here is truly a "self-understanding" that is mistaken'.

Paul demands more of the strong person than of the weak; and since he counts himself among the strong, he must bring the proof that he is able to achieve the sheerly impossible transcendence of self, the transition of gnosis to agape. This proof is brought in Acts 21, in a scene carefully prepared by Luke through a long, dramatic build-up (19.21–21.16). Here Paul demonstrates a 'bearing' of the 'weak' by the 'strong' that conforms him definitively to his Lord, since he too is handed over by the Christians to the Jews, and by the Jews to the Gentiles. When he comes to Jerusalem with the gifts of the Gentile communities, he is submitted by James to the yoke of the Jewish customs which were still observed by the Judaeo-Christians, so that 'all may see that there is nothing in the rumours that are going round about you, but rather that you faithfully observe the Law' (21.24). The 'rumours' concerned Paul's decisions that converted Jews from the diaspora need no longer circumcise their children, and that they themselves need no longer live in accordance with Jewish customs. It is obvious that Paul believed himself to be in the right with this ruling, which is derived directly from his central Pauline gospel; but it is precisely the Letters to the Romans, Galatians, and 1 Corinthians ('my gospel', Rom 2.16) that contain, beside the teaching on justification and as its fruit, teaching about the Church, in which agape is superior to gnosis. It is for this reason that he does not betray his gospel when he 'becomes a Jew for the Jews': he is only bearing with the weak brother, and seeks indeed to be like his Lord by 'destroying in himself the enmity' between Jew and Gentile (cf. Eph 2.16). The welcome of the person who is always experienced as other took place in Christ 'for the glorification of God' (Rom 15.7), as did the suffering of the Apostle (2 Cor 4.15); there is no other way for those who are strangers to each other, the Jews and the Gentiles, to become together 'the praise of glory' (Eph 1.12, 14).

---

[33] 'It is decisive that obedience, in contradiction of one's own conviction, becomes necessary for the condition of salvation, and that an offence against this obedience, in a false accommodation to the other, becomes sin (v. 23). A genuine accommodation to the brother occurs only when it is carried out through love and remains itself the expression of one's own freedom. Obedience, in contradiction of one's own conviction, has its boundary in the existence of the brother who puts this obedience into practice in another way, indeed in a contradictory way. Paul therefore teaches the community to bear with divergences in the convictions that are held' (ibid., p. 346). One should however note that all the theologically contradictory convictions are held together by the single dogmatic proposition (as this is formulated at 14.7–9) which is the justification of Christianity as such. This proposition is ineluctable and cannot be dissolved into any subjective 'conviction'.

3. Let us now glance at the Johannine writings. As in the Synoptic evangelists and Paul, in John the 'new commandment' (Jn 13.34) of love of neighbour is based solely on the event of Jesus Christ. The existence of a purely horizontal philanthropy (Mt 5.46f.; Lk 14.12) has even less relevance here than in the Synoptic Gospels. Although in John the 'law' is orientated towards 'grace', Jesus is not portrayed as the creative summariser of the commandments of love of God and of neighbour, nor does John develop the teaching that all the commandments of the law are fulfilled in the commandment of love of neighbour (Rom 13.8ff.; 1 Tim 1.5); rather, Jesus is the love that flows from God the Father to men; it is precisely this love that is life, but life is light and truth. This love encompasses both the theory and the praxis of God: 'God loved the world so much that he gave his only Son . . .' (Jn 3.16). John does not speak from the position of the human person who is required to give himself because he has been loved beforehand by God in Christ (Gal 2.20); he speaks from the position of God himself, who is love that flows out to men in his Son: man is required to fit himself into the rhythm of this movement. John does indeed speak, more strongly than Paul, of a 'commandment' and even of commandments, but only as the echo of the commandment (ἐντολή) that Jesus has received from his Father (Jn 10.18; 12.49,50). While the sovereign freedom of the Son is emphasised (10.17f.), the content of this commandment is the pouring-out of his life for 'my sheep'. The commandment of the Father is identical with the life that flows forth in eternity (12.50). In John, everything is unified and simplified by reduction to this movement in which God shows himself to be love (1 Jn 4.16); and this is certainly no philosophical definition of the essence of the absolute, but a theological affirmation that is read out of God's gift of himself to the world (1 Jn 3.16) in such a way that for John, the inmost depth of God appears 'interpreted' (Jn 1.18) in his relinquishing of himself. It is not only some little part of the God who is mysterious in himself and who remains in darkness, that love reveals: the love is one with his pure light (1 Jn 1.5), and all the more so in that God as it were gives his love for the world precedence over his love for his Son (Jn 3.16) and thereby 'gives away' to the world the secret of the mystery of the love within the Godhead. The primacy of God's love for the world is so dazzling that it completely outshines the old 'chief commandment' with its anthropocentric formulation, as we see in the sentence which begins, then breaks off and reverses itself: 'In this is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us and sent his Son to be the expiation of our sins' (1 Jn 4.10).

The first and most important thing to which the Johannine testimony bears witness is that this love of God for the world has encountered us in bodily form in Jesus Christ. Jesus 'demonstrates' his love to the brothers (e.g., in the washing of the feet, which introduces his pouring out of himself in the Eucharist and the Passion) and can also capture in words what he has demonstrated in his deed: 'As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you . . . No one has a greater love than the one who lays down his life for his friends' (Jn 15.9,13). It is not an individual deed that is meant here, but the whole movement εἰς τέλος (13.1), i.e. 'completely, utterly'.[34] The 'friends' become such in the creative event of this love. The dialectic of the love that pours forth to the ultimate point means that even the Johannine dualism of light/darkness, truth/lie, freedom/slavery, life/death has only a penultimate character. This dualism is irreconcilable, in the world and in the Church; the light of love falls ever anew into the noose of darkness and hatred 'without any reason', because it itself is 'without any reason' (15.25). But again and again, those who are 'his own' (i.e., 'friends') but did not receive him, become people who receive him (1.11f.). It is pointless to outmanoeuvre, through theological knowledge, this space that sets up boundaries through hate and denial to halt the love of God as it pours forth, and to say that this space is filled with unconscious or unadmitted love. The only meaningful step is to join the movement of divine love and then to experience that it is a life and light that pours forth and pushes forwards: 'The darkness is disappearing' (1 Jn 2.8). The Spirit leads ever more deeply into the truth of the love of Christ (Jn 16.13ff.), and the prayer of Christ embraces also the 'world' that is to come into the light through the faith of the disciples: 'that the world may believe' (17.21). One cannot therefore say that John restricts the specifically Christian transcendence of love of enemies (as in the Synoptics), of love for the other in his otherness (as in Paul), narrowing it down to an esoterically closed circle of disciples of Jesus. The extent of Christian love is determined by the extent of Christ's love; the name of brother cannot be withheld from any human person (1 Jn 4.20).[35] [34] Bultmann ad loc., following Blass and Debrunner, Grammatik des ntl. Griechisch, §207, 3.

---

A double answer is given to the question how a man can enter the absolute movement of God's love for men: through faith that Jesus is the Son of God, and through being born from God. Faith always appears as the presupposition for love, even if then love is the necessary consequence of faith. 'This is his (God's) commandment: we are to believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ and to love one another, as he (Christ) has commanded us' (1 Jn 3.23). The leap out from one's own centre, which John demands, is no less radical than the lead which Paul requires. There is no smooth passage from the sphere of philanthropy into the circulation of the triune love which extends itself to the brothers. The leap of faith shows its breadth when it is described as a new breaking-forth from the origin, as a new or a second birth. 'The one who believes that Jesus is the Messiah, is born of God' (1 Jn 5.1): the Son of God gives him this possibility (Jn 1.12f.) and leads him thus into the kingdom of God (3.5). But for John, just as for Paul, faith is not separated from love; faith is the initial response to the recognition of God's love in Christ, and is therefore itself already love. Even if John speaks primarily of the love for the brothers, in which God loves the world through us, there is no lack of affirmations that the believer loves God the Father, just as he loves Christ. We love the Son: 14.15, 21, 23, 24, 28; 21.15; 1 Jn 2.15; 4.20; 5.1f.; cf. Jn 8.42. But as children of God, we love the Father too, so that on the basis of loving him we may love all those begotten by him, as our brothers: 1 Jn 5.1.[36] And the one who is born from the origin of love—the Father—in his faith and love for Jesus, is confirmed in his awareness of being loved by the Father (Jn 14.23), and he would not at all be able to love the beloved children of the Father, without at the same time loving the loving primordial source. If one looks at the Johannine prayer dialogue between the Son and the Father, it is impossible to assert that the 'love for God' (1 Jn 5.2) 'lacks an object' or is merely the transcendental presupposition for love for one's brother. In being born, the child discovers that it is not the father; the love, which is given to him so that he may pour it out further, comes from a deeper origin than the child itself (1 Jn 3.1); and the child loves this primordial source of the love that bestows its gifts precisely at the point where this source 'makes its dwelling in him' (Jn 14.23) and it has in itself the testimony of the origin (1 Jn 5.10).

---

[35] R. Schnackenburg, Die sittliche Botschaft, op. cit., p. 265 (ET p. 328); idem, Joh. Briefe, p. 105f. Similarly J. Huby, Mystiques paulinienne et johannique (1946), pp. 183ff. On the controversy, cf. O. Prunet, La morale chrétienne d'après les écrits johanniques (1957), pp. 107–115.

Naturally, the law of love that belongs to the origin then becomes in him the law that controls everything: faith (Jn 14.1–14) necessarily becomes love (14.15–24), which makes its demands of him with the same unconcerned sovereignty as was the case in Jesus himself: Jn 12.25f. (cf. 21.18); 15.18ff.; 16.1ff.; if he laid down his life for us, 'then we too must lay down our lives for the brothers' (1 Jn 3.16), and this is not to be just 'in word and in speech, but in deed and in truth' (v. 17). Jesus' farewell prayer sets the love of the brothers under the trinitarian law of an archetypical I and Thou (Jn 17.11,21): definitive distinction of the Persons in God as among men, in a definitive fellowship that is instituted by God and through Christ unites men both to the Trinity and to one another. In John, the brother is the one for whose sake the Father handed over the Son. Behind him there stands—indeed, in him there dwells—the same momentum of the eternal love that Paul saw in his fellow man. In the realisation of brotherly love, we are as it were making sure of the truth of our faith (which is also our love for the invisible God: 1 Jn 4.20), because the fact that the child keeps the commandment of love is a sign that it loves the Father (1 Jn 5.2–3), its bad conscience at not having kept the commandment in the proper way is quietened by the thought of Jesus the atoner, mediator and intercessor with the Father (1 Jn 2.1f.; cf. 3.20f.), the one who has kept the commandment to the full.

---

[36] Lütgert emphasises clearly that the love for God is not dissolved into love for the brother, but becomes a theme on its own (op. cit., p. 242). Cf. also C. Spicq, Agape, III, pp. 303–308.

b. Solidarity

As has just been shown, the encounter with the Lord in one's brother takes place, not in an isolated I–Thou relationship, but in the embrace of both by the global reality of the Lord: this is both the sphere within which the Lord glorifies himself and the sphere in which he is glorified by us. We are therefore not abandoning our main theme in giving special consideration again to this identity of 'self-glorification' and 'being glorified'—under the heading 'communion of the saints'—although this study will only bring to light aspects that lay hidden implicitly in what went before, and which will now become explicit in the confrontation with particular results of our investigation. We have already seen in the section 'Appropriation as Expropriation' the principle (still primarily vertical, in the relationship between the human 'I' and the triune God) that to come to be oneself is possible only if one is willing to be set free by the God who expropriates himself and brings one into his own self-expropriation. This fundamental law was revealed on a deeper level when we reflected on 'fruitfulness': here the most precious and most personal thing of all was seen to be precisely what the individual achieves, as it were beyond himself, in self-abandonment, letting it grow to maturity out of himself in such a way (through the divine energy in him) that he can divest himself of it and hand it over for God to enjoy. But in order to correspond to the movement whereby God becomes man, both must be applied to the relationships between human persons, without abandoning the conceptual sphere of δοξάζειν in this. And since, for the New Testament, God's glory reveals itself now in Jesus Christ in the revelation of the gift of self made by the triune love—and not only when he 'returns in glory'—and Jesus Christ in his gift of self establishes the reality of the Church as the place in which this glory of his comes into being, it follows that the life by which the Church is brought into existence is in full truth a proleptic 'self-glorification (of the Lord) in his saints' (2 Thess 1.10)[1] and a 'glorification of the name of our Lord Jesus' precisely through these saints (2 Thess 1.12). It is true that the definitive glory of the believers will shine out only when the Lord returns (1 Cor 15.43; Phil 3.21; Col 3.4), but it is equally true, in accordance with the analogy of the concept of doxa, that this glorification has already begun in the conformation of the suffering and loving 'body' to its 'Head' (Rom 8.30, with aorist tense), 'from glory to glory, as through the working of the Lord' and of his Spirit, to the extent that the Christians look away from themselves and see the glory of the Lord (2 Cor 3.18), viz. the self-giving of the triune love which has appeared in him.

---

[1] It is true that the primary reference at 2 Thess 1.10 (in its combination of Ps 89.8 and 68.36 LXX) is to the parousia and the angels; but the connection with v. 12, where it is the present Church that is meant, as well as the second clause in v. 10 which speaks of 'believers', shows that Paul already terms the Christians 'holy ones' (no longer using this term for the angels).

As is well known, the term 'communion of the saints'[2] made its way into the creed late on,[3] and has never, historically speaking, been an important definition of the essence of the Church. But both 'communion' (communio, κοινωνία) and the term 'saints' for Christians are biblical words, as is the idea of the fellowship of life and goods which the pairing of these words expresses. While the Eastern Church understands τὰ ἅγια (neuter) above all as a reference to the sacramental goods which the believers alone share, the Western Church (with Augustine, but based on Origen) mostly sees the ἅγιοι as those who share in the fellowship of life.[4] Both these great fathers are doing nothing more than radicalising the biblical foundations, by taking seriously the indwelling of the believing persons in a common life-principle, which deprivatises them through and through, but without depersonalising them, since the life-principle itself—the life of the Trinity—is personal. The κοινωνία or communio is realised either in Christ (1 Cor 1.9), or in his Eucharist (1 Cor 10.16), or in the Holy Spirit (Phil 2.1; cf. 2 Cor 13.13); this removes the limitations of the concept of the 'holy people' that grows numerically through the addition of personal individuals, and of the concept of the 'body' (of Christ) in which the biological image does not directly portray the interpersonal communication: both these images are brought together in a deeper mid-point. The individual persons are rooted in a common life-principle which in itself is personal, but at the same time universal—since it is divine and incarnate in the God-man—and which has the effect of opening out beyond itself every personal element that comes to development in it, so that this is not endangered, but is brought into the sphere of universal solidarity. At 1 Cor 10.16, the 'fellowship' with Christ through the eucharistic table becomes almost incidentally also the mutual fellowship of those who share in the meal: 'Because there is one bread, we are one body, we who are many, all of us who share in the one bread' (v. 17). The requirement that individuals should decide to enter the spirit—properly speaking, the decidedness—of the agent of their unity, shows the personal reality of the agent with whom the believers share. In order to make this clear, Paul builds a series of five synonyms: 'Do not join in pulling the foreign yoke of the unbelievers (as ox and ass ought not to be yoked together): for what participation (μετοχή) could righteousness have in unrighteousness? What fellowship (κοινωνία) is there between light and darkness? What harmony (συμφώνησις) between Christ and Belial? What could the faithful share with the unbelievers? What agreement can there be between the temple of God and idols?' (2 Cor 6.14ff.). The parenthesis (6.14–7.1) which starts with these words is only an insertion into a section that is concerned with the most intimate fellowship of the Church, of the Apostle and the community.[5] The fellowship is personal: thus God sends sufferings and consolations to the Apostle, so that he in turn may be able to exhort and console; but it is not this personal act that creates the fellowship in suffering and consolation—rather, it always presupposes a 'partnership in the sufferings and also in the consolation' (2 Cor 1.7). For both the Apostle and the community are rooted together in the reality of the death and Resurrection of Christ, and 'suffering means that forces of grace are unloosed' (cf. 2 Cor 4.12).[6] When he suffers, Paul has the community 'in his heart': 'you are all sharers of my grace (of suffering) in my fetters and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel' (Phil 1.7). But this fellowship is not given one-sidedly by the Apostle to the community: the community already (1.5) have a κοινωνιά 'with the gospel'. While Paul is the personified bearer of the gospel, it represents at the same time the total reality of the divine actualisation of salvation, into which the community as such is really incorporated. The personal share of the community in this reality of salvation is expressed precisely as their share in what happens to Paul, a share that can take the active form of material help (4.14); but while Paul is grateful for this help, he wishes to have it understood as the expression of the deeper communio, and indeed as a mutual giving and taking too (4.15). The same hierarchical and yet unified relationship exists between the one who is taught and the one who teaches (Gal 6.6), and on the large scale, in the collection taken up among the Gentile Christians for the support of the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem, about which we have spoken earlier: the fact that this is an exchange of material goods for spiritual goods is quite irrelevant in the presence of the κοινωνία between the two integral parts of the Church, a κοινωνία established in Christ (Eph 2.11ff.) and sealed by Paul's giving his hand to the earlier Apostles (Gal 2.9).[7]

---

[2] J. P. Kirsch, Die Lehre von der Gemeinschaft der Heiligen im christlichen Altertum (1900); P. Bernard, 'Communion des Saints', DTC III (1911), 429–434; D. Bonhoeffer, Sanctorum Communio (2nd edn. 1954); A. Piolanti, Il mistero della comunione dei Santi nella rivelazione e nella teologia (1957); idem, art. 'Gemeinschaft der Heiligen', LThK IV (1960), 651f.

[3] First in Nicetas of Remesiana (PL 52.871), then in Faustus of Riez and Caesarius of Arles.

[4] Texts in Bernard, op. cit., pp. 432f. Cf. also V.-M. Breton, La communion des Saints. Histoire, dogme, piété (1934), pp. 33–65. The fundamental intuition of Origen (translated, with some alteration, into the Augustinian vision of the civitas Dei from the first righteous man, Abel, to the last of the righteous) is the universal fellowship of all the redeemed in Heaven and on earth: angels, the righteous of the old covenant and the believers of the new covenant. All the righteous form one single fellowship, in which the same life circulates and the same disposition and the same interest hold sway. Origen speaks very frequently of the participation of the heavenly Church (to which both the angels and the departed belong) in the celebrations, the struggles and the sufferings of the earthly Church.

---

[5] The communio with everything that is opposed to the Spirit of Christ must be avoided, as an open contradiction of the communio with him: Eph 5.11; Rev 18.4; the quotations at 2 Cor 6.16–18; 1 Tim 5.22; 2 Jn 11. This is the reason for the dividing line that is drawn in the Eucharist: 1 Cor 16.22.

The concept of communio receives final clarity in the First Letter of John: the purpose of this Letter's entire proclamation is to invite people into the already existing communio of the Church (1 Jn 1.3). This communio does not generate itself, but is generated by 'communio with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ' (ibid.), and the only one to share in it is the one who accommodates himself to the personal light that is the being of the triune God, and puts this accommodation into practice even in the decision and conduct of his life (1.6,7).

---

[6] J. Gnilka, Der Philipperbrief (1968), p. 49.

[7] Cf. art. koinos etc., TDNT III 789–809 (Hauck).

The essence of such a fellowship is illustrated in the image of the vine: the 'physical' element in this, the bearing of fruit because of being united to the principle of fruitfulness that belongs to the vine, is raised to the personal sphere, without reducing its significance: thus, the branches are 'pure' through the power of the word that Jesus has spoken (Jn 15.3), and their 'remaining' in him is the same thing as the 'remaining' of his words in the disciples (v. 7). It is the personal Jesus—his word, his love and his self-giving, his prayer—that dwells in the 'branches' and thereby generates the fellowship of life: and the indwelling of this in all the 'branches' gives them the personal character that becomes the communio that goes directly from the vertical to the horizontal.

Paul explains this directness when he makes the transition from the Christian's participation in the Cross and glorification of Christ (whereby he is constituted and defined as a Christian) to the participation of the members of the 'body' of Christ in one another's sharing in the lot of Christ: 'If one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; if one member is glorified (δοξάζεται), all the members rejoice with it' (1 Cor 12.26). This is the κοινωνία πνεύματος (Phil 2.1), which consists indistinguishably of the one Spirit which 'has been given to all to drink' (1 Cor 12.13) and of the 'fellowship that fights together in harmony of mind' (μιᾷ ψυχῇ συναθλοῦντες, Phil 1.27). Likewise, in the great passage in the Letter to the Ephesians that describes the growth of the body through the mutually overlapping services that the members carry out (4.11–16), it is of central importance that the unity of the body which is aimed at in the reciprocal interlocking of the personal services should at the same time already exist (4.3f.), if it is to be possible to speak of members and of services at all.

The form of thought which is found repeatedly in the New Testament—which cannot be adequately traced back to Old Testament categories or to those common in Antiquity (such as the 'collective I')—makes it impossible to understand the radical fellowship of life and goods shared by Christians as a secondary social function of persons who are primarily individuals on their own with a 'direct relationship to God' (this is the unspoken presupposition of most of the scholastic speculations about 'supernatural merit for others').[8] The very concept of 'merit' sets individualistic limitations on the concept of fruitfulness, as we explained it above, creating an unnecessary problem: how to cross over from the personal sphere to the 'Thou' and to the community. Consequences have been drawn here from the immediacy of the responsibility of each person to God (e.g., Rom 14.4), from the images of judgment that portray an eschatological separation of 'goats' and 'sheep', and from a doctrine of double predestination inherited from the Judaism of late Antiquity and then radicalised within Christianity—but also from the awareness of the infinite distance that lies between the grace of Christ and our imperfect and shoddy activity[9]—that reduce the biblical idea of solidarity in its original form and in its subsequent effects to such an extent that it is only rarely that the complicated speculations take the primarily social character of Christian living and action as their starting-point.[10] The image of the vine sets us on different ground, since it both forbids the 'branches' to claim for themselves the unique fruitfulness that belongs to the vine, and allows the fruitfulness of the branches to be of the same kind as that of the vine out of which they grow, and thus directly lays upon them the bearing of fruit for others.

---

[8] J. Czerny, Das übernatürliche Verdienst für andere. Eine Untersuchung über die Entwicklung dieser Lehre von der Frühscholastik an bis zur Theologie der Gegenwart (Studia Friburgensia, new ser. 15, 1957).

[9] This last theme is decisive for Thomas Aquinas; the emphasis in his teaching, which remains substantially the same despite a variety in the formulation, is on the qualitative difference between the merit of Christ—the 'man for others' (K. Barth)—and our small merits, since we are only 'men with others': 2Sent. d 27, a 6; 3Sent. d 19, a 1, q 1; De ver. 29, 7; S.Th. I–II 114, 6: unusquisque nostrum movetur a Deo per donum gratiae ut ipse ad vitam aeternam perveniat, et ideo meritum condigni ultra hanc motionem non se extendit. Sed anima Christi mota est a Deo per gratiam non solum ut ipse perveniret ad gloriam vitae aeternae, sed etiam ut alios in eam adduceret, inquantum est caput Ecclesiae. Cf. S.Th. III 19, 4c. Of course, what is at issue here is always a meritum de condigno, while Thomas admits that one who receives grace can obtain de congruo even the first grace of conversion for a sinner. The entire scholastic discussion rests on the basis of this distinction, which requires a critical scrutiny.

[10] Initial steps are taken by Giles of Rome, who makes the connection between 'social merit' and the social structure of the Church and all personal charisms (Czerny, p. 45), and by Suarez, the theologian who dealt in the greatest detail with the question of merit on behalf of others, likewise indicates the corpus mysticum as the foundation: the 'one who merits' and the 'one on whose behalf he merits' are not one physical person, but they

This delimits the meaning and the limit of what can be called coredemption. The distance between the 'Head' and the 'body' must be maintained under all circumstances, so that Christ as the Head is the sole redeemer of all, even of his 'proleptically redeemed' mother; but at the same time, the one Redeemer takes up the 'body' of the Church into his redemptive activity, and this becomes yet more fruitful the more a member conforms itself to the selflessness that is Christ's disposition, and the less he exercises reserve in putting his existence at the service of universal redemption.[11] The salvific principle seen already in the Old Testament whereby God bestows his grace on the people of Israel because of the faith of the patriarchs, because of the intercession of Moses, of Samuel and of the prophets, and ultimately because of the suffering of the Servant of Yahweh, and forgives Job's friends because of his righteousness, is clearly brought to its fulfilment in the new covenant.[12] The Corinthian practice of being do form a mystical person et sunt invicem membra ratione unius fidei et caritatis, per quas in Christo uniuntur; ergo . . . dum unus alteri meretur, sibi quodammodo meretur (Opp. X 2240a). Suarez, unlike earlier theologians, does not require that the one who merits should have a particular intention that his merit should be applied to another rather than to himself; rather, he can leave this in a quite general way up to the application that God's providence will make: Protest autem intelligi, quod unus iustus mereatur aliis de congruo divinum favorem et beneficientiam absolute et generatim, determinationem eius divinae sapientiae et providentiae committendo (ibid., 24lb, with examples adduced from scripture). H. Schnell speaks of the 'stimulating effect' of good works 'for one's neighbour's life of grace', pointing out that all the members of the mystical body operate always in co-operation with the other members, from whom they have received help and who sustain them—and never solely out of their own power (Kath. Dogmatik III, Book 6, §3, n. 10 (1892), pp. 337, 354).

---

[11] On this point, cf. C. Journet, L'Eglise du Verbe Incarné, II (1951), pp. 406, 418ff.

[12] A thorny question all of its own is mentioned here only in passing: that of the co-operation of the old covenant in the bringing-about of the Incarnation. For details, cf. G. Kokša, Die Lehre der Scholastiker des XVI. und baptised on behalf of the dead shows how strong the awareness that one could act on behalf of one another was in the life of the Christian community too (1 Cor 15.29).[13] This presupposes the idea that not even baptism is a private event that affects the clearly delimited subject, but is a grace into which one can draw others: this is an exceptional application of the early community's 'having all things in common', such that its members were 'one heart and one soul', with none of them 'considering what belonged to him as something private (ἴδιον)' (Acts 4.32). One can see from the special mention of the acts of Barnabas, as of Ananias and his wife, that the words in Acts 4 do not imply a universal fellowship of goods;[14] but in this way they give expression to a particular disposition, which is also repeatedly inculcated in the Letters of the Apostles through the recommendation of hospitality (Rom 12.13; 1 Tim 3.2; Tit 1.8; Heb 13.2; 1 Pet 4.9), of earning money in order to be able to give alms (Eph 4.28), and of 'sharing in the needs of the saints' (Rom 12.13), with ceaseless transition from the fellowship in material matters to the fellowship in spiritual matters: 'Rejoice with those who rejoice, weep with those who weep' (Rom 12.15). The external hospitality that welcomes others into one's own room is echoed in the inner self-expropriation that does not resist others when they force their entry (Mt 5.39): 'Why not rather let yourselves be set at a disadvantage?' (1 Cor 6.7); 'do not avenge yourselves' (Rom 12.19). This establishes the innermost disposition of the Lord on the Cross as the heart of the Church's disposition; the only one who was able to be 'a man for others' with full efficacy now introduces his followers into the same ability: 'Bear with one another, and forgive, if one has any complaint against another. As the Lord has forgiven you, you also should forgive . . . Let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts, for you were called to this (peace) in one body' (Col 3.13, 15).

XVII. Jahrhunderts von der Gnade und dem Verdienst der alttestamentlichen Gerechten (Rome 1955).

[13] M. Rissi, Die Taufe für die Toten. Ein Beitrag zur paulinischen Tauflehre (1962). Further bibliography: Bauer, WbNT, 262 (ET 131).

[14] Haenchen, Apostelgeschichte (5th edn., 1965), pp. 188f. (ET The Acts of the Apostles, 1971, pp. 186f.

The command actively to encourage one another—which always proceeds from Christ (as God's mercy) and is orientated towards Christ[15]—shows that this act of making way for the other is not passivity, but the offering to him of the disposition of the Lord. And mutual intercession, repeatedly required of the Christian, takes place (like all New Testament praying) in a sphere where Christ is present (Mt 18.19f.), where his living word dwells among us (Col 3.16); not only does the Apostle pray 'unceasingly' for his community (Rom 1.9; 1 Thess 1.2; 2.13), but he counts on their prayer in order to carry out his task (Rom 15.30ff.; 2 Cor 1.11; Phil 1.19; Col 4.3, 18; 1 Thess 5.25; Philem 22). Thus 'the Church' too prays 'unceasingly to God' for Peter when he is in prison (Acts 12.5,12). As the prayer of the Church, it has its root in the new unity instituted by Jesus, his own unity with the Father which he has opened up to his disciples and to those who believe in him, in the high-priestly prayer (Jn 17.20–23). The Church, with all that goes to make up its social context, is the disclosure and the exposition of Christ, and thereby of the social life within the Godhead. And since Jesus prays the Father to permit those who belong to him to dwell where he is and to see his glory (Jn 17.24), and the Church is already the place where he is, the personal and social life of the Church permits one to see into the glory of Christ and of the triune love.

The concept of the social character of the Church is given a final confirmation in Paul's antithesis between Adam and Christ. It is well known that this antithesis, which is worked out twice (at Rom 5.12–21 and 1 Cor 15.45–50), should be interpreted in each case in its particular literary context and not be isolated and generalised.[16] But it is in any case clear [15] H. Schlier, 'Die Eigenart der christlichen Mahnung nach dem Apostel Paulus', in: Besinnung auf das NT (1964), pp. 340–357.

[16] R. Bultmann, 'Adam und Christus nach Rm 5', ZNW 50 (1959), pp. 145–165 (criticism of K. Barth, 'Christus und Adam nach Röm 5. Ein Beitrag zur Frage nach dem Menschen und der Menschheit', Theol. Studien 35 [1952]). E. Brandenburger, Adam und Christus. Exeget.-religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zu Röm 5, 12–21 (1 Kor 15), WMANT 7 (1962); P. Lengsfeld, 'Adam und Christus. Die Adam-Christus-Typologie im NT und ihre dogmatische Verwendung bei M. J. Scheeben und K. Barth', in: Koinonia 9 (1965).

from Rom 5 that 'Adam', as the head of fallen humanity, is a deficient antitype to Christ as the head of redeemed humanity, and that this antitype has two characteristics: he has opened the door to the reality of sin which dominates all men, and he is the first sinner in a line of personal sinners that includes all men. These two characteristics must be maintained in juxtaposition: 'it is only the statement of the unity of inexorable addiction to sin and of personal responsibility' on the part of all individual sinners that is 'truly biblical'.[17] Thus we have a negative statement of the simultaneity of the social element and the personal element; Paul's intention in adducing this negative is ultimately only to display the positive model of the same simultaneity of both aspects in Christ and in the new community which he has instituted. The 'foreshadowing of the one who was to come' is infinitely surpassed by him when he comes, for the grace of Christ 'flows over on to all men far more richly' than Adam's trespass. But although the equilibrium between Adam and Christ is completely abolished in terms of its substance, the relationship between the superior law of being and the law of free choosing and decision remains constant, as the indivisibility of what the Christian is and what the Christian ought to do in the following section, Rom 6.1–23, makes clear. And while the precise details of the relationship between Adam and his descendants is not discussed in Paul—the only thing that matters in this area is the dual unity of destiny and responsibility[18]—this relationship on the side of Christ and the [17] K. H. Schelkle, 'Schuld als Erbteil?', Theol. Med. 20 (1968), p. 25.

---

[18] Accordingly, it is necessary to formulate anew the teaching about the sin beforehand (misleadingly called 'original sin') and the individual's personal sin. On this, cf. H. Rondet, Le péché originel dans la tradition patristique et théologique (1966). According to Rondet, the peccatum originatum in us can have as its presupposition a peccatum originans that consists of the sin of all men of all periods (p. 321), without its being necessary to assume a mythical original Adam or (with Augustine) an antecedent existence of all souls in the first man: rather, the unity of all men is to be derived from their antecedent orientation towards Christ, the true Adam. 'Cette hypothèse se rattache évidemment à une espèce de platonisme personnaliste' ('this hypothesis is obviously linked to a kind of personalist Platonism', p. 322). But this apparent Platonism is not the result of a prior philosophical decision, but merely the expression for the prior election of all men Church becomes significant, since Christ himself (in antithesis to the ἁμαρτιά that holds sway) is the personal all-inclusive law of life for all the redeemed, who have chosen in responsible freedom to be incorporated into him. 'Sin' as such is not a person, even if it dominates men with a collective, super-personal power; in its ultimate being, it is the powerlessness of mankind to will and to aim for the 'supernatural' goal that God has set for it, viz. its true unity 'in the Beloved' (Eph 1.6), and therefore it is for all men 'the loss of the glory of God' (Rom 3.23), whereas, now that we have been reconciled to God through Christ, we have won back access to the glory of love and 'boast in hope of the glory of God' (Rom 5.2). Adam is the problematic solidarity in an existence without glory: Christ is the genuine solidarity in the recovered 'open access to grace' (ibid.) which intends for us the glory of the eternal love of God, as this 'has been poured out into our hearts' beforehand and has made us dwell in its own domain. But since a solidarity in what is not love is a contradiction in terms, the one who is 'enticed' by sinful desire (ἐπιθυμία) is driven out of the community towards isolation and death (Jas 1.14), so that it is only the Church in the love of Christ and of God that remains as the surpassing model of solidarity, in which the one who is other—as our brother—displays to us both that the divine love transcended itself by entering what was other than itself in order to bring us back home, and that it yet did not abandon its own being in doing so, since it always embraced in itself otherness, as triune love. It is only thus that the presentiment of the divine shining, which plays on man's face because of his origin (Ps in Christ, as this is described at Eph 1.3–10 and as it has been analysed by us above. The additional perspective at 1 Cor 15.45 is fully justified by the fact that the original plan of God (in which Christ would have to be described, supratemporally, as the first Adam) was to unroll in a temporal dispensation of salvation, in which finally Christ would take up into himself all that was imperfect and bring back what had strayed (cf. here the whole theology of Irenaeus): it is not (as the Corinthian gnostics supposed) a heavenly, transfigured, mythical Adam who stands at the beginning of history, but the 'earthy' Adam, who however is the antecedent image of the one who is to come (Rom 5.14).Cf. Lengsfeld, op. cit., pp. 51ff.

---

8.6) and which is presented to Adam, as he looks yearningly for a partner (Gen 2.20ff.), in the form and face of Eve, as the mirror of his own being in the image of God, is brought to fulfilment. But the fulfilment takes place, not in the glory of paradise, but in the crucifying encounter of the crucified Lord in the sin-distorted face of one's fellow-man.[19] And it is in terms of this encounter that we shall be judged.[20]

c. Nuptiality

When we began to set out what is contained in the New Testament's 'glory', the key expression seemed to us to be 'face' (πρόσωπον),[1] meaning the presence of the entire person for other persons, spiritual presence in a total embodiment, which includes in itself also the 'word' (λόγος)[2] when it gives expression to itself, and goes beyond the 'image' (εἰκών), offering itself without concealment in the radiance of its immediate appearance. The one who prays in the Old Testament 'seeks' God's face and asks that it may not be withdrawn from him (Ps 27.8). And yet the kabōd in this face is so strong that its naked appearance kills. But now 'God's glory' has dawned 'upon the face of Christ' (2 Cor 4.6): 'The one who sees me, sees the Father' (Jn 14.9). And if we do not yet see him at present 'as he is' (1 Jn 3.2), this is not because the human face of Christ would be a concealment of the divine, but because our eye is as yet capable of perceiving only 'in a fragmentary fashion', and is not yet mature enough to be looked at by God (1 Cor [19] Cf. R. Schulte, Theologie und Heilsgeschehen, Zur Aufgabe heutiger Dogmatik (1968), pp. 48ff.

---

[20] The Son of Man who is to come 'in his glory' to the judgment (Mt 25) is Christ in fulfilment of the Danielic Son of Man, who is interpreted collectively at Dan 7.13 as the 'people of the saints'. Thus the personal meaning and the collective meaning can both come into play in the New Testament judgment scene. Cf. O. Cullmann, Heil als Geschichte (1965), p. 180 (ET Salvation in History, p. 201).

[1] Bibliograpy in TDNT VI 768ff., art. πρόσωπον (Lohse).

[2] In the understanding of 'face' in the ancient period, both in the Old Testament and in the hellenistic milieu, 'face' as the expression of the person is not set against the power of speech (as in modern physiognomy).

13.12). Nevertheless, in principle there is no longer any veil between our face and the glorious face of God. Paul explains this at 2 Cor 3.6–4.6 by means of the antithesis between the glory of the old covenant and the glory of the new, or more precisely, between the glory of the law of Moses, which remains letter, and the glory of the gospel, which is spirit. The letter is 'written on stone' (albeit by God's hand), and both the letter and the stone are an image that mediates the living will of God: but they are not God himself. As he comes down from the mountain, Moses' face reflects something of the glory of God's face as it shines; but, precisely for this reason, he must cover his face with a cloth in the presence of the Israelites,[3] both because they cannot bear the splendour (3.7) and so that 'they might not see the end of what was transitory' (3.12). What was 'transitory' was the mediation of the living, eternal face through letter and stone: the letter 'kills' (3.6), and the law is insufficient to overcome death and 'condemnation' (3.9), and thus the whole former dispensation was intrinsically and essentially finite, and thereby also unable to catch any glimpse at all beyond its own finitude (τέλος, 3.13) of its transcendental goal (τέλος νόμου Χριστός, Rom 10.4).[4] The veil on the face of Moses is therefore the same veil that lies on the whole of the 'reading of the Old Testament' (the Jews pray with their heads covered); God's face remains concealed in the mediation by stone and letter, just as man's face or 'heart' remains concealed (3.15), and it is not possible for them to see one another. The heart remains 'stony', 'hardened' (3.14); where God cannot lay bare his heart—which is his glory—man's personal face too remains veiled. 'The veil is taken away' when one 'turns to the Lord: but the Lord is Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom' (3.16f.). The mediation disappears where the Father appears in the Son,[5] and thereby the Spirit of God shines directly upon the hearts. Full incarnation—so that the glory of God shines upon the face of Christ—is simultaneous with immediate participation in the Spirit of God, who gives us all the 'freedom' to look away from our embarrassed self-concealment, 'with uncovered face', and to lift our eyes to the face of eternal love and thus see 'the glory of the Lord' (3.18). The ultimate stage of 'face to face' has already been attained in principle in the human face of God, shown and seen in the Spirit of God, even if for the time being this directly shining medium of communication, which does not separate, but binds together, still bears the name 'light of the gospel of the glory of Christ' (2 Cor 4.4). Faith, hope and love, the three that remain in eternity (1 Cor 13.13), are already the spiritual way to see into the Spirit of God, into his love, and to share in this.[6] The 'light of the gospel of the glory of Christ', which contains and bestows the Spirit, freedom, and thereby 'great parrhesia' (2 Cor 3.12)—and not a mere 'quality of being a fellow-man'—permits the miracle whereby divine love and human love not only look upon one another, but sink into one another: nuptiality.

---

[3] Art. κάλυμμα: TDNT III 558ff. (Oepke).

[4] Prümm, Diakonia Pneumatos I, pp. 137ff., correctly describes the double reason for the concealment: not being able to see and not wishing to see. The point at 2 Cor 3.13 is not that the Israelites were not to see how the splendour on Moses' face gradually disappeared, but rather that they do not see the inherent transience of this splendour (and hence its transcendence).

The new covenant is the fulfilment of the nuptiality between God and humanity which was foreshadowed in the old covenant but could only escape from its confinement to the sphere of images when bodiliness was involved on both sides of the relationship. Otherwise, no matter how much the oriental, Egyptian and hellenistic mystery cults spoke of the sacred marriage (ἱερός γάμος), the union of bodies on earth remained at best a (Platonic) reproduction of a spiritual wedding (syzygy) in Heaven, and the concept of a wedding between a heavenly partner and an earthly partner was caught in the model of the relationship between spirit and body. In neither form did the sexual element of relationships between human persons play a serious role. But when Jesus, as the incarnate Son, takes possession of the Old Testament images, he automatically raises them to a new level, just as Paul follows the model of gnostic thought forms in order to underline the importance of the Incarnation, but likewise transposes them completely, so that despite their apparent relationship to gnosis, they are made to express the opposite of what they say.[7] It required precisely the unique and exclusively Christian interweaving of christology, Trinity and Church, in order to raise the basic form of human togetherness, the relationship of man and woman, from the merely biological sphere to the personal sphere, and indeed to let it become a genuine 'sacrament' (Eph 5.32) of the human relationship. The levels and orders interlock here with the highest degree of subtlety and are inseparable from one another, without however being confused with each other. We see how closely this theme is connected to that of 'glory' from Paul's two statements that, within the human sphere, the woman is 'the glory' of the man (1 Cor 11.7), and that Christ 'has presented to himself a glorious Church without spot or wrinkle' (Eph 5.27). When both these statements are brought together, the Song of Songs receives for the first time a position and a definitive justification within Holy Scripture.[8]

---

[5] It is not first at v. 18, but already at v. 16 that the κύριος is Christ, even if Old Testament words are used. Pneuma denotes the distinctive being of God as spirit, which for the Old Testament cannot make a direct gift of itself because of the 'covering', and in the New Testament is written on hearts as the 'Spirit of the living God'.

[6] See my 'Fides Christi', in: Sponsa Verbi (1960), pp. 45–79.

It must remain doubtful whether the Synoptic Jesus took over the metaphor of the nuptiality between God and Israel[9] and applied it to himself. Although the Judaism of late Antiquity does know the image of the wedding feast as a metaphor for the eschatological sealing of the covenant,[10] the equation of the Messiah with the bridegroom is not attested, or is very late.[11] One could therefore attribute the references to wedding feasts (Mt 25.1–13; 22.1–10; Lk 14.15–24; also Mk 2.19 par.) to Jesus himself, while explaining the equation of the bridegroom (who becomes 'the king's son' in Matthew) with Jesus himself as the reflection of the community (likewise with Mk 2.20 par.). The neatness of this distinction is, however, massively called into question by the link between the words of institution of the Eucharist and the perspective of the eschatological meal (Mk 14.25; cf. Lk 22.30): these two stand in a hidden continuity, so that the formulations of the community are to be seen only as the clarification of what came to expression silently in Jesus' being and his deeds. Are not the meals that he holds with the 'sinners' an explicit anticipation of the eschatological, messianic meal? And just as he put himself into his own parables as the embodiment of the coming kingdom, employing mysterious words to do this, so it is also possible that the metaphor at Mk 2.19a is a hidden pointer to himself.

---

[7] On this, cf. the excursus on hieros gamos in H. Schlier, Epheserbrief, pp. 264–276, and on the whole subject cf. art. γαμέω etc., TDNT I 648–657 (Stauffer).

[8] Cf. III/2,1, pp. 120–125.

[9] Hos 2.19; Is 54.4ff.; 61.10; 62.4; Ezek 16.7ff. In Hosea, where the image first occurs, it is a response to pagan cultic practices: cf. III/2,1, pp. 222f.

[10] Stauffer, op. cit., 653f.; C. Wiener and J. Colson, 'Un roi fit des noces à son fils', in: Thèmes Bibliques (Bruges 1962).

On the other hand, the union of man and woman, both sexual and nuptial, takes on new accents in Jesus, who frees it from legal casuistry and exposes it as the original work of God the creator (Mk 10.6ff.). The inner unity in which one flesh comes into being out of two, is directly the deed of God; let not man divide here! But this unity in the flesh denotes also a similarly thorough-going unity in the loving spirit: to look with lust on the wife of another is already to break this unity, for 'copulatio without communio is harlotry'.[12] Nevertheless, in the case of a conflict of duties, the requirements of the kingdom of God have the precedence even over those of the marriage bond.[13] Besides, marriage belongs to the 'old era' and does not enter the kingdom of Heaven (Mk 12.25 par.). But Jesus is no enemy of marriage; he has married disciples, he loves children, he accepts invitations to weddings. He did not lift marriage out of its [11] Joachim Jeremias, art. νύμφη, νυμφίος, TDNT IV 1099ff.; cf. J. Gnilka, '"Bräutigam"—spätjüdisches Messiasprädikat?', Tr. theol. Zft. 69 (1960), pp. 289–301.

[12] Stauffer, op. cit., 650.

[13] Lk 14.20 par.; Mt 19.12.

creaturely order, but gave it a new significance within that order. But he made the deepest basis of marriage the new love, ἀγάπη. The Letters of the Apostles make it clear that this was his intention (Eph 5.21ff.; Col 3.18ff.; 1 Pet 2.18ff.) and that he introduced something that was to come to its conclusion in the speculations of the Letter to the Ephesians.

It is not clear what the fourth evangelist's views about Jesus as the eschatological bridegroom were. If M. E. Boismard were correct to suppose that Jn 3.22–30 is a first redaction of the narrative of the relationship between the Baptist and Jesus, which was displaced to its present position by the later redactions, then the metaphor of the Baptist—'He who has the bride is the bridegroom; the friend of the bridegroom, who stands and hears his voice, rejoices greatly at the voice of the bridegroom' (3.29)—would cast a quite different light on the symbolism of the wedding scene at Cana, which would appear as the first dawning of the glory of the eschatological meal.[14] It must have been clear to the evangelist and to the community which heard him that the 'bride' of which the Baptist speaks is the Church.[15] In the powerful closing chords of the New Testament, the Apocalypse of John develops the image: the continual duality of Yahweh's bride, Jerusalem the virgin and harlot, is here definitively separated into the pure bride 'clothed in shining white linen' (19.8) and her opposite image, the great harlot of Babylon; it is no longer God who is the husband, but the Lamb (19.7; 21.9). Prophetic, apocalyptic and hellenistic images come together at the point where 'the holy city Jerusalem' descends to earth 'out of heaven from God in the splendour of the glory of God' (21.10) for the ἱερὸς γάμος that eliminates the distance between Heaven and earth and definitively incarnates what was predestined and indeed pre-existent in the presence of God (cf. Gal 4.26ff.; Heb 12.22ff.), while on earth the bride who dwells in the wilderness (Rev 12.14) still looks yearningly with the Spirit for this wedding: 'Come!' (22.17). As in the Gospel, the individual believers are invited to this wedding as guests (19.9). The images of Revelation stand without any definitive interconnection, yet there is a subliminal inter-relation. The one hundred and forty-four thousand who follow the Lamb are 'virgins' and have been 'purchased for the Lamb' (14.4). The ark of the covenant appears in the open temple of Heaven (11.19), followed immediately by the pregnant woman clothed in the sun (12.1): how could it be possible that these two images should bear no relationship to those of 'bride' and 'wife'? And if such a relationship exists, does it not cast a light backwards upon the 'woman' who brought about the first dawning of Jesus' glory in Cana? The wedding and the glory stand at the very beginning and at the uttermost end. And is not the request of the woman for the miracle at the feast like a first 'Come!'? Is there not an encounter here—in the concealment and the rejection of the request—for the first time between the two faces that will unveil themselves fully at the nuptials of the Lamb?[16]

---

[14] Du Baptême à Cana, Lect. Divina 18 (1956); idem, 'Les traditions johanniques concernant le Baptiste', RB 70 (1963), p. 32. Cf. Claude Chavasse, The Bride of Christ. An Enquiry into the Nuptial Element in Early Christianity (London 1940).

[15] R. Schnackenburg, Johannesevangelium I, p. 454 (ET p. 417).

The concept of nuptiality occurs in many ways in Paul, before it is given its great development in the Letter to the Ephesians. 2 Cor 11.2, alluding to the Old Testament metaphor, identifies the Corinthian community as engaged to Christ (no longer to God); and as the bridegroom has become incarnate, so also has 'God's husbandly jealousy' (ζῆλος θεοῦ) become incarnate in Paul, who has once for all, as betrother or bride's father, 'betrothed' the community to its 'single husband' and prepared her to be 'presented' (παραστῆσαι) to him as a 'spotless bride'. The lapse of time has not altered the danger to the relationship; like Jerusalem in the past, Corinth today is near to being seduced 'away from simple loyalty (ἁπλότης) to Christ', as Eve was seduced by the serpent. Thus we have here, through the bodiliness of the spouses, a relationship that goes behind the old covenant to the first pair in Paradise and links this to the 'sacred marriage'; but while in Ephesians the reference goes from the first pair to the final pair, 2 Corinthians, fearing the worst, goes from the second pair back to the first.

---

[16] It can be seen from the Church's title at 2 Jn 1,5,13 that, for John, she is in her hiddenness now already 'bride' and 'spouse': she is the 'lady' (kuria) chosen by God, who has her 'children'—doubtless from John or from the Lord—like her 'chosen sister', the other community, whose 'children' make their greetings in the Letter.

Nevertheless, in Rom 7.1–6 the definitive step forwards is taken: the Old Testament bond of marriage with the 'law' is dissolved through the death and settlement of the law in Christ, so that the wife is set free for a new bond.[17] 'If she gives herself to another husband, she will not be an adulteress. Thus, my brothers, as far as the law is concerned you have been put to death through the body of Christ, so that you may be given over to another, to the one who was raised from the dead so that we might bear fruit for God' (Rom 7.3–4). The marriage to the abstract law is dissolved through the concrete body of Christ on the Cross: in that he dies vicariously for all, all have died. This death is an event of life, because it is an event of love; it is dying into the Resurrection, but the abstract law is unable to follow it here. Thereby—and not through a dying of the law, but through a dying to the law—is the new marriage covenant sealed, with a fruitfulness directed towards God.

One might well assume on the basis of this text that the concept of the Church as the 'body of Christ' in which the believers are 'each members' (1 Cor 12.27), already contains a certain nuptial element; this becomes a certainty at 1 Cor 6.13–20. Paul is speaking about fornication, which takes on a wholly new accent in the new covenant through the fact that God has become flesh and that we are incorporated into this flesh. This is the only reason for the soundness of the argument that 'every other sin that a person commits remains outside his body; but the one who commits fornication sins against his own body' (6.18; cf. Sir 23.17ff.). For Paul goes on to describe this 'body of one's own' as an expropriated body that is not one's own: 'Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit, who dwells within you and whom you have from God, and that you no longer belong to yourselves at all? You were bought at a high price!' (6.19f.). But the expropriation did not take place because of an external act of representation in which one body is only given in exchange for another body: rather, one body is handed over to the other body, eucharistically. 'The body does not exist for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body' (6.13); therefore it is absolutely forbidden to take a member of Christ and make it 'one body' with a prostitute in accordance with the principle in Genesis, for in the Holy Spirit, both bodies—that of the believer and that of Christ—are already one flesh in nuptial union.[18] [17] On the nuptial meaning of Rom 6, cf. W. Thüsing, Per Christum in Deum, NtAbh new series 1 (1965), pp. 97f., cf. n. 106.—The quotation from Hosea at Rom 9.25 is another point of contact with the bridal theology of the Old Testament.

---

Elements of a theology of the first pair in Paradise are found at 1 Cor 11.2–16; the practical context—Paul wishes to introduce at Corinth the oriental Jewish custom that the women cover their heads in worship—clashes harshly, in the search for a theological justification, with the statement at 2 Cor 3.18 that we 'all see (or: reflect) the glory of the Lord with uncovered face', a statement that certainly includes women no less than men. But over and above this cultic regulation, which has no special interest for us, a theology of man and woman is developed that is significant for the definitive statement in Eph 5: man is 'the image and glory of God' and has 'Christ as his Head', while woman is 'the glory of man' and has the man as her 'head' (1 Cor 11.7,3). A hierarchy based in nature (with a reference to Gen 2.20ff.) is established, while at the same time Paul emphasises the immediate personal relationship to God and the mutual independence of the sexes from each other (11.11f.). The veiling of the woman (through a covering on her head, or with her hair: vv. 5f,15) belongs to the order of nature [18] The nuptial theme lies clearly also in the double κολλᾶσθαι, which is used first for 'cleaving' to the prostitute and then for 'cleaving' to Christ. Since Paul is forced by his quotation to alter σῶμα to σάρξ (v. 16), in the first case he speaks of 'becoming one flesh', and in the second case of 'becoming one πνεῦμα (not 'one body'); πνεῦμα is the opposite of sarx, but not of σῶμα. Objectively speaking, Paul could also have said σῶμα instead of πνεῦμα, as E. Percy observes ad loc.

---

(φύσις αὐτή, v. 14) as this bears on the serious interplay of the sexes: the 'capturing' and 'unveiling' of the woman by the man, who awakens her in love for himself and thereby makes her also his 'helper' without whom he can do nothing with his maleness. Since he is obliged to capture, and rules as the 'head', his powerlessness is revealed; since the woman is 'below the man' (ὕπανδρος, Rom 7.2) in the (Christian) position of service, she becomes the 'glory of the man', who however does not reveal his own glorious potency in this, but shows that he is the 'image and glory of God', 'from whom all fatherhood derives' (Eph 3.15). It has been suggested that doxa here means 'clearly what is secondary as opposed to what is original ... the radiance as opposed to the light',[19] but this meaning is not securely attested;[20] it is rather the 'exterior manifestation of dignity, of what is sovereign' that is meant, just as the man 'Adam' was God's vicar in the creation.[21] The immediacy (of the εἰκών) in both sexes, with a gradation of the doxa, establishes in the order of a creation the basis for the mysterious interplay of sexual fruitfulness in the opposition of personal partners with equal rights.[22]

[19] Lietzmann, ad loc.; cf. J. Jervell, Imago Dei (1960), pp. 100f., 139f.

[20] H. Kittel, Herrlichkeit Gottes, op. cit., pp. 224f.

[21] W. Hillmann, Das Wort, die Kirche und der Mensch (1964), p. 57: 'Adam is created "as God's portrait and image", in that God makes him the creaturely embodiment of his sovereignty . . ., Eve, the woman, is not set beside him as a second, different being, but (is) . . . the visible development of his being (δόξα ἀνδρός).' Cf. P. Bachmann (in Zahn's Commentary, VII, 2nd edn. 1910, p. 355): the passage is one of those 'in which δόξα is predicated of a person, in order to express what another person possesses in it: 1 Thess 2.20; 2 Cor 8.23; cf. also Eph 3.15, viz. glory, because the second person has, in the existence of the first person, a test that proves the value of his work and a fulfilling of his will that gives glory to his work'. The immediacy of being God's image is not denied in the case of the woman, but this has its particular character because the relationship of glory is a mediated relationship. For the translation 'representation', cf. Bousset and Gressmann, Religion des Judentums (3rd edn. 1926), p. 346. Cf. F. W. Eltester, Eikon im NT (1958), p. 155.

[22] We do not need to follow up here all the implications of this text, out of which it is not possible to arrive at total clarity. Above all, in the first hierarchy at 11.3 a position is attributed to Christ (as Head of the man, but with God as his own Head) which is not repeated at 11.7f. At any rate, one

It is only at this point that both orders, that of the creation (on the basis of Gen 2) and that of the covenantal nuptiality (on the basis of the prophets) can be bound together into a New Testament synthesis: Eph 5. The sign that we have more here than a mere collection of previously existing elements, that we have a creative unification of these, is the introduction of the soteriological theme, and this not in a vague form that could find a place if need be even in a gnostic drama of redemption, but—as always in Paul—in the specifically New Testament, staurological form. 'The husband is the head of the wife, as Christ is the Head of the Church'—this is the first time that he speaks of the Church as a whole, and no longer of a particular community—'he who is the saviour (σωτήρ) of his body. As the Church submits to Christ, so should wives submit to their husbands. Husbands, love your wives, as Christ loved the Church and gave himself for her, so that he might sanctify her, having washed her with the bath of water in the word, so that he might present the Church to himself glorious, without spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but holy and blameless' (5.23–27). It is clear that Paul begins here by projecting his thought in advance from the creaturely, sexual sphere (which is the subject of his exhortation) to the soteriological sphere: he offers the husband a boundless image of the bodily gift of self, which he can look at, but not truly imitate. For this Church, which Christ has loved to the point of giving himself for her, is indeed 'someone', a reality that is pre-existent in God's election of her—and yet, as the holy and spotless bride, she is only the outcome of his pouring-out of himself: she is in fact not his partner, but his fruit. From both perspectives, the relationship between Christ and the Church (even when it is presented as a model to marriage partners) goes far beyond the natural relationship of the sexes, which experiences itself as subsumed by the former relationship and given a point of reference utterly superior to itself. Thus Paul can conclude by affirming: 'This mystery (of man and cannot argue from this that there is any lack of immediacy in the relationship between Christ and the woman; but it is best to leave open everything that is unsaid. Cf. Thüsing, Per Christum, op. cit., pp. 25–29.

---

woman, who become one flesh) is great, and I say this because of its relationship to Christ and the Church' (v. 32). But Paul, who up to this point has interpreted the order of creation with reference to the order of redemption, goes on to look back from the latter order to the former: 'Thus husbands are obliged to love their wives like their own bodies. The man who loves his wife, loves himself, for no one has ever hated his own flesh: rather, he nourishes and cares for it, as Christ does for the Church. For we are members of his body, "therefore the man will leave his father and his mother and will cleave to his wife, and the two will become one flesh"' (5.28–31). The instruction to the husbands now looks back to the situation in Paradise: Eve comes from the rib of Adam, and therefore he loves his own flesh in her—and the soteriological love of Christ for the Church, which is his flesh (for we are his members), likewise appears here as the fulfilment of this original situation. What previously seemed excessive and inimitable—Ecclesia ex latere Christi—now has a basis in the reality of creation. The agape which seemed to hover unattainably above eros (baptism and Word—the event in which the Church is born—have their roots in the bloody gift of self Christ made on the Cross) brings to its fulfilment a mystery of a lower order, in which the erotic love of the husband actually seemed to be self-love, almost a condition of being in love with his own body. Should such self-love on the lowest rung of the ladder, the stage of the individual personal love of man and woman, point up, through the relationship between Christ and the Church, to a self-love on the highest rung, where the individual personal love between the Father and the Son in the Spirit is synthesised once again in the self-love of the selfless eternal love? And would the love with which Christ cherishes and cares for the Church as his own flesh, be then a reflection of this eternal love which loves itself and gives glory to itself in all things? This at least is how Augustine saw it.[23]

In order to understand correctly what is said here, one must look back at the prologue to Ephesians, which was expounded above.[24] There, Paul spoke of the election by God before the creation of the world, so that we might be 'holy and blameless' (the same words that are used at 5.27) before him, and that we might be the praise of the glory of his grace; but this is 'in his Beloved', who is always the one in whom we have 'the redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins' (1.7), the one who—like 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world' (Rev 13.8)—is always, from the very outset, the one who was bloodily crucified for his Church. This at any rate excludes the gnostic concept that may be lurking in the background of Paul's affirmations—though only so that it may be refuted and excluded—viz., the idea that before time, or at the end of time, an eternal 'marriage of the gods' takes place in Heaven between two powers, one of which is called 'redeemer' (σωτήρ) and the other 'Church' (ἐκκλησία),[25] and that this marriage must be reproduced on the lower level of the human sexes. Paul nails this myth to the Cross and thereby demythologises it. And it is remarkable that even in the case of Valentinus, for whom the myth becomes a soteriological drama in which the redeemer goes down from Heaven to a degraded Sophia-Ecclesia in order to bring her back home, the myth stops short at the Christian Cross, which it separates into a 'true', unbloody Cross above and an irrelevant bloody Cross that is at best a hint and a metaphor of the spiritual Cross. It is in the true, bloody Cross, which presupposes a true Incarnation and thus true human sexuality, that we have the touchstone of what is Christian. And the insoluble puzzle of the gnostic dualism (between the heavenly syzygy and its earthly sexual imitation) is solved only when the genuine creaturely sexuality of man and woman is thought of as fundamentally related over and above itself to an eternal, holy and spotless standing before God, in the love of the incarnate Christ for his bride, which is the Church that consists of human persons. It is not said that this love, as agape, is merely eschatologically sublimated eros; for, as God predetermined things, agape is the first (Eph 1.4) and must impress itself as a form on eros (5.25,28,29,33); and yet what was predetermined does not become a real Church until the Agapētos, the beloved Son, has shed his blood as a human being and as a man for his bride—which is undeniably a human, feminine bride—in order to give her from himself the form that is to be hers for ever. Since human sexuality serves this mystery, it is sanctified sacramentally; but at the same time, it is as a whole transposed above itself. It lends to the nuptiality between God and the world the red hue of life—the colour of sex and of flowing blood—but only to pass away, in itself, and to enter the greater sphere of which it is the 'mystery'.

---

[23] Texts in my selection from Augustine, Das Antlitz der Kirche (2nd edn. 1955), pp. 118–127.

---

[24] See above, pp. 392ff.

[25] Examples from gnostic and Jewish- and Christian-gnostic texts in H. Schlier's excursus on the hieros gamos mentioned above (op. cit., p. 206, n. 2 and 3, with further bibliography).

After Christ, it is too late for a sexuality that would suffice for itself as a mystery, and would round itself off and be closed in on itself (1 Cor 7.6ff.,29). For the New Testament, it is time to cross over with Paul from the order of marriage into virginity, i.e. into the eschatological nuptiality. Where it is possible to live directly out of the universal truth of the incarnate love between Christ and the Church, there is no further need for the detour via the individual symbol of this truth. This truth is the transformation of the whole life of the Redeemer into generative fruitfulness—his existence as Eucharist—and the transformation of the whole existence of the redeemed human person into the obedient fiat that the Church speaks to God, the perfect ὑποτάσσεσθαι ἐν παντί, 'submission in everything' (Eph 5.24). Nevertheless, the completed image of God in the world picks up once more the creaturely image, the duality of the two persons of man and woman in the one human nature. The image and the natural theology that are to be found in human togetherness are inchoative, just as the natural theology of Acts 17.27, 'to seek God, if perhaps they could feel after him and find him', is an inchoative image. Neither the reference to one's fellow human being nor the natural reference to God come to their fulfilment outside the relationship between Christ and the Church. Both belong to the presuppositions established by God, which he required in order to reveal 'the glory of his grace'; and this glory does not wish to see God glorified above man, but in man. Not only is the eros between human beings the basis that permits God to impress his own agape on the human person; the encounter face to face between man and woman is also the basis that permits the possibility of such a face to face encounter between God and humanity. In the Church, humanity is given a face for God. She is the body that is given its form by the Spirit and the blood of God and of Christ, only because at the same time she is his bride and his spouse. Although the Church stands 'in a kind of personality of her own vis-à-vis' Christ,[26] this is different from the relationships between human personalities in that Christ does not find the Church already in existence, but brings her into existence out of himself, and for himself, by virtue of his own gift of himself. The Baptist (Jn 3.29) and Paul (2 Cor 11.2) are only subordinate 'fathers of the bride': the one who truly 'leads' the bride 'to himself, and before his own face, into the power and the splendour of his look',[27] is Christ himself. Once again, of course, it is not into a relationship closed in on itself that he leads her: at the last, he wishes 'to make over the kingdom to God the Father' and to 'submit' (ὑποτάσσεσθαι) to the Father just as the bride has 'submitted' to the bridegroom, 'so that God may be all in all' (1 Cor 15.28). Even the act whereby the Son brings the bride into existence for himself is ultimately a work of the Father, 'who has put everything into subjection to him' (15.27): there exists no heavenly 'syzygy', but, if everything has been created 'through the one Lord Jesus Christ' and has been led to the Father, then 'for us there is only one God, the Father, from whom all things come and for whom we have been created' (1 Cor 8.6). The trinitarian love is the only ultimate form of all love—both the love between God and men, and that between human persons.

[26] H. Schlier, Epheserbrief, p. 279.

[27] Ibid.

3. SETTING OUT TOWARDS GOD

In treating the glory of Christ, we had to consider the tension between the radiance of the highest light that comes from God, Vidimus gloriam eius and the deepest concealment of this same light so that it becomes unrecognisable. We find the same tension when we speak of the glorification of the divine glory, which must take place in the openness of truth and of parrhesia, and yet must hold out in naked faith and in the poverty of hope, until the breaking-in of the kingdom. What has become for us a certainty beyond all doubt, something to be heard, seen and touched, still lets us walk only 'in faith, not in sight' (2 Cor 5.7); 'hope that is seen is not hope' (Rom 8.24). It is from this contradiction that there derives the immense movement that came into the world through Christ, the movement between the presence of the eschaton and its future, and this movement is the Church, which essentially is an institution that never rests for a single moment, but must always be breaking off and setting out. But she would not possess such a potential for the future, unless she had the urgency of the maturing seed as a present reality within herself. Col 1.27 uses the language of glory to express this contradiction, which is constitutive of the Church and is to be the object of our reflections in this final chapter: 'At this time, the mystery that was hidden from earlier times and generations has been revealed to his holy ones, to those to whom God wished to make known the riches of the glory of this mystery among the peoples of the world, which is "Christ-in-you", the hope of glory'. The contents of the glory is known, and can be named: 'Christ-in-you'. This concerns the peoples of the world, whether they know it or not—the Church appears only as the 'consecrated one', who is privileged to know and obliged to proclaim it—and yet, this content remains a hope. The tension that constitutes the essence of Christian existence (but ultimately concerns the peoples of the world) is even greater and more paradoxical than the tension in the life of the earthly Jesus; for the Christian lives on the basis of the unity of the Cross and Resurrection of Christ (i.e., on the basis of the unity of what is not yet, and what is already), in order to hold out for the glory which is still to come. This tension is so great that it seems to consume Christian existence to the point of existential self-contradiction: muero porque no muero.

We shall argue in three stages. First, eschatological existence is the transition (in Christ) from every state of being closed in to what is universal: the Church has a form only so that she may transcend herself ever afresh and give the world transcendent form. Second, eschatological existence means bringing into the future what has always been future: setting out towards God's future together with the world, and indeed with the pledge of the 'sighing Spirit' in it. Finally, eschatological existence is therefore existence in a love that makes an undivided flame out of cross and blessedness.

a. The transition

The gospel of the grace of God in Christ is first of all the transition from a national religion (which sees itself as such even in the images that express its eschatological hope) to a message for the whole of humanity. 'We proclaim Christ, by speaking to the conscience of everyone and instruct everyone in all wisdom, in order to present everyone in perfection in Christ' (Col 1.28). The 'people of God' in the old covenant was a closed people: its religious duties included the demarcation against other peoples and their religions. It is true that Israel had been chosen from the peoples as 'Yahweh's inheritance' (Deut 32.9), and therefore had a destiny which transcended its existence as a particular people; nevertheless it was, in order to make visible the concreteness and uniqueness of God and of his action, a concrete and unique people: 'Israel according to the flesh' (1 Cor 10.18). No matter how far God transcends this basis, at which the term 'people of God' is to be taken at its full literal value (Rom 11.1f.; 15.10), he will never withdraw from it (Rom 11.29), for it is the 'root' (Rom 11.18) in which 'the promises' are based (Rom 3.2; 9.4). And as long as Jesus is carrying out his earthly mission in the flesh, he can present himself only as the fulfilment of this promise, while of course claiming to embody the immediate and ultimate fulfilment of all that God had included in the promise to Abraham and in the instruction of the law, of wisdom and of the prophets. This is the reason for his kingly freedom, for his rejection of every secret act of taking possession of God through pious achievements, for the rejection also of all ready-made concepts of fulfilment (in the titles that could be applied to him), and for the claim he makes on the whole of Israel, as this is expressed in the choice of the 'Twelve' (as 'judges of the tribes', Mt 19.28).[1] 'Salvation comes from the Jews' (Jn 4.22); and Jesus' mission is directed to the Jews (Mt 10.5f.). The breakthrough comes only with the rejection of the 'Messiah' on the part of the Jews, and with Jesus' handing over of his earthly work to the Holy Spirit at the Resurrection. E. Peterson locates this breakthrough at the moment when the 'Twelve' no longer feel bound to Jerusalem, but dare to make the transition to the mission and become the 'twelve Apostles'; Luke has synthesised this moment proleptically and prophetically in his theology of the feast of Pentecost.[2] Just as 'Christ according to the flesh' (2 Cor 5.16) has become something of the past, so has the whole of 'Israel according to the flesh' (1 Cor 10.18); indeed, the dividing line between the rejection of the 'Messiah' and his raising-up by God is identical with the dividing line between the 'wrath' of God, which patiently endures the vessels that are ripe for destruction, and the 'mercy' of God for the vessels that 'he designated beforehand for glory, in order to make known the riches of his glory' (Rom 9.22f.). The ancient kabōd (Rom 9.4) likewise declines;

[1] N. A. Dahl, 'Jesus and Israel', in: Das Volk Gottes. Eine Untersuchung zum Kirchenbewusstsein des Urchristentums (2nd edn., 1963), pp. 144–167.

[2] 'Die Kirche' (1929), also in: Theologische Traktate (1951), pp. 411–429. '"The Twelve" belong to the messianic kingdom . . . but "the twelve apostles" exist only when the bodiliness of the "Lord" is transfigured, in virtue of a call by the Holy Spirit . . . The problem of the Church consists in this decisive fact, that "the Twelve" are identical with the "twelve apostles"' (p. 418). Cf. M. Simon, Verus Israel (1948); H. Schlier, 'Die Entscheidung für die Heidenmission in der Urchristenheit', in: Die Zeit der Kirche (1956), pp. 90–107, where Peterson's theses are nuanced.

the future is shown us only by the one who was intended from the outset in the 'root' of Abraham, in pure faith in the God who raises the dead: the blessing for all peoples (Gen 12.3). There was therefore always this dialectic between the fleshly (Ishmael) and the spiritual (Isaac) in the ancient people, a dialectic in which only the will of the one who calls shows the true direction (in the case of Rebecca's twins, he chooses Jacob, not Esau); God's plan suffers no deviation at any point (Rom 9.6–13). Yet even the spiritual Isaac is also a man of flesh, just like the great, unique 'heir' (Gal 3.16), in union with whom alone all the others can become fellow-heirs (Gal 3.29; Rom 8.17).

This shows the profound problematic of the Church after Easter. She is essentially the transcending 'remnant' of Israel (Rom 9.27, 29; 11.5), which is leaving behind the protection offered by its restriction to one people and is opening itself without protection to the universality of the peoples of the world. It is only in a quite improper and paradoxical sense that the terms 'people of God' and 'Israel of God' (Gal 6.16)[3] can be applied to this remnant, a sense that transcends the proper meaning of these terms. This remnant must have a certain earthly visibility, in order to be able to bear the essential eschatological message out beyond its own confines (Rom 10.14ff.), but it has 'no law' (Gal 5.23) any more, other than the 'higher law' of the divine love which has given itself for all, the 'law of Christ' (Gal 6.2; 1 Cor 9.21); it has no rites now, other than 'dying and rising together with Christ' (Rom 6.3ff.) and the breaking of the bread in which both of these are proclaimed and made present (1 Cor 11.23ff.): what a paradox for mortal men! It has no right, other than the right to use 'spiritual weapons' to bring into the redemptive total obedience of Christ those who are willing to believe (1 Cor 10.4–6); no strength other than the weakness of the Cross, in which God's power is perfected (2 Cor 12.10, 9), no 'letter of recommendation' other than believing and loving hearts (2 Cor 3.1ff.). The whole is a provisional arrangement that lasts for all ages,[4] and all the more so because the 'root that bears you' (Rom 11.18) has become inaccessible through Israel's falling behind, and the definitive fulfilment of the promise to Israel, the 'mystery' of the final end-time (Rom 11.25f.), has still not come. In all its exiles and scatterings abroad, Israel, as an earthly people, was always centripetal: Jerusalem is always presented as the ultimate point of assembly (Third Isaiah); the New Testament community is much more radically a 'wandering people of God' (Heb 3–4), more explicitly expropriated into what lies 'outside' (Heb 13.11ff.), 'for here we have no abiding polis, but we wander in search of the polis to come' (13.14). According to Paul, the opening of the once closed 'people' to the universality of the peoples—made possible only by the Cross and Resurrection of Christ—is the central contents of the 'mystery' (Eph 1.13f.; 2.11ff.; 3.6). The Church is the service that continues the service of Christ, revealing to the world the 'gospel', viz. the message that is the reality of God's reconciliation of the world in Christ: through the word, and through the attestation of a life that is borne by the cultic act of Christ and itself becomes a cultic act within the aim of making the peoples of the world a 'cultic offering' (Rom 15.15f.). Thus it is possible for the Old Testament titles, especially that of the 'priestly people', to be taken up afresh with new contents (1 Pet 2.9; Rev 1.6; 5.9f.; 7.13ff.). But the collective element is essentially personalised, because of Christ: the representatives of the new 'people' are those who have been explicitly expropriated by him and sent by him for this eschatological service of the world, people who incarnate the reality of the 'gospel' for the world in the public 'liturgy' of the word and of the gift they make of their lives (Phil 2.17; 2 Tim 4.6): 'a trinitarian ministry of sacrifice',[5] because they portray and offer the redemption of the Father in the form of the Cross and Resurrection of the Son in the power of the Spirit who creates anew (2 Cor 5.17–21). They are not only signs for the world, but the form (τύπος) that is stamped upon the 'Church' (Phil 3.17; 2 Thess 3.9; 1 Tim 4.12; Tit 2.7; 1 Pet 5.2f.). The existential self-consecration (λογικὴ λατρειά, Rom 12.1) of all the believers corresponds to the sacrifice of those who 'form' them, for the consecration of the world to God; but they conform the world to themselves, not themselves to the world (12.2). Paul's existence, as this is described at length, has no characteristics that are not found in the existence of every Christian, but in his case they are more visible and almost, as it were placarded, so that it is possible to see in Paul the whole paradoxical indefinability of the position of Christians—in worldly terms, their lack of a place (utopia). The only point of reference in the present—between the historical 'past' of the events of Christ and the historical (?) future of the christological parousia is the gospel, in which (as we have already seen)[6] the entire 'glory' of the Christian existence as service is concentrated.

---

[3] The paradoxical and also polemical meaning of this phrase is clear from the entire context of the Letter to the Galatians.

---

[4] 'The one who has not understood that the Church is something provisional, has not understood what the Church is at all': Dahl, op. cit., p. 218.

[5] H. Schlier, 'Grundelemente des priesterlichen Amtes im NT', in: Theologie und Philosophie 44 (1969), p. 165.

The three sections of argumentation in 2 Corinthians—3.1–4.6; 4.7–5.8 (or 10); 5.9 (or 11)–6.10—for all their christological and ecclesiological riches, have only one central theme: the glory of the gospel of the apostolic ministry as service of the gospel. If we wish to take up once more our earlier question,[7] whether the Christian Church has a form—and we must conclude here by asking this question—then the best way to answer is to examine these three concentrated pieces of argumentation. It is quite true that the form they show is being pulled apart in an almost unbearable tension, and in innerworldly terms this can be only a form cut to pieces, unrecognisable, impossible to reproduce, and ultimately falling apart into sheer contradictions (6.8ff.). The Church, as a whole, has no other form. She may drape herself in ever new garments—those of a static institution with official hierarchies, books of law, regulations for cult and sacraments, theologies closed firmly in on themselves, etc.—but all of these attempts to give herself a form are unable to do away with this incomprehensible oscillation that belongs to her existence in the world: her glory lies not in her, but in the gospel—she serves, and the gospel has glory to the extent that it is the inexplicable 'presentation' of one who (as past and future) is absent; but the presence is the work and the self-attestation of the Pneuma.

---

[6] See above.

[7] Cf. Vol. I, pp. 556ff.

The first section (3.1–4.6) has as its centre the opposition between gramma and Pneuma, old covenant and new, but in relation, not to the Christ-event, but to the apostolic existence from which the form of the Church may be read off. This existence has no 'letter of recommendation', no self-evident character, and cannot even show itself openly (unlike the Torah and the circumcision which the Judaists can display). Paul's authentication is not something he carries around in his pocket: it is within, in his heart, through his community. There he is 'easy to understand and readable for everyone' (3.2), just as he also 'openly proclaims the truth for everyone capable of bearing responsibility for himself, before the face of God' (4.2),[8] although for the 'unbelievers', what is disclosed remains concealed, since 'the God of this world has darkened their understanding, to keep them from seeing the splendour of the gospel of the glory of Christ' (4.4). The Apostle has no worldly power with which to combat this worldly blindness: his whole 'power comes from God', not from the letter but from the 'Spirit', and it is good that this is so, because the one who uses the letter as his weapon kills, while the one who achieves something through the Spirit 'makes alive' (3.6). It is indeed true that the letter written on stone was 'glorious' (3.7)—not only Solomon's Temple and the whole fascinating ritual which the heart of the Jews longingly yearned to see (Ps 84; Sir 50), but also the sacred institution with its minutest gradings (1 Chron 23–29), its tradition (2 Chron 13), reform (ch. 14) and administration (ch. 17), including the prophetic element (ch. 18) and the propaganda for it (ch. 19), and even the bloody wars carried out for its sake in 'the Holy Spirit' and in 'faith in Yahweh' (20.14, 20) and the repeated restorations (chs. 24; 29; 34). But this whole glory was, ultimately, a 'service of condemnation' (2 Cor 3.9) and met with a corresponding end (2 Chron 36).

---

[8] On συνείδησις: TDNT VII 914ff. (Maurer).

Therefore, already in the logia of Jesus, what is present in him is quite simply an intensification that surpasses what existed before.[9] It is possible to draw conclusions from the glory of old, which was visible on earth, about the new glory: 'if what is transitory passes through glory, how much more does what endures remain in glory' (2 Cor 3.11); but the transitory, the temporal and the earthly—including the glory that seems to be visible—is precisely something concealed. This is true both of the face of Moses, and of the law, and of the Jews: all remain veiled (3.12–15), so that one must turn from what is visible but concealed, in a U-turn (ἐπιστρεφειν) to the Lord, in order to 'catch sight of' what is revealed and glorious, and thereby also to 'reflect' it.[10] And the more one sees the splendour of the Lord without concealment, the more does the one who sees take on precisely this paradoxical form of glory: 'we are being transformed into the same image, from one glory to another, in the manner that (this splendour) shines out from the pneumatic Lord' (3.18). But what is this new splendour which shines forth upon the servant of the gospel through the Lord in the power of the Spirit?

The answer is given in the second section, 4.7–5.8 (or 10). There is a 'mighty superabundance' of God in 'earthen vessels', so that it may not be counted to the credit of the vessels, but of God. But the Apostle's weakness is not a human weakness, but the weakness of Christ: the paradox of the relationship between human failure and God's power is ultimately not an anthropological paradox, but a christological paradox. This can take various forms: the Apostle can give existential embodiment, vicariously, to the side of death, in order that the side of life may come to the benefit of the community (4.12), but he can and must also display both sides in his own existence (4.10–11), for otherwise he would not be displaying in a credible manner the gospel of death and Resurrection. But how is this possible? The Resurrection of Jesus, which lies beyond his death, surely cannot be displayed within time together with his death—and this, not in Jesus himself, but in the earthen vessels of other men! No, answers Paul, this is possible, through the 'Pneuma of faith' which indeed forces him to speak of the gospel (which is death and Resurrection in one): 'I believe, and therefore I speak' (4.13 = Ps 116.10 or 115.1 LXX), and, as in the psalm, this occurs under the pressure of the experience of death and in the presence of the listening community. And if, already, the psalmist can sing of his hope in the God who saves, out of the experience of death, how much more the Apostle, whose word contains from the start the synthesis of the death and Resurrection of Christ and who therefore 'knows' (4.14) that he will be raised together with the community, for whose sake all this is taking place. This 'knowledge' will generate 'overflowing thanksgiving to the glory of God' in the community (v. 15), and is itself justified by the fact that the gospel is not the neat union of two equal parts—Cross and Resurrection—but is rather the dynamic transition whereby the former makes way for the latter: in E. Stauffer's phrase, the gospel is a 'formula expressing a breakthrough'.[11] This formula does not remain in a static dialectic, but also gives a prevalent forwards momentum to Christian existence: 'Therefore we do not give up, for even when our outer man is destroyed, our inner man is renewed from day to day. The light tribulation, which never lasts for more than today, brings about for us an eternal weight of glory that takes its measure in a superabundance that leads on to ever greater superabundance' (v. 17). This presupposes that our eye of faith is directed, not to the 'visible', but to the 'invisible', for the risen glory of Christ is indeed essentially a hidden glory. What is visible causes us to 'sigh', but since we have 'the down-payment of the Spirit', we are 'cheerful' even while we sigh in yearning (5.1–8). 'Absence' and 'presence' are only relative values, and as such are irrelevant compared to the confidence of the 'pilgrim' that he is doing the will of the Lord and is pleasing to him (v. 9).

---

[9] 'More than Jonah, more than Solomon' (Mt 12.41f.), more than the Baptist (Lk 7.28f.), more than David (cf. Mk 12.35ff. par.), 'more than the Temple' (Mt 12.5f.); Jesus is the 'wisdom' that speaks (Lk 11.49ff.: wisdom speaks = Mt 23.34ff.: Jesus speaks), and he is above the Law and Moses (Mt 5.22ff.).

[10] On both possible meanings of κατοπτρίζεσθαι at 3.18, cf. the next chapter.

---

[11] 'Vom λόγος τοῦ σταυροῦ und seiner Logik': Theol. Stud. u. Kritik 103 (1931), pp. 179–188.

In the third section, the official and thus the ecclesial existence definitively becomes the service of the trinitarian-christological event: it is the awareness, transparent in the presence of God (5.11), of having been definitively uprooted from what was one's own through the love of Christ, who died and rose from all, and of having become bound in obligation to the Lord (5.14–15): but Christ's gift of self is the Father's work of reconciling the world, a work which took place in the abolition of the 'old' (v. 17) and of the 'flesh' (v. 16) and in the 'new creation' of the Spirit, and which is continually represented in its contemporaneity to the world in the 'embassy' and 'exhortation' of the Apostle (v. 20). The one who is an 'ambassador' can also call himself God's 'fellow worker' (συνεργοῦντες, 6.1). He is an instrument that is put to use in a work that is carried out by God for the sake of the world at each particular moment in the Church's ministry. In this work, the Apostle is a 'deacon, a servant of God' (6.4). The closing hymnic section shows how great an existential claim this service makes, and how completely the instrument is exploited (in the sense of the paradox of the gospel). The passage speaks first of the whole range of exterior tribulations (vv. 4–5), then of the interior dispositions that are required (vv. 6–7), and finally of the paradoxes—impossible to resolve in a tidy fashion—of a radically Christian existence in the face of the Church and of the world (vv. 8–10). This is precisely what is to be expected from the union of Cross and Resurrection in the kerygma, and it is precisely this union which fills the human vessel: 'acknowledged and jeered at, spoken of badly and well, accused of deceit and yet true, unknown and yet well known, dying yet behold, we live, stricken yet not dead, seemingly sorrowful yet always cheerful, seemingly beggars yet enriching many, men who have nothing yet possess everything'. Although the word 'glory' no longer occurs in this section, it is here that it takes on its greatest fullness, indeed has a triumphant ring, since the paradoxes become increasingly 'formulae expressing a breakthrough' into the light, so that the first side has now only the effect of a 'quasi' that gives way to the 'mighty predominance' of the second side.

All of this is understood here as the transcendence of the new and eschatological existence over the national and institutional religion that was closed in upon itself. Just as the Old Testament partnership of a God in Heaven with a people on earth is superseded by the trinitarian event whereby God reconciles in Christ and in the Spirit—since Christ and those who are his are 'one person' (Gal 3.28)—so too the existence of the Apostle and the community can no longer be located in a position lying between God and the world. The Apostle, as the one who embodies the gospel, comes to the community and to the world from within the sphere of the divine activity, without in the least separating himself from solidarity with the community and the world, since he goes towards God together with the community and the world in the same tribulation and the same courage born of faith (2 Cor 6.7); and it is clear from the whole of the New Testament that the Church of Christ, his body and his bride, comes to the world from the activity of God, making proclamation, giving example and proferring invitation—in a position over against the world that is absolutely required, in order for her to be able to address the world—without for a moment abandoning solidarity with that aim of her mission, viz. the world she is addressing. On the contrary, the 'glory of the gospel' affects the world as a whole just as directly as it does the Church; its message is cosmic, and it is this which gives it an absolutely new quality when compared with all previous and contemporary images of the world, philosophies, mysteries and political religions.[12] The 'light of the gospel of the glory of Christ' (2 Cor 4.4) enters a sphere of freedom hitherto unknown, since God 'snatched us from the power of darkness and transferred us to the kingdom of the Son of his love' (Col 1.13). In relation to this light, 'darkness' defines all the innerworldly 'systems of law' which kept man a prisoner, whether the Old Testament 'law' or the Graeco-Roman-hellenistic 'law' (νόμος) of the polis, whether the cosmic mega-polis of the Stoa or the half-cosmic, half-political polis of the great kings from Alexander to Augustus. The Christians' experience of freedom makes both these forms of a sacral world system of law, which had reduced man to a slave, melt into one; just as the Gentile peoples were ruled and tyrannised by 'cosmic powers', so ultimately the law of Yahweh is not Yahweh himself, but (as Judaism and early Christianity saw) something mediated by 'angels', i.e. by intermediary powers (Acts 7.30; Gal 3.19; Heb 2.2).

---

[12] K. Prümm, Christentum als Neuheitserlebnis. Durchblick durch die christlich-antike Begegnung (1939).

Naturally, both the Jewish and the Gentile forms of Hellenism sketched many concepts in which the narrowness of the national dimension would be opened out on to an oikoumenē that embraced all mankind and indeed the whole of the cosmos. This created a certain preliminary understanding, and made available the categories for future development.

On the Jewish side, Philo and Josephus outdid each other in liberal sketches of how the old religion of Yahweh could be extended to take on a significance for all mankind. The law of Moses is coterminous with the natural law;[13] the Jewish fidelity to 'what has been handed on' ('what comes from the fathers') is the same as the fidelity of other peoples; it is precisely the Jews who distinguish themselves by their love of (divine-cosmic) Wisdom and are thus the most philosophical people. But is its God not one who transcends the world? Here Jewish propaganda makes common cause with the Stoa and Platonism, for both of which the 'wise man' transcends the boundaries of the polis and of the nation and is a free man and a 'foreigner' in relation to them,[14] with his home either in the megalopolis of the cosmos as a whole (according to the Stoa) or in the spiritual world of ideas or the divine world of the stars (according to Platonism). The exodus from Egypt, the exile in Babylon, and the existence as resident aliens on the margin of the Roman empire can be dissolved philosophically in this way, and so given a justification. But where do these philosophical ideas lead? The Stoic concepts could not get beyond the point of a free submission of the human individual to the law of the all-embracing cosmic logos which governed both animals and plants and human beings, a nomos which finally remained only the extension to world dimensions of the nomos of the individual polis. And when the attempt was made later to give an innerworldly political expression to this universal nomos, it was necessary to fall back on the idea of a divine kingdom: a mortal and fallible man becomes the representative of the divine nomos, in order to be a head with absolute authority for the human oikoumenē which is the gathering of all the individual peoples into one 'kingdom'. The Platonic concept, if carried through to its conclusion in a radical manner, has no interest in the political events which are mere shadows; it disincarnates man and turns its interest to a Jesus who is purely spiritual or else attainable through mystical experience. He belongs to the kind of 'invisible Church' that Philo praised,[15] just as the written law is only the concretisation (for those who need this) of the unwritten law of God,[16] and the Temple cult is only the symbol of the cult in the great temple that is the world.[17] Here, once again, we stand before the 'bridge that cannot be made to span the gap':[18] it is possible for the human person to attain transcendence either by submitting to a cosmic 'law' (in which case, he is not free), or by separating his spirit from his bodiliness (in which case, he has ceased to be a human being). Even if Philo and other hellenistic Jews still somewhere retained their messianic hope, 'they could always fall back on the assurance, "We have no other king than Caesar" (Jn 19.15), if the Messiah failed to arrive'.[19]—We may say, in schematic terms, that four paths lay open to the ancient world. First, the path from the closed polis or nation to a cosmological cosmopolitanism; but, to use Paul's expression, this remained subject to the 'elements of the world' (Gal 4.3,9; Col 2.8,20). Second, the path to a purely human cosmopolitanism, which of its very nature includes an 'orientation towards atheism (even if often only on the level of emotions)'.[20] Third, the path to the attempt at a synthesis of both, which leads to the emperor cult. Finally, the path to an escape from the cosmos, the path that flees from the existence of the world and of man.

---

[13] Philo, Spec. leg. II 129f.; III 137; IV 131; Vita Mos. II 48.51f., etc.

[14] On the theme of 'foreignness' within Judaism, borrowing from Greek metaphysics, cf. Dahl, op. cit., pp. 93, 111, 116, 196.

---

[15] Spec. leg. I 324–326; Virt, 108.

[16] E. R. Goodenough, The Politics of Philo Judaeus (1938), pp. 72f.

[17] Vita Mos. II 71–108, and often.

[18] Cf. Vol. IV of this work, pp. 214ff.

[19] A. A. T. Ehrhardt, Politische Metaphysik von Solon bis Augustin, 2 vols. (1959), quotation from Vol. II, p. 34.

It is only if we have these desperate alternatives before us, that we understand how open was the space into which the Christian message led people forth. This space is opened, and indeed created, by the victory over death of the one who was crucified: it is the space which is identical with the man Jesus, who 'was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father' (Rom 6.4) and now 'dies no more', but 'lives for God' (6.9f.). It is, therefore, essentially an anthropological space, and this is expressed in New Testament terms when it is said that this man was exalted 'above all the heavens' (Eph 4.10), i.e. above all the cosmic powers or angels or dire controllers of history or servants of God (Heb 1.1–3.6). The era that begins with the Resurrection is truly the era of man, but of 'the man Jesus Christ, who gave himself as a ransom for all. This is the message of salvation' (1 Tim 2.5f.). Even if the Christian Church attempts to express herself by using the categories of all the conceptual sketches that have been mentioned above, she either totally eliminates these or else unites what they could not unite in themselves. What belongs to the 'cosmic polis' is no longer subject to the nomos of the world-phusis; both the Gentile nomos and the Jewish nomos have fallen away, so that one now lives only 'within the nomos of Christ' (ἔννομος Χριστοῦ, 1 Cor 9.21): and this is nothing other than the law of his free gift of self to his fellow men. Therefore this Christ must also take the place of the emperor as the sacral representative of the world-law, but in such a way that his law of love is superior to all sacral-political authorities. Christ himself distinguished between God and Caesar by means of the coin for the tax (Mt 22.15ff.) and declared that the 'sons', unlike the 'subjects', were free, even though they paid the tax (Mt 17.25ff.); and although the early Church acknowledged an authority belonging to the state (Jn 18.28–19.16; Rom 13), this authority was stripped of its numinous quality to such an extent that the Church 'attacked the religious basis of the ancient state' and, 'in this sense, was "revolutionary"',[21] long before all the difficulties which inevitably followed such a teaching, both those of a new union of Church and empire (in the case of Constantine and the East) and those of an increasing secularisation of the state leading to an exceedingly dangerous dualism (in the case of the West). The disclosure of the eschatological space called 'Jesus Christ' leads into this problematic. As we shall consider later, the present reality of this space is heavy with promise for the future: this is neither Jewish nor futurist messianism, nor a Platonic timeless present, because the history of the world has its goal in the 'day of Christ', the breakthrough of the glory which he has already begun to possess. It is also true that the anthropological age that has begun with Christ is liberation from the powers and laws of the world only because he has carried out God the Father's plan for the world in the free obedience of love and brought it to the decisive turning-point: this plan for the world is and remains divine and is therefore prior to the world which it embraces totally. But this is the opposite of a chain of events governed by destiny, as the Stoics conceived of this, for the obedience of the Son leads into the freedom of the Fatherly and triune love. The anthropological age has indeed demythologised the cosmos, but not robbed it of its divine element. The freedom which Christ opens up is at one and the same time, and indivisibily, the freedom of God and of man. Man must make his decision for this indivisible unity; escape (in Platonic terms) into what lies outside the cosmos has been made impossible by the Resurrection, and to remain stubbornly in the old age hands over the individual anew to the 'lordship, power and strength' (1 Cor 15.24) of the collective, and to the 'last enemy', death (v. 26). The gospel is a herald that cries out to summon man to make this decision.

---

[20] Ibid., Vol. I, p. 161.

---

[21] Ibid., Vol. II, p. 3.

In order to understand the full significance of this decision, we must think back to the predestination 'before the foundation of the world' and, in accordance with this, to what was said about 'appropriation through expropriation'. The living God is the life of the creature, but also its freedom: when he calls the creature to himself, and the creature chooses him instead of itself, it finds in this expropriation both its freedom and its home. And this is not independent of the Cross and Resurrection of the Son, who, as the second Adam, brings the first Adam into his own genuine nature: not into a Platonist, individualistic bodilessness, but into the eschatological bodiliness that belongs to the nuptial partner of God. Thus there is no absurdity in speaking of an eschatological 'citizenship' with God (πολίτευμα ἐν οὐρανοῖς, Phil 3.20), or of a 'place made ready' by Christ with God (Jn 14.2f.), or of a real 'polis with firm foundations, designed and built by God' (Heb 11.10), for indeed God could truly call himself the God of those who believe in him only 'after he had made ready such a polis for them' (Heb 11.16): 'the polis of the living God' (Heb 12.22), which, as a sign of its eschatological transcendence, is called in the Bible the 'new, holy, higher, heavenly Jerusalem' (Gal 4.26; Heb 12.22; Rev 3.12; 21.2,10). We see how real and powerful the presence of the 'glory' (Rev 21.11) of Jerusalem is, even in its temporary hiddenness (Col 3.3), in the reality of the freedom that the Christian wins vis-à-vis all forms of cosmic order. His experience is that he 'has been set free for freedom through Christ' (Gal 5.1), that he is therefore 'truly free' (Jn 8.36), that he 'was freed from the law of sin and of death through the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus' (Rom 8.2), and that he is no longer subject to the pressure of any innerworldly nomos, but is subject to 'the perfect law of freedom' (Jas 1.25), which is identical to the king's own law and therefore deserves to be called 'the royal law' (Jas 2.8). This freedom is then nothing other 'than the glory of the existence that has been given a home anew in its original essence'.[22]

Now the heralds's cry that proclaims the gospel the call to decision, is clear: it demands that a choice be made between two freedoms—a freedom, which may take a personal or a collective form, of innerworldly self-determination (αὐτάρκεια), and a freedom of self-giving in faith's obedience to the free love of God. The one who chooses self-determination will remain in the 'servitude' of the world and will be alienated from God, while the one who chooses self-giving has his home with God and is a 'pilgrim and stranger' (1 Pet 1.1; 2.11; Heb 11.13) and a 'resident alien' (1 Pet 1.17; cf. Heb 11.9) in this world. Nevertheless, even this world—by contrast with systems of dualistic gnosis—in its decadent turning-away from God, is already set under the lordship both of the Creator and of the Redeemer today. The New Testament's teaching about the state shows that the Creator maintains his dominion over this world; the New Testament shows that he shares this dominion with the risen man Jesus Christ by speaking of his exaltation 'to the right hand of God' (Rom 8.34, and frequently), 'at the right hand of the majesty on high' (Heb 1.3), and of the gift to him of 'all power in Heaven and on earth' (Mt 28.18), a 'power to subdue all things to himself' (Phil 3.21). Since they are aware of this omnipotence of Christ, the 'strangers' who have been made over to him can even now be aware that 'all is yours . . . life and death, present and future' (1 Cor 3.21f.).[23]

The reason why God and his Christ have not given up their dominion over the world in the old aeon is that even the man who is alienated from God has not ceased to be God's creature and, in principle, the redeemed brother of Christ, although he must make the decision to cross over into the 'new creation' (Gal 6.15; 2 Cor 5.17). For the one who rejects it, the law remains in force—as the Jewish Torah, or as the Gentile nomos written on the heart—as God's call to [22] H. Schlier, 'Das vollkommene Gesetz der Freiheit', in: Die Zeit der Kirche (1956), pp. 199.

---

[23] The difference from similar Stoic formulations (cf. Lietzmann ad loc., as well as Ehrhardt, op. cit., Vol. II, p. 9, n. 5) is precisely that the Christians are not 'citizens of the world-city', but have their home outside the cosmos.

him; and the authority of the state, which bears the sword and maintains the order of the world, is precisely not the reflection of human autarkeia (whatever form the regime may take, democratic, monarchical, etc.), but remains—like the law, which in itself is 'holy and just and good' (Rom 7.12) 'ordained by God', 'a helper given by God to carry out what is good', which one must obey 'for the sake of conscience' (Rom 13.1ff.; cf. 1 Pet 2.13). It is, however, fundamentally important to note that nowhere in the New Testament does the slightest ray of the divine glory fall upon the structures of the state, as happened in the case of the Old Testament theocracy, and as seemed inseparable from all the forms of the ancient polis. There is nowhere even the faintest suggestion that the state should take on the form of an earthly reflection, a reproduction or representation of the heavenly Jerusalem and its eschatological glory. The structures of the order of what Augustine will call the civitas terrena are nowhere 'transfigured'. No matter how powerful the yearning for such an earthly copy of Heaven on earth will become in the history of the Church—from the early political theology which comes to a close under Constantine, via the eastern and western concept in the middle ages, to the modern attempts at a political theology—this is discredited by the New Testament: 'In principle, a rupture has been brought about which rules out every "political theology" that the Christian proclamation misuses to justify a political situation. Only within Judaism or paganism is it possible to have something like a "political theology"'.[24] The only thing possible for the Christian is to fill the structures of the state with Christian spirit and life, and thus to blunt them a little (the sword becomes superfluous, Rom 13.3; and even the courts can become obsolete, when Christians suffer injustice: 1 Cor 6.1–7). But since these systems embrace neutrally both the citizens of Heaven and the citizens of earth, and cannot be affected by the all-important decision between the two forms of freedom, they can only be 'honoured' by Christians (Rom 13.7; 1 Pet 2.17), not 'loved'. This does not alter the obligation to pray for those who have authority, just as one must pray for all men (1 Tim 2.1). But the authority of the state, with its sword, does not exist primarily for the righteous, but for the 'wicked . . . and irreverent', for 'this is the teaching of the gospel of the glory of the blessed God' (1 Tim 1.9,11). But it is certainly possible that even this authority is exercised by the wicked, as the situation of Revelation shows: the kings of the earth commit fornication with 'great Babylon, the mother of harlots and of all abominations on earth', and the 'merchants get rich through her unheard-of opulence' (Rev 17.5; 18.3). The false god and the false glory establish themselves in politics and economics: 'Their god is the belly, their glory is in their shame' (Phil 3.19). While this authority was neutral, it could be recognised as coming from God, but it has become unrecognisable through the utter opposition to God that is the attitude of those who have power. This is the hour of the martyrdom of Christians; they bear witness with their blood to their inviolable freedom. In Revelation, we are given a description of 'the ultimate possibilities of the world, the depth of things, which begins to disclose itself since the coming of Christ'; here, 'the state, making its appearance as the beast, occupies the final place. It is revealed as the most extreme possibility of the authoritarian world'. [25] As the 'beast', it is the embodiment of the subhuman collective and the utter perversion of the divine-human heavenly Church whose personal 'Head' stamps his own imprint personally on the whole body.

---

[24] E. Peterson, 'Der Monotheismus als politisches Problem' (1935), in: Theologische Traktate (1951), p. 105.

It is not possible to say the same about the 'structures of the Church' (if such a manner of speaking were at all tolerable in New Testament terms), as is clear from the fact that the Church is the place where the thanksgiving of δοξάζειν takes place; and it has been shown that this is a response intimately linked to the δόξα of God, which was revealed in the crucified and risen Lord. The Church is the place where God's mystery has dawned 'now for his holy ones, to whom [25] H. Schlier, 'Die Beurteilung des States im NT', in: Die Zeit der Kirche (1956), p. 15.

---

God wishes to make it clear' as the 'riches of glory' (Col 1.26f.), whether these 'holy ones' are the Apostles or the community as a whole.[26] The Church knows about the eschatological mystery of God—the rescuing of the entire world through its incorporation into Christ—even if this knowledge is for the time being only 'hope of glory'. We have been taken up proleptically by Christ 'into the glory of God', and this gesture of opening the door, is to be continued in the mutual relations of the members of Christ, so that the Church can come into being (Rom 15.7). To the extent that it is possible to speak of 'structures' in the Church—ministry, sacrament, gathering and organisation of the community—these are completely different from the structures of the state, since they belong to the rule of life of those who have made the decision of faith and have thereby set themselves under the single law of the Cross and Resurrection of Christ, the law of the grace of God and of his freedom. Since they continue to exist in the old aeon, it will constantly be necessary to 'admonish' them (παρακαλεῖν), and the apostolic-ecclesiastical admonishment will have to adopt even strict forms of judicial decisions (1 Cor 5), in keeping with the degree of their slackness or sinfulness which brings them into a situation of open contradiction of their fundamental decision.[27] But the apostolic and ecclesiastical admonishment always has the character of speech that proceeds from within the mercy of God (which is Christ), cooperating in bringing about his love and the love of the Spirit; indeed, it is speech 'in the place of Christ, so that it is God who admonishes through us' (2 Cor 5.20).[28] Therefore παρακαλεῖν always means 'to console, to ask, to adjure (by the love of God)'; it makes present the original salvific Word of God himself, which judges only in order to raise up anew. But by making this Word present, it has in itself something of the absoluteness of the Word of salvation: 'He who hears you, hears me' (Lk 10.16). Paraklesis comes from the immediate mission of Christ: together with him, it establishes the Church and builds her up, and it is not to be dismembered from the charisms within the Church. It is of course never possible in New Testament terms to neutralise this anticipatory character of the apostolic ministry and the structural character which this gives it, by separating it from the existential representation of the grace of God in the self-giving of Christ; in his existence, Paul always seeks to make his commission and his life (as τύπος for the community) coincide with each other; he is enough of a realist to know that the best that can be hoped for is an approximation (Phil 3.13), that many do not correspond to the requirement inherent in the ministry, and that those who have received the commission are themselves in constant need of a particular paraklesis (the Pastoral Letters). They must continually be kept fast in the sphere for which they have made the decision of faith, and they must be brought back into this sphere: but this is the sphere in which God has his glory, just as he has his glory in Jesus Christ (Eph 3.16). His glory has appeared in the one who was crucified and is risen, and he possesses the totality of glory (κύριος τῆς δόξης, 1 Cor 2.8), but his truth has been set within the Word of the gospel, so that the glory of God shines out in this Word (2 Cor 4.4), visible to the believers but concealed from those who do not believe (2 Cor 3.18; 4.3f.); and in this, the cruciform existence of the preacher is an aspect of the 'visibility' (2 Cor 4.10). All of this has already been set out earlier. Believers are brought into the sphere which God opens through the proclamation of the good news, in order that they may share in the same reality. And just as the Word of God has its own effective divine power (δύναμις), so also the sphere of the Church has its own effective power in the sacraments, which confer the Church's own form: baptism is a conforming to [26] 'Those to whom the Spirit of Christ has also given the necessary organ of sight, cf. 1 Cor 2.6–16': Staab, Regensburger NT, Vol. VII (3rd edn. 1959), p. 87. Lohmeyer's opinion that these holy ones can 'only be the angels' (Kolosserbrief, 1950, p. 82) seems unlikely, especially as Eph 3.9f. explicitly says that the angels learn of the mystery only through the Church.

---

[27] Delicate questions arise about the boundary to be drawn between membership of the community and exclusion from it: cf. Mt 18.15–17; Rom 14.1ff.; 1 Cor 5.4f.; Heb 10.24f.; 2 Thess 3.14f.; 1 Tim 1.20; Tit 3.10f.; 1 Jn 2.19; 5.16f.; 2 Jn 10f.; Jude 22f.

[28] Rom 12.1; 15.30; 1 Cor 1.10; 2 Cor 10.1. On the whole topic, cf. the fine article by H. Schlier, 'Vom Wesen der apostolischen Ermahnung', in: Die Zeit der Kirche (1956), pp. 74–89.

the death and Resurrection of Christ (Rom 6.3ff.) and is therefore the entry to 'the riches of the glory of the mystery' (Col 1.27). The Eucharist is the expropriation of the individual into the fellowship in Christ of the one bread and the sacrificed body (1 Cor 10.16f.), and creates the reality which must then also be reproduced and brought about on the existential level: 'to offer one's own bodily existence as a living, consecrated sacrifice that pleases God' (Rom 12.1). Marriage in the sphere of the Church is always related in principle, and must then also be related existentially, to the marriage of blood between Christ and the Church (Eph 5.21ff.). Finally, in the mutual service of all the members of the Church, the Church is the sacrament of the presence of Christ in her, although the full realisation of this presence is always only something that is the aim of her struggles (Eph 4.15f.). In all δοξάζειν, the δόξα is both the presupposition of present existence and the goal which is aimed at; but the Church never becomes a sphere for this δόξα by 'appropriating' this in her structure or her existence, but only by handing over herself in consecration to the glorification of God. 'Faith . . . lays hold of δόξα as its basis; but the only way in which this occurs is for the believer to "give" God the δόξα, by acknowledging it and yielding himself to it in his confession.'[29]

This act of handing over is never definitively accomplished; it remains until the end of the world an event that leaves the Church no time to reflect upon herself. Looking up to the glory of the Lord, she can reflect something of this, without reckoning up for herself what and how much she is reflecting. She 'reflects' the glory of Christ for the world only when she looks away from herself to Christ, without reflecting upon herself (2 Cor 3.18). 'For it is not ourselves that we proclaim, but Christ Jesus, and ourselves as your servants for Jesus' sake' (4.5). The ideas that the Apostle will find his glory in the community, and that Apostle and community will glorify themselves in one another (1 Thess 2.20; 2 Cor 1.14), are laid up in store for the last day, when every self-centred reflection will be for ever excluded. Should one therefore say that, as long as the world lasts, the Church is always en route to her own self? Such an affirmation misses the essential point, which can be seen from two perspectives: first, the Church is not en route to herself, but to 'the perfect, definitive man' (Eph 4.13), her bridegroom Christ; and second, in this continuous self-transcendence, the Church's goal is something that is no longer herself, because this goal will be without the word of preaching, without the sacraments, and without the innerworldly structure, so that the distinction between 'Church' and 'world' will no longer be tenable. The goal of the Church is to make herself superfluous and thereby to fulfil her service in the aeon that is passing away. In a hidden manner, she has already been 'left behind' by the hidden glory of the heavenly Jerusalem, without which she would not be in any way the Church of Christ. And something of the structural geometry of the Church of the old and the new covenants will be maintained in the forms and measurements of the eternal city (Rev 21.12–17). It is, however, quite impossible for the pilgrim Church to draw nearer to this geometry by looking backwards to the old covenant in order to set up a theocratic polis in accordance with a supposed knowledge of heavenly standards of measurement (Ex 25.9, 40), for that would produce only a 'shadow image' (Heb 8.5); the result would be 'merely a shadow of what was to come, for the substance of these belongs to Christ' (Col 2.17). The Church must look forwards, in keeping with the event in which she has her being: this event leads through from the Cross to the Resurrection of Christ, and is therein the appearing of the glory of the selfless triune love.

---

[29] H. Schlier, 'Doxa bei Paulus als heilsgeschichtlicher Begriff', op. cit., p. 52.

b. The hope of glory

'We boast in our hope of the glory of God' (Rom 5.2). 'Christ in you: the hope of glory' (Col 1.27). 'The blessed hope and the appearing of the glory' (Tit 2.13). Everything that has been said thus far points, inevitably and irresistibly beyond itself to hope and the future; for the movement which the Church makes into the public sphere of the world is no longer a departure merely from Egypt to Canaan, and the situation at the end of the new covenant—when the glory that appeared in Christ withdrew itself one last time, after many concealments—is in no way comparable to the close of the old covenant. It opens not on to 'empty time', but on to a fulfilment so explosive that it generates from itself a deeper hope and a more certain comprehensiveness that goes absolutely beyond any geographical universality and indeed beyond any hope that could reside in such a universality: this comprehensive hope can be satisfied only by the in-breaking of the world as a whole into the glory of God which has been proleptically attained, opened up and made certain by the one who has risen from the dead. Through the fact of Christianity—which is now to be proclaimed to all the world—an entelechy has been definitively set into the foundations of the world, an entelechy that cannot be superseded by any wider horizon, but that has a forward momentum stronger than any utopian horizon which could be sketched with the world as its starting point, because through the Resurrection of the dead, this horizon proleptically surpasses the world with even its most extreme utopias. Granted a universe in dynamic evolution, as yet unknown to the Bible, and granted all the self-transcendence of forms of life and culture, the question remains: what worldly utopia can offer us the past—death, and the myriads of deaths that lie behind us, and even more horribly, the atrocious sufferings that do not understand themselves and are meaningless in worldly terms—as the future and the 'blessed hope of glory'? For in the apocalyptically-formulated utopia at 1 Thess 4.13ff., it is in a remarkable way precisely those who belong to the past—the dead—who are the first to rise, while those who belong to the future—the last generation of the world's history—will 'have no advantage over those who have fallen asleep'. When history's vanguard penetrates into the kingdom, this does not involve forgetting what it has been, as if this were 'building materials' now lost to sight. The solidarity that no form of socialism can know, and which is likewise forgotten or undervalued by an existential and a merely historical interpretation of Scripture, hopes first for those who belong hopelessly to the past, and only then for itself.

And this most utopian of hopes, which finds not the smallest space within history, is really anchored in the hearts of the believers through the proleptic Resurrection of Jesus, who is not just any old dead person, but the one who 'was made sin' by God (2 Cor 5.21)—and death is the fruit of sin (Rom 5.12; Jas 1.15)—and the one whose 'reign' therefore has as its goal the destruction of 'the last enemy, death' (1 Cor 15.26). For the Christian hope, that which causes the greatest pain through the waiting for its arrival, and delays for the longest time, is the contents of the surest promise, because it is already a present reality in the Lord (v. 23). This gives the Christian faith an explosive power which cannot be compared with any form of evolutionism, for what is born of evolutionism is at best the child of creation's own womb; for the world could not seriously entertain the idea of giving birth to a god, unless possibly the one who has already created it, and this could only mean the Church's Marian cooperation so that the Alpha may also be the Omega. Any other god to whom the world gave birth would only be an atheistic god, the god 'man'. What is born of the Christian hope, deeper than all the pangs of the cosmos, is God himself: not the God of the ancient kabōd, which in his Heaven he cannot give up, but the God whose love for the world has made him 'strip' himself of the form of his heavenly glory, so that he may find it once more with us: naturally, this glory will never again be the inalienable kabōd of old, but the glory of the triune love that has appeared in him, the love that has revealed its true omnipotence in the powerlessness of the Cross and that will never go back to a lesser, cheaper form of glory. When the Son has reigned in the world's history until he has 'subdued all sovereignty, power and might', subjecting it to the form of his own power, then 'comes the fulfilment, when he makes over the kingdom to God the Father (not: to Yahweh)', and thereby, as Son, he will be 'subject to the one who has submitted all things to him, so that God may be all in all' (1 Cor 15.24,28). This can only be the expression of the order and subordination within the Godhead, when the ultimate original generative source of love occupies the totality of the world which 'the Beloved' has prepared to be the definitive womb. One cannot object to the conclusive character claimed for this interpretation, by saying that the New Testament also projects the Old Testament kabōd-scenario of the 'day of the Lord' into the eschatological future, since the Christ who returns appears with the attributes of Yahweh's glory and divides sheep and goats with a sharpness that goes beyond even the Old Testament and apocalyptic, and (like Yahweh) '"kills"' the antichrist '"with the breath of his mouth" and destroys him with the appearance of his presence' (2 Thess 2.8: Is 11.4; 2 Esd 13.10f.); for all of this remains metaphor drawn from ancient resources in order to describe the process of subjection and forming anew—and this process is not conceivable without judgment and division on the part of a love that is now 'exalted' and 'ruling'. If this slain Lamb were not on the throne, then it would not be this Lamb that won the victory (on the Cross) as the 'lion from Judah' and is able to open the seven seals of the book of the world's history (Rev 5.5f.). Because it was slain and has won for itself all nations through its blood, it had the power to make ready 'for our God a kingdom and priests' (5.9): this is no other power than that of love, but truly of the love that lets the Lamb have its place on the throne of the Father, because both are one in love. It is not possible to break through the closed circle of New Testament teaching, which understands the love of the Son as the revelation of the love of the Father. 'I and the Father are one' (Jn 10.30). Thus it is impossible that the Old Testament kabōd-attributes of a mere 'Lord God' could emerge behind the 'kingdom of the Son', when this is laid at the feet of the Father, in order to make at the last moment a gnostic disavowal of God's history with his world.[1] The justification for employing the ancient world of metaphors to speak of the eschatological parousia lies in the kernel which they had concealed from the very start, but which now shines through the veils: God's sovereignty and free personal vitality, the basis and fullness of which are disclosed in the trinitarian love. The Apocalypse of John and all the related statements of Scripture show what bloody pains it costs this love to get its own way in the world whose nature it is to resist this love and negate itself; nothing can tone down the paradox that 'the lion, who has won the victory' (Rev 5.5) at the same time rides out into the battle 'with his garment soaked in blood', 'rules with iron sceptre', 'judges and makes war' (πολεμεῖ, Rev 19.11), and that it is even possible to speak of 'the wrath of the Lamb' (Rev 6.16). These abysses must be revealed in the struggle between both forms of freedom which are offered to us by the gospel for our decision: for otherwise the good news would not be the proclamation of the flame of the divine truth, but would be outmanoeuvred and blurred by a cosmological evolutionism.

---

[1] This is why Ernst Bloch's 'Atheism in Christianity' (1968) is possible only by pressing into service the whole gnostic arsenal (Ophites, Marcion, Valentinus) against the Bible's indissoluble trinitarian union of the old covenant and the new. The new attempt shows once again that gnosis and atheism go together, and that they are in fact the alternative to Christian trinitarian theology. If one throws Yahweh on to the scrap-heap for the sake of a 'principle of hope' and a 'theology of the future', there will never

The paradox that the 'victor' still 'fights' is the theological presupposition for the Christian form of hope: the certainty of the believer that the victor is fighting, gives this hope its tremendous utopian elasticity, which criticises and moves on from everything that has been attained, or can be attained, on this earth: 'the kingdom' is never immanent until the last enemy, death (and the past), has been included in it. And the fact that the victor is fighting, gives 'those who are called and chosen and faithful, those who are loyal to him (the Lamb)' (Rev 17.14) the certainty that their Christian 'patience' is no mere waiting until the process of time matures by itself and reaches its end; it is a certainty that, in 'the hard times that lie ahead' (2 Tim 3.1), 'the good fight of the faith' must be 'fought through to its conclusion' (1 Tim 6.11), and, like Paul, must be fought with the whole of one's existence: 'Already I am being poured out . . . I have come through the good fight' (2 Tim 4.6). After what has been said in the previous section about the transcendence and the transitional character of the Church vis-à-vis the world, it will be impossible to accuse be any possibility of making the transcendence with Jesus to a God who is still 'a God to come'.

this paradoxical, eschatological Christian hope, which fights along with Christ, of being egotistically concerned with the individual's salvation. The 'ambassador' of Christ does indeed bear 'God's message of reconciliation' in himself, but this word is addressed to the world (2 Cor 5.19f.). Paul's eschatological 'glory' lies, not in himself, but in the part of the world that has accepted his sacrificial service of the gospel and has taken on a share in this (1 Thess 2.19f.; Phil 4.1; 2 Cor 1.14). The theme of the solidarity between the Christian and the world, of his fighting alongside the victor who fights for the sake of the world, can take on the most various and contradictory forms in the course of Church history—all of which are true and necessary[2]—but this is not in the least something that has to be projected into the gospel from a changed understanding of the world (such as today's understanding); rather, as a glance at Rom 8 confirms, this is present in the gospel from the beginning.

In Rom 8.18–30, the comprehensiveness of the Christian's hope locates him in a tension between an 'expectation' (ἀποκαραδοκία, v. 19) and a 'hope' (ἐλπίς, v. 20) of 'the whole creation', which is in solidarity with man and even more closely with Christian man (on the one hand), and something like a hope within God (on the other hand), since the divine Pneuma sighs together with the unsure and powerless 'sighing' for what is definitive, and gives this 'sighing' depth and accuracy: it is precisely the 'wordless sighing' of the spirit (v. 26) that is the adequate word of prayer to God that can be understood and will be answered (v. 27)—just as the inarticulate dying cry of the crucified Logos became the definitive human word that broke through the whole realm of darkness to pierce God's heart. What do the world, man and the Spirit sigh for? For 'the glory that is to come' (μέλλουσαν δόξην, v. 18). Here for one last time, everything in the Old and New Testaments that bore this name is cancelled out: everything from Sinai to Christ and to the gospel. All of this did exist, and was glorious—but it had precisely the right amount of glory in order to kindle in us an unquenchable hope for the future, for something that has absolute superiority (v. 18, cf. 2 Cor 4.17) to everything past and present, yet remains fully indeterminable in its superabundant contents. The superiority of this glory is guaranteed by the entire direction of the christological event, into which we are caught up: 'provided (of course) that we suffer together with him, in order that we may be glorified with him' (v. 17). The quick motion of the current shows us, however, from the outset the backwater in which our whole bodily existence in this world holds us back. Hope becomes the fundamental condition that discloses to us at one and the same time the transcendent tipping of the scales in favour of the final state of things, which we still await, and our inability to escape from the condition of vanity, of futility, of mere appearance, of what is useless (ματαιότης, v. 20), of temptation, decadence and perishing (φθορά, v. 21). It is through no fault of its own that the creation, which man ought to have brought to God, has been forced into this condition, but through the fault of man—and man, who cannot separate himself from the fate of the world, thanks to his bodiliness, lives a life orientated towards death, because of sin (8.10). The fateful relationship between the cosmos and man can be undone neither by cosmic developments, nor by human endeavours to make the world more habitable; but the current of hope transcends this relationship and enters on something that cannot be conceived, something that is indicated by the expressions: 'the revelation of glory in us' (v. 18), 'the freedom of the glory of the children of God' (v. 21), 'the redemption of our body' (v. 23). The first formulation brings down to us what is distinctively divine—for this remains δόξα to the last— and draws us into its own definition. The second posits 'freedom' as the basic term for our departure from the decay and alienation of the cosmos. The third expresses what is decisively Christian: it is precisely the body (and with it, the world) that counts, for it is only together with the body that we are saved. This is possible neither for a soul mysticism that dispenses with the world, nor for a merely innerworldly culture and technology that do not eliminate the law of death.

---

[2] C. Bauer, 'Bild der Kirche—Abbild der Gesellschaft' (1965), now in: Bauer, Deutscher Katholizismus (1966), pp. 9–27. Cf. H. Maier, 'Politische Theologie?', Stimmen der Zeit (1969), pp. 82f.

Nothing is more utopian than this hope, which has staked everything on what is still awaited and is still essentially unattainable because of the decay of the present time. There is no possibility here of speaking of 'a gradual realisation of the eschaton';[3] there are no gradual phases of transition between death and Resurrection. No matter what the achievement demanded of man may be, it is not a requirement that the Christian hope be gradually, through one's own efforts, changed into a capacity, a vision, a possession. 'Hope that sees is no longer hope; for how can one still hope for what he sees?' (v. 24). It would be a misrepresentation of Paul's thought, were we to suppose that one could discover in advance the form of the awaited glory on the basis of the form of the lack of this glory (which would be a kind of 'wrapping paper' around it), for that would mean forgetting the incomparable superabundance and superiority of the divine gift (cf. Rom 5.15ff.).

But now we are told that creation and man do not only suffer 'the pains of this present time' (v. 18) in a 'common sighing' (v. 22), but are also 'in the pangs of birth' for the coming time: here we certainly have the beginnings of the idea of a future fruit, indicated also in the 'hope' (v. 20) that dwells within creation for the sake of which creation was unwillingly subjected to decay. It is said of Christians too that they 'were saved for hope' (v. 24). It is uncertain whether Paul is thinking of the Jewish 'Messianic woes' (cf. Mk 13.8; Mt 24.8; 1 Thess 5.3), since he is speaking here, not of a limited condition of the world at the end of time, but of a fundamental condition that has existed since Adam. And so these 'pangs' too are subject to the same dialectic that is characteristic of the whole of the old aeon, which must bring forth something to which it does not have the strength to give birth. Everything in these pains strains towards 'liberation' (v. 21), hope intensifies in proportion to the measure of the pains, the child has long had the 'predominance'—and yet it remains a hidden glory that is present only in sighing pain and in powerless hope. At this point in the Christian existence, one no longer speaks of 'word' or 'sacrament' or 'Church' or anything else that has form; it is the 'wordless' (v. 26) that is dominant, and instead of any action, there is 'patience', 'holding on' (v. 25), 'sighing' (v. 23), 'weakness' (v. 26). In the midst of all this, we have the expression 'prayer' (v. 26), but this of course is a wordless prayer that cannot be formulated, 'for we do not know what we should pray, if we are to pray appropriately'. The world looks with longing to man, so that he may find the word that redeems it; but man looks to God, and does not find the word that redeems both himself and the world with him.

---

[3] As E. Schillebeeckx holds: 'Gott, die Zukunft des Menschen' (1969), p. 46.

Here, in the ultimate perplexity about the resolution of the contradiction in creation, everything is taken up into the trinitarian dimension. 'The Spirit comes to our help and takes on our weakness along with us' (v. 26). This does not mean that he shapes our sighing into a word, for what we are concerned with here is not word and concept and clever action—these things lie behind us in the eschatological sufferings, just as they lie behind Christ in his dying cry. Rather, the Spirit 'intercedes for us with wordless sighs': this is how far God has gone in making the pains of his creation his own. Not only has he 'not spared his own Son, but rather given him up for us all' (v. 32), he has also 'poured out' (5.5) his own (8.11) and his Son's (v. 9) Spirit, so that we might be able 'to make our boast in the hope of the glory of God' (5.2), and win—in this Spirit which has been poured out—patience in tribulation, a proof of our worth in patience, and hope in this proof, the 'hope that cannot be put to shame' (5.3–5). God's Spirit sighs in the depths of our perplexed 'hearts', at the place where they no longer know themselves but are transparent only to 'the one who searches the heart' and 'knows the yearning of the Spirit' (8.27) who intercedes with God on behalf of our yearning and answers it without speaking. The sighing of the Spirit is no mere appearance, just as the Cross and the cry of the Son were no appearance; the spirit does not only give a justification of the hopelessness that lies within the existence of the world and of the Christian, but also experiences it together with us and gives it a place—as such—within the dialogue of prayer in the Trinity, 'in wordless sighs'. This does not take place on a level completely above us, for the Spirit dwells intimately within Christians and, through them, in the world: 'the Spirit bears witness to our spirit that we are the children of God, and if we are children, then we are heirs . . . fellow heirs with Christ' (8.16f.); he is 'the Spirit of adoption as children, in whom we cry out: Abba, beloved Father!' (v. 15). This is, accordingly, not something that occurs on a level higher than our hearts: it proceeds from the depths of our Christian hearts, in a fellowship that displays the intimate depths of the brotherliness of Christ, our fellow-man. In the Spirit who sighs, and thereby truly prays, the last shadow of a 'Lord God' has disappeared; such a God looked on his servant Job from an unapproachable height, in order finally to crush him with the arguments that belong to power. We have been introduced proleptically—in a hope that does not see—into the inner depths of a God whose whole glory (for which we hope) consists of the pure gift of self, accompanying us, 'existing for the other' (8.31), understanding and granting the request that is not put into words, in an exchange of 'love' (5.5; 8.35ff.). The mutual gifts of the Trinity are the creature's place and home: in God's 'foreknowledge', the creature is 'predestined' to be there (v. 29).

Rom 8.29f., therefore, presents us once again with the idea of appropriation as expropriation which we developed in treating the Prologue to Ephesians. Here too, the election made beforehand by God's foreknowledge has as its goal 'to conform us to the image (i.e., the essential form) of his Son, so that he might be the firstborn among many brothers'; between the predetermination and the attainment of this goal lies the progress through the history of the world, which is summarised here only from God's perspective, and then in giant strides: 'those whom he predetermined, he also called; those whom he called, he also justified; those whom he justified, he also glorified' (v. 30). The Cross of the Son and the sighing of the Spirit are set between the alpha of the predetermination and the omega of the glorification. Time, together with its pangs and its hopes, is real, and involved in a process, but this process has a meaning only between the alpha and the omega which God joins together into an identity. In the same way, at Eph 1.4, man was always predestined from the outset to stand before God 'holy and spotless in love', and this predetermination always took account of 'the forgiveness in the blood' of Christ (Eph 1.4, 7). The 'creation of the world' was mentioned only indirectly in that passage (v.4), because the alpha point, which proleptically contained the omega point in itself, preceded this creation. At Rom 8.29–30, the history of the world is compressed into a few great stages, in order to show the infallibility of the triune plan for the world; but this does not happen without the prior description in detail of the whole distress of the world—its godlessness (Rom 1.18–3.20) and its problematic and dialectic between law and grace even after the Christ-event (Rom 7), as well as its fatal decadence and its hope of life. In the final perspective, it is only the ultimate point that is relevant, where the triune love, which determines all things, comes into contact with the destiny of the world. 'We are fellow heirs with Christ. But we must suffer with him, in order to be glorified with him also' (8.17). This is the point of intersection of the triune life and the life of creatures: the same one is the 'own Son' of the Father (8.32) and the firstborn 'among many brothers'. He is the 'Thou' of God and a 'Thou' among men. God is consubstantial with him, and we are his blood relations. But in each of these relationships of equality, he is 'the other', both for God and for us. In brotherly love, the created world is permitted to enter the divine world. And this point of contact between God and the world in Christ is the eschatological turning-point of the ages. The Cross is the final point within the old aeon, and the Resurrection is the beginning of the new aeon. It is for this reason that the Cross is not merely the image of the principle inherent within the created world—as if this were but a vale of tears with suffering as its embodiment. Rather, the Cross lifts up on itself the whole inadequacy of the world, in order to bear the sin to Hell and to set man free for God. This raises the question of the meaning of human existence at the turning-point of the ages.

Once having spoken of the commission given to man at creation 'to be fruitful and multiply, to fill the earth and subdue it' (Gen 1.28), the Bible is silent on the theme: the commission is inscribed on man's being, and there is no need to write anything more about it. If one joins the four verbs together, one cannot be surprised that they show the world and humanity to be essentially in a condition of evolution. The original creation includes race and kin, culture and technology, the development of powers that lie ready to hand in man and in the soil, the enrichment and transmission of what has been found and invented, the hominisation of nature and the evolution of mankind. A reflected radiance of the divine glory lies on this sovereignty of the man 'like Elohim' (Ps 8.6), who is given 'powers like those of God' (Sir 17.3) and has the Promethean light from the beginning (ibid., vv. 7–8). How could God forget his 'evolutionary' creation when he plans to make ready for it a definitive place in his triune love! But just as the powers in creation made available to man were not regimented by revelation and forced by God into a synthesis that would predetermine their use, so in Christ and after Christ the same holds good. It is especially clear in the sphere of sexuality that what belongs to the creation takes on a new light in the Christ-event: without being confused in a gnostic manner with the divine love, the relationship between man and woman and its fruitfulness have received a new significance and a new orientation in the relationship between Christ and the Church. The same is true by analogy of the world of human work. Jesus of Nazereth worked with his hands until he was thirty years old; during the longest period of his life, he made his contribution to the world's work without drawing attention to himself, as a matter of course and without words, in solidarity with all. And the proclamation of the kingdom in the years of his public ministry was an earthly toil (Jn 4.6); the 'struggles and hardships . . . in rich measure' (2 Cor 11.27,23) of the Apostles will be no less of a burden. But why should one speak of this—unless in order to raise it into the light of the turning-point of the ages? Just as all the acts of sexual intercourse in the world do not suffice to bring about the relationship between Christ and the Church, all the evolution and work of the world will not suffice to bring in the kingdom of God.

Quite the contrary: the innerworldly forms become fruitful when the grace of God breaks into the cosmos and when the faith that hopes and loves looks to this grace to resolve the concerns of the world. Once again, it is the case here that no innerworldly hope has a power for transcendence like that of the Christian hope, which has the 'down-payment' of the new aeon in the midst of the old aeon, to which it gives an orientation that carries it up beyond itself in all its dimensions. Marriage, whether or not blessed with children, receives a new dimension of fruitfulness 'in relation to Christ and the Church'. The entire futility and decay of earthly existence can, as such, be transformed into fruitfulness, if it understands itself as the 'pangs' of the new aeon and as a sharing in Christ's sufferings. It follows that everything that human endeavour achieves in respect of the commission given at creation—the struggle against injustice, hunger, sickness, need and depravity, and the struggle for better conditions of life, education, wages, etc.—acquires a positive significance in view of what God has done in Christ and of the help of the Holy Spirit, and that nothing of this will be lost ultimately. God assumes that his creature will be at work, even when he reserves to his own sovereign synthesis to determine how the contributions of his creature are applied. The convergence of human achievement and the coming of God as the omega is absolutely incalculable, whether in a millennarian or in an evolutionary sense; but this does not make it any less certain. The old aeon does not make a continuous transition into the glory of the new: it is the death and the Resurrection of the 'firstfruits' that lead from the one to the other.

But God's Son has become man in order to prove to the Father the goodness of his creation—of the body, of sex, of fellowship, of work. He brings all of this goodness into the ultimate freedom in the presence of God. In faith, the Christian knows about the definitiveness of this proof, which lies in the bodily Resurrection of Christ, in the 'body of his glory' (Phil 3.21), which gives us the hope of a 'spiritual body' 'in glory', 'in power', 'in corruption' (1 Cor 15.42ff.). This hope looks 'without concealment' to 'the glory of the Lord' (2 Cor 3.18), and yet what is seen in hope is 'concealed': 'your life is hidden with Christ in God; when Christ, our life, appears, you too will appear with him in glory' (Col 3.3f.). This tension in the gaze of Christian hope—which is open, on the basis of the Resurrection, for a liberated, open existence, as yet inconceivable, within the Trinity of God—takes on definitive character for the condition of the whole of world history. The Christian eschaton, glimpsed in anticipation, sheds such a light of decision on to history that from now on one can only say 'yes' or 'no' to it.

This points us once again to the pericope about the veil in 2 Cor 3, and requires us to give an interpretation of 3.18, 'We all, κατοπτριζόμενοι the glory of the Lord with uncovered face, are being changed into the same image from glory to glory, as from the Spirit of the Lord'. It is difficult to decide whether κατοπτριζόμενοι should be translated 'reflect' (catching in our mirror and making it shine out) or 'contemplating' (what is looked at in the mirror).[4] The context refers back to Moses' vision of God when he saw God's glory uncovered on the mountain and then reflected it so powerfully among the people that he had to cover his face. Thus both elements are present in the Old Testament model, that of vision and that of reflection. And since the Greek word in question contains the word for 'mirror' in itself, this should be decisive, no matter how much the mirroring reflection on the part of Moses presupposes a vision of the glory of Yahweh and, correspondingly, the mirroring reflection on the part of Christians presupposes a vision of the glory of the Lord who now has become Christ. It is clear from the context that Paul does not mean an open vision face to face; the Christian lack of concealment is subsequently explained as the 'light of the gospel' and its 'open proclamation before the face of God' (4.4,3). It follows that the concept of a mirror here has nothing to do with the antithesis at 1 Cor 13.12 between 'seeing in a mirror and in a riddle' and seeing 'from face to face'.[5] Between the image of Moses and the Christian antitype, there has come at 3.13–15 the statement about the veil, which moved unnoticed from the face of Moses to the hearts of the Jews and now transmits the idea that 'we all with uncovered face reflect the glory of the Lord'—not only Paul and the Apostles alone,[6] as could be suggested by the logic of the type (Moses) and also by what follows (4.5), but truly 'we all': Paul together with all believing Christians who have 'turned to the Lord' and have thereby disposed of the veil over their hearts. In this turning to the radiant gospel, they see—naturally with the eyes of faith—the glory of the Lord, and since this act of seeing is the work of the Pneuma that shines out from the Lord, but which is essentially the form of the Lord's existence ('the Lord is the Spirit', 3.17) and which 'proceeds' from the Lord (3.18) and draws the believers in the intimacy of their being into the sphere of the Pneuma, the reflection that follows is not purely mechanical, but is a 'metamorphosis into the same image (of being)'. The believers are assimilated to Christ, not in a mystical vision fascinated by what lies beyond this world, but in their existence as persons who are sent, an existence that transmits the eschatological splendour to the world and to its history. They are a mirror in their pure transparency, which is an anticipatory assurance of the new aeon in the old, ἀπὸ δόξης εἰς δόξαν, 'from glory to glory', which must mean from the hidden glory of Christ, which they see proleptically in faith and reflect, to an open glory which manifests itself in the kerygmatic and existential public character of the gospel in the world. Once again, in this text εἰκών and δόξα come very close to each other, just as the risen one both is 'the image of God' (4.4) and has the 'glory of God' on his face (4.6); thus the Christian who is turned to the Lord can transmit an 'image' of the being of Christ for the world only to the extent that he reflects Christ and does not spread abroad the radiance of his own self. Otherwise, this would not be an event that takes place in the Holy Spirit.

[4] Detailed discussion with bibliography in: K. Prümm, Diakonia Pneumatos, I, pp. 166–202, and the excursus, ibid., pp. 420–424. Apart from the commentaries, cf. especially J. Dupont, 'Le chrétien miroir de la gloire divine d'après 2 Cor 3.18', RB (1949), pp. 392–411.

---

[5] J. Dupont, Gnosis (1949), pp. 119ff.

[6] Against H. Windisch (1924), ad loc.

This statement in 2 Cor 3 is in tension with Rom 8, but does not contradict it: it makes clear the anticipation of the new aeon in the Christian's existence in faith in the Pneuma, while Rom 8 emphasises in the same Pneuma the painful gap between the aeons. In the former text, something of the eternal light and the eternal freedom ('where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom', 2 Cor 3.17) shines proleptically into our mortality and kindles the flame of hope; in the latter text, the Spirit sighs together with those who hope for the definitive freedom. The more that the light of glory streams in from above,[7] the more painful does the experience of having to wait for what is definitive become: this is why Christians ought to stand as burning torches in all the gardens and along all the military roads of world history. Their hope is so unsurpassable that only they—not the adherents of any other religion—can light up in advance all humanity's endeavours to form itself and the world in accordance with its commission in creation. No freedom attainable in earthly terms is able to surpass the freedom to which the Christian looks forward in justified hope, although every attempt to establish freedom, peace and brotherhood on earth must go in the direction which the Christian hope indicates. The earthly attempt, which corresponds to the genuine commission given by God, would collapse, were the categories of 'futility' and 'decay' to form the ultimate horizon of earthly existence. They are indeed a horizon that cannot be crossed in this aeon; but this horizon exists only because creation has been subjected to it against its own will and 'with a view to hope'. This is why the principle of hope has the last theological word to say about the constitution of the world, and precisely as a principle that is wholly utopian for the old aeon, since this is unable to awaken its dead to life. In order for the utopia to be truly the object of a hope that is constitutive of everything, christology, and thus the Trinity of God, is the only adequate presupposition: it is possible for the world and humanity to give birth to a God who as such is the apotheosis of humanity, only if this God is truly a human being and humanity finds its brotherhood in the unity of body and spirit with this God-man. Were humanity to generate a god who lay wholly in the future, such a god would never be able to justify his pre-history—humanity's path to cross and death. A redeemer who does not justify the creator has not truly redeemed anything; above all, he has not taken seriously the human 'Thou' who suffers, 'the least of my brothers'. If glory is the love that is eternal, but has always given its light to the world in a perceptible manner, then the Christian faith is necessary in order for the world to rise up into eternal glory.[8]

---

[7] On the possibility of taking 'from doxa to doxa' as a 'formula of departure', op. cit., pp. 193f.' W. Thüsing, Per Christum in Deum (1965), p. 127.

In conclusion we must ask: do we know that for which we hope? This is a tricky question. For if we knew about the essence of glory, then we should already stand—with the Corinthians—in the new aeon, having resolved (with Hegel)

---

[8] Because Christ, as the crucified and risen one, is a 'brother' like no other, who experiences in himself all that is done to the brothers, there is complete appropriateness in the patristic concept that the heavenly Christ continues to suffer in his earthly Church which is his body (Augustine), and indeed that it is only together with all of his perfected and risen members that he will enter the definitive state of blessedness (Origen, Lev. 7.1–2; Baehrens 6.370–380). Accordingly, he has won the victory for himself but not yet for us, and in Revelation and 1 Cor 15.25f. he continues to fight. When he is exalted by the Father as ruler over the cosmos, it is as though he were given only the raw material of the definitive kingdom; the possibilities in this material must first develop in the world—possibilities entrusted to man's administration on the basis of creation—and what has been developed through man until the end of the world becomes once again material, on a higher plane, that is to be given its shape by the forming powers of the kingdom of God. Thus the 'future of Christ' depends on the future of humanity, but the future of humanity is in a provisional state that is orientated towards the future of Christ. But it is meaningless to wish to separate the fact that man has a future with regard to the world and to God from the fact that this future is given to him by a God who is always present. The gift of God makes it meaningful to take on oneself the burden of the brothers and of the world, and the hope lies, not in the empty thought that it will be better in the world tomorrow than it is today, thanks to our effort, but in the fact that we have been promised that to bear the burden of the world in genuine solidarity with one's brothers is—on the second level, requiring the second courage of Christians—a meaningful contribution for the kingdom of Christ and of God.

God's promise into an absolute knowledge. But if we do not know it, our hope is directed to a vacuum, and a gap yawns between faith and knowledge that must remain unbridgeable if it is so now. 1 Cor 2.6–16 gives an answer to this question: although it is poised on a knife's edge, it confirms the fundamental thesis of this book in a way surpassed by perhaps no other passage of the New Testament.

'We' (the Apostle and his fellows) 'proclaim wisdom among those who are perfect', and this is 'God's wisdom in the mystery, a hidden wisdom which God predestined before the ages to be for our glorification' (2.6f.). The proclamation of the gospel is the proclamation of wisdom: but it proclaims, 'not the wisdom of this age', but a wisdom from the depths of God, which 'no one knows but the Spirit of God' (v. 11), and the centre of which is the redemption of the world through the Cross of Christ, 'who has become for us wisdom from God' (1.30). The ultimate goal of this wisdom of God, planned before the world was created, is 'our glory' (2.7). Here, the eschaton is no longer God's own glory which holds sway in the world and has become manifest, nor even our glorification of this divine glory, but explicitly 'our glory'. God goes with us to the extent of clothing us in the mantle of his divinity which is reserved to himself alone, and we are permitted to penetrate into God to such an extent that we become wholly radiant in divine light. But this extreme statement is immediately made to undergo an extreme distinction.

The wisdom of God, which as such is orientated towards glory,[9] is a wisdom that comes from the 'depth' of God's personal freedom, and requires a free revelation through God's Spirit who is within him, just as much as a human 'Thou' can disclose what is within himself only in freedom (vv. 10f.). No 'transcendence' from man to God, from the 'I' to the 'Thou', can anticipate this free self-disclosure. Now comes the central statement: 'But we have received the Spirit [9] H. Schlier has insistently pointed out the connection between wisdom and glory: 'Doxa bei Paulus', op. cit., pp. 48, 49, 52; cf. idem, 'Die Erkenntnis Gottes nach den Briefen des hl. Paulus' (1964), now in: Besinnung auf das NT (1964), pp. 319ff.

---

. . . who is from God, so that we may understand what has been given us by God (χαρισθέντα)' (v. 12). Not only does God speak—as happened in the Incarnation and crucifixion of his Logos—but he hands over his Spirit (who is also 'the mind of Christ', v. 16) to our spirit, which provides the medium in which what is divine can be humanly understood and even translated into human speech (λαλοῦμεν: 2.6,7, 13; 3.1). It is, however, understood and uttered only as something 'given in grace', i.e. in no sense as something snatched from God's gesture of giving into man's own possession and autonomous administration, into 'absolute knowledge'. The proof of this is that the mysterious wisdom of God remains 'folly' for the one who does not have the Spirit; the whole of the first chapter had developed this idea, and now the second chapter takes it up in a double way. If the 'rulers of the world' had recognised the wisdom of God in Christ, they would not have nailed him to the Cross (v. 8); they ought at least to have pounced on him in order to snatch his wisdom from him and appropriate it to themselves as absolute knowledge, but they were not capable of doing this: 'the one who does not have the Spirit does not understand what belongs to the Spirit of God, for it is folly to him; he cannot recognise it, because it is discerned only in the Spirit' (v. 14). This is why Paul insists with hammer-blows on the unique Cross, when he writes to the Corinthians (2.2), and makes himself weak and cruciform in his own existence and in his proclamation (2.3f.), in order to prevent any confusion between the human and worldly spirit and the Spirit of God, and in order to yield the full power of conviction to the self-evidence of the Spirit of God (2.4). The 'quotation from Scripture' at v. 9 sets at the close the keyword (doubtless inserted first by Paul): 'love'. No eye has seen, no ear has heard the glory that awaits man, the glory that God has prepared for him, and it has not risen up through transcendence into the heart of any man: it is a pure 'gift' to those who 'love him', and all the understanding that weaves its way to and fro in anticipation between man's love and God's gift remains within a circuit that is closed for those who belong to the mind, the flesh and the world: these despise what it contains as 'folly'. The one who thinks within the circuit between the love and the gift cannot be 'judged' by any outsider, whereas he is very well able to judge all that lies outside (v. 15). But the circuit which seems closed is the broadest and most open of circuits, and the wisdom made known within it is the highest wisdom, because it reflects itself at its focal points with an intensification and enrichment that can never be brought to an end, 'since we interpret by comparing spiritual with spiritual' (v. 13). Because the Spirit of God is given to the spirit of the man who loves, he is truly involved as an agent in understanding and in speaking, but the gift of God never becomes something autonomous, nor does the miracle and mystery of the divine love ever become something commonplace and customary.[10] From this perspective, the believer looks in hope to the fulfilment of the paths of God, the glorification of man in God. And, as one who loves, he does not ask at all how much of what is to come he perceives in advance, thanks to love, and how much he does not perceive. He allows himself to be surprised again and again by the divine love in such a way that, since he knows how God delights in surprising, he is ready to be surprised again in a definitive way and as it were for the very first time. 'Beloved, now we are the children of God. It is not yet revealed what we shall be one day. But we know that, when it is revealed, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is' (1 Jn 3.2).

c. The possible impossibility

As we have just seen, the heart of Christianity ultimately stands face to face with what belongs to utopia. Each knows that, in order for man to be able to be what he is, the impossible must be made possible. It is pointless to equate the impossible and the possible in such a way that both disappear into the empty freedom which man possesses, to be both God and the devil. This synthesis breaks down when confronted with the charge of caring for one's fellow man: man is the guardian of his brother. But my brother is quite as much an 'impossible' person as I myself am; thus it is only together that we can struggle, in an endeavour borne up by utopian hope, towards the point at which the impossible turns around and becomes possible, real and necessary. The utopia has the glory in its vanguard, and is driven by the impulsive force of today's impossibility. Death has no more right to exist—no suffering, no lament, no pain—and every tear must be wiped away; what existed earlier must have passed away (Rev 21.4). Something in the world and in man justifies us in such a hope: the knowledge that we are 'unfree' (Rom 8.20), slaves under an alien domination (Rom 5.14), and that a vertical intervention straight through the horizontal 'futility' of our time is overdue and must come, if the present time is to be able to exist at all in its impossibility.

---

[10] 'As with the joy of one who observes great things, Paul as it were takes up a position here alongside the life of his own spirit and discloses its inmost structure. The Spirit turns his gaze to Christ; but when he raises his spirit to reflect on the share in his own insight into the mystery of Christ—which is the mystery of the wisdom of God—he receives knowledge which he reckons, not as his own achievement, but as a gift of the Spirit through which he is carried up beyond the natural limitation and perversity of his knowledge. He is borne—and yet he moves his own wings ... And everything finds its place in the world. But when he leaves his original home, he does not yet alienate himself from his own nature ...': P. Bachmann, 2 Kor. (2nd edn. 1910), p. 135.

But those who advocate utopia presume that they can become fathers of the future without having been children of the past. They want to create without having received—and that would mean being God himself. The fact that they lay claim on their own behalf (with a view to the absolute future) to the very paternalism against which they are revolting, speaks against them, as does the fact that they appropriate to themselves the absolute power to bring about transformation, while their present impossibility is evidence that they do not possess this power. The kingdom which they would like to create bears the name of 'righteousness', an Old Testament name; but the secret intention is the New Testament element hidden in this name, love, which is the inevitable goal, if not indeed itself the means by which righteousness is to be established on earth. But how can one who has not received such a love generate it himself? Only the one who encounters it, knows it; only the one who is—incomprehensibly—addressed by it is able to reply to it (out of the grace and power that are love's own). This is why Jesus points the mature persons who wish to enter the kingdom, back into the unquestioning readiness to receive that belongs to the children who live in the condition of love's gift.

For Christians, the vertical intervention of the kingdom of God has already been accomplished, in Jesus Christ, breaking right through the course of world history. The lightning-flash of God's glory has struck the earth: eternal time has made its impact felt in the time of men, eternal love has poured out all its blood in the death of a human being, has rested in the irrevocability of Hell, and has 'prepared a place beside the Father' (Jn 14.2) for those doomed to futility. The kingdom is reality. God has established his covenant with such power that man can no longer dissolve it, even in union with the powers of the apocalyptic beasts. Because the kingdom was, it will be. But is it—now, for us, on earth? Everything in the world contradicts it, and who could point to it even as only something in the process of coming into being? 'All day long, I hear the question: where is your God?' (Ps 42.4). What can Christians make publicly known? That which became an event in Christ is so hidden for the world, so vulnerable—and so ineffective! Or was it only to be a beginning, so that now it is up to the Christians to give shape to its continuation and to accomplish the 'greater works' that Jesus promised (Jn 5.20; 14.12)? But what could they accomplish at the best of times, assuming that one were to forgive them all that they left undone and all that they have done utterly wrongly? Here we see for the first time the burning question that is posed to the only possible alternative, utopia as the primal act of generation ex nihilo: is it possible to live as a Christian in a human manner, within world history? Is it possible to live out of faith in a definitive eschatological event which has taken place, hoping for the break-through of this event in the whole of world history, and with a love for God and for men which gives evidential character to existence on the basis of such a faith and hope? What a difficulty!

We encountered this difficulty earlier, when we considered the imitation of Christ—the invitation to accompany Jesus on a way, the final point of which, in this world, had to be betrayal (for the One was to bear all the others); and, on the other side of this gulf (indeed, as a fruit born of this gulf), the mission to bear witness to the good news through word and life. It must work. It cannot work. It works nevertheless. And it is this third stage that makes the first ('It must work') an inexorable obligation, even when the pain of the second stage becomes all the sharper as one goes on. Finally, it is the third stage that is decisive: 'it works nevertheless', because we Christians are the interpretation of Christ's condition as one who has made the gift of himself. This condition was the centre of his existence, at a deeper level than both his claim to authority and his powerlessness, since he handed himself over to the Father, to the Spirit and to the Church to be used and shaped. His self-giving and his Eucharist are the guarantee that, at the point where the strength of our creative commission and the witness of our suffering break down, something continues to bear even what belongs to us towards the kingdom. This cannot be neatly calculated in worldly terms. Psychologically and sociologically, Christian existence is always doomed to draw the shorter straw, because there is no earthly scale of measurement which can be applied to its contents. Such a scale of measurement cannot and must not exist, if faith is to remain itself. Such a scale of measurement exists neither for the non-Christian nor for the Christian himself, who can only hang in faith, not stand in faith[1] The possibility in which his impossibility is embedded has a universal consistency which can be demonstrated by means of three cross-sections: power-powerlessness-presence; joy-suffering of the cross-burning bliss; form-splintering-superior form.

1. The power of Christ's victory gives the disciples authority for the kingdom: authority to bring the message, to heal sickness and decay, and to offer all the signs of the presence of divine love. This ability is always based in what has been given as a gift: the word of the message bears in itself the power to show that it is 'not the word of men, but what it truly is, the Word of God' (1 Thess 2.13), and the sacramental powers, which have the same structure as the word which works of itself, make Christians co-operative instruments of Christ the chief worker; the more they make their existence an instrument in faith, the more suitable does this existence become to transmit the power which is intended. The instrument is suitable when it offers no resistance to the one who works. Here the apparent double dialectic of Christian existence begins. Permitting God to act through oneself is the opposite of lazy passivity; where God's love for the world burns in zeal, the Christian must point to this quality of God's love through his own burning zeal. He must seek to realise in himself and around himself, in activity and in passion, the kingdom that God wills. This is why the images of those Christians who are called 'holy' in a particular sense are portrayed and displayed: when one sees them, it is at once obvious what such a commitment is in its active transmission. This is not a dialectic, since their attitude is a unity: their will is one, united to the will of God. But it is an utopia (if one wishes to use this word), since each of them has thrown himself against the immobile sluggishness of the world and has scattered a few (at most) sparks from his own fire and kindled a few hearts; then the whole thing ends on some via dolorosa, at the stake, or is smothered; outwardly, perhaps only a statue remains. 'Like sheep among wolves.' The power of the sheep cannot be organised; a more rational employment of the 'saints' (and of those who resemble them from a greater or lesser distance) will not hasten the coming of the kingdom. For here, the second dialectical element comes into play: the power, on the basis of which they are sent out and work, is and remains the power of the one who was crucified and exalted. His power retains the smell and taste of the Cross in this age of the world. Where this is not felt—for example, in programmes of Christian revolution—both Christians and non-Christians would have occasion for misgivings. This is why the diagnosis of St Paul—'not many wise people in the worldly sense, not many powerful, not many of superior standing' (1 Cor 1.26)—continues to hold true for the whole people. Only a tiny portion of a people consists of men who are capable of fighting: most are women, children and the aged, to say nothing of the sick, the crippled and the mad. The people of God has the same structure as this, both sociologically and christologically; it would be a lack of faith, and a fantasy, to wish for anything else. And in order for those capable of fighting, the 'elite', to be strong, they are set nearer to the powerlessness of the Cross: 'it is in weakness that power is made perfect'. And in order to exclude the possibility of confusing God's power with his own ability, Paul is given the angel of Satan, who rains blows down on him, and all his requests to be spared are refused: 'My grace is sufficient for you, for power is made perfect in weakness' (2 Cor 12.10, 7–9). Thus both the wretchedness of the Church as a people and the special deprivation of power which the saints experience have a functional relationship to the power of the risen Lord in the world. This fundamental law cannot be outmanoeuvred by any 'aggiornamento' of obsolete forms of the thought, proclamation and life of Christians, nor by any 'Catholic Action' or 'political theology', no matter how necessary these may be. It would be good if those involved in these endeavours were to keep this constantly in mind. This is why no statistics can encompass what the saints do: their action in pure prayer, in the night of the cross, and in hidden suffering can be much more fruitful than all that takes places visibly and can be assessed up to a certain extent. 'For you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God' (Col 3.3) With the life, power too is hidden; as Christian power, its only way to affect the world is via the conversion of hearts through the contagious example of humility and selflessness. This is true both for the man who is engaged in political and economic life and in the business of culture and technology, and for the housewife, the child and the old man. One may have a wider reach than the other, but the way in which they are effective is the same. 'The kingdom does not come in a way that can be pinned down' (Lk 17.20). An aspect of the powerlessness of Christians is their inability to locate, promote and establish in the world the eschatological event which they proclaim. They have 'seen his glory' (Jn 1.14), but what can they demonstrate of this? They proclaim and indeed promise the greatest thing of all; thus they seem ridiculous, contemptible, deserving hatred. They must resist the temptation to transmute their 'spiritual weapons', which alone are 'truly powerful' (2 Cor 10.4), into worldly weapons; they must be content to prescind from power and powerlessness and to bear witness to the presence of what is ultimate: i.e., the love of God in Christ. It goes without saying that this requires active brotherly love as the expression of their grateful love of God. This love builds the kingdom, and is a secret anticipation of it; but it is not we who build the kingdom, but the one who is present in us and through us. The endless obstinate struggle of the world to declare his presence a past that is long since finished with, to change his event into a rumour, and to tear up the indissoluble form of the gospel into archaeological strips, to exhaust the Christians emotionally and undermine them intellectually (better than nourishing their vitality through prison and torture)—this struggle, with its ever-increasing intensity, proves the power of his presence.

---

[1] Augustine, Enarr. in Ps. 33, II 9.

2. The Christian message is joy. The event begins with the Incarnation, which is proclaimed as 'great joy' (Lk 2.10), because now God makes all his promises of salvation come true. It ends in the great, astonished joy of the Resurrection (Lk 24.41) and the return to the Father (Lk 24.52). But how is it possible that this joyful event embraces 'sorrow even unto death' (Mt 26.38) as its mid-point? Are joy and sorrow ephemeral moods that alternate like clear weather and clouds in a landscape? Is there something lying peacefully behind both, something that is neither: the calmness of other-worldly mystical religion? Or are these moods socially determined for the Christian in keeping with the situation presented to him: 'Rejoice with those who rejoice, weep with those who weep' (Rom 12.15)? But would it not then be necessary for the Christian, as he reflected on the state of the world and the Church as a whole, to be perpetually laughing and weeping at once—and more weeping than laughing? But does he not owe it to the joyless world that he should communicate joy out of the joy of his faith? Paul knows that both his 'superabundant sufferings in Christ' and the 'superabundant consolations through Christ' which are likewise given to him can be communicated to the community, and are indeed imposed upon him and given to him so that he can communicate them (2 Cor 1.3–7): therefore, 'I am filled with consolation, indeed more than filled with joy, in all our tribulation' (2 Cor 7.4). For it means that the tribulation which makes him weary of life itself (2 Cor 1.8), the tribulation which goes to the point of abandonment by God (Mk 15.34) and of losing every meaning in existence, remains objectively meaningful for the world, and thereby contains a spark of eternal joy which is no longer accessible to its own self. Thus the Christian dialectic of joy and Cross points to a mystery in the heart of God himself, where there reigns 'greater joy' in pardoning a sin that has caused pain (Lk 15.7), and where a feast must be held to celebrate the return of the one who had run off and been lost (Lk 15.23,32) and had caused the father so much suffering: indeed, more than this, where the Father causes the pain to himself by abandoning his much-loved only Son to the darkness, in order to have the joy that 'whoever believes in him should not perish, but should have eternal life' (Jn 3.16). Can the divine joy be so strong and deep that it can bear to embrace in itself the cry of the Son when he is abandoned by God, without thereby clouding over—but also without brushing this cry aside as an alien event and as it were putting it in an antechamber, a place that does not truly belong to God, or a temporal instant that would be irrelevant for eternity, but on the contrary, enduring it to the full in the midst of what we call God's 'eternal bliss'? Does not this mean that we posit a contradiction in God: in the joy the face is turned to the other and in the cry it is turned away, in the former the 'Thou' is won and in the latter the 'Thou' is lost, in the former is all meaning and in the latter meaninglessness yawns? Can one say that in God, in whom all is in the present tense, the Cross is only a moment that passes away? Is the only way out of this dilemma, overcoming the contradiction, perhaps to look up to the ever greater love of God, to his innermost glory in which the cry of loss and the pain of the face that is turned away take their place in the drama of love as a moment not to be missed? A moment that is itself light, thanks to love? For in God 'there is no darkness at all' (1 Jn 1.5).

This final point, scarcely visible to human eyes, is the goal of the many paradoxes of human and Christian living, in an increasing mutual integration of joy and suffering, indeed of joy and the Cross. When Jesus proclaims that the poor, the mourners, the hungry and the thirsty are blessed, this is not in view of a future that is still to come and that will console and fill them, but because even now they are open, in their shortage, in the attitude of receptivity which the happy, the rich and the filled do not know, or have forgotten. It is the 'poor in spirit' who are meant, not those who put up with their poverty against their will and shelter in their hearts the same greed and covetousness as the rich. The beatitudes thus embrace something that holds true for all human persons: there is no inner freedom without renunciation, and without rising above impulse and inclination, nor any deeper joy without yielding up a superficial happiness, not only in the individual sphere but also in the social sphere: the individual can sacrifice himself in joy for the common good, and this is the basis of Hegel's requirement that every limited individual aspect must be submerged and make itself available in the unavoidable pain of the dialectical process but in the joy of the greater freedom which results. The harshness of Marxist dialectic demands even more explicitly that this joy of self-transcendence should involve self-renunciation in favour of the future happiness of others, and the enduring paradox of this teaching is that the joy of renunciation, the joy that affirms and drives the whole process, can be greater than the expected eschatological happiness: the unremovable barrier of death forbids one to see how the two are mutually related. The person is sacrificed, and should sacrifice itself in joy, and not only without the ulterior motive of a reward, but—and this is decisive—without the awareness of being loved and eternally affirmed as a person.

For the Christian too, temporality is a process which includes the alienations that must be endured for the sake of coming together in unity: in part, these are the natural unpleasing events of educative chastisement, without which no one comes to maturity; in part, the measures taken by grace to bring back the alienated sinner to the love of God; finally, there are the salvific states of compassion with the crucified Lord which are imposed on some persons for the redemption of the world. It is possible at every point here to kindle a light of understanding, and thus of joy; and at every point here, this light proceeds explicitly from the good news of the resurrection of the dead, so that the Hegelian-Marxist paradox is avoided; yet the light of understanding must constantly transcend itself to enter the incomprehensible Christian truth that the Cross has its place in the heart of the bliss of God, and that the Lamb who was slain stands on the throne of the Father. The Old Testament already knows that God, as Father, chastises the children whom he loves (Deut 8.5f.; Prov 3.11f.), and the New Testament picks this up (Heb 12.5–13); chastisement becomes the sign that one is respected by the eschatological love of God (1 Cor 11.32; 1 Pet 4.17; Rev 3.19). The paraklēsis of the Church is required, in order for the chastised child to keep in view the standpoint of the Father. Thus the 'appearance' of the Father's alienation is shattered and gives way to the truth: 'Every chastisement does indeed appear for the moment to bring, not joy, but suffering; but afterwards it brings forth to those who have been trained by it the peaceful fruit of righteousness' (Heb 12.11). This appearance (δοκεῖν) is repeated in the chastisement of the community by the Apostle: the appearance has 'distressed' the community, 'even if only for a short time', and its sadness was the correct sadness 'that is pleasing to God' and as such became joy for the Apostle (2 Cor 7.8f.); but now the community must understand the Apostle's joy and come to share it, rising above its sadness: 'I have confidence in you all, that my joy will be the joy of you all' (2 Cor 2.3)—although the Apostle's joy (which makes concrete the joy of God) can be attained along no other path than that of the process of rebuke and hence of sadness: 'For if I make you sad, who can give me joy other than precisely the one to whom I caused the sorrow?' (2.2). In this dialectic, which is a considerable advance on the dialectic of the Old Testament, the relationship between the Apostle and the community reflects the whole relationship between God and the world: the pain which has been caused is necessary for the joyful God for the sake of the world, yet now God needs joy to come back to him from the world which he has raised up out of its alienation into the light of love and hence of understanding.

The paraklēsis must draw attention to the fact that suffering is not entry into alienation, but an exit from it. On a deeper level, suffering is a participation in the suffering of the one who leads us out of alienation. Here too, the New Testament picks up insights of the Old. 'Beloved, do not be surprised at the ordeal that you are going through, as if something strange were happening to you. Rather, rejoice that you share in the suffering of Christ' (1 Pet 4.12f.). 'Count it pure joy, my brothers, when you fall into many tribulations' (Jas 1.2). Subjective severe suffering is disclosed as objective 'pure joy', and this suffering can be endured in life only when those who suffer 'entrust their souls to the faithful creator and thereby do what is good' (1 Pet 4.19); then they can 'boast' with Paul of their tribulations (Rom 5.3) in the transcendence that comes from faith's insight that the process derives its meaning only from the eschatological integration; it is there that the emphasis lies, so weighty that it overthrows what seems to be heavy in the present time. 'The slight sadness' (1 Pet 1.6), 'the momentary, light tribulation' (2 Cor 4.17), can be lived through proleptically in an 'unutterable and glorified joy' (1 Pet 1.6–8), because it is objectively transparent and is indeed a guarantee of the incomparably weightier glory (2 Cor 4.17; Rom 8.18). All of these texts remain—correctly—in a perspective that is ultimately the perspective of Easter. It is from Easter that Christ's life and suffering receive their justification, and the Church's mission to proclaim this universal justification of God in the world in the Easter event remains a mission of joy. In faith and hope, this mission is empowered to set the brackets of a quasi around the utterly real suffering of the contemporary world and Church: Quasi tristes, semper autem gaudentes (2 Cor 6.10; cf. Heb 12.11: videtur non esse gaudii). This is all the more true in that at least the Christian—even in the subjective dark night—is permitted to retain the knowledge that his suffering, and with God's grace all suffering, is fruitful and is given in order that it may be handed on in its turn. The suffering of the Apostle takes place 'for the body of Christ, the Church' (Col 1.24), and through the Church and its upbuilding, even if in an extremely invisible manner, 'the universe' (τὰ πάντα) is brought towards its perfecting in Christ.[2] In this (post-Easter) view of things, the 'yes' to suffering and to the night receives its ultimate justification from christology, from a 'yes' of the Son to the will of the Father which can be spoken only in joy, not with a sigh. For this reason, one cannot dismiss the idea of A. Frank-Duquesne that an element of joy dwells in the lowest depths of the abandonment by God, and that it is this joy which makes the abandonment possible.[3]

[2] H. Schlier, Epheserbrief, pp. 205ff.

[3] 'Despite being rejected, despite the incomprehensible, hellish abandonment in his last hour on the Cross, there is no heart that overflowed with truer joy than the heart of Jesus . . . A hidden exultation makes him tremble through and through. It is as if the 'Hell' of darkened love—beyond all enjoyment and every possible reflection back upon himself—were precisely the true, naked and exposed reality of love and thus of joy . . . of the tremendously bottomless, divinely free and spontaneous joy, the joy in obeying, the joy that one may love to the point of giving oneself up, the joy that one may pour oneself out, a joy that is entirely 'located' in God . . . joy is then no longer psychological and something experienced (hence also something that somehow happens, something contingent and accidental), but becomes 'ontological', essential, giving a foundation to being itself, transcendent and divinising': 'Joie de Jésus-Christ', Etudes Carmélitaines (1947), pp. 23–27. On the dialectic between joy and suffering, cf. also: P. T. Dehau, Joie et Tristesse (1946); J. Massin, 'Le rire et la croix', Et. Carm. (1947), pp. 88–116; M. Carrez, 'Souffrance et gloire dans les épîtres pauliniennes', R. Th. Ph. 31 (1951), pp. 353–353; A. Brunner, 'Das Geheimnis der christlichen Freude', Geist und Leben 26 (1953), pp. 414–422; W. Nauck, 'Freude im Leiden', ZNW 46 (1955), pp. 68–80; H. U. von Balthasar, 'Die Freude und das Kreuz', Concilium 4 (1968), pp. 683–688.

On the theme of joy in the New Testament, basic are: E. G. Gulin, Die Freude im NT, part I (Jesus, Urgemeinde, Paulus) (Helsinki 1932), part II (Johannes) (ibid. 1936); Bo Reicke, Diakonie, Festfreude und Zelos (Uppsala 1951); J. Brosche, Jesus und die Freude (1946); LThK, 4th edn., IV, 361f. (E. Schick, A. Auer). D. Bonhoeffer's letters from prison return again and again to this theme in biblical meditations: Widerstand und Ergebung (1951), e.g. pp. 150f., 253f. (ET Letters and Papers from Prison, 1967, pp. 73f., 126f.):

Nevertheless, this theme is not exhausted by this Pauline view, which can no longer be called into question (even by 'taking the Cross seriously'); for christology does not have absolutely the last word as the justification for an existential doctrine of Church and man. Behind the Son stands the Father; behind the fiat of the Son to the will of the Father stands the heart of the Father who allows the Son to go into the total abandonment of Hell. Paul discovers the Cross and reflects on it from the starting-point of the Resurrection; but John accompanies the beloved Master to the Cross and understands that he too, like the Father, must accept beforehand, as one who loves, the suffering of the beloved. Here it is no longer a question of bearing the suffering, but of letting it be borne, of imposing suffering, and here a quite different shadow of 'alienation' falls upon the problem of suffering. The farewell discourses are the words of one who is 'agitated' (Jn 13.21; cf. 11.33; 12.27) to those who are somehow 'agitated' together with him (14.1). Even now, consolation is given and the gap of death is bridged over as 'a little while' (16.16ff.). But, incredibly, the loving disciples are required for their part to agree to the hiatus: 'if you loved me, you would rejoice that I go to the Father' (14.28), on the only road that leads thither: the way of the Cross. 'If you loved me': and so it is not the sinner who rejoices that one other than himself takes away from him his burden and his damnation—for that would not be love. It is the lover who rejoices that the beloved suffers: not because suffering would be a joy, but because suffering is an expression of his love, which could not have expressed its ultimacy in any other way one must not make the Cross a principle (as Kierkegaard did), 'in any case, even in the Old Testament the one who was blessed has to suffer much . . ., but nowhere does this lead to the positioning of an exclusive antithesis between happiness and suffering, or between blessing and Cross (nor is this done in the New Testament)'. And then, reflecting on the human ethical element: 'Not only action, but also suffering is a way to freedom. The liberation lies in the suffering, in that one is allowed to give one's cause out of one's own hands and lay it in the hands of God. In this sense, death is the crowning of human freedom. Whether the human act is a matter of faith or not, depends on whether or not man understands his suffering as a continuation of his action, as a perfection of freedom'.

---

(15.13). The beloved rejoices that he is permitted to do this, and therefore the lover too should rejoice in this. If one reflects on this more deeply, one ceases to be surprised that Christian joy, even in its pure childlikeness, retains something that burns in a strange way in this world. The loving Church assuredly lives, with Paul, on the basis of Easter and has the right to rejoice at the redemption that has been given to the world; but the loving Church, with the Marian-Johannine fiat, is always on the path that leads to the Cross, which we never leave behind us as a 'fact' of the past, but which is the eschaton to which the whole course of the world's history is directed (Mt 24.30): videbunt in quem transfixerunt (Rev 1.7). John's eye is held by this vision (Jn 19.37). But the Apostle of the Gentiles too is caught up by the devouring flame of this love, which has 'encompassed him' (2 Cor 5.14) and, since the beloved has died for him and for all, has drawn him and all men down into the same death. Does this mean that a Christian may no longer enjoy in a carefree manner the earthly joy which God gives him, but must have a bad conscience in the midst of the joy? This would run contrary to the entire Pauline good news: 'Rejoice in the Lord always! Again I say: rejoice!' (Phil 4.4). It is true that joy—even Christian joy—has various levels, and that the deepest levels do not need to be always explicitly present to the consciousness; but as Christians we cannot deliberately look away from the depth and explicitly exclude it from our joy, turning our backs on the demand it makes of us. And the more we, like the 'saints', make room for the divine truth in us, the less can we do this. This means that the Christian leaves the world's rhythm, in which joy and suffering alternate, and enters a sphere that is mysterious for all men, and for himself, into a possibility of affirming suffering in joy, with God and in God, while nevertheless not depriving suffering of its depths of abandonment by God. God does this likewise, and in him this is a mystery of his love. The Jews refused to look on God's glory, because this was said to bring death. The Christians look on it in faith, and say 'yes' to the death that the glory has at its heart. Anxiety in the presence of the God who is a consuming fire (Deut 4.24) is changed into reverent service of the grace of the love of God: 'because our God is a consuming fire' (Heb 12.28f.).

3. Our wish would be that all this—existentially so difficult, and so questionable and dialectical for us sinners—should be presented within a framework that would take away something of the sense of exposure and give us instead an earthly feeling of security. In reality, the Church does exist. She is more than the sum of her parts and members: she is the body of Christ, his bride, our mother. She has promises of an ultimate infallibility (to the extent that she is without stain at an innermost point: Eph 5.27); and because she has a human form and is visible, something of this sheltering eschatological security is communicated to the forms of her life. Her symbols have the power to make present the grace which they signify and contain: bread and wine do not conceal the flesh and blood of Christ, but rather reveal precisely in what an essential manner Christ wills to be nourishment for us, how deeply he incorporates himself in us in order to take us up into himself; in the same way, the water of baptism reveals how deeply he buries us with him into his own death, how fundamentally he washes us, and how much his 'poured out' Spirit 'saturates' us individually and together. There are the keys that bind and loose both on earth and in Heaven. There is the Word that lasts longer than Heaven and earth and is entrusted to the proclamation of the Church: embodied in an intact form (as Scripture) that gives the guidelines for every new opening-up of the kerygma for new times. There is the promise that the form of the shepherd who gives his life for the sheep does not die out with the 'chief shepherd' (1 Pet 5.4): the servant who follows him may also follow to the point of dying for the flock (Jn 21.19). And even if rapacious wolves will break in again (Acts 20.29) and there will always be the cowardly 'hirelings', the 'strangers', and the 'thieves and robbers', still the flock knows the voice of the shepherd; the Church has the anointing in herself (1 Jn 2.20ff.) which teaches her which precept and which 'manner of life' of those who 'preside over her' (Heb 13.7) she must follow.

The development of the symbolism of 'the barque of Peter' was therefore almost automatic. It is true that the two pairs of disciples were called away from their boats and nets, in order to carry out a different calling, that of fishers of men;[4] but the movement away from the fisherman's boat is slowed down through Jesus' use of the boat for his preaching (Lk 5.1ff.) and for his crossings of the sea (Mk 4.35–41 par.), with the boat in Matthew already a clear anticipatory reference to the form of the Church (in the storms of the world). In the appended chapter in John, there is indeed a 'sacramental' identity posited between the boat of Peter, which makes the catch of all the fish of the world ('not far from the shore') at the Lord's command, and the Church; but the closing scene then takes place on the shore, and Peter is commissioned as shepherd, not as fisher. The outline of the ship remains behind, faded. For how could a little fishing boat be comparable to the great sacred vessels of salvation, with the ark in the flood, for example, or with Solomon's Temple? From now on, it is no longer the ship that gives shelter, not the institution, but the God who has disclosed the intimacy of his heart in Jesus. It is this glory that we have seen, and no other institutional and sacred glory. The transparency of the Christian symbols must therefore also be able to survive the transition from a 'sacred' form of thinking and feeling to a 'profane' form, without harm.

The institution, the mission and the sending out of the Church have their basis in Easter. But she retains Good Friday and Holy Saturday in her centre, where the human form and the visibility of God are swept away, extinguished and buried. With this mystery within herself, the Church can only be the 'tent' of a wandering people, a tent that is continually folded up anew, in order that it can be erected anew somewhere else.[5] 'The one who dwells in the mystery in the highest house has also a tent on earth, the Church . . . I admire many things in this tent: God's earthly tent is the men who believe. And while one marvels at the obedient submissiveness of the members, one comes thereby to the house of God, following thereby a certain sweetness, an indescribable, hidden inner delight, as if an organ sounded forth sweetly from the house of God . . . chords of an eternal feast, where there is the face of the God who is present, where there is joy without end. This feast had no beginning, and no end is ordained for it. From this feast, something sweet sounds forth to the ears of the soul, if the world does not drown it out . . . and it draws the hind to the springs of water'.[6] It is not the structures that make the sounds of music, for they can scarcely be called the keys of the instrument from which arises the melody that awakens yearning; but they have an interior dimension, and the modest festal gatherings of the Church point to a quite different feast: the scanty meal with bread and wine points to an intoxicating banquet—new in my Father's kingdom. It is therefore possible for the structure of the temporal institutions to become weaker at times; these truly belong to time, and time works on them, so that much rusts, corrodes and must be replaced; what seemed firmly joined together, becomes separated and lets light or also darkness through.

---

[4] On this logion, cf. M. Hengel, Nachfolge und Charisma (1968), pp. 85f. (ET The Charismatic Leader and his Followers, 1981, pp. 76ff.

[5] Cf. the symbolism of the wandering through the desert in Origen's homilies on Exodus.

The Acts of the Apostles ends with a broad and almost cosy description of a shipwreck: the ship is Paul's. Luke is very well aware of the symbolism of his narrative.[7] The ship is caught by the sea-wind, and since 'it could not withstand the onslaught, we gave it up and let ourselves be carried along' (Acts 27.15). The ship is undergirded, then the cargo is cast overboard, and finally the sailors 'cast out with their own hands the tackle of the ship' (vv. 17ff.). 'All hope of being rescued was gone.' Paul receives in a dream an instruction which he passes on: 'There will be no loss of human life, but only of the ship'. This then is broken to pieces, when its bow bores into a sandbank and the rear deck splinters under the assault of the waves. Those who know how to swim jump overboard, and the others save themselves on planks of the ship or on the backs of the swimmers (vv. 41–44). This is the eschatological situation: the structure, as the outer form, bursts, and one can save oneself and get to shore on the débris. 'The camp of the saints and the beloved city' are 'surrounded' in the final battle (Rev 20.9), and according to human reckoning they must fall. If the earthly Jerusalem were to be constructed in such a way that it made a direct transition to the heavenly Jerusalem, it would be the tower of Babel. The disciples in Peter's boat likewise called out, 'Lord, save us, we are perishing!' (Mt 8.25). The prudent man who built his house on the rock—'the rain streamed down in torrents, floods came, storms raged and beat against the house' (Mt 7.24f.)—is the man who has set his confidence in the rock who is Christ. He will find the plank that brings him safely to shore, and this plank is perhaps the back of someone who can swim.

---

[6] Augustine, Enarr. in Ps. 41, 9 (PL 36.470).

[7] It is not necessary to discuss here how he blends Old Testament tradition (above all Testament of Naphtali; cf. Ps 107.23ff.), an already-existing narrative of the voyage, and some additions that glorify Paul, and makes a unity of these elements.

The Church herself, as the body of Christ, will not escape in her visibility and her institutional character from the law which was given by her Head. The risen Lord too is once more a visible form, but one that has passed through the gulf of the abyss. And it is precisely from the risen Lord that the earthly visibility of the Church has her soul and her spirit, so that she has as it were a form that is already alien to the world that is passing away, a form that has its home elsewhere; this form will not be affected by worldly shipwrecks or by the splintering of its own intratemporal form. And the Church, as body and bride, is never the mid-point of the form to which we have wished to point here. She is the moon, not the sun: the reflection, not the glory itself. Put more precisely, she is the response of glorification, and to this extent she is drawn into the glorious Word to which she responds, and into the splendour of the light without which she would not shine. What she reflects back in the night is the light of hope for the world.

INDEX OF NAMES

Aalen, 240
Aland, K. 123
Althaus, P. 231
Alszegy, Z. 240
Anselm, 16, 205, 273, 315, 318, 326–7
Arndt-Gingrich, 57
Athanasius 213
Auer, A. 537
Augustine 14, 22, 52, 53, 200, 244, 289, 440, 460, 468, 481, 502, 523, 529, 541–2

Bachmann, P. 479, 526
Baltensweiler, H. 341, 342, 344, 347
Barth, G. 404
Barth, K. 21–3, 24, 28, 84, 215–16, 314, 464, 467
Barth, M. 289
Bauer, C. 512
Bauer, W. 57, 466
Bauernfeind, O. 220, 428
Bavalcado, R. 239
Bernard 212
Bernard, P. 460
Bertram, 294
Berry, G. R. 239
Best, E. 73
Betz, O. 42
Billerbeck 57, 222, 313, 314
Blank, J. 227, 228, 254, 375, 382, 384
Blass 49, 455
Blinzler, J. 341
Bloch, E. 129, 510
Bloch, R. 69
Böckle, F. 416, 423, 426
Boethius 263
Boismard, M.-E. 48, 49, 475
Bommer, J. 416
Bonaventure 263, 273
Bonhoeffer, D. 20, 440, 460, 537–8
Boobyer, G. H. 239, 342
Born, A. van den 391
Bornkamm, G. 120, 158, 349–50, 351, 368
Botte, B. 239
Bourke, M. 68
Bousset, W. 82, 228, 479
Bowman, J. W. 169
Brandenburger, E. 467
Braun, F.-M. 240, 376
Breton, S. 215
Breton, V.-M. 460
Brockington, L. H. 239
Brosche, J. 537
Brownlee, 42
Brox, N. 199
Bruce, A. B. 371
Brunner, A. 537
Buber, M. 186, 440
Büchsel, F. 254
Bulgakov, S. 213–14, 347
Bultmann, R. 49, 122, 151, 152, 153, 162, 342, 362, 375, 411–12, 455, 467
Buri, F. 169
Burrows, E. 60

Caesarius of Arles 460
Calvin, J. 232
Campenhausen, H. von 62
Carlston, C. E. 342
Carrez, M. 239, 537
Casel, O. 262
Casper, B. 440
Cerfaux, L. 290, 362
Champions, L. 239
Chardon, L. 216
Charlier, C. 290
Charme, A. 239
Chavasse, C. 475
Clement of Rome 105

Colson, J. 473
Constantine 499, 502
Conzelmann, H. 352
Corssen, C. 239
Crisan, T. 239
Cullmann, O. 36, 56, 153–4, 162, 163, 165, 170, 171, 179, 287, 348, 376, 422, 470
Czerny, J. 464

Dahl, N. A. 71, 99, 182, 368, 487, 489, 496
Dalman, G. 169
Daniélou, J. 66
Daube, D. 68
Däubler, T. 354
Davey, N. 115, 203
Debrunner, 455
Dehau, P. T. 537
Deissman, A. 307
Delling, G. 163, 168, 170, 173, 178, 423
Dibelius, M. 220, 342
Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite 205, 272, 273
Dodd, C. H. 162, 167, 288
Doresse, J. 24
Duplacy, R. 239, 240
Dupont, J. 47, 72, 74, 98, 239, 359, 368, 376, 520, 521

Ebeling, G. 135, 152, 331, 332
Ebeling, H. J. 220, 348
Ebner, F. 440
Eckhart 285
Ehrhardt, A. A. T. 497, 498, 499, 501
Eichrodt, W. 205
Elbogen, I. 134
Eltester, F. W. 280, 281, 366, 479

Fascher, E. 71, 74–5, 76, 240, 316
Faustus of Riez 460
Feine, P. 80
Feuerbach, L. A. 440
Flick, M. 240
Florian, F. 216
Fohrer, G. 71, 130
Formesyn, R. 290
Fraine, J. de 93
Frank-Duquesne, A. 537
Fuchs, E. 123, 135, 152, 339
Funk, R. W. 70

Galtier, P. 213
Gerber, W. 348
Gese, H. 303
Giles of Rome 464
Gils, F. 79
Gnilka, J. 462, 474
Goethe, J. W. von 440
Goettsberger, J. 239
Gogarten, F. 135
Goguel, M. 169
Gombos, C. 240
Goodenough, E. R. 285, 497
Grässer, E. 179
Greeven 57, 400
Gregory Nazianzen 85
Gregory of Nyssa 272
Gressmann, H. 82, 228, 479
Groussow, W. 240, 241, 375
Grundmann, W. 44, 77, 147, 346
Guillet, J. 45
Gulin, E. W. 20, 412, 537
Güttgemanns, E. 183

Haag, H. 229
Haenchen, E. 466
Haenel, J. 80
Hahn, F. 342
Haldar, A. 70
Harder, G. 33
Harnack, A. von 342
Harrison, E. F. 239
Hartmann, G. 334
Hauck 416, 423, 462
Hegel, G. W. F. 13, 89, 315, 327, 440, 523, 535
Heghmans, M. 240
Heising, A. 334, 425

Held, H. J. 330
Hengel, M. 190, 193, 541
Henry, P. 212, 214
Hermann, I. 403
Herodotus 69
Hesse 240
Hilary 48, 213
Hildebrand, D. von 440
Hillmann, W. 479
Hirsch, E. 326, 328
Höller, J. 341
Holmes, W. H. G. 371
Hoskyns, E. C. 115, 203, 378
Huby, J. 267, 456
Humbert, A. 221
Humboldt, W. von 272

Iamblichus 275
Ignatius of Antioch 199, 392
Ignatius Loyola 198–9, 382
Irenaeus 89, 105, 129, 133, 233

Jaeger, H. 71
Jänike, T. 239
Jeremias, J. 46, 57, 134, 168, 169, 336, 338, 341, 346, 442, 474
Jervell, J. 270, 280, 296, 479
Joest, W. 302
John Chrysostom 48, 366, 371
John Damascene 371
Josephus, Flavius 43, 65, 227, 496
Jossua, J. P. 212
Joüon, P. 51
Journet, C. 465
Jülicher, 338
Jüngel, E. 152, 164
Justin 49, 51, 129, 146

Kähler, M. 218
Käsemann, E. 80, 116, 118, 119, 130, 153, 155–6, 170, 212, 245, 281
Kassing, A. 64
Kennedy, H. A. A. 359
Kierkegaard, S. 20, 21, 190, 216, 326–8, 334, 538
Kirsch, J. P. 460
Kittel, G. 240, 241, 244, 280, 281, 284
Kittel, H. 264, 265, 271, 297, 479
Kleinknecht, 280
Klostermann E. 61
Koch, G. 14
Kokša, G. 465–6
Köppen, K. P. 74
Korn, J. H. 72
Köster, H. 86, 154
Kremer, J. 199, 200
Kuhn, K. G. 82, 228
Kümmel, W. G. 46, 162, 166, 167, 169, 171, 180, 366, 449
Kuss, O. 239, 307, 412

Lagrange, M.-J. 450
Laurentin, R. 59, 61, 63, 64, 66, 352
Law, R. 244
Leder, H.-G. 74
Leibniz, G. W. 16
Leibrecht, W. 110
Lengsfeld, P. 467, 469
Leo the Great 212
Léon-Dufour, X. 353
Lessing, G. E. 328
Lietzmann, H. 366, 449, 479, 501
Lightfoot, J. B. 366
Lloyd, R. B. 239
Lohfink, G. 358
Lohmeyer, E. 42, 55, 98, 183, 342, 343, 504
Lohse, B. G. 470
Loos, H. van der 330
Löwith, K. 440
Lubac, H. de 20, 102–3, 108, 296, 406, 440
Luck, U. 15
Lütgert, W. 15, 435, 457
Luther, M. 205, 232, 328
Lyonnet, S. 205

Maier, H. 512

Marcion 72, 510
Marx, K. 440, 534, 535
Marxsen, W. 88, 121, 349
Massin, J. 537
Matzkow, W. 240
Maurer, C. 491
Maximus the Confessor 85
Mecham, H. G. 240
Meer, F. van der 240
Meyer, E. 342
Michaelis, M. 287, 290
Michel, O. 48, 153, 306, 369, 370, 372, 452
Milik, J. T. 343
Moffat, J. 435
Molin, G. 240
Morgenstern, M. 239
Mühlen, H. 93, 440
Müller, C. 303
Müller, H. P. 344
Mussner, F. 94, 128, 169, 254, 286, 287, 289, 291, 323–4, 331

Nairne, 371
Nauck, W. 537
Nelis, J. 229
Neuenschwander, 169
Neugebauer, F. 156
Newman, J. H. 18
Nicetas of Remesiana 460
Nicholas of Cusa 85, 232, 263, 273
Nieder, L. 445, 446
Nielen, J. M. 391
Nisin, A. 55
Nygren, A. 258
Nyström, S. 70

Oecumenius 371
Oepke 46, 368, 471
Origen 23, 52, 85, 87, 108, 168, 205, 234, 295–6, 460, 523, 541
Otto, R. 169
Overbeck 187

Pannenberg, W. 138, 139, 159, 169, 170
Pascal, B. 83, 263
Pass, H. L. 239
Pax, E. 128, 274, 275, 276, 278, 356
Pelletier, A. 227
Percy, E. 239, 478
Perrot, C. 67, 68
Pesch, R. 155, 170, 190, 195
Peterson, E. 487, 502
Philo 105, 108, 227, 271–2, 275, 281, 282–3, 369, 450, 496, 497
Pseudo-Philo 67
Pines, S. 66
Piolanti, A. 460
Plato 16, 273, 275, 281–2
Plotinus 16, 271, 273, 432
Plutarch 281
Pohle-Gierens 231
Polanus 21
Popkes, W. 149, 224, 225
Potterie, I. de la 287
Preisker, H. 33, 70
Proclus 275
Prümm, K. 208, 313, 366, 412, 414, 471, 495, 520
Prunet, O. 456

Rad, G. von 240, 280
Rahner, H. 434
Rahner, K. 160, 218
Ramsey, A. M. 270, 320–1, 326, 347, 353, 371
Ratzinger, J. 107, 160
Reicke, B. 537
Reitzenstein, R. 416
Rengstorf, K. H. 190, 290, 366
Richard of St Victor 232
Richter, G. 51
Riesenfeld, H. 72, 80, 341, 343
Rigaux, B. 179
Rissi, M. 466
Robillard, J. A. 329
Robinson, J. A. T. 51
Rodin, A. 46
Rondet, H. 468
Rosenweig, F. 440

Sabbe, M. 342, 343
Sahlin, H. 70
Sartre, J.-P. 441
Scheler, M. 288
Schelkle, K. H. 19, 149, 190, 203, 210, 316, 374, 468
Schick, E. 537
Schierse, F. J. 295, 371
Schillebeeckx, E. 514
Schlatter, A. 15, 43, 154, 159, 359
Schlier, H. 16, 86, 125, 158, 174, 239, 242, 270, 287, 294, 295, 306, 354, 360, 365, 367, 369, 392, 394, 399, 410, 442, 443, 449, 467, 473, 482, 484, 487, 489, 501, 503, 505, 506, 524, 537
Schmauch, W. 70
Schmidt, K. L. 366
Schmoller, 398
Schnackenburg, R. 71, 73, 117, 173, 179, 244, 285, 292, 309, 378, 407, 422, 438, 446, 456, 475
Schneider, G. 341
Schneider, J. 203
Schnell, H. 465
Schniewind, J. 72
Schrenk, G. 180
Schulte, R. 470
Schultz, A. 190, 191, 193, 194, 198, 199
Schürmann, H. 95
Schütz, P. 295
Schütz, R. 42, 43, 49
Schweitzer, A. 162, 167, 169, 187
Schweizer, E. 128
Seesemann 71
Selwyn, E. G. 374
Siewerth, G. 288
Simon, M. 487
Sjöberg, E. 49, 218, 219, 348
Sohm, R. 155
Söhngen, G. 308
Spicq, C. 19, 118, 294, 314, 371, 374, 435, 448, 457
Staab 504
Stählin, G. 221
Stauffer, E. 42, 65, 75, 127, 375, 473, 474, 493
Steiner, M. 74
Steinheimer, M. 240
Steinmann, J. 45
Stimpfle, J. 240
Strauss, D. F. 342
Strecker, G. 437
Strobel, A. 179
Stuhlmacher, P. 296, 298, 300, 303, 437
Stuhlmueller, C. 439
Stuiber, A. 390
Suarez 464–5

Teilhard de Chardin, P. 406
Tertullian 48, 72, 105, 129
Thibaut, R. 157
Thomas Aquinas 14, 199–200, 205, 213, 229, 263, 326, 464
Thomas Leonardi OP 216
Thompson, G. H. P. 74
Thüsing, W. 46, 228, 240, 244–5, 257–8, 259, 290, 298, 407–8, 477, 480, 522
Toussaint, L. 240
Traets, C. 287, 288, 289, 290
Trilling, W. 118, 184
Turrado, L. 240

Valentinus 482, 510
Van der Woude, A. S. 67
Vanhoye, A. 291
Vaux, R. de 208
Vergil 65
Vermeulen, A. J. 240
Vielhauer, P. 51, 153
Vincent, J. J. 123
Vögtle, A. 56, 67, 68, 144–5, 173
Völkl, R. 435, 438
Volz, P. 42, 82, 88, 228

Waldow, E. von 303
Warnarch, V. 435

Weinel, H. 20, 79
Weiss, J. 20, 79, 169, 171
Weizsäcker, C. von 342
Wellhausen, J. 49, 342
Welte, B. 160
Wenz, H. 287
Werner, M. 169, 187
Wette, W. M. L. de 20
Wetter, G. P. 239
Weiner, C. 473
Wikenhauser, A. 407
Wilckens, U. 139, 159, 169–70, 178, 369
Willms, H. 280, 283
Wilson, E. 42
Windisch, H. 521
Winter, P. 66
Wrede, W. 220, 348
Wright, A. G. 69
Wright, G. E. 38

Zimmermann, H. 127, 128

INDEX OF REFERENCES

Genesis
1.2 57
1.26f. 280
1.27 392
1.28 518
2 480
2.20ff. 470, 478
2.24 92
8.11 57
12.3 435, 488
49.10 47

Exodus
3 34
4.13ff. 34
4.19–20 69
16 72
16.4f. 425
17.1–7 72
24 342
24.1 344
24.9 344
24.16 344
25.9 507
25.40 507
34.28 71
35ff. 315
40.34f. 357
40.35 60, 343

Leviticus
19.35f. 315
26 58

Numbers
11 72
12.5 91
25.11–13 435

Deuteronomy
1.31 72
4.24 539
8.5f. 535
10.21 412
18 79
18.15 41, 343, 346
18.21f. 139
25.14f. 315
26.5 68
27–28 58
32.9 486

1 Samuel
24.5 224

2 Samuel
6.2–11 61

1 Kings
17.8–24 80
19.2–10 50
19.8 71
19.19ff. 80

2 Kings
4.42ff. 322
4.43f. 425
5.10 334
5.42ff. 80

1 Chronicles
23–29 491

2 Chronicles
13 491
14 491
17 491
18 491
19 491
20.14 491
20.20 491
24 491
29 491
32.21 71
34 491
36 491

Job 71
3.23 209
10.3 209
10.16 209
10.17 209
11.7–9 267
14.5 165
28.25 314
30.15 209
38.5 314

Psalms 24
2.7 56
5.12 412
8 89, 375
8.6 266, 370, 469–70, 518
18.5 46
27.8 470
31.5 226
32.11 412
42.4 528
51.18f. 207
52.3 412
68.36 (LXX) 459
69.3 46, 212
69.10 451
69.15 46
75.5 412
80.9ff. 416
84 491
85.10 25
87.6 (LXX) 231
88 81–2
89.8 459
94.3 412
95.9 73
96–98 303
104.35 435
105.4 400
107.23ff. 542
115.1 (LXX) 493

116.10 493
118.22f. 222
118.22 221
124.4f. 46
139.21f. 435
139.23 71

Proverbs
3.11f. 535
8.22 281
11.1 315
20.10 315

Isaiah
1.21 62
2.2–5 91
5.1ff. 416
5.4 418
7–11 60
7.14 62, 67
8.14 61, 221
8.15 222
9.1f. 78
10.23 85
11.4 510
14.10 229
21.3–4 209–10
25.8 228
27.2ff. 416
28.16 221
32.15 309
35.1–6 320
35.5f. 47
40.3–5 25, 320
40.3 41, 51
40.6ff. 130, 375
40.10 47
40.12 314
41.8ff. 61
42.1 57, 346
44.3 309
45 69
52.13 355
52.15 442
53 35, 110, 166, 209, 299
53.2 328
53.3 385
53.7 58, 208, 226
53.9–10 207
53.10 230
53.11 442
53.12a 442
53.12b 442
54.4ff. 473
55.1 309
55.10f. 40, 175
58.11 309
60.1 320
60.13 320
61.1f. 77
61.1 47
61.10 473
62.4 473
62.11 350

Jeremiah
2.2 45
2.21 416
4.2 435
7.16 40
9.22f. 412
11.14 40
14.11f. 40
17.10 416
23.29 117
31.33f. 400
31.33 317, 419
51.59–64 210

Ezekiel 319
9.3 25
10 210
10.18 25
11.22f. 25
14.17 61
15.1–8 416
16.7ff. 473
16.44ff. 206
17.3–10 416
19.10–14 416
36.25 309
36.27 445
37.5 309
37.14 309, 445
39.29 309
40ff. 315
40.3 314
40.5ff. 314
43.2ff. 25
43.2 375
43.4f. 77
47 226

Daniel 342–3
2.34 222
2.44 222
3.24–90 82–3
7 25
7.13 470
7.13a 47
7.14 (Th) 319
7.14 (LXX) 319
8.16 60
8.26 346
9.21f. 60
12.4 346

Hosea 477
2.5 45
2.16 45
2.19 473
6.6 207
10.1 416
13.9ff. 37

Joel
2.21ff. 60
3.1f. 309

Amos
5.24 87, 442
5.25 207
6.12 416
8.4ff. 315
8.9–10 227

Jonah
2.3–11 82–3
2.6 46

Micah
4 61
4.10 61
5 61, 67
6.8 87, 442
6.10f. 315

Zephaniah
3.15ff. 60

Zachariah
2.14 60
9.9f. 60
9.9 350
12.10 309
13.1 226, 309
13.7 189
14.8 309

Malachi
3.1f. 47
3.1 41, 44, 51, 117
3.19 58
3.22f. 344
3.23 41, 51
3.24 44

Tobit
4.17 435

Judith
13.18f. 61

Wisdom of Solomon 280, 281, 282
1.14 406
5.1 411
7.25f. 281
7.26 369
8.21 281
11.20 314, 315
11.24 406
13.1–9 284
18.15f. 117
18.19 118

Ecclesiasticus
1.11 412
9.16 412
10.22 412
12.6 435
17.1–14 392
17.2 165
17.3 518
17.7–8 518
23.17ff. 477
24.4–10 187
24.12 34
48.10f. 51
48.10 44
50 591

1 Maccabees
2.24–26 435

Matthew
2.2ff. 349
2.2 54
2.11 68
2.20 69
2.22 69
3.1 54
3.2 43, 117
3.6 46
3.7 41
3.8 43
3.9 43
3.11 par. 44
3.11–12 58
3.11 47
3.12 46, 420
3.13 54
3.14 48
3.15 70, 315, 350, 404
3.16 56
4.2 71
4.3 70
4.4 96, 135, 209
4.8 73, 347
4.10 75
4.12–16 54, 78
4.12 49
4.16 131
4.17 117
4.17b 43
5–7 351
5.3–10 131
5.3ff. 339
5.6 87, 436
5.8 294
5.10 436
5.11–12 78
5.11 137, 160
5.14 286 433
5.16 419
5.17–20 78
5.17ff. 111
5.17f. 56
5.17 119, 185
5.18 350
5.19f. 39
5.20 310, 350, 425, 436
5.21ff. 436
5.22ff. 492
5.25f. 338
5.39–42 132
5.39ff. 350, 438
5.39f. 437
5.39 466
5.43–48 141
5.43 435
5.45 436
5.46f. 454
5.48 436
6.1 436
6.2ff. 132
6.10 40
6.13 72
6.19ff. 132
6.21 437
6.22 par. 14, 126, 437
6.25–34 437
6.25–33 431
6.25ff. 132, 350
6.27 145, 165
6.33 87, 188, 436

7.1 par. 126
7.1ff. 350
7.11 136
7.12 43, 87, 326, 350
7.21ff. 349
7.21 418, 437
7.22f. 78
7.24f. 543
7.28f. 124
8–9 351
8.2 333, 349
8.4 334
8.5–13 332
8.10 193
8.11 194
8.17 350
8.19 133
8.20 45, 96
8.25 543
9.2 120
9.11 438
9.12 131
9.14 41
9.18 333, 349
9.22 par. 135
10 96, 351
10.1 333
10.5f. 487
10.8–10 133
10.16 133
10.17ff. 350
10.19f. 133
10.24f. 198
10.33 122
10.34ff. 349
10.40–42 79
10.41 349
11–12 351
11.1 334
11.2–6 322
11.2 47
11.3 47, 53
11.4–6 par. 320
11.4ff. 139, 331
11.6 221
11.9 41
11.11 41
11.11b 48
11.12 47
11.14 51
11.18 45
11.19 279, 339, 341, 351, 438
11.25 267, 350
11.29 350
11.30 437
12.5f. 492
12.6 79
12.7 87
12.8 119
12.11ff. 119
12.19 350
12.20 404
12.24 341
12.25 120
12.27ff. 322
12.28f. par. 174, 320
12.28 124, 351, 404
12.31f. 351
12.38ff. 332
12.39 79
12.40 230
12.41f. par. 79
12.41f. 492
12.41 230
12.42 351
13 351
13.4ff. 146
13.12 310
13.17 351
13.19 419
13.24ff. 146, 340, 419
13.27 417
13.30 123
13.31f. 332
13.33 340
13.34 336
13.35 336
13.36–43 336
13.40f. 123
13.40ff. 339
13.47ff. 123
13.47f. 340
13.49f. 336, 349
13.55f. 341
13.57 par. 79
13.57 221, 351
13.58 135
14.13 135
14.20 425
14.23 135
14.28–31 334
14.33 333, 349
15.3–9 119
15.3 75
15.11 450
15.12 221
15.13 417
15.21–28 332
15.24 166
15.25 333, 349
15.28 135, 193
15.37 425
16.1ff. par. 332
16.3 126
16.4 230
16.14 79
16.17 344
16.18 230
16.19 103, 182
16.23 75, 221
16.24ff. 350
16.27 345
16.28 345
17.2 345
17.5 343
17.11f. 50, 51
17.12 345
17.14–21 333
17.20 193, 332, 389
17.25ff. 75, 499
18.1ff. 350
18.6 222, 331
18.10 267
18.12ff. 339
18.15–17 504
18.18 182
18.19f. 467
18.21ff. 349

18.21f. 141
18.23–35 340
18.32f. 123
19.3–9 119
19.7f. 75
19.12 474
19.21 353
19.23ff. 350
19.27 194
19.28 par. 126
19.28 319, 357, 487
19.29 par. 134
19.29 160
20.1–16 416
20.1–15 339
20.1ff. 146
20.20ff. 350
20.20 349
20.22 167
20.28 141, 438
21.4f. 350
21.11 78
21.15 350
21.25 41
21.28ff. 340, 416
21.31f. 438
21.31 339
21.32 43, 55
21.33–44 416
21.33ff. 417
21.33f. 417
21.40ff. 123
21.42 222
21.46 78
22.1–10 336, 474
22.1ff. 146
22.2 123
22.11–13 123, 340
22.11ff. 123
22.15ff. 499
22.32 81
22.39 441
22.40 350
22.41ff. 79
23.13–33 37–8
23.23 43, 87, 350, 442
23.27f. 206
23.34ff. 492
23.37 49
24.8 514
24.24 79
24.27ff. 349
24.27 174
24.30 539
24.34ff. 349
24.44 174
25 470
25.1–13 340, 474
25.6 340
25.12 123
25.14–30 par. 417
25.24–30 419
25.26ff. 123
25.31–46 123, 340
25.31ff. 123, 349
25.31 123, 319, 357
25.34 123
25.40 123, 350, 439, 444
25.45 350, 439
26.11 165
26.20ff. 120
26.26 148
26.28 148, 149
26.31 221
26.38 532
27.19 125
27.42 226
27.47ff. 226
27.50 226
27.51–53 176, 227
28 96
28.2–4 176
28.2f. 356
28.9 68, 177, 349
28.11–15 177
28.17 68, 177, 276, 349
28.18–20 123, 177
28.18f. 177
28.18 149, 501
28.19 196
28.20 172

Mark
1.1 88
1.4 43
1.8 par. 57
1.10 56
1.12 70, 136
1.13 70
1.14 49
1.15 88, 320
1.18 191
1.20 par. 191
1.22 27, 95
1.24 par. 125
1.27 96, 124, 333
1.35 135, 334
1.40ff. 330
1.41 349
1.43 349
1.45 334
2.5 120
2.8 120
2.9 81
2.10 par. 124
2.12 333
2.14 193
2.17 par. 341
2.18ff. 40–1
2.19a par. 474
2.19f. 165
2.19a 474
2.20 par. 474
2.20 173
2.23ff. par. 119
2.27 119
3.2ff. par. 119
3.5 333, 349
3.6 78, 337
3.14 192
3.15 126, 193
3.22ff. par. 118, 330
3.24f. 230
3.27 75
3.29 par. 136
3.29 76
4.3ff. par. 340
4.9 336
4.10–12 par. 336

4.10 192
4.11 416
4.13–20 336
4.22 121
4.26ff. 340, 419
4.27 168
4.29 340
4.30ff. par. 340
4.35–41 par. 541
4.40 333
5.15 333
5.20 333
5.30 80, 334
6.1–5 77
6.2 27
6.5 par. 331
6.6 135
6.15 79
6.31 135
6.35 par. 192
6.46 135
6.51 333
7.15 450
7.24ff. 334
7.33 332
7.37 27, 333
8.1ff. 192
8.8 425
8.12 349
8.17 333
8.23 332
8.27ff. par. 53
8.28f. 51
8.28 51, 79
8.29 323, 344
8.31f. par. 323
8.31 par. 316
8.31 224
8.33 195
8.34 par. 46
8.35 par. 141
8.38 par. 357
8.38 150, 319, 320
9.3 28, 345
9.7 343, 344
9.11 51
9.12 par. 44
9.12f. 51
9.24 135, 193
9.31 par. 224
9.34 15
9.36 349
9.42 331
10.6ff. 474
10.13–15 332
10.14 349
10.16 349
10.21 par. 429
10.21 349
10.26 27
10.28 194
10.30 194
10.33a par. 224
10.33b par. 224
10.35–40 194
10.37 par. 357
10.37 319
10.38 141
10.45 par. 149, 224
10.45 141, 438
10.45b 225
10.52 135
11.1ff. 192
11.12–14 417
11.12f. 140
11.18 27
11.20f. 417
11.28 par. 124
11.29–33 124
12.10f. 222
12.14 125
12.15 75, 120
12.17 333
12.25 par. 474
12.34 37
12.35ff. par. 492
12.44 132, 429
13.8 514
13.9 par. 173
13.19 173
13.22 79
13.26 par. 357
13.26 319
13.28 339
13.31 166, 322
13.32 145
14.12ff. 192
14.18f. 120
14.22 148
14.24 148, 149, 438
14.25 173, 474
14.27 189
14.33 223
14.35 223
14.50 par. 191
14.62 par. 319
15.5 225
15.26 341
15.34ff. 85
15.34 210, 533
15.37 par. 210
15.37 226
16.5 355
16.8 356
16.11 276
16.12 280, 355
16.13f. 276

Luke
1.1 70
1.16f. 46
1.17 44, 51
1.27 62
1.29 63
1.38 56, 306, 400
1.42 61
1.45 62
1.46–50 61
1.47f. 103
1.52–53 353
1.66 54, 59
1.76 44, 46
2.1f. 105
2.9 319, 355
2.10 532
2.13f. 319
2.14 392
2.19 59, 63, 94
2.20 333
2.22ff. 352
2.30–32 77

2.30ff. 319
2.32 60
2.34 222
2.39–40 66
2.45–49 66
2.48–50 66
2.49 352
2.50 63
2.51–52 66
2.51 59, 63, 94
3.3 45, 55
3.6 55
3.16–17 58
3.17f. 42
3.18 43
3.21 135
3.22 56
3.23 63
4.13 74
4.14–21 54
4.14 136
4.15 353
4.16–30 341
4.18f. 47–8
4.18 77
4.21 77
4.22 333, 353
4.23 341
4.25ff. 52
4.30 353
4.35 351
4.36 124
4.41 351
4.42 135
5.1ff. 541
5.5 129
5.8 312
5.11 65, 132, 191, 195, 353
5.14 351
5.16 135
5.20 120
5.26 333
5.28 65, 132, 195, 353
6.5 119
6.12 346
6.19 334
6.20 65
6.22f. 137
6.22 137
6.23 137
6.24ff. 353
6.24f. 132
6.32–34 438
6.35–36 141, 436
6.35 140
6.36–38 314
6.36 160
6.37 438
6.38a 438
6.38b 438
6.40 133, 198
6.45 133
6.46 133
6.47f. 136
7.10 120, 334
7.16 79
7.22 65
7.28f. 492
7.30 43
7.33 43
7.35 279
7.36–50 352, 424
7.39ff. 120
7.41ff. 339
7.44f. 138
7.50 425
8.15 62
8.17 121
8.21 132
8.25 120
8.38 195
8.50 135
8.56 351
9.3 65
9.8 79
9.17 425
9.18 135
9.19 79
9.21 351
9.22 224
9.23f. 137
9.23 195
9.26 320, 355
9.28 135
9.31 27, 320, 343, 346, 352, 434
9.32 320, 345, 355
9.34 343
9.36 351
9.37 346
9.45 153, 351
9.47ff. 137
9.47 119
9.51 120, 173, 352
9.58 133
9.59ff. 132
10.1 192
10.2 140
10.16 385, 505
10.17 192
10.18 120, 174
10.20 131
10.24 par. 276
10.25–37 352
10.30ff. 339
10.35 141
10.38ff. 425
10.41 132
11.1 45, 135
11.4 72
11.5–8 134, 340
11.9 135
11.11–13 136
11.11ff. 286
11.13 268
11.17 119
11.20 124
11.27ff. 62
11.28 136, 306
11.30 230
11.32 230
11.49ff. 137, 492
11.52 103
12.2 121
12.6f. 132
12.8 par. 117
12.8f. 150
12.8 121
12.15ff. 340, 353

12.20 132
12.32 151
12.33f. 132
12.33 353
12.35ff. 133
12.39 340
12.49–50 58, 141
12.50 80, 167, 352
12.54ff. 339
12.57 126
12.58f. 338, 340
13.6–9 336, 340
13.8 417
13.10–16 119
13.17 333
13.20f. 340
13.24–30 340
13.32 144
13.33 38, 49, 79, 144, 146
14.3–5 119
14.10 352
14.12–14 352
14.12ff. 141, 339
14.12 454
14.15–24 336, 474
14.16ff. 123
14.20 par. 474
14.26–33 195
14.26 353
14.28–33 339
14.33 132, 353
15 137
15.1f. 137
15.7 533
15.11–32 339, 352
15.11ff. 132
15.17 425
15.23 533
15.32 533
16.1–8 341
16.1–7 141
16.8 141, 285
16.8b 338
16.9–13 353
16.9 338
16.10 338
16.11 338
16.12 338
16.13 338
16.14 353
16.16 49
16.19–31 229
16.20ff. 65
16.31 132
17.2 137
17.3f. 141
17.7–10 140
17.14 334
17.19 135
17.20f. 340
17.20 531
17.24 174
17.25 224, 316
17.37 295, 339
18.1–8 340
18.1–7 134
18.1 338
18.2–8 338
18.9–14 338
18.9ff. 132
18.15ff. 137
18.22 65, 132, 193, 353
18.31 352
18.34 351
18.42 135
18.43 333
19.1–10 137
19.10 131
19.11–26 141
19.12–27 par. 340
19.28 352
19.38 267, 319, 392
19.41 352
20.17 222
20.18 124, 222
20.47 132
21.1–4 37
21.3 65
21.30 295
22.17 418
22.19f. 149
22.19 148, 225, 418
22.20 148
22.28 194
22.29 151
22.30 474
22.35 132
22.37 138
22.39 346
22.42 135
22.53 223
22.67f. 226
23.9ff. 225
23.34 135
23.35 341
23.39ff. 227
23.43 229
23.46a 226
23.47 125
24.4 355
24.7 316
24.11 276
24.16 355
24.19 79
24.26f. 316
24.26 320, 355
24.37 356
24.41 276, 356, 532
24.44f. 176, 316
24.52 532

John 244
1–12 252
1 158, 159
1.1–3 283
1.1 27, 157
1.3f. 381
1.4 285
1.4b 285
1.5 254, 292, 381
1.7f. 50
1.9 122, 292, 375
1.10 381
1.11f. 456
1.11 375, 381, 383
1.12–13 422
1.12f. 457
1.12 292, 383, 385, 395

1.13 292, 310, 405
1.14 27, 28, 125, 260, 276, 286, 292, 295, 374, 376, 379, 531
1.15 44, 60
1.16 292
1.18 86, 104, 266, 287, 376, 379, 380, 422, 455
1.19f. 50
1.19 53
1.21 (51), 79
1.22 53
1.25 (51), 79
1.29 50, 58, 214
1.30 44, 47, 60
1.31 49
1.32 251
1.33 47, 49, 53
1.36f. 51
1.36 50, 58, 214
1.39 276
1.40ff. 120
1.41 194
1.45 194
1.46 120
1.48 120
1.49 194
1.50f. 289
2.4 166
2.10 424
2.11 260, 335, 378
2.21 253
2.22 153, 378
2.24 378
3.2 378
3.5f. 310
3.5 57, 395, 422, 457
3.7 316, 422
3.8 136, 151, 422
3.11f. 256
3.11 247
3.13 244, 248, 379, 422
3.14f. 379
3.14 316
3.16 51, 205, 225, 251, 279, 377, 395, 454, 455, 533
3.17f. 122
3.17 381
3.19–21 122, 285
3.19f. 381
3.19 284, 285, 292, 381
3.22–30 475
3.22 57
3.25 40
3.26 57
3.27–30 48
3.29 475, 484
3.30 50, 56, 316
3.31 248
3.34 57, 251, 313
3.35 259
4.1 57
4.2 57
4.4 316
4.6 518
4.9ff. 378
4.10 226, 309
4.13f. 226, 309
4.14 151, 253, 379, 421
4.16ff. 120
4.19 79
4.20 316
4.22 487
4.23 261, 381
4.32 135
4.34 96, 125, 135, 150, 209, 247, 256
4.35ff. 422
4.35f. 253
4.35 295, 384
4.44 79
4.48 332, 378
4.50 120
4.53 334, 378
5.10 119
5.13 334
5.16 119
5.19–47 118
5.19f. 125
5.19 244, 245, 250, 382
5.20 249, 259, 528
5.21ff. 382
5.22ff. 122
5.22 302
5.23 122
5.24–30 122
5.25 122, 261, 381
5.26 285, 383
5.28f. 382
5.28 173
5.30 126, 244, 382
5.31 50
5.36f. 380
5.37f. 287
5.37 292
5.41 125, 146, 414
5.43f. 376
5.43 246
5.44 146, 246, 375
5.46 376
6.12 425
6.14 79
6.15 135
6.20 127
6.27 150
6.28 151, 378
6.29 150, 385, 425
6.33ff. 379
6.37 151
6.38 142, 244, 248, 323
6.39 173, 382
6.40 173, 382
6.44 151, 173, 286, 291, 382, 383
6.45–46 294
6.46 266, 287
6.51 253, 425
6.51c 148
6.53ff. 379
6.54 173, 253, 382

6.56 309
6.58 425
6.61 221, 380
6.63 57, 251
6.65 383
6.68 96, 193
6.69 312
7.4 321
7.6ff. 165
7.6 145, 180, 189
7.7 381
7.8 180
7.15–24 118
7.16–17 217
7.16 142, 291, 380
7.18 142, 146, 246, 377
7.19ff. 245
7.27 377
7.28 244
7.29 247
7.30 245
7.37ff. 379
7.37f. 226
7.37 50, 421
7.37b–38 421
7.38 253, 309
7.39 151, 226, 251, 260, 404
7.40ff. 378
7.40f. 51
7.40 79
7.52 79
8.11 126
8.12 284, 285, 433
8.12b 285
8.13–20 118
8.14ff. 125
8.14 246, 377
8.15 382
8.17 381
8.19 377
8.20 245
8.24 127
8.25 53
8.25b 383–4
8.26 291
8.28 127, 244, 286, 291, 379, 383
8.29 125
8.31f. 312
8.31 308, 309, 378
8.33ff. 378
8.33f. 256
8.36 500
8.39f. 44
8.40 125
8.42 244, 457
8.46f. 125
8.46 207, 378
8.47 247
8.48f. 118
8.49 385
8.50 246, 377
8.53 82
8.55 247
8.56f. 44
8.56 276, 300, 376
9.4 316
9.7 334
9.14 119
9.16 119
9.17 79
9.29f. 377
9.36 378
9.39f. 380
9.39 122
9.41 380
10.10 425
10.11–15 149
10.15 214
10.16 245, 316
10.17f. 382, 455
10.17 247
10.18 148, 149, 244, 245, 247, 323, 383, 454
10.28 383
10.30 249, 510
10.37 248
10.38 312, 335, 383
10.40f. 380
11.4 260
11.9 144
11.24 173, 378
11.25 292
11.33 223, 538
11.38 223
11.40 260
11.42 246, 410
11.45ff. 380
11.50 149
11.52 250, 442
11.54 334, 380
12.4ff. 425
12.16 153, 378
12.20ff. 384
12.23ff. 421
12.23 379
12.24 247, 250, 253
12.25f. 257, 458
12.26 257, 403
12.27–33 347
12.27f. 223, 248
12.27 223, 245, 538
12.28 249
12.31 223, 227
12.32f. 379
12.32 250, 286, 291, 383, 442
12.34 316
12.35 144, 165, 169, 285, 292
12.36 284, 285, 292
12.40f. 380
12.41 27, 375, 376, 377
12.42 378
12.46 284, 285
12.47 381
12.48 173, 381
12.49–50 244
12.49f. 291
12.49 244, 247, 455
12.50 247, 288, 455
13–16 252
13.1 87, 148, 197, 245, 248, 251, 378, 424, 438, 455
13.6 127

13.7 153
13.8 312
13.13 217
13.14 200, 256
13.16 198
13.19 127
13.21f. 120
13.21 223, 538
13.31 247, 252, 379
13.32 248, 249
13.34 254, 256, 454
13.35 255
13.36 189, 197
14.1–14 457
14.1 288, 538
14.2f. 500
14.2 256, 528
14.6 166, 292, 308
14.9 283, 377, 470
14.10 142, 244, 247, 291
14.12 258, 528
14.13f. 135, 246, 410
14.13 259
14.15–24 457
14.15 254, 288, 457
14.16 125, 251, 390
14.18 253
14.19ff. 290
14.19 177, 220, 289
14.20 253
14.21–23 289
14.21 250, 457
14.23 177, 250, 253, 255, 292, 309, 407, 457
14.24 141, 254, 457
14.25 252
14.26 251, 252, 390
14.28 265, 292, 457, 538
14.31 248, 249
15.1–8 250
15.1ff. 416
15.1 217
15.2 250, 417
15.3 463
15.4f. 308
15.4 253, 309
15.5 217, 309, 420
15.7 309, 410, 463
15.8 259, 416, 421, 433
15.9f. 309
15.9 308, 455
15.10–17 254–5
15.10 244, 256, 308
15.12 256
15.13 455, 539
15.14–16 423
15.14f. 256
15.15 256, 291
15.16 246
15.16b 259
15.16c 135, 259
15.18–16.4 198
15.18ff. 257, 458
15.19 257
15.20 198
15.24 382
15.25 147, 210, 254, 380, 456
15.26f. 254
15.26 251, 252, 390
16.1ff. 146, 458
16.2 257
16.4 153
16.5f. 390
16.7 251, 253, 289, 390
16.8–11 254
16.10 279
16.12 266
16.13–14 252
16.13ff. 456
16.13 152, 178, 252, 253, 259
16.14 178, 252, 391
16.15 152, 249, 251, 259
16.16–23 289
16.16ff. 538
16.16 289
16.18 197
16.20 197
16.25 253, 290, 336
16.26 86, 126
16.28 377, 395
16.29f. 336
16.29 220
16.30 277, 312
16.32 223, 261, 381, 383
17.2 126, 381, 383
17.4–5 248
17.4f. 247
17.4 247
17.5 172, 211, 249, 250, 260, 375
17.6–8 259
17.7f. 312
17.9ff. 246
17.10 249, 251, 256, 259, 401
17.11 197, 458
17.14 257
17.16 257
17.17 257, 259
17.19 252, 257, 259
17.20–24 259
17.20–23 467
17.21 249, 251, 254, 456, 458
17.21 251, 254, 267, 309
17.24 245, 249, 260, 266, 467
17.26 249
18.6 321
18.8 189, 223
18.11 245
18.14 149
18.20 221
18.28–19.16 499
18.37 200, 223
19.9 377
19.11 223
19.15 497
19.26f. 223
19.26 197

19.28 226, 244, 248, 379
19.30 223, 226, 244, 248, 251, 379
19.34ff. 85
19.34f. 248
19.34 58, 248, 253, 309, 379
19.35 276, 295
19.37 291, 539
19.38 378
20.8–9 176
20.9 316
20.12 355
20.14 294
20.15 355
20.16 294
20.17 176, 217, 423
20.21–23 151
20.21 355
20.22f. 182
20.22 251, 379
20.29 176, 198, 289
21.4 334, 355
21.7 334
21.15 457
21.18f. 176, 183
21.18 458
21.19 257, 540
21.23 179
21.25 90

Acts
1.3 356
1.6 356
1.11 176
1.16 316
2.17 178
2.33 309, 355
2.36 124, 150, 330
2.41 426
3.13f. 124
3.13 355
3.14 125
3.21 44, 316, 357
3.22f. 79
4 466
4.4 426
4.27 125
4.30 125
4.32 466
5.15ff. 330
5.31 124
6.7 426
6.8 310
7.22 68, 79
7.30 496
7.42f. 207
7.55f. 357
7.56 177
8.14–17 422
8.32 226
8.37 36
9.4ff. 178
9.8 358
9.16 199
9.31 426
10.41 356
10.45 309
11.23 308
12.5 467
12.12 467
13.1 362
13.43 308
14.15ff. 364
14.22 308
15.10 96
16.5 426
16.6 136
17.3 316
17.22ff. 364
17.27f. 408
17.27 269, 272, 364, 400, 483
19.11ff. 330
19.21–21.16 453
20.7ff. 330
20.18–36 98
20.29 540
21 453
21.17ff. 111
21.24 453
26.13 358
26.18 358
26.23 358
27.15 542
27.17ff. 542
27.41–44 543

Romans 111, 454
1 243
1.4 279, 397
1.5 305, 307
1.9 467
1.13 423
1.16 147, 270, 363
1.18–3.20 517
1.18 206, 300
1.19–23 359
1.19–20 243
1.19 268
1.20 147, 241, 268, 269, 367
1.21 268
1.23 147, 241, 243, 268, 280, 367
1.24ff. 225
1.24 224
1.26 224
1.28 224
1.32 243
2.1–3 126
2.5 300
2.6 127, 419
2.10 267
2.14f. 186
2.15f. 364
2.16 454
2.24 206
3.2 486
3.4 125
3.5 302
3.7 426
3.19 185
3.23ff. 301
3.23f. 297
3.23 25, 229, 270, 296, 297, 469
3.25 205, 298, 301, 305

4 111
4.5 299
4.10ff. 185
4.10f. 300
4.13 81
4.15 185
4.17 299, 364
4.20 304
4.24f. 110, 299
4.24 299
4.25 225, 369
5 310, 468
5.1 297
5.2 297, 308, 469, 507, 515
5.3–5 515
5.3 413, 536
5.5f. 395
5.5 309, 310, 434, 515, 516
5.6 192, 402
5.8f. 301
5.8 149, 196, 205, 304, 360
5.9 204
5.10 205
5.11 412
5.12–21 442, 467
5.12 509
5.14 469, 527
5.15–21 425–6
5.15ff. 514
5.15 40, 269, 310, 426
5.17 40, 269, 310, 426
5.19 223, 306, 396, 426
5.20f. 269
5.20 26, 40, 300, 310, 426
6 477
6.1–23 468
6.1 310
6.3ff. 58, 182, 301, 488, 506
6.3 405
6.4 308, 354, 498
6.5 397
6.6 397
6.7ff. 364
6.9f. 498
6.10 404, 407
6.11 402
6.19 303
6.21 423
6.22 423
7 517
7.1–6 477
7.2 479
7.3–4 477
7.4–5 423
7.4ff. 408
7.4 408
7.6 408
7.12 37, 502
7.25 369
8 409, 512, 522
8.1 407
8.2 500
8.3 204, 211, 216, 225, 227, 298, 362
8.4 308
8.9–11 407
8.9f. 311
8.9 309, 362, 401, 515
8.10 302, 369, 404, 513
8.11 299, 401, 402, 403, 515
8.14 136, 401
8.15ff. 311
8.15 395, 405, 516
8.16f. 516
8.16 312, 405
8.17 201, 488, 513, 517
8.18–39 368
8.18–30 512–17
8.18ff. 369
8.18 302, 512, 513, 514, 536
8.19 278, 512
8.20 512, 513, 514, 527
8.21 255, 270, 409, 513, 514
8.22 514
8.23 278, 513, 515
8.24 365, 485, 514
8.25 278, 515
8.26 267, 512, 515
8.27 512, 515
8.29–30 516–17
8.29 217, 281, 397, 516
8.30 270, 298, 399, 459, 516
8.31 516
8.32–39 205
8.32 149, 360, 395, 398, 401, 515, 517
8.34 501
8.35ff. 516
8.35 205, 360
8.38 178
8.39 305
9.4 486, 487
9.6–13 488
9.22f. 487
9.23 264, 354
9.25 477
9.27 488
9.28 85
9.29 488
9.33 221
10.2ff. 37
10.3 306
10.4 471
10.9 299
10.14ff. 360, 488
10.16 360
11.1f. 486
11.5 488
11.18 486, 489
11.20ff. 302
11.20 308
11.25f. 489

11.25 206
11.29 486
11.32 27, 224, 442
11.33–36 159
11.36 392
12 448
12.1 407, 490, 504, 506
12.2 293, 490
12.3 313, 445
12.4f. 445
12.6ff. 445
12.6 313, 448
12.8 428
12.13 466
12.15 466, 532
12.19 466
13 499
13.1ff. 502
13.3 502
13.7 502
13.8ff. 454
13.8 87
13.12 285, 294
14.1–15.3 450–2
14.1–12 450
14.1ff. 504
14.1 452
14.3 452
14.4 451, 464
14.5f. 450
14.6 451
14.7–9 452, 453
14.7f. 446
14.10–12 452
14.10ff. 122, 302, 419
14.10 452
14.13–23 450
14.13 452
14.14 450, 451
14.15 149, 439, 451
14.17 301, 451
14.20f. 452
14.22 452
14.23 452, 453
15.1–13 450
15.1–6 451
15.1 450, 452
15.2 452
15.3 452
15.5 446, 451, 452
15.7–13 451
15.7 368, 446, 451, 452, 454, 504
15.8 401, 451
15.10 486
15.13 310, 426
15.15f. 489
15.18 330
15.27 430
15.28 423
15.30ff. 467
15.30 504
16.25–26 392
16.26 305
16.27 392

1 Corinthians 454
1.7 278
1.8 302
1.9 460
1.10ff. 445
1.10 504
1.13 199, 316
1.17ff. 178
1.18 222
1.19f. 400
1.20 200
1.21 268
1.23 221, 222
1.24 270
1.25–31 412
1.25 222, 318
1.26 530
1.30 303, 524
2.2 525
2.3f. 525
2.4 525
2.6–16 504, 524–6
2.6f. 524
2.6 234, 525
2.7 222, 399, 524, 525
2.8 39, 241, 264, 368, 505, 525
2.8b 366
2.9 525
2.10f. 524
2.11 312, 401, 524
2.12 525
2.13 525, 526
2.14f. 126
2.14 401, 525
2.15 526
2.16 310, 312, 525
3.1 525
3.6 423
3.8 302, 419
3.12–15 302
3.12ff. 302
3.12f. 234
3.15 39, 302
3.16f. 309
3.16 310, 401
3.21f. 398, 501
4.1 402
4.2–4 302
4.4ff. 419
4.4f. 302
4.5 126, 285
4.7 434
4.9ff. 364
4.10ff. 224
5 504
5.1ff. 182
5.4f. 504
5.5 302
5.7 182, 208
6.1–7 502
6.1–4 445
6.2–4 180
6.2f. 126
6.7 132, 466
6.11 301, 306, 401, 445
6.12 449
6.13 20–477
6.13 406, 478
6.14 299, 354
6.16 478

6.17 395
6.18 477
6.19f. 478
6.19 309, 445
7.6ff. 483
7.29 178, 445, 483
7.31 280
7.34 445
7.40 401
8.2f. 448
8.6 299, 484
8.8 449
8.11 149, 439, 449
8.12 439, 449
9.1 276
9.11ff. 430
9.16f. 277
9.16 413
9.20 451
9.21 488, 498
9.23ff. 302
10.4–6 488
10.6–10 110
10.6 45
10.11f. 302
10.11 178
10.16f. 306, 506
10.16 182, 418, 460, 461
10.17 461
10.18 486, 487
10.31 446
10.33 442
11.1 191
11.2–16 478–9
11.3 478, 479
11.5f. 478
11.7f. 479
11.7 242, 281, 354, 399, 473, 478
11.8 92
11.11f. 478
11.14 479
11.15 478
11.23ff. 488
11.24 148, 149, 225
11.25 148
11.26ff. 418
11.26 182, 301
11.29 182
11.32 127, 535
11.34 127
12 448
12.3 36, 178, 401
12.8 312
12.10 126, 333
12.13 463
12.26 463
12.27 477
12.28 154
13.2ff. 418
13.2 306
13.5 434
13.8ff. 178
13.8 154
13.12 266, 295, 449, 470–1, 521
13.13 472
14.5 449
14.12 449
14.26 449
14.29 126
14.33 183
14.40 183
15.1–2 308
15.3–5 356
15.3 110, 225
15.14 13
15.15 299
15.17 261
15.20 227
15.23 509
15.24ff. 234
15.24 499, 509
15.25f. 523
15.26 228, 499, 509
15.27 484
15.28 484, 509
15.29 466
15.40f. 242
15.42ff. 519
15.43f. 403
15.43 459
15.44 362
15.45–50 467
15.45ff. 408
15.45 362, 469
15.49 294
15.54 172, 228
16.13 308
16.22 97, 279, 461

2 Corinthians 477
1.3–7 533
1.3ff. 392
1.3 427
1.4–5 427
1.5 302
1.6 199–200
1.7 533
1.8–9 427
1.8 533
1.11 413, 467
1.12 413, 415
1.14 302, 413, 506, 512
1.20 284, 399, 401
1.22 178
1.24 308
2.2 535
2.3 535
2.14 367
3–4 358, 359
3 347, 520, 522
3.1–4.6 490, 491–2
3.1ff. 488
3.2 255, 491
3.3 255, 400, 401
3.5 434
3.6–4.6 471
3.6 363, 471, 491
3.7–11 26
3.7 359, 471, 491
3.8f. 411
3.8 360, 363
3.9f. 284
3.9 471, 491
3.10 298
3.11 492
3.12–15 492

3.12 367, 411, 471, 472
3.13–15 521
3.13 264, 471
3.14 471
3.15 264, 471
3.16ff. 426
3.16f. 472
3.16 472
3.17 401, 403, 521, 522
3.18 24, 241, 264, 281, 284, 293, 297, 343, 362, 364, 367, 368, 401, 459, 472, 478, 492, 505, 506, 520, 521
4.1–2 360
4.2 361, 491
4.3f. 505
4.3 520
4.4ff. 358
4.4 147, 241, 255, 270, 281, 284, 366, 472, 491, 495, 505, 520, 521
4.5 360, 361, 411, 506, 521
4.6 18, 264, 281, 284, 344, 359, 368, 411, 470, 521
4.7–5.8 490, 492–4
4.7–11 413
4.7 361, 414
4.10–15 183
4.10–11 361, 493
4.10f. 427
4.10 505
4.11 196
4.12 462, 492
4.13 493
4.14 299, 493
4.15 310, 427, 454, 493
4.16 294, 407
4.17 114, 493, 513, 536
5.1–8 493
5.4 228
5.5 178
5.7 485
5.9–6.10 490, 494–5
5.9 494
5.10 118, 122, 302, 419, 490, 492
5.11 449, 490, 494
5.12 413
5.14–15 360, 494
5.14f. 149, 181, 301, 304
5.14 97, 205, 208, 306, 396, 402, 539
5.15 391, 403
5.16f. 235
5.16 363, 487, 494
5.17–21 489
5.17 218, 294, 363, 494, 501
5.18 181, 205, 284
5.19f. 512
5.20 305, 494, 504
5.21 149, 205, 208, 284, 298, 301, 363, 396, 443, 509
5.21a 207
6.1–10 183
6.1 302, 494
6.4–5 494
6.4 494
6.6–7 494
6.7 414, 495
6.8–10 494
6.8ff. 490
6.10 536
6.14–7.1 461
6.14ff. 461
6.16–18 461
6.16 309
7.4 310, 411, 533
7.8f. 535
8.1–9.15 427–31
8.1 428
8.2 310, 428
8.3 428
8.4 428
8.5 428
8.6 428
8.7 310, 428, 430
8.8 429
8.9 264, 304, 428, 429
8.10f. 428
8.10 429
8.11–12 430
8.14 430
8.15 430
8.19 431
8.23 479
8.24 431
9.6 430
9.8 310, 430
9.10 431
9.11 428
9.12 431
9.13 428, 431
9.14–15 428
9.14 431
9.15 266, 267, 431
10.1 504
10.4 183, 532
10.5 15
10.12f. 414
10.12 313
10.13 313
10.15 310, 313
10.16 313
11.2 476, 484
11.14 367
11.15 302
11.16f. 413
11.21 413, 414
11.23–29 413
11.23f. 413
11.23 518
11.27 518
11.29 222

12.1 413
13.2ff. 413
12.4 266
12.7–9 531
12.9 310, 488
12.10 373, 488, 531
12.11ff. 414
12.11 413
12.12 330
12.15 311, 414
13.2–5 407
13.3 293
13.4 311, 414
13.5 293, 308
13.13 460

Galatians 111, 454, 488
1.1 299
1.15f. 358, 360
2.9 462
2.19–20 360, 407
2.19f. 407
2.19 196, 397
2.20 97, 149, 205, 225, 293, 301, 304, 454
3.1 298
3.13 149, 204, 225, 298, 301, 304, 363, 396
3.16 488
3.17 185, 299
3.19f. 184
3.19 185, 443, 496
3.20 86
3.23 306
3.24 13
3.25 306
3.26 407
3.28 446, 495
3.29 488
4.2 13
4.3 498
4.4 88
4.6 309, 395, 396, 405
4.9 449, 498
4.19 293, 407
4.26ff. 475
4.26 500
5.1 403, 500
5.4 308
5.5 278
5.6 313
5.11 222
5.14 87
5.19 423
5.22 423
5.23 488
5.24 445
5.25 445
6.1–10 445
6.1f. 447
6.2 488
6.5 447
6.6 462
6.7ff. 302
6.14 196, 412
6.15 294, 501
6.16 313, 488

Ephesians 476, 477
1.3–14 392
1.3–10 469
1.3 392, 393, 398
1.4–10 214, 424
1.4f. 405
1.4 393, 483, 517
1.5–6 393
1.5 393
1.6 393, 409, 431, 433, 469
1.7 393, 394, 396, 482, 517
1.8 310, 394, 398, 426, 448
1.9 393, 394
1.10 161, 184, 283, 394
1.11–13 394
1.11 393
1.12 393, 398, 454
1.13f. 489
1.14 178, 393, 398, 454
1.15 395
1.17–20 270
1.17 284, 368, 394
1.18f. 270
1.18 14, 354, 355, 358, 394, 395
1.19–23 394
1.19 394
1.20 354
1.23 395
2.1–10 394
2.1 395
2.6 196, 364
2.7 365
2.8 395
2.10 311
2.11–22 395
2.11ff. 462, 489
2.12 443
2.13 443
2.14–18 442–3
2.14 442, 443
2.15 442, 443
2.16 395, 442, 443, 454
2.17 443
2.18 442, 443
2.20 154
2.21 310
3.4 448
3.5 154
3.6 489
3.7 310
3.8 204, 208
3.9f. 504
3.9 358
3.10 270
3.12 410
3.14 410
3.15 479
3.16f. 395
3.16 264, 354, 395, 505
3.17f. 284
3.18f. 312

3.18 314, 448
3.19 16, 87, 397
3.20 267
3.21 392, 399
4 448
4.1–2 447
4.1 308
4.2 398
4.3–7 445
4.3f. 463
4.4 395, 447
4.7 313
4.9 395
4.10–16 447
4.10ff. 149
4.10f. 174
4.10 498
4.11–16 463
4.13 313, 395, 507
4.15f. 506
4.15 310, 449
4.16 395, 449
4.20ff. 125
4.23 294
4.24 311
4.25 294, 445
4.28 466
4.32–5.2 446
4.32 445
5 306, 354, 478, 480–1
5.1 445
5.2 205, 207, 225, 308, 445
5.3 316
5.8 285
5.9 423, 433
5.11 423, 461
5.21ff. 475, 506
5.21 445
5.23–27 480
5.24 306, 483
5.25ff. 395, 405
5.25 149, 225, 483
5.26 58
5.27 93, 354, 399, 473, 482, 540
5.28–31 481
5.28 92, 483
5.29 483
5.31 92
5.32 92, 395, 473, 481
5.33 483
6.11ff. 294
6.20 411
6.24 97

Philippians
1.5 462
1.7 462
1.8 293
1.9 284, 310
1.11 423
1.19f. 411
1.19 362, 401, 467
1.22 423
1.23 360
1.26 413
1.27–30 445
1.27 463
2 244, 299
2.1–8 257–8, 445
2.1 460, 463
2.2–8 98
2.2 447
2.3 258, 445
2.4 258
2.5 293
2.6–11 147, 158, 159, 211
2.6ff. 304
2.6 211
2.7 146, 208, 216, 280, 318, 325
2.8 223, 363
2.9ff. 330
2.11 442
2.12 302
2.13f. 446
2.13 445
2.16 413
2.17 98, 489
3.3 412
3.4ff. 98
3.9 302, 407
3.10f. 312
3.10 402
3.11 196, 397
3.12–14 402
3.12f. 10, 178
3.12 181, 266, 294, 302, 449
3.13f. 181
3.13 505
3.15 266
3.16 355
3.17 98, 490
3.19 406–7, 503
3.20f. 294
3.20 182, 278, 500
3.21 196, 293, 362, 459, 501, 519
4.1 512
4.4 539
4.5 183, 445
4.6f. 183
4.7 267
4.14 462
4.15 462
4.17 423, 430
4.19f. 392
4.19 264, 355

Colossians
1.5f. 423
1.6 310
1.9 284, 423, 448
1.10 284, 308, 310, 397, 426
1.11 147, 354, 399
1.12 285
1.13–23 214
1.13 281, 495
1.15–20 159, 280
1.15ff. 283, 299
1.15 366
1.18 397
1.19 13
1.20 205, 363
1.24 199, 537

1.26f. 504
1.27f. 270
1.27 264, 293, 355, 357, 485, 506, 507
1.28 398, 486
2.2–3 100
2.2 310
2.3 152, 204
2.8 498
2.10 174
2.14f. 230
2.15 174, 233
2.17 507
2.19 310
2.20 498
3.1–4 445
3.3f. 357, 520
3.3 365, 500, 531
3.4 459
3.5ff. 446
3.8ff. 294
3.9f. 445
3.10f. 284
3.10 284, 293, 294
3.11 293
3.12f. 293
3.12 445, 447
3.13 445, 466
3.15 466
3.16 467
3.18ff. 475
4.3 467
4.5 308
4.18 467

1 Thessalonians
1.2 467
1.5 310
1.9–10 364
1.10 299
2.2 411
2.12 308
2.13 467, 530
2.19f. 413, 512
2.20 267, 479, 506
3.12 426
3.13 302
4.6 445
4.8 310, 401, 445
4.13ff. 508
4.17 179
5.1ff. 179
5.3 514
5.5ff. 182
5.5 285
5.8 294
5.9 445
5.10 149
5.17 265
5.25 467

2 Thessalonians
1.3 310
1.9 147
1.10 357, 459
1.11f. 310
1.12 459
2.8–10 277
2.8 275, 321, 510
2.10 278
2.13f. 445
3.9 490
3.14f. 504

1 Timothy
1.5 87, 454
1.9 503
1.11 255, 503
1.14 310
1.17 392
1.20 504
2.1 503
2.4ff. 184
2.4f. 442
2.5f. 498
2.6 149
2.10 316
2.15 308
3.2 466
3.16 159, 261, 279, 355, 403
4.10 442
4.12 490
5.22 461
5.24 127
6.4 400
6.11ff. 278
6.11 511
6.13 217
6.14 275
6.16 86, 266, 279

2 Timothy
1.7ff. 278
1.8f. 310
1.10 275
1.12 278
1.14 309
2.1 310
2.6 423
3.1 511
4.1–8 278
4.1 122, 275
4.5 278
4.6 489, 511
4.8 122, 275, 278

Titus
1.8 466
2.7 490
2.11 275, 442
2.13f. 278
2.13 275, 357, 507
3.4 278
3.5 310
3.10f. 504

Philemon
8 411
22 467

Hebrews 35, 306–7
1.1–3.6 498
1.1–3 92
1.1 13, 94
1.2 13, 40, 90
1.3 13, 129, 146, 157, 211, 280, 281, 283, 369, 501

1.4 174
1.5 56
1.13 355
2.2 496
2.5ff. 370
2.5 174
2.8f. 294
2.9 149, 210, 355, 369, 370, 371
2.10 266–7, 316, 324, 370
2.11 91, 92
2.12 217
2.13 207
2.14f. 91
2.14 92, 234, 371
2.18 73
3–4 489
3.1 295, 371
3.3–6 91
3.3 372
3.8–11 45
3.8f. 73
4.12f. 45
4.12 117–18, 122
4.15 36
5.5 56, 245
5.7–10 370
5.7–8 224
5.8 73, 370
5.9 267
5.14 76, 126
6.2 124
6.4–8 234
6.4f. 371
7.3 234
7.9f. 41
7.26 316
7.27 207, 370
7.28 208, 234
8.1 355
8.5 284, 372, 507
9.5 372
9.11f. 234, 372
9.12 207
9.14 148, 207
9.16 234
9.23 372
9.24 234
9.26 207
9.28 278
10.1 284
10.3 207
10.4 207
10.5–10 373
10.5–7 370
10.7 207
10.10 207, 234
10.12 207, 234, 355
10.14 207
10.16f. 373
10.19ff. 371
10.20 234
10.22 310
10.24f. 504
10.33 364
11 50, 136, 186, 307
11.3 186
11.9 501
11.10 500
11.13 182, 295, 371, 501
11.16 500
11.26 136, 224, 295, 371
11.27 295, 371
11.40 186
12.1–3 50
12.1 294
12.2–3 370
12.2 133, 135, 211, 224, 295, 307, 371
12.5–13 535
12.11 535, 536
12.18–21 277
12.22–24 277
12.22ff. 475
12.22 500
12.25f. 234
12.28f. 540
13.2 466
13.7 540
13.8 365
13.11ff. 489
13.14 489

James
1.2f. 71
1.2 398, 536
1.8 126
1.10 19
1.13 71
1.14 469
1.15 509
1.17 286
1.21 294
1.25 436, 500
2.1–17 433
2.8 436, 500
2.10f. 39
2.20ff. 111
2.21 186
4.8 126
4.11 119
4.12 119

1 Peter 99
1.1 501
1.3ff. 392
1.4 19
1.6–8 536
1.6 71, 536
1.7 373, 399
1.8 19, 267, 374
1.10f. 276, 295
1.11 136, 174, 347, 355
1.12 174
1.17 501
1.20 174
1.21 355
1.24 19
2.1 294
2.2 310
2.5 309
2.6–8 221
2.9 489
2.11 182, 501
2.13 502
2.17 502

2.18–24 99
2.18ff. 475
2.19f. 373
2.21 190
2.22 207
2.23 148, 224
3.14ff. 373
3.16 374
3.18–20 230
3.18 125, 279, 403
3.19 230
3.20f. 46
3.22 174
4.9 466
4.11 147, 269
4.12–19 99
4.12f. 71, 536
4.13 19, 357, 373
4.14 19, 374
4.15ff. 373
4.15 373
4.17 127, 535
4.19 536
5.1 347, 373
5.2f. 490
5.4 373, 540
5.10 308
5.11 269, 392
5.12 308

2 Peter
1.4 311
1.16–18 347–8, 373
1.18 344
2.4 229
3.3f. 179
3.6f. 58
3.9 442
3.15ff. 111
3.18 310, 392

1 John 99
1.1–3 289
1.1 276
1.2f. 198
1.3 462
1.5 285, 357, 433, 455, 534
1.6–7 285
1.6 462
1.7 415, 462
1.8–10 285
1.8 415
1.9 415
1.10 415
2.1f. 458
2.2 200, 252, 415
2.6 308
2.8 285, 456
2.9f. 433
2.10 285, 308
2.11 292
2.14 309
2.15 457
2.18 178
2.19 504
2.20ff. 540
2.24 309
2.27 284, 309
2.28 411
3.1 457
3.2 266, 470, 526
3.7 415
3.9 309, 385, 395, 415, 422
3.16 148, 208, 256, 279, 415, 455, 458
3.17 257, 433, 458
3.18 415
3.19f. 286
3.20f. 458
3.20 267, 415
3.21 410, 415
3.23 456
3.24 309, 312, 410
4.10 251, 252, 455
4.12 266, 309, 380
4.13 309, 312
4.14 36
4.15 309
4.16 309, 455
4.17 127, 411
4.18 309
420 288, 456, 457, 458
5.1f. 457
5.1 457
5.2–3 458
5.2 457
5.3 437
5.6ff. 309
5.6 226
5.8 58, 226
5.9ff. 312
5.10 457
5.10b 384
5.14f. 410
5.16f. 504
5.20 277

2 John
1 476
2 309
5 476
9 308, 309
10f. 504
11 461
13 476

3 John
9f. 415

Jude
6 229
22f. 504
24–25 239
24f. 269
25 147

Revelation 523
1.6 147, 269, 489
1.7 539
1.12–16 343
1.14 119
1.16 118
1.18 39, 103, 229, 230
2.16 118
2.18 119
3.9 268
3.12 500

3.19 535
4.10 268
4.11 269
5.5f. 510
5.5 103, 149, 511
5.6 138, 149, 200, 214
5.9f. 489
5.9 138, 149, 510
5.12 138, 149, 269
5.13 269
5.14 268
6.16 214, 511
7.11 268
7.12 270, 398
7.13ff. 489
7.17 214
11.1 314
11.3ff. 344
11.16 268
11.17f. 398
11.19–12.1 64
11.19 476
12.1 476
12.10 398
12.12 179
12.14 475
13.8 138, 149, 175, 214, 482
14.4 476
14.6 255
14.7 268
14.16 118
15.2 267
15.3f. 398
15.3 267
15.4 268
15.8 267, 357
17.5 503
17.14 511
18.3 503
18.4 461
18.9–24 267
18.21 210
19.1f. 398
19.1 147
19.4 268
19.5 398
19.7f. 398
19.7 475
19.8 475
19.9 476
19.10 268
19.11 126, 511
20.9 543
21.2 500
21.4 527
21.9ff. 64
21.9f. 95
21.9 475
21.10 475, 500
21.11 500
21.12–17 507
21.14 95
21.15–17 314
21.15ff. 267
21.16 314
21.17 314
22.1 226
22.4 266
22.8 268
22.9 268
22.17 279, 476

Gospel of Thomas 23–4
8 123

Testament of Levi
2.5 343
4.4 86
5.7 343

Testament of Naphtali 542
4.5 86

Testament of Zablun
8.2 86

Life of Adam
6 71
11 296
12 296
16 296
17 296
20f. 296

Apocalypse of Abraham
21.1 71

Apocalypse of Peter 346, 348

Syrian Apocalypse of Baruch
51.10 343

2 Esdras
13.10f. 510

Enoch
13.7 343
13.10 343
14.2 343

Ethiopic Enoch
45.3 319
51.3 319
55.4 319
61.8 319
62.2ff. 319
69.27ff. 319

Slavonic Enoch
23 67

Acts of John 348

Acts of Peter 348

Qumran writings 285, 301
Manual of Discipline (1QS)
1.3–4 435
3.18 228
4.18 228

Babylonian Talmud
Sanhedrin
43a 330–1

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
3 9015 01516 9892